

THE LIBRARY

Periodical Collection

CLASS

BOOK

J 39-
e. Jackson and Jan
T H E L A D I E S

HOME JOURNAL

JANUARY 1922

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY PHILADELPHIA

15 CENTS

By subscription $1.50

In Canada, 20 cents; by subscription, $2.00

Vol. XXXIX, No. 1. Published weekly at Philadelphia. Entered as second-class matter May 6, 1911, at the Post Office at Philadelphia, under the Act of March 3, 1879. Additional entry at Columbus, Ohio, at Decatur, Ill., at Chicago, Ill., and at Indianapolis, Ind.

UNIV. OF MICHIGAN LIBRARY

Digitized by Google

Painted by B. Cory Kilvert for Cream of Wheat Co.

Copyright by Cream of Wheat Co.

"LEST WE FORGET"

THE PRICE of the HOME JOURNAL

PUBLISHED once a month, 15 cents the copy from all newsdealers. By subscription: To the United States and Possessions, including Cuba and Mexico, $1.50 the year, remittances from outside the U. S. proper and Canada to be by U. S. money order or by draft payable in U. S. funds on a bank in the U. S.

To Canada, by subscription, $2.00 the year. Single copies, 30 cents.

To Foreign Countries in the Postal Union, by subscription, postpaid, $3.00 the year, remittance to be by draft payable in U. S. funds on a bank in the U. S.

The Ladies' HOME JOURNAL

THE FAMILY MAGAZINE OF AMERICA

Incorporating The Home Journal. Registered in the United States Patent Office and in Foreign Countries

PUBLISHED ON THE FIRST DAY OF EACH MONTH BY

THE CURTIS
PUBLISHING COMPANY

INDEPENDENCE SQUARE
PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA

CYRUS H. K. CURTIS

PRESIDENT

C. H. LUDINGTON

TREASURER

PHILIP S. COLLINS

GENERAL BUSINESS MANAGER

WALTER D. FULLER

SECRETARY

WILLIAM BOYD

ADVERTISING DIRECTOR

BARTON W. CURRIE, Editor

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LORING A. SCHULER WALTER H. DOWER

MARTHA E. DODSON

Copyright, 1922 (trade-mark registered), by The Curtis Publishing Company, in the United States and Great Britain. London Office, 6, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W. C. All rights reserved. Entered as second-class matter May 6, 1911, at the Post Office at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, under Act of March 3, 1879. Additional entry as second-class matter at Columbus, Ohio, at Decatur, Illinois, at Chicago, Illinois, and at Indianapolis, Indiana.

A SKEPTICAL BUT TIMID PARENT GOES DETERMINED TO ASK WHY THE BOARD HAS GIVEN THE JOB OF TEACHING SCHOOL TO THE ROAD SUPER-INTENDENT'S DAUGHTER WHO HAS NEVER EVEN BEEN TO HIGH SCHOOL AND WHO HAS LOST HER PLACE IN THE TOWN STORE BECAUSE SHE WASN'T EFFICIENT ENOUGH FOR THAT

Illiterate America

We Boast of Our Education, but Most of Our Teachers are Untrained and Thousands of Schools are a Scandal

By CHARLES A. SELDEN

Illustrations by Thomas Fogarty

GO SLOW—SCHOOL. So reads one of the most familiar of the many kinds of signboards placed along the highways of America to guide or warn the drivers of the country's millions of automobiles. It is on the Lincoln Highway and the Mohawk Trail, and on all the other recently improved ancient and historic routes of the stagecoach and saddle-horse periods. It is scattered along the countless miles of new roads, the building of which in all states has been compelled by the development of the automobile. We all see it.

But the great American Republic seems to take these signs figuratively rather than literally. There are now enough millions of chauffeurs and car owners to think of them, in fairness, as representative of the American public.

We don't take or heed the school signs literally because we do not drive slowly in response to the warning. For proof of that statement watch the big and little cars streaming along at full speed by any country schoolhouse in front of which you happen to find yourself. Many drivers are even more reckless or thoughtless as to the risk of running through a group of children than they are in risking their own lives at a railroad grade crossing.

But it is as tax-paying citizens, as the responsible men and women of American villages, towns and cities that we seem to find figurative application to ourselves in that "Go Slow—School" sign. And we heed the warning. We go very slowly in committing ourselves to the cost of providing enough decent schoolhouses; we go at a snail's pace in providing for effective and complete use of such school facilities as we already have; we come, most of us, to a full stop in the most vital matter of all—the getting of teachers who have something real to give to our children and who are trained in the giving of it.

There are approximately seven hundred thousand school-teachers in America. John J. Tigert, the United States Commissioner of Education, estimates that only about one-fifth of them are adequately trained for their work.

Of course there are creditable exceptions in our attitude toward that legend on the signpost, whether taken in its literal sense or the other way. Every once in a while there comes along a driver who will ride past a school building at safe speed.

Here and there throughout the country there is a good school and a good teacher.

But such a school is an exception, merely a show place on which to base America's boasting about its public education. Here and there can be found a city with nearly all its schools fairly good and with an encouraging proportion of creditable teachers. There are even states which have reduced the bad spots in their public-school systems to minimum proportions, although there is no state—in New England or out of it—without its bad spots, its very bad spots.

Still more exceptional, there are some natural-born teachers in America, men and women who love to teach, who are teaching because they would rather teach than loaf or do any other kind of work. Such a teacher, of course, makes a school a good school, whether it is housed in a tumble-down frame shack in a poverty-stricken region of mountaineers or in the most modern and most expensive of schools in the well-to-do quarter of a city. Such teachers are so scarce, however, that they have never got into the oceans of school statistics. Still we indulge in loud and incessant boasting of the few splendid but locally restricted things we have in our public schooling to such an extent that we ignore and forget the defects.

The people of New York City, for example, pay no attention to the fact that their schools are shamefully overcrowded, that many thousands of their children are in school buildings which have been condemned as fire traps; they pay no attention to these things except when a city election is on, and the party which is out makes a political issue of school conditions against the party that is in. As soon as election is over the school bells ring the children back to another four years' attendance in the fire traps.

ach a public attitude as that toward public schools is far more typical of the spirit of the country as a whole than is the occasional insistence of this or that community that housing be adequate and that teachers be trained.

We pick out the few good spots and hold them up to ourselves and to educational authorities of other countries, not, honestly, as isolated examples, but as typical of educational conditions throughout every nook and corner of all the forty-eight states and the island possessions. Furthermore, the favored few who live in the good spots don't know or care anything about the other places.

What a splendid thing the "little old red schoolhouse" was for this country in its small beginnings! What a pest and a handicap to progress it has become in later years! Why? Because we still boast about it and talk about it and set it up as an oratorical campaign screen to blind our eyes to the fact that we are trying to get on to-day with miserable shacks, thousands of which haven't even got red paint on them.

In a Vermont school district the other day I was told by a mother, who had been a teacher, that the morning session in the school shanty of that district never amounted to anything in winter because it was impossible to get the place warm before noon.

"They have the same stove there," she added, "that they had when my father went to that school sixty years ago."

In the adjoining school district of this same county, parents of several of the pupils told me that the outdoor water-closets had not been cleaned or emptied for four years. They were beginning to think that that might have something to do with the fact that there is so much sickness among the children after school opens every fall.

Suppose a skeptical but timid parent goes to school meeting, determined to ask why the school board has given the job of teaching the district school to the road superintendent's daughter who has never even been to high school and who has lost her place in the near-by town store because she wasn't efficient enough for that.

Of course the timid parent doesn't really have to ask why, because she and all her neighbors know that it was because the road superintendent used the greater part of the last highway appropriation to improve the old dirt road running by the farm of the school-board chairman. But nevertheless she has come to meeting determined to ask.

If it is a moderately enlightened community the school chairman will have a vague notion that he has done something which may arouse criticism, and he is on guard. He makes a speech about the rule of three, the Constitution of the United States, the Declaration of Independence, the suffering at Valley Forge, the nation's hope of the future in the children of to-day and the little old red schoolhouse.

If the chairman happens to be a man who stayed in school himself more than four or five years when a boy and got into the Friday afternoon declamation period, he probably will tell the annual meeting that the torch of civilization was first lighted in the little old red schoolhouse.

But either way, the determination of the skeptical parent will falter and peter out before the grunts of approval from the taxpayers—the untrained teacher costs twenty-five or fifty dollars a month less than the one who knows something—and nobody will ask why the girl, not intelligent enough to make the right change over the dry-goods counter in the village store, has got the job of teaching addition, subtraction, multiplication and division to the children upon whom the future hope of the nation depends.

Thousands of Them

THERE are tens of thousands of such schools, such teachers, such road superintendents, such school-committee chairmen and such educationally swindled communities scattered through this country.

The picture of the annual meeting at which protest falls flat before pretense and humbug is no exaggeration. It will fit regions throughout the country with modifications to suit local conditions and with trivial changes to cover the special forms of greed and ignorance and petty graft by which the educational and sanitary and every other form of community welfare of this or that place is blocked.

There probably is no state in the Union which has not one or more such districts. Many states don't have much of anything else. Don't be fooled by state school laws which read so well on the statute books and lay down such reassuringly strict provisions for the qualifications of teachers and other matters. Those laws have big loopholes whereby any community evade the requirements for trained teachers and all the other educational stipulations which are formulated in state capitols and violated in school districts. There are so many communities availing themselves of those loopholes all the time that of the 700,000 school-teachers in America there are more than 500,000 not fitted for their work, according to the standards of the United States Bureau of Education.

According to the same authority, Federal Commissioner Tigert, we are a nation of sixth-graders taught by tenth-graders.

That means these two things: First, that the average age at which our children quit school for all time is the age of the sixth year in grammar school, two years before the age of entering high school; and secondly, that the average American school-teacher is a person who has gone only halfway through high school and had no other training or preparation for her work of developing the minds of children.

How About Lump Results?

THAT is the high-water mark which America can claim honestly for her public-school results, taking the nation as a whole. There are many sections of the country which rise above that average. Therefore there are many which fall below it. Kentucky, for example, taken as a whole, is a state of fourth-graders taught by eighth-graders. Nineteenths of the public-school teachers in that state have not been to high school. But there are several Southern states rated lower than Kentucky on a scale based on various factors other than that of teacher qualifications.

It is by ignoring, by not knowing and appreciating this general, nation-wide and low average condition of things that we have reached a flattering but utterly false appraisal of ourselves as an educated people.

We boast of the fact that the lump sum spent in elementary and secondary education in the whole country is in the neighborhood of three-quarters of a billion dollars a year—ten times as much as we spent half a century ago. But we don't talk much about the lump results. We pick and choose the show places and pretend to ourselves that they are typical. When educational commissions come to us from foreign countries to study our methods and results we show them the schools of Brookline, Massachusetts, and Berkeley,

California, and other similarly favored places in various sections of the country. The rotten spots scattered all the way across country from coast to coast and up and down from Lakes to Gulf are not exhibited. If they were, there are several European countries far less illiterate than America which would begin to look to the United States as a horrible example instead of a model, because the vast majority of our one hundred eight millions of people are living in regions where educational conditions are worse than mediocre.

Something of an awakening has followed the war because of the startling revelations of the intelligence tests to which American soldiers were subjected. Prior to the war America had confessed to seven per cent of illiteracy, an estimate based on the Federal Census and arrived at by the most inadequate, easy-going methods, which involved no test of any sort. But the careful examination of a million and a half soldiers showed that one-quarter of them were illiterate. They could neither read nor write. They were representative of this country's entire population; they came from every state. They were white and black, American-born and foreign-born.

But America cannot stand pat even on this estimate, that one-quarter of the population is illiterate, and be entirely honest with herself. What about the Americans who can read a very little and can write a very little, but don't? There are millions of them. Dean West, of Princeton, estimates that these near-illiterates would make up another quarter of the entire population, giving us a total of more than fifty million people in the United States who are not educated.

The other day, riding on a train in the Ohio Valley, I shared a seat in the smoking car with an amiable and conversational American citizen, to whom Dean West would certainly not give a degree, but who, for statistical purposes in census reports and in official general statements of social conditions, would be listed and counted as an educated American. He would not be thought of as among those who should be Americanized by some committee. On the contrary, his name found on the voting list or tax list by the hunters of statistics would be used by them in making up their grand total of American-born and educated citizens whom the newcomers should strive to emulate.

He was an Indiana tenant farmer, a man about thirty-five years old and the father of two small children. He was white, of course, and American-born. So were his parents, his grandparents and his great-grandparents American-born.

He was born in Hodgenville, Kentucky, where Abraham Lincoln was born, and had gone to school in Hodgenville. But he did not know whether Abraham Lincoln was a white man or a black man.

To be chronological, let's go back to the country school of which this Indiana farmer was a product. It is still producing citizens who will not be sure, when they are grown up, as to the color of Abraham Lincoln.

By the Lincoln Spring

IT WAS on my way north from Arkansas, where Governor McRae and the state school authorities are making an uphill but honest and stubborn fight to reduce illiteracy. It occurred to me to give myself a day off from the job of getting facts and impressions concerning public schools, by making a detour from the main line to Louisville to see the log cabin in which Lincoln was born near Hodgenville.

But it was no day off. Two miles out from the village is the cabin, now inclosed by the great stone memorial structure recently erected by the United States Government to preserve the sacred hut for generations to come. It stands upon a small hill and just below it is the spring, still running fresh and sparkling, from which the Lincoln family got its water supply. It was a dismal place then, according to Hay and Nicolay, the biographers of Lincoln.

It is even more dismal now as compared to the glorious place it should and might be because of memories and traditions. But the school children who drink from that spring to-day are not taught to find incentive or inspiration there.

On the inner wall of the memorial surrounding the log cabin is the following extract from one of Lincoln's own comments on his childhood and education: "There were some schools so called. There was absolutely nothing to excite ambition for education. Of course when I came of age I did not know much. Still somehow I could read, write and cipher to the rule of three, but that was all. The little advance I now have upon this store of education I have picked up from time to time under the pressure of necessity."

(Continued on Page 38)

WHAT A SPLENDID THING THE "LITTLE OLD RED SCHOOLHOUSE" WAS FOR THIS COUNTRY IN ITS SMALL BEGINNINGS! WHAT A PEST AND A HANDICAP TO PROGRESS IT HAS BECOME IN LATER YEARS!

MY MOTHER says that everybody in the world has got some special gift. Some people have one kind and some have another. I got my skates and dictionary book last spring when I was nine. I've always had my freckles.

My brother Carol's gift is being dumb. No matter what anybody says to him he doesn't have to answer 'em.

There was an old man in our town named Old Man Smith. Old Man Smith had a wonderful gift. It wasn't a Christmas gift, like toys and games. It wasn't a birthday gift, all stockings and handkerchiefs. It was the gift of finding things! He called it "The gift of the probable places."

Most any time when you lost anything he could find it for you. He didn't find it by floating a few tea leaves in a cup, or by trying to match cards, or by fooling with silly things like ghosts.

He didn't even find it with his legs. He found it with his head. He found it by thinking very hard with his head.

People came from miles around to borrow his head. He always charged everybody just the same, no matter what it was that they'd lost. One dollar was what he charged. It was just as much trouble to him, he said, to think about a thimble that was lost as it was to think about an elephant that was lost. I never knew anybody who lost an elephant.

When the postmaster's wife lost her diamond ring she hunted more than a hundred places for it. She was most distracted. She thought somebody had stolen it from her. She hunted it in all the newspapers. She hunted it in all the stores. She hunted it all up and down the village streets. She hunted it in the depot carriage. She hunted it in the hired girl's trunk. Miles and miles and miles she must have hunted it with her hands and with her feet.

OLD Man Smith found it for her without budging an inch from his wheel chair. Just with his head alone he found it. Just by asking her a question that made her mad he found it. The question that made her mad was about her baptismal name. Her baptismal name was Mehetabelle Euphemia.

"However in the world," said Old Man Smith, "did you get such a perfectly hideous name as Mehetabelle Euphemia?"

The postmaster's wife was madder than scat. She wrung her hands. She snapped her thumbs. She crackled her finger joints.

"Never—never," she said, had she been "so insulted."

"U-m-m-m: exactly what I thought," said Old Man Smith. "Now just when, if you can remember, was the last time that you felt you'd never been so insulted before?"

"Insulted?" screamed the postmaster's wife. "Why, I haven't been as insulted as this since two weeks ago last Saturday when I was out in my back yard under the mulberry tree dyeing my old white dress peach pink. And the druggist's wife came along and asked me if I didn't think I was just a little bit too old to be wearing peach pink? Me! Too old! Me!" screamed the postmaster's wife.

"U-m-m," said Old Man Smith. "Pink, you say? A little powdered cochineal, I suppose, and a bit of cream of tartar, and more than a bit of alum? It's a pretty likely combination to make the fingers slippery. And a lady what crackles her finger joints so every time she's mad—and snaps her thumbs and—yes! under the mulberry tree is a very probable place. One dollar, please."

The Gift of the Probable Places

By ELEANOR HALLOWELL ABBOTT

Illustration by H. J. Mowat

And when the grocer's nephew got suspended from college for sitting up too late at night and getting headaches, and came to spend a month with his uncle and couldn't find his green-plaid overcoat when it was time to go home, he was perfectly positive that somebody had borrowed it from the store, or that he'd dropped it out of the delivery wagon working overtime, or that he'd left it at the high-school social.

BUT Old Man Smith found it for him just by glancing at his purple socks and his plaid necktie and his plush waistcoat.

"Oh, yes, of course it's perfectly possible," said Old Man Smith, "that you dropped it from the basket of a balloon on your way to a missionary meeting. But have you looked in the young widow Gayette's back hall? 'Bout three pegs from the door, where the shadows are fairly private? One dollar, please," said Old Man Smith.

And when the old preacher lost the hymn book that George Washington had given his grandfather, everybody started to take up the floor of the church to see if it had fallen down through a crack in the pulpit. But Old Man Smith sent a boy running to beg 'em not to tear down the church till they'd looked in the old lawyer's pantry, 'bout the second shelf between the ice chest and the cheese crock,

SHE SAT DOWN ON THE GROUND AT OLD MAN SMITH'S FEET. BUT ALL THE TIME SHE KEPT RIGHT ON BRAIDING THE HANDLE OF THE BLUE CHINA CUP INTO HER HAIR

Sunday evening after meeting was rather a lean time with old preachers, he said he'd always noticed. And old lawyers was noted for their fat larders.

And there was certain things about cheese somehow that seemed to be soothin' to the memory.

"Why, how perfectly extraordinary!" said everybody.

"One dollar, please," said Old Man Smith.

AND when little Tommy Bent ran away to the city his mother hunted all the hospitals for him, and made 'em drag the river, and wore a long black veil all the time, and howled.

But Old Man Smith said: "Oh, shucks! It ain't at all probable, is it, that he was aimin' at hospitals or rivers when he went away? What's the use of worryin' over the things he weren't aimin' at till you've investigated the things he was?"

"Aimin' at?" sobbed Mrs. Bent. "Who in the wide world could ever tell what any little boy was aimin' at?"

"And there's something in that too," said Old Man Smith. "What did he look like?"

"Like his father," said Mrs. Bent.

"U-m-m. Plain, you mean?" said Old Man Smith.

"He was only nine years old," sobbed Mrs. Bent. "But he did love meetings so. No matter what they was about he was always hunting for some new meeting to go to. He just seemed naturally to dote his self on any crowd of people that was all facing the other way, looking at somebody else. He had a little cowlick at the back of his neck," sobbed Mrs. Bent. "It was a comical little cowlick. People used to laugh at it. He never liked to sit any place where there was anybody sitting behind him."

"NOW you're talking," said Old Man Smith. "Will he answer to the name of 'Little Tommy Bent'?"

"He will not," said Mrs. Bent. "He's that stubborn. He's exactly like his father."

Old Man Smith wrote an entirely new advertisement to put in the papers. It didn't say anything about rivers or hospitals or "dead or alive." It just said:

LOST—In the back seat of most any meeting a very plain little boy. Will not answer to the name of "Little Tommy Bent." Stubborn like his father.

"We'll put that in about being 'stubborn,'" said Old Man Smith, "because it sounds quaint and will interest people."

"It won't interest Mr. Bent," sobbed Mrs. Bent. "And it seems awful cruel to make it so public about the child's being plain."

Old Man Smith spoke coldly to her. "Would you rather lose him—handsome," he said, "or find him—plain?"

Mrs. Bent seemed to think that she'd rather find him plain. She found him within two days! He was awful plain. His shoes were all worn out and his stomach was flat. He was at a meeting of men who sell bicycles to China. The men were feeling pretty sick. They'd sent hundreds and hundreds of he-bicycles to China, and the Chinamen couldn't ride 'em on account of their skirts. It was the smell of an apple in a man's pocket that made Tommy Bent follow the man to the meeting. And he answered to every name except "Tommy Bent," so they knew it was he.

(Continued on Page 40)

The Vanishing Girl

By PHYLLIS DUGANNE

Illustrations by Pruett Carter

HER EYES MET HIS CHALLENGINGLY. "IF YOU'VE RECOVERED FROM BEING AN INTERESTING MYSTERY COME TO THE MASQUERADE AT THE COUNTRY CLUB TO-NIGHT—"

THE love affair that culminated when Duff Schuyler met The Girl in the spring of 1921 really had its beginning shortly after he landed in New York in December of 1920. The whole trouble was that Duff didn't know it; he wasn't even sure that The Girl was real until that June afternoon when she stood at his side in a red dress, her dark hair blowing back from a low, white forehead.

Duff had not the slightest intention of falling in love in the winter of 1920; there were too many important things for him to do. They were, for the most part, negative things that he wanted as he sat stretched out in the steamer chair on the boat that was so steadily widening the distance between itself and South America, lessening the remoteness of New York. First of all, most important of all, he wanted to forget. The banging of doors, the creaking and thumping of the boat, brought back the explosion a hundred times a day during the voyage. Over and over he heard again the roar that had persisted, increasing through the jumble of other sounds—screams, groans, terrible splinterings; and over and over, the silence which had seemed for an instant as though the whole world had become a vacuum.

At each unexpected noise Duff winced and closed his eyes abruptly. In itself the explosion in the Schuyler copper mine had been a ghastly thing; but normally a young man of twenty-six could see all that Duff had seen without serious after-effects. He had been exhausted, however, when he arrived at the mine after a year in France. He had taken his responsibilities heavily; Schuyler, Senior, had been unable to get away from the New York office, and he had placed his son in complete charge of the mine. The young man had worked hard; in the evenings at the hotel he had puzzled over plans and reports, had conferred and worried until there were few of the day's allotment of hours left for him to sleep in before it would be time to be out again.

THE explosion had been the touch that was needed to bring a complete collapse; and here he was, looking out over the dark water with an expression in his gray eyes that made other passengers wonder.

In his first week at home his family watched him with apprehension and interest. His seventeen-year-old sister, Elisabeth, seemed slightly disappointed that his nervous collapse did not make him a more interesting invalid. Even his mother, after the first few days of waiting anxiously for him to do something which would warrant her in exercising her long-neglected duties as a loving parent and tender nurse, rather gave it up. She still watched him with a perplexed expression in her mild eyes, but that was mainly because he was, if not an interesting invalid, at least an interesting stranger. It took longer for Duff and his mother to become friends than it had for him and Elisabeth. His mother was slightly embarrassed at the thought that the tall, sunburned young man was the baby whom she had brought into the world.

Probably his father came nearest to knowing the young man, to realizing a little the things that he felt; but Schuyler, Senior, was a busy man.

Elisabeth found Duff alone in the library on his second Sunday at home. She came in quietly and sat down in the armchair opposite him.

"You've grown very pretty," he said, looking at her gravely.

She smiled, unembarrassed. "I must have changed a lot," she said.

"You have. You —" He smiled again, because words were inadequate; he was a bit out of the way of using them too.

Elisabeth crossed her ankles precisely and looked at her finger nails for a moment. "You've been away from New York a long time," she said finally. "You ought to start going around more, Duff."

"Ought I?" He looked at her in amusement.

"I—could take you around quite a bit," she continued. "I mean, you don't know any of the nice restaurants or tea-places or—or anything. To think you'd never even heard of the Quartier Club!"

"It's awful," he agreed solemnly. "But why all this solicitude on your part? Although I suppose it is embarrassing to have a brother who goes around craning his neck at the skyscrapers."

"It isn't exactly that," she said. She grinned and raised her eyes to his honestly. "You see it's this way: Mother thinks I'm much too young to go dashing around with the opposite sex. You don't know how she treats me, Duff—as if I were a mere infant. And—well, I thought if you wanted to see all the new places and shows and everything like that, why, we'd be killing two birds with one stone."

DUFF'S mouth twitched. "You know that's awfully dear of you, Elisabeth," he said. "I do appreciate it. Where would you like to go to-morrow night?"

"Duff!" Elisabeth's eyes shone. "You're a darling. We'll go to a show—they say The Rose Girl is awfully good—and then to the Quartier Club. Freddy goes there all the time. And —"

"Freddy?" asked Duff, raising his eyebrows politely.

"Freddy Burns; didn't you know him?" Elisabeth was trying valiantly to appear casual. "And I'll tell you what, Duff—you must pretend you're a suitor; not to any of the boys I know of course, but to—to —"

"The world at large?" he suggested.

"Yes, that's it. And you won't be jealous or—tell, if I dance with a lot of other people, will you?"

"I won't do either of those things," he assured her.

From that day on he was docile in the competent hands of Elisabeth. New York seemed so immense, so much a great complex machine of which he was not a part but in which he was thoroughly tangled, that he was really grateful for her guidance. It was, on the whole, a rather uninspiring part to play, that of escort to Elisabeth; but the thought that it was his baby sister who told him where to go and what to order, how to address the waiter under special circumstances and what to tip the hat boy, made it amusing more than anything else.

Before she had taken him in hand he had felt more alone than ever before in his life. His friends had scattered everywhere. The girls he had known seemed to have vanished from the face of the earth. There had been sisters of some of the men at college, but they had, for the most part, turned into wives and mothers before he was out of uniform; one or two girls he had known in the city were still available, but they seemed irrevocably a part of another existence. So he followed the slender figure of his sister from restaurant to cabaret; from theater to one of the lunch rooms on Fifty-ninth Street, where sailors on shore leave ate buckwheat cakes and bacon with their sweethearts side by side with the year's debutantes and their gallants. It developed into an ideal arrangement for them both. Elisabeth's bright blue eyes could roam about the room without fear for the attention of her escort, and Duff had the advantage of seeing New York whirl about him without having to make sparkling comments to the young woman at his side.

JANUARY and February sped past, and Duff remained clay in the hands of Elisabeth.

"We're going to have luncheon at one of those new little French restaurants to-day," she would say at breakfast, fixing wide eyes on him as innocently as though she and Freddy Burns had not made all arrangements the day before.

And Duff would acquiesce meekly and smile reassuringly at his mother.

At the restaurant he would sit, looking dizzily about the crowded room, not hearing the small talk of his sister and the ardent Freddy in the bubbling mist of words and laughter that floated upward from the tables. Before—years before—he had been as much a part of all this as Freddy. Now he sat like a disembodied spirit returned to old haunts, a silent, puzzled, fascinated watcher.

"We're going over to the Clover Club to dance, Duff dear," his sister's voice would pierce the blur of his mind.

"Yes." And he would pay the check, docilely get his coat and hat, and tag along.

Sometimes he found Freddy's eyes fastened on him curiously. His clothes were all right; Freddy certainly had no fault to find with his execution of the rôle of chaperon. But there was something queer about the man. He could not be led into conversation about South America or even about the war. He never talked; he rarely laughed, although a bewildered smile always hovered about his lips. But Freddy did not complain; far from it. Elisabeth's eyes were soft and bright, and the hand he held in his beneath the table was warm and friendly, if nothing more.

Elisabeth had disappeared into the ladies' room to repair the ravages of three successive dances on her carefully and needlessly applied complexion, and Freddy and Duff were alone at the table. After a few minutes Freddy coughed nervously, and as Duff dragged his attention slowly to the youth, he realized that he was expected to say something. He wondered what.

"You ought to bring a girl along some time," Freddy said. "It's not much fun to just sit around like you do."

"I suppose it isn't," Duff agreed and laughed. The boy must think him an utter idiot. He tried to brighten. "I've been away so long," he said, "that I don't believe I'd know what to say to a girl."

"You needn't tell me there weren't any gay señoritas in South America," said Freddy, looking infinitely wise.

Duff grinned. There had been one señorita—but Freddy wouldn't believe that story. One of the Americans in the company had married her and proceeded to treat her abominably. And Duff had stepped in to help—there had been no one else to do it—and had finally taken the girl back to her parents. A lovely little thing she had been, too, drooping, teary, pathetic.

"Memories—mem-o-ries," said Freddy insinuatingly. "Did you ever know Miss Morton—Helena Morton? She's a queen, if there ever was one. Why, she —"

"Freddy, I could positively expire listening to this tune. To think that I've wasted even a bar of it!" Elisabeth stood before them, swinging with the music. "Dance with me."

"You ought to have a 'Wet Paint' sign on your forehead," Freddy said as he swung off with her.

Duff certainly felt out of it; one did not make remarks of that sort to a girl like Elisabeth in his day. And a girl like his sister did not — In his day. . . . "Oh, thunder!" he groaned, and sank back disgustedly.

IN MARCH Elisabeth bore him to the Metropolitan, preceded him into the Schuyler box in her velvet cape and sat down magnificently. She was playing the young wife that night; Duff caught her moods amazingly and entered into them.

"This is a bore, of course," she said languidly, opening her new feather fan as nonchalantly as though it were an umbrella. "But we can dance afterwards." She looked about the theater disdainfully, but her eyes sparkled with excitement.

Duff watched her indulgently; she was such a lovely young thing, so absurdly young and so tantalizingly sophisticated. He was just beginning to consider her as a person; gradually he was cutting into her conversations with Freddy, drawing her out. He did not wholly approve of her, the girl who had grown up while he was away, and little by little he was finding her lacking as a companion. In short, Duff was reaching the point where he looked at women in cafés and theaters as human beings, not as attractive sections of the scenery.

"See that girl in the evening cape over there, Duff, in the box near the stage?" she asked. "That's Helena Morton, who lives in Scarborough near our maison. She's awfully cute, isn't she? And the girl beside her, the one just taking off her wrap —"

Duff turned toward the box. A door in the corridor crashed shut as his eyes found the two girls, and he jumped to his feet abruptly.

The color flooded his white face as he sat down again. "Sorry, Elisabeth," he apologized, smiling into his sister's startled eyes. "I'll get over this sort of rot soon—haven't done that since I got off the boat. We've been going it pretty much lately, and I'm not quite fit yet."

HE TURNED again toward the box and the two girls, but the lights dimmed. The orchestra thundered unexpectedly into the first chords of the overture. The audience fluttered into silence, like a flock of pigeons settling down on a roof, and in the Schuyler box Duff had fainted.

Mrs. Schuyler and Elisabeth looked across his bed with large eyes as Doctor Blake pronounced it a mild case of shell shock.

"But the war's been over for years," said Elisabeth. "Nobody has shell shock now."

The doctor laughed and pinched her cheek. "I'll admit Duff seems a little out of date, but you can't always be fashionable. It's a combination of war nerves and that South American affair."

"I hadn't said anything about it," Duff explained, looking at his mother apologetically. "I was rather shot up when I got back here. But I thought it was all over. Just the noise—sudden, you see—and—I'll be all right."

Evans Blake smiled at the young man. It was strange to see this boy whom he had known so well, who had eaten the best peaches from his orchard and pulled the pigtailed of his daughter, suddenly become a man who talked carelessly about wars and mine explosions. But it was nearly fourteen years since he had really known Duff Schuyler.

"You'd better take him away from New York," he said, lapsing into his professional manner. "Rest is what he needs."

So they closed the New York house and moved to the quiet of Scarborough, while the season was still whirling in New York and the winds that blew across the tennis court were tinged with frost. In the old days, Scarborough had seemed as quiet as a town as the country boasted, and the Elms as forgotten by sound as the inside of a thermos bottle; but to Duff now, it was like an endless string of firecrackers exploding, one after another. A door slamming or the wind crashing through the trees brought him to his feet, his face set, his lips white.

The summer passed, and Duff watched it from the side piazza of the house; voices of Elisabeth and her friends floated out to him, but he saw no one. He seemed to have an aversion to people, although Elisabeth constantly chattered of girls who were "simply dying to meet him." He read a great deal of the time and wrote letters to an imaginary girl, letters which he destroyed almost as soon as he had finished them; and for the rest of the time he sat watching the grass change from delicate green to deep emerald, from emerald to moss color, eventually to brown.

In November, when the Schuyler car drew up at the door and the creak of the brakes clenched his hands and made his heart sound like a machine gun, he gave up.

"After all, dad," he said to his father, "what's the use? I've been loafing about for more than six months, and I can't see that I'm any different. I think I need honest toil. Take me back into your office, and let's see what that does to me."

In less than two months he had found exactly what it would do to him. The doctor suggested that Sleepy Valley was as good a place as any for him to spend the winter. In the summer the rambling inn was tenanted by nervous old ladies and gouty old gentlemen; in the winter it was quiet as a tomb. And there, hidden among the hills, the second stage of his love affair was reached, although Duff thought it the first.

THE proprietor of the inn and the proprietor's wife looked at him in amazement when he burst into the diningroom, demanding a time-table. He had been there for two months, and his arrangements had been made for the winter. His bags were packed, he explained to them, and his trunk was ready. He boarded the New York train without a glance back at the bewildered man standing on the wooden platform.

In the city his taxi sped serenely past the Schuyler house, stopped outside an office building, and Duff waited impatiently in the ante-room for Doctor Blake to appear.

"Well, what's up?" the doctor asked when finally he did emerge from one of the honeycomb of inner offices.

"What's up?" Duff demanded indignantly. "I ask you, do I look crazy?"

The doctor smiled as he shook his head. "Come on in here and tell me about it."

Duff sat down in the chair by the desk and drew a deep breath. "Well," he said at last, "I—I tell you I'm not crazy, you know." He flushed. "It was at the inn—Sleepy Valley. I was in bed rather early, reading. The door of my room opened and a girl came in—a real girl."

"Yes," said the doctor.

"I saw her—just as clearly as I see you. She was pretty—heavens!—in a white dress and a red cape. She walked into the room deliberately, and then just as deliberately she slipped off her cape and folded it. I thought, of course,

(Continued on Page 44)

"NOW THEN, TO BEGIN AT THE BEGINNING, IT REALLY WASN'T YOU WHO CAME INTO MY ROOM AT SLEEPY VALLEY, WAS IT?"

RANDOLPH THREW TERROR AND DISCRETION TO THE WINDS AND SMILED OPENLY, BROADLY, FEARLESSLY, STRAIGHT INTO THOSE HEAVENLY BLUE EYES

YOU wanna get struck by lightnin'?" Shivering in his dripping bathing suit before a chill wind that came rushing through the great park forest, Randolph Meredith hugged his dry clothes under his arm and yelled to Albert, whose head at that moment broke "Shady's" surface as he emerged from a neat back-flip dive off the springboard.

The woods had become ominously deep shadowed on this early June afternoon, and now as the rain-scented wind filled the trees with sound, Randolph glanced nervously up through the green canopy to the heavy clouds. "Come on," he yelled. "It's gonna rain."

Albert's sense of hearing was dulled by the water in his ears; he merely saw his companion's lips working rapidly. But he interpreted. So he climbed out to the bank, tilted his head to the right, hopped on his right foot and pounded his right ear with the heel of his right hand.

A stream of warm water trickled from the cavity. He repeated the operation in behalf of the left ear. Then, for the first time hearing distinctly, he caught the distant roll of thunder.

"Wait a minute," he called to Randolph, already walking briskly along the path that paralleled the bouldered creek. "Ain't you gonna put on your clothes?"

"Naw, take 'em under your arm."

Freckled, flap-eared Albert swept up his clothes and hurried to Randolph's side. "Shucks!" he panted in exasperation, "what makes you so scared of thunder anyway? Ain't gonna rain."

"You think I wanna get struck? Look at the leaves—look at the leaves, all turned wrong side out. That's a sure sign. Besides, a rain crow was hollerin' near 'Shady' all the mornin'."

"Those crazy things holler at everything. You believe in signs?"

RANDOLPH came to a sudden stop. Gingerly he raised his right foot, dropped his clothes and extracted a tiny brier from his big toe. "Yes, I believe in signs. Listen at that locust; that's a sign of hot weather, ain't it?"

"Sign! Ain't it been hot for two weeks?"

"I betcher you couldn't kill a snake an' hang it up unless it rained," tacked Randolph. "I've seen 'em do that at my grandma's lots of times." He waited for Albert's rebuttal, but it was not forthcoming. "An' I reckon you don't believe horsehairs turn to snakes in water either. You don't believe you'll get fever if you go in 'Shady' in dog days. You don't believe if you drop a book you'll miss that lesson the next day. But I do. I've seen all those things happen—many a time."

Another pause in the monologue as the two hurried along. "I betcher you'll believe in signs Saturday night when we get through 'nitiatin' you in The Purple Gladiators. I'll bet you won't sleep through that, if you did sleep through the movie of Dr. Jekyll an' Mr. Hyde. I betcher —"

Randolph's assault on Albert's weakest point was interrupted by one of those early June phenomena which drove both of them scurrying to the shelter of an enormous oak. On the instant the sun had broken majestically through the cloud pall; simultaneously the rain descended in glistening downpour.

"Uh-huh!" nodded Randolph triumphantly; "'twasn't goin' to rain. You don't believe if you pick up the first rock you see when it's rainin' an' sunshinin' you'll find a hair the same color of the hair of the girl you're gonna marry, do you?"

Albert laughed derisively. Randolph rushed from the shelter of the tree, stooped over and raised the first stone he clapped eyes upon. "Come here," he yelled.

Albert stood over him. Randolph raised the stone. Sure enough, in the mold it made lay a short strand of hair.

Triumphantly Randolph held it up. "There 'tis—brown. Now!"

Illustrations by George Brehm

two with searching scrutiny. "Which one of you threw this thing into my car?" He held up the enormous shoe which must have been cast by a blue-ribbon Percheron.

Randolph gulped. "I did, mister. But I didn't do it a-purpose. I didn't even see your car. I threw it over my shoulder for luck."

The man took a pencil from his pocket, along with an old envelope. "What's your name?"

"Randolph Meredith."

"What's your father's name?"

"Mister Randolph Meredith."

"Where do you live?"

"Right up there," answered the panicky culprit, pointing to his house that faced the park, "Seventy-two Park Place."

The man made notes, put away pencil and envelope. "Very well, I'll send your father the bill for this glass. And I hope he takes it out of your hide, young man. It's coming to a nice pass when people are not safe on public drives. Suppose this thing had struck me or my daughter here —"

FOR the first time Randolph saw the girl in the limousine. She was twelve or thereabouts, clad in a middy suit of white serge. Her eyes were blue; she was bareheaded—and the rich flowing curls were chestnut brown!

The tremendous significance of this fact that her hair was a chestnut brown temporarily drove terror from Randolph's heart and filled it with a tremendous emotion.

The girl was trying to suppress a smile. Randolph threw terror and discretion to the winds and smiled openly, broadly, fearlessly, straight into those heavenly blue eyes.

"You won't think this is a laughing matter by the time I'm through with you," warned the man. He slammed shut the blasted door and the limousine rolled proudly off.

Albert turned serious eyes upon Randolph. "You're in for it, all right. You know who that was? That's Mr. Waples. He's got all kinds o' money. He's the meanest man in town. I guess you believe in signs now. Sure is a lot o' luck in horseshoes, all right."

At the challenge Randolph bit his lip, opened his hand to reëxhibit the strand of hair he had rescued from beneath the enchanted stone. "You saw what color her hair was, didn't you?"

But Albert's practical mind refused utterly to credit the coincidence that seemed strangely to temper Randolph's appreciation of forthcoming events.

"I'll pay for the old window," stoutly declared Randolph. "I've got five dollars saved up for my baseball suit. If it costs more I'll save it up, I reckon."

Albert's trenchant classification of Mr. Waples as the meanest man in town was justified in Randolph's estimation that very evening. Mr. Meredith came home, called his son into the living room and icily inquired whether he had nothing better to do than throw horseshoes through limousine glass.

"I didn't go to do it," pleaded the boy; "we always throw them over our shoulder when we wish on them. Honestly, daddy, I didn't even see his old car."

His father nodded. "Mr. Waples called me up and I told him to send me the bill. It will cost ten dollars to replace that glass. This will have to teach you a lesson. You'd better make your plans now to pay me back."

It had been easier to boast to Albert than it was now to take the inexorable verdict. Gone, the five dollars he had so miserably saved for that baseball suit! And five more dollars gone even before he had worked to earn them! His head drooped.

"Yes, sir," he meekly answered, and left the room.

That night, as his father sat reading, the boy stole to his mother's room and poured out the contents of his heart. "Albert said he was the meanest man in town," he concluded bitterly, "an' I believe it. I didn't go to hit his old limousine."

A Horseshoe for Luck

By WILLIAM HARPER
DEAN

Heedless of the pattering rain, Albert started up the path. Randolph hurried beside him.

"'Twasn't nothin' but a dog hair," contended Albert.

"How'n the mischief could a dog get under that little rock?"

"How'n the mischief could a girl get under it?"

The rest of the journey out of the park was made in total silence between the two. Nor was it broken until they had crossed the macadam boulevard over which cars were speeding as the sudden downpour had sent them scurrying from the scenic driveways.

RANDOLPH stopped still. "Lookit that horseshoe," he cried, pointing to an enormous one lying in the cobbled gutter directly before him. "Ends pointin' right at me too. Gee, Buck, what a whopper!" He picked it up.

"Hold the ends up, crazy," warned Albert. "You're lettin' all the luck run out."

"Thought you didn't believe in signs."

"Don't; but that's what they say."

Randolph touched his tongue to the great horseshoe, shut his eyes, made a wish, and hurled the thing over his left shoulder.

Crash!

Accompanying the fearful sound came the shrill whine of madly applied brakes. Both boys stared dumfounded as the huge limousine skidded to a stop, then shot back in reverse until it was abreast of the open-mouthed pair. With deep nausea Randolph saw the wreck of a plate-glass panel shattered as though from a sledge-hammer blow.

A small, wiry man with narrow eyes and close-cropped gray mustache opened the limousine door and withered the

His mother made a poor show of suppressing her sympathy. "You'll just have to save up your money, Ranny, that's all."

"Albert's goin' out to the golf course to caddie Saturday. He gets twenty-five cents for nine holes—an' tips. Last week he made two dollars. Can I go?"

Mrs. Meredith shook her head. "Your father doesn't approve of that, Ranny. It puts you back home too late. Besides, you'd better be thankful he hasn't taken away your privilege for Saturday night. Are you going to initiate Albert then?"

Randolph nodded dejectedly. "Yes'm."

"Well, you'd better get to your lessons now and go to bed early. We'll think of some way for you to make money. Don't worry about it any more."

She kissed him and he went to his room.

Glorious youth! Randolph went to bed that night with every worry totally obliterated by the vision of a girl with chestnut curls who smiled at him with eyes of the blue of a robin's egg. As he lay awake in darkness, dreaming, he saw the Waples limousine stranded in a lonely section of the woodland park, the chauffeur draped lifelessly over the wheel, the meanest man in town bound hand and foot by the roadside, the girl with chestnut curls wringing her hands while the bearded kidnaper, who had sprung from ambush, leered brutally as he reached within the luxurious equipage to snatch the prize for ransom.

RANDOLPH, in rubber soles, crept forward like a cat. The villain's knotty budgeon lay within reach of his hand. The girl saw him, opened her lips to cry out to him. Randolph placed a finger to his own lips. Then in a flash he had seized the great club. With the strength of a giant he swung it. He heard the horrible crack and felt the unkempt head give under the blow. The man rolled lifeless at his feet. It was the work of an instant to whip out his pocketknife and slash the cords binding Mr. Waples.

Then for a quick, positive examination of the senseless chauffeur. "Only a stunning blow," he reassured the terrified girl. "A little while and he'll be himself again."

The wealthy man's fervent handclasp! "My boy, you have saved my daughter from a fearful fate. You need not fear the law for what you have done to this man. I shall defend you with the ablest legal talent."

And then with a bound he caught the swooning girl. Closely he held her in his arms. Her eyes were closed, she was breathing deeply. Priceless glowing chestnut strands brushed his cheek. Oblivious to everything, he bent over to touch his lips to her pale cheek . . . and sleep closed his eyes and dream fairies bore him up among the stars.

Came Saturday to find Randolph no penny richer, no plan formulated for the accumulation of the sum still due as indemnity. As he sat on the front steps his mother called him. And when she had seen his face she felt deep compassion.

"HERE'S my order, Ranny," she said, handing him a folded paper with the green edge of a bank note protruding. "Take your wagon up to the store and bring it for me. This time I'll give you a quarter instead of the regular fifteen cents."

"Thanks, mother," he said, pocketing the paper.

As he started up the street, drawing the express wagon, his right hand in his trousers pocket, his head was bent with the weight of deep meditation. For the life of him he could not understand how anybody could deprive him of a baseball suit and five dollars more to pay for a piece of glass when that man had thousands of dollars for every penny that he owned. Suddenly he caught his breath. Unconsciously he had been running his pocketed fingers round the edge of a big coin. Now the full significance of that fact struck him with tremendous force. He withdrew his hand, gazed thoughtfully at the big Spanish dollar. His luck piece! And a lot of luck it had brought!

But here was a dollar, a whole one, which, if properly utilized, would reduce his indebtedness by exactly one-fifth. He would see about selling the thing this very day.

In front of the chain-store grocery stood a line of express wagons parked in orderly row, while their youthful owners circulated among the customers in the store, soliciting business. Randolph had consistently refused to launch into this Saturday vocation: you had to haul groceries so far for ten cents a load. But this morning he looked upon the matter with mercenary eyes. He needed every dime he could get with his hands on. So he parked his wagon, surveyed the general situation with a swift glance and straightway walked half a block up the street, determined to catch his custom where the field was uninfested with competitors. Two housewives, with baskets on their arms, were coming his way.

Randolph doffed the blue-and-white felt skullcap that kept his pompadour under perfect submission. "Want me to haul your order home?" he solicited.

ONE of the women absent-mindedly gave him her basket, without a break in her rapid-fire monologue. "Edna and Charlie," she rattled on as Randolph respectfully brought up the rear, "have been saving for it so many years. And, as I told Clara, goodness knows they deserve something. They've simply slaved for their children, and Charlie hasn't had a real rest for heaven knows when."

"I think it's wonderful," said her companion as the first woman paused for breath. "When do they start?"

"Next Monday. First, they're going to England, then, unless they change their minds, to France and Spain. Edna's wild to see Spain. That's all she raves about —"

Randolph had darted to the woman's side. "Lady, do you know somebody that's goin' to Spain?"

The woman looked at him, plainly annoyed at the interruption. "Yes; my daughter. Why?"

The boy smiled hopefully. "I've got a real Spanish dollar, an' if she's goin' to Spain she needs it, don't she?"

"I dare say," she replied, her frown lifting. "You mean you want to sell it?"

"Yessam."

"Well, when you take my order home you can ask her. Now where did I put my list?"

Fifteen minutes later Randolph drew the loaded express wagon behind the woman who led the way to his base of golden expectations. He took in the first armful of packages and deposited them on the kitchen table. A younger woman was bustling about the room.

"Lady," said Randolph, "are you the one that's goin' to Spain?"

"Why, yes —" She hesitated.

"Edna," explained the mother, pausing in her task of checking up the order, "this boy wants to sell you a Spanish dollar."

Randolph's hand shot into his pocket and brought out the big silver coin. The woman examined it carefully.

"So you want to sell it?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"Very well, I'll buy it. I looked up exchange this morning. I'll give you seventy-four cents for it."

Randolph started. "Seventy-four—lady, that's a dollar."

"I know, my dear—a Spanish dollar. It's worth only seventy-four cents of our money now."

"Then why do they call it a dollar?" challenged the boy. "A dollar's worth a dollar."

THE woman smiled. "You don't understand, child. Exchange governs the value of one country's money in another's. And just now a Spanish dollar isn't worth so much as one of ours by twenty-six cents. Don't you study about that in school?"

Randolph's eyes were filling with heavy suspicion. "We study that a hundred cents makes a dollar, an' this sure is a dollar. My uncle said so; he brought it to me for a luck piece. It's worth a hundred cents."

As the woman was about to elaborate on her explanation of the vagaries of exchange, Randolph reached out his hand, took back the coin and returned it to his pocket. Grimly he went back to the wagon outside, brought in the rest of the packages, collected his fifteen cents from the mother and walked from that house, a being of shaken faith. That a woman who had money enough to travel to England, France and Spain should try to cheat a boy out of twenty-six cents was about the worst yet. No wonder she had plenty of money, if that's the way she did!

As he walked slowly back to the store he reviewed the succession of wrongs that had been inflicted upon him from the epochal moment when he had discovered that monster horseshoe in the gutter. It seemed to him that the whole world fattened on a diet of injustices to boys. And as his faith in mankind began to totter, so he felt the overpowering conviction that, after all, Albert was right. What luck had the horseshoe brought him? Or the Spanish pocket piece either?

LATE that afternoon Randolph made a heroic effort to put aside his worries. He entered Kirk Newton's cellar by the back entrance. There he found a dozen boys industriously painting black circles round the eye slits in single-piece white shrouds and otherwise symbolizing gruesomeness.

Kirk Newton, with a paint brush in his hand, turned and nodded sarcastically at the newcomer. "Here he is now," he announced. "It's time you were helpin' some. Get in that coffin, Ranny, an' see if you can lay down."

Randolph stared at the casket improvised from a great packing case. It rested on two sawhorses and reeked of a second coat of black paint. But the interior was untouched by the brush. Randolph hesitatingly complied. He fitted snugly enough. Kirk forced the lid in place. Randolph looked through the pair of gimlet holes directly above his head.

"Can you breathe all right?" called Kirk.

"Uh-huh, lemme out. Listen," he said when again he was on his feet, "it's a fine for goin' in vacant houses. Darn if I ain't in enough trouble now without that."

"Aw, who's gonna know?" retorted Kirk. "An' if they did find out, what could they do? We ain't stealing anything, are we?"

WITH A WHISTLING CATCH IN HIS BREATH HE WRESTED OFF THE LID. IT FELL WITH FEARFUL CLATTER. O'DONOHUE LEAPED BACK WITH A CHOKING GULP

(Continued on Page 110)

"I—THERE ISN'T ANYTHING FOR ME TO SAY, IS THERE?" SHE SAID. HER VOICE WAS NOT QUITE STEADY. "YOU KNOW—HOW—HOW BEAUTIFUL IT IS?"

And he sat with her. "I had my chance, you know," he said at length. "I don't know what went wrong." She waited, silent, thoughtful, a little remote; and he went on: "I always knew what I wanted to do, when I was just a kid—draw, paint, put down the way things looked, anyway. I guess my mother must have been like that; I don't know. She died when I was born. My father didn't have any use for anything like that. I had to go to work in his store when I was big enough.

"After a while I went off and got work in Hartford, and then in New York. And I used to spend all I didn't need to live on for paper and paints and brushes and things. I went to some classes at night too.

"Then my father died, and I sold everything and took the money and went to Paris. The war drove me back, and I got some illustrating to do and some pictures for advertising. And after I'd gone back to France—when we were in the war—and I'd come home again, everything was sort of mad. I made more money than I'd ever dreamed of having, and I guess it sort of went to my head.

"I thought I was good, just because I was making a lot of money and couldn't begin to do all the work they offered me. And then—they didn't seem to want so much of my stuff; and just the other day—the day before I came here—Crocker was in my place, and he dug out some of the stuff I'd done when I was over there the first time and said it was worth everything I'd done since. And I could see he was right."

He sat brooding, staring out across the garden to the little road. "And Helen —" he said in a voice so low that Miss Prudence leaned toward him to hear.

She laid her hand on his arm. "Yes," she said. "And Helen?"

"I GOT her letter the next morning," he said, as if Miss Prudence must understand. "She just said she couldn't marry me. She said she'd been trying to find some way of telling me. I'd thought—I'd hoped — Oh, I couldn't stay!" he cried. "I remembered a place where I'd spent a summer—he flung out his hand toward the south—"but when I got off the train I knew I couldn't find what I'd had there—peace and happiness—so I just walked along until I came to the little road and —"

"I think Providence brought you here," Miss Prudence said very simply. "Stay with us, Kent, until you find all your strength again. Don't talk of going soon."

"I've thought," he began—"I've money, you know, some money—I thought, perhaps, if you would let me pay my share, I could stay—and I might find a place and live on it. There's something about making things grow; they're beautiful; it's another way —"

She looked about her at her flowers. Slowly she rose. "You must come in now," she said.

"I could help you later, perhaps, when I'm stronger," he said half eagerly, "mending things, painting, digging—I'd like to learn." He had her smile for his answer.

The Little Road

By WILLIAM ALMON WOLFF

Illustrations by Walter Biggs

KENT MARSHALL paused and stood looking at the little road. It seemed to beckon to him, to bid him welcome, to urge him to be done with the clamor of the hurrying cars, the reek of oil and gas. And so, with the blast of a tuneless horn to speed his parting, he turned from the highroad.

The little road led him among trees bare still, but warm with the promise of bud and leaf. The clamor of the black highroad died down until it was like the hum of bees in a field of clover; above that murmur came the song of a bird; the crooning tune that the wind sang among the bare branches or in the fallen leaves; the purling of tiny streams among the trees; once a squirrel chattered at him angrily.

Marshall began to know how tired he was in body and soul. His cheeks were flushed; he began to wonder dimly if he might not be ill. Once or twice he sat down upon a wet rock and tried to rest. But it was as if the little road urged him to go on. So it brought him at last, faltering, to a house that stood at the foot of a long, gradual decline. An old brick path led from the road to its door; in a white fence an open gate nodded a greeting to the little road and those that it might bring.

Marshall stumbled along the path and reached the door and raised the old brass knocker once and let it fall. When the door was opened he saw a woman, dressed all in black, her gray hair parted, whose eyes widened as she saw him and marked the signs of the fever that was upon him. He stood a moment staring at her, and beyond her into a hall from which a staircase of mahogany rose. He saw an old, tall clock, its face fantastically painted and adorned; a picture, in an oval frame of gold, of a man who wore a high, white stock; a round rug, woven from colored rags.

He raised his hat. "I am very tired," he said. "I hope that you will let me rest here a little while —" He pitched forward as he spoke and went down at her feet.

As he struggled to rise he felt her cool hand on his forehead. "There—there; lie still," she said. She raised her voice. "Sister!" she called. "Prudence!"

SPRING had come before Kent Marshall saw the little road again. They had cared for him in a room that looked out upon the garden in the back; there, with Doctor Grant to guide them, they had nursed him through that devastating siege of pneumonia. And when he was strong enough to go downstairs, it seemed to him that he must have known Faith Brewster and her sister Prudence all his life. They had cared for him as the mother he had never known might have done. Since they had known that his danger was past they had sat and talked with him, simply, easily. They had only served him and tended him. All they had asked him was if there were anyone to whom they should send word; and he had only shaken his head and turned away.

Now when, leaning upon his stick, he trod the old brick path again violets were blooming between the bricks; they lay thick in the grass beside it. The rose bushes were full of buds; the promise of the glory that was coming filled the garden. Miss Prudence walked with him. The garden was hers, as the kitchen and the house were her sister's.

They walked together to the gate, and he stood leaning upon it and looked at the little road. "I must go, I suppose," he said presently.

"Some time," she said in her quiet way. "When you are ready, Kent."

"I'll be strong enough soon. I'm getting stronger every day. Doctor Grant —"

"Will you be ready when you are quite strong again?"

"No—I don't know —" He stared at her. "How do you know? I haven't told you—you don't know anything about me."

She smiled. "I have had trouble, too, Kent," she said.

"I DON'T know what to do. I've got to do something—I pick up life again—go on. It's no use; but I suppose I'll have to try."

"How old are you, Kent?" she asked.

"Thirty-three—no, thirty-two, I guess," he said, surprised.

"And you think you've failed?"

He laughed bitterly. "Oh, I know it," he said. "I've made a mess of everything, Miss Prudence."

She walked slowly through the garden, leading him without seeming to do so, and came, without intention, as it were, to a stone bench and sat.

He lay awake a long time that night, thinking of the years dedicated to an illusion, the fair hopes that had beckoned to him in his youth and that were now like stark skeletons. What was it Crocker had said? Go back to those beginnings of his? Get back the thing that he had lost, that had given life to those rude sketches of his days in Puteaux?

He had felt that he could not; that he had reached already, in those old days in Paris, the highest point his life would know. Now there was a difference in him since he had talked with Miss Prudence. For humility was taking the place of bitterness and resentment was turning to regret.

SO LIFE began once more to be a pleasant thing in that sheltered corner of the world. When the first sounds came of a morning that told him the sisters were stirring, he went down in flannels and soft shirt to make the kitchen fire. And every morning Miss Faith protested—and thanked him. Later he helped Miss Prudence in the garden and learned from her the lore of flowers. They lived for her; they were, he thought, the children she had never borne. There was much for him to do about the house, too, as he grew strong. And at night, when the day's work was done, he sat and smoked his pipe in the lamplight, while Miss Faith and Miss Prudence sewed. Often they talked of books, and they were never tired of hearing what he could tell them of the war.

Along the little road the postman came each day, riding his bicycle. Most often he brought letters for Kent, forwarded from his club. Kent tore many of those letters without opening them; a few he read; fewer still he answered. Farm wagons also passed sometimes; once in a great while a motor car brought venturesome explorers who had turned from the post road. And every Thursday afternoon came Jimmy Hayden, on his wheel, with a great clamor of his bell, dropping a weekly magazine in the letter box.

One day, when it was very warm, Jimmy came in and asked if he might have a glass of water. Miss Faith made much of him and gave him lemonade instead, and he sat and talked while he drank.

"We're very proud of Jimmy, Kent," Miss Prudence said. "He's saving his money. And next year he's going to college. Aren't you, Jimmy?"

"I hope so, ma'am." "Have you many new subscribers, Jimmy?" asked Miss Faith.

"GOT everyone 'round here, 'cept old Mis' Tucker," said Jimmy stoutly. "She—why, say, there's no pleasing her, Miss Faith. First off she said she was afraid maybe they'd print things that wasn't nice. So I left her a sample copy every week for a while, so's she could make sure. And what do you guess she says now? She says she'd take it if the pictures were colored. She makes me tired, spoiling my record; only one I haven't got."

Kent laughed with the rest. He picked up one of the magazines and turned its pages. And suddenly he was still, staring with somber eyes at a drawing; he could remember how his model had made him wait. He put the magazine away with an impatient movement.

"Maybe there's something we can do about this, Jimmy," he said. "Miss Faith, didn't I see a box of water colors in the attic the other day?"

He went upstairs and came down carrying a japanned box. He filled a tiny cup with water; a minute later he was at work, coloring the work of a man famous on two continents for his drawings in black and white. Laughing he went on, coloring a dozen drawings, while Jimmy leaned over his shoulder, and Miss Prudence watched him with eyes suddenly a little dim.

"There!" he said at last. "Show her that copy, Jimmy. If she subscribes, you bring me a copy every week and we'll color it for her."

"If she don't subscribe now—well, I'm through with her, that's all," said Jimmy. "Say, you're a real artist, aren't you, Mr. Marshall?" Kent winced. "Those pictures now—they're ever so much prettier'n they were before." Then he was off, whistling gayly as he rode along the little road.

Kent turned and saw Miss Prudence looking at him. His eyes fell before hers at last, and he cried out an answer to something she had not said. "I can't!" he cried.

As spring gave way to summer the little road called often to Kent, and he followed it through a smiling country of orchards and wooded hills, of fields and meadows. It showed him long vistas of low hills and pleasant, rounded valleys; ridges on which old fruit trees stood; blue water in the distance; a land mellowed by time, softened by long use.

Day by day his life was taking a new aspect. It was less hurried, less exacting, than it had ever been. Just as his money went further than in the city, so did the stuff of mind and body. He thought often of Helen Marsden—it was so that he thought of her and not of the new name that she had taken. But her image came to him without pain, without that stabbing agony of jealousy that in the beginning had seemed more than he could endure. He wondered, sometimes, if he had ever truly loved her, since he was finding such peace in a world from which, for him, she had departed.

He had work enough. He had friends—the sisters, Doctor Grant, Sam Newcomb, the old letter carrier. And Jimmy Hayden had come back to report triumphantly Mis' Tucker's surrender; she had agreed to take a magazine each week, so long as the pictures were colored. So Kent had done his part, and every Thursday morning now Jimmy brought him a book, and in the afternoon came back to fetch it.

MISS PRUDENCE watched him often as he colored the drawings. There was a strange look in his eyes, then, a gathering of his forces. He was conscious of her regard. He looked up once from the last drawing, and their eyes met. He looked away abashed, and she sighed and went out to the garden and he went with her.

Together they stood looking out over the roses, white and yellow and red; the larkspur, in a score of tints of blue and white and lavender; the tall hollyhocks, on the very verge of their blooming; clove pinks, nestling down in the grass; the house itself, covered with climbing vines of pink and crimson roses.

"I sit and wonder sometimes in the winter evenings if I shall ever see all this again," Miss Prudence said. "Every winter it grows harder for me to remember what we see now, Kent. I used to be able to close my eyes and see it all. And then each year I am afraid that it is less beautiful than it was the year before, that as I grow older I am losing some power —"

"I will try to paint your garden as you see it now," said Kent.

He held out his hand; but she put out her arms and drew him to her and kissed him.

Even now, when love had made him put his fears and his memory of his ruined hopes away, Kent lacked the strength to turn back along the little road. And so, when Jimmy Hayden came that afternoon, a list was ready for him, and Kent gave him money, and told him where all that he would need was to be bought. And Jimmy, delighted, eager to serve his friend, promised that in the morning he would go to the city and bring back all that was set down upon the list.

KENT went back into the garden when the boy had gone. Already he saw it with new eyes. He wandered about, with a pad of paper and a stubby pencil, making notes, planning his composition. He was strangely thrilled. He studied details of leaf and blossom; their texture; dreamed of the mixing of his colors to fix this shade and that.

And the next day he was like a child on the eve of Christmas as he waited for Jimmy to come back. He sat with his eyes upon the little road, smoking pipe after pipe as he watched the lengthening of the shadows. And when Jimmy came at last, there were two boys to fall upon the package and tear them open, making a great litter in Miss Faith's neat living room.

After supper and until very late that night

(Continued on Page 115)

WHILE MISS FAITH AND MISS PRUDENCE SEWED, HE SAT AND SMOKED HIS PIPE IN THE LAMPLIGHT

Henry Labouchere, that great journalist and editor, wrote in Truth: "When Daly first came to England the company was pronounced by our theatrical guides, philosophers and friends a complete failure. At present, although the company is the same and the plays are the same, everything is declared to be perfection."

Royalty attended our performances, and one night, when we were playing at the Gaiety Theater, the Prince of Wales, later Edward VII, asked Ada Rehan and myself to come into his box. With him were his wife, now the dowager Queen Alexandra, and a young relation of hers from Denmark. The Prince of Wales was very affable, but he rather ignored Daly, who ushered us into the box. In the managerial department of the London theaters in those days everyone wore dinner clothes. Daly never dressed for the theater.

A Collector of Royalties

THE Prince of Wales asked us whether or not Shakspeare was popular in America. He had seen the advance billing that we were to do The Taming of the Shrew. The play that night was Love on Crutches, and he did not seem to care for it. This play never did go so well in London as it had in New York.

When we got back to the stage some of the other players wanted to know about our reception.

"Who was the other man in the box?" asked Leclercq.

"He is one of the Princes of Denmark. The Princess of Wales is his aunt," I explained.

"What's he doing over here?"

"I don't know. They did not let us in on the purpose of his mission."

"I know what he's doing here," said Jim Lewis; "he has come over here from Denmark to collect royalties from Henry Irving for Hamlet."

On our trip abroad in 1886, we went to Germany and played in Hamburg and Berlin. This was the first and only time that an entire American company visited Germany. This jaunt, which Daly undertook as an advertisement of the company, was really a greater success than might have been supposed. Of course, in neither German city were they particularly pleased with the adapted version of their own plays, played by an English-speaking company. The writers of these plays were extremely glad to see us, as they had made a good thing out of the Daly adaptations and, because of the higher royalties paid, they made more money out of the American rights than at home.

In Hamburg six plays were given: Love on Crutches, A Night Off, Nancy and Company, A Woman's Won't, The Country Girl and She Would and She Would Not. For the two English plays, The Country Girl and She Would and She Would Not, full arguments were printed in the program. It was taken for granted that the German farces would be well known, and merely the title and author of the German plays were given. It so happened that Love on Crutches, that is to say, the German play from which it was made, had never been given in Hamburg, and the audience was as much bewildered as if the play were totally foreign. The performance started out with a good deal of vivacity, but as scene after scene went by without any appreciation or laughter the players naturally became subdued and a little bewildered.

In Berlin we opened in A Night Off. This play had been an enormous success when done in the original, and while it was allowed that our performance was smooth, the whole was declared to be lacking in distinction. The estimate of the players varied.

One critic wrote that Miss Rehan was a "good sou-brette" and another that "Miss Rehan, the darling of the company, was ridiculous in tasteless gowns." The general opinion seemed to be that Mrs. Gilbert was not funny.

Some critics thought Lewis was too funny to be natural, and others found his naturalness quite astonishing. Skinner and I got off easily and were said to give value to our dry humor.

EDITH KINGDON (GOULD)
AS SHE APPEARED WITH THE DALY COMPANY

The two old comedies, She Would and She Would Not and The Country Girl, were highly praised, especially the acting. Nancy and Company met a better fate than A Night Off, in which we opened. The original German of this had not been successful, and the critics were shocked to find that it was more humorous in the adaptation than in the original.

Of the performance the Berliner Tageblatt said: "We see them on their strongest side, an exuberant humor which passes all bounds, and which our Germans have not courage to attempt for fear of lapsing into the coarse."

The English-speaking people all attended our performances.

When we were in Berlin the King of Portugal was visiting the old Kaiser, and I saw the whole royal family. There was a great crowd on Unter den Linden, and I asked a policeman what they were waiting for, and he told me that the Kaiser was coming from Potsdam and would be along shortly. The carriage came into sight presently. Amid the acclaim of the crowd, the German emperor touched his helmet in salute with white-gloved hand. In the next carriage were Frederick Wilhelm, then the crown prince, and the King of Portugal. In the third carriage was this last Kaiser, now in exile. They told me that the old emperor lived in the utmost simplicity, and that he had a camp bed in his palace.

New Name for a Pullman Car

WHEN we left London for Hamburg just three members of our company could speak any German—Henry Widmer, who was in charge of our orchestra, Otis Skinner and myself. Widmer was a German-American. Skinner knew some German, and I knew a little. One other member of the company claimed to know some German, but as he told Lewis that a sign on a car in the station "Nicht Rauchen" (No Smoking) meant "Night Riding" or a Pullman Car, we lost confidence in his knowledge of the language.

In Hamburg we played at the Thalia Theater and stayed at the Alster Hotel. One night after the theater we went to an open-air garden. While we were having our sandwiches and beer, a very eruptive, restless child of about ten was tearing about between the tables.

As I did not think that we should be overheard I said to Lewis: "I didn't suppose they would have such fresh kids over here."

The boy stopped and said to me: "I can speak English as good as you. I know you. You're James Lewis and John Drew." He told us that he came from New York and that his father, who was sitting at one of the tables back of us, had told him that we were actors in the Daly Company playing at the Thalia Theater.

In Berlin we played at the Wallner Theater, which was an important theater and extremely well ordered. Maids were provided for the women, and dressers for the men. The dressers, who were really tailors' helpers or bushmen, were very efficient.

The dresser who looked after me was so zealous in the performance of his job that he followed me onto the

JOHN DREW AND
MRS. LESLIE CAR-TER, NOW PLAYING IN "THE CIRCLE,"
THE BRILLIANT
NEW COMEDY BY
W. SOMERSET MAUGHAM

PHOTO BY WHITE

(Continued on Page 105)

Digitized by Google

"I AM SUCH A LIAR THAT I'LL DO WELL TO LOOK AT MYSELF," SHE MEDITATED. "HERE I AM AGAIN. NOW! THE WORLD EXPECTS ME TO MARRY. BUT WHAT DO I EXPECT?"

changed me, made me over physically—and did something to my soul, heaven knows what! And it has saved Glenn. Oh, he is wonderful! You would never know him. For long I had not the courage to tell him I had come to bring him back East. I kept putting it off. And I rode, I climbed, I camped, I lived outdoors. At first it nearly killed me. Then it grew bearable and easier, until I forgot. I wouldn't be honest if I didn't admit now that somehow I had a fine time, in spite of all. Glenn's business is raising hogs. He has a hog ranch. Doesn't it sound sordid? But things are not always what they sound or seem. Glenn is absorbed in his work. I hated it; I expected to ridicule it. But I ended by infinitely respecting him. I learned through his hog raising the real nobility of work.

"Well, at last I found courage to ask him when he was coming back to New York. He said, 'Never!' I realized then my blindness, my selfishness. I could not be his wife and live there. I could not. I was too small, too miserable, too comfort loving, too spoiled. And all the time he knew this, knew I'd never be big enough to marry him. That broke my heart. I left him free—and here I am. I beg you, don't ask me any more—and never mention it to me—so I can forget."

A FEW days sufficed to swing her into the old life. Some of Carley's acquaintances were still in the city. Others of her better friends were on their summer outings in the Adirondacks. Carley decided to go with her aunt to Lake Placid about the first of August. Meanwhile she would keep going and doing.

She had been a week in town before Morrison telephoned her and added his welcome. Despite the gay gladness of his voice, it irritated her. She scarcely wanted to see him. But a meeting was inevitable, and, besides, going out with him was in accordance with the plan she had adopted. So she made an engagement to meet him at the Plaza for dinner. When with slow and pondering action she hung up the receiver, it occurred to her that she resented the idea of going to the Plaza. She did not dwell on the reason why.

When Carley went into the reception room of the Plaza that night, Morrison was waiting for her—the same slim, fastidious, elegant, sallow-faced Morrison whose image she had in mind, yet somehow different. He had what Carley called the New York masculine face, blasé and lined, with eyes that gleamed, yet had no fire. But at sight of her his face lighted up.

"By Jove, but you've come back a peach!" he exclaimed, clasping her extended hand. "Eleanor told me you looked great. It's worth missing you to see you like this."

"Thanks, Larry," she replied. "I must look pretty well to win that compliment from you. And how are you feeling? You don't seem robust for a golfer and horseman. But then I'm used to husky Westerners."

"Oh, I'm fagged with the daily grind," he said. "I'll be glad to get up to the mountains next month. Let's go down to dinner."

They descended the spiral stairway to the grill room, where an orchestra was playing jazz, and dancers gyrated

The Call of the Cañon

By ZANE GREY

Author of The Man of the Forest, Wildfire, Riders of the Purple Sage, Etc.

Illustrations by H. R. Ballinger

It was before Aunt Mary's shrewd, penetrating, loving gaze that Carley quailed. "Yes, Carley, you look well—better than I ever saw you; but—but —"

"But I don't look happy," interrupted Carley. "I am happy to get home, to see you all. But—my—my heart is broken!"

A little shocked silence ensued, then Carley found herself being led across the vast-domed cathedral-like chamber of the station. A strange sensation pierced her with a pang—not the old thrill of leaving New York nor of returning! Nor was it the welcome sight of the hurrying, well-dressed throng of travelers and commuters, nor the stately beauty of the station. Carley shut her eyes, and then she knew. The dim light of vast space above, the looming gray walls, shadowy with tracery of figures, the lofty dome like the blue sky, brought back to her the walls of Oak Creek Cañon and the great caverns under the ramparts. As suddenly as she had shut her eyes Carley opened them to face her friends.

"Let me get it over—quickly," she burst out, with hot blood surging to her face. "I—I hated the West. It was so raw, so violent, so big. I think I hate it more now. But it

SYNOPSIS—Carley Burch, a New York society girl, worried by a letter from Glenn Kilbourne, her fiancé, who has gone to Arizona to heal his gassed lungs and shell-shocked nerves, goes West to bring him home. But she finds him vastly changed, and seemingly much interested in Flo Hutter, a girl of the cañon country. Carley hates the West. She hates its rigors and sufferings. In addition, an evil-eyed sheep handler is brutally frank with her about the kind of clothes she wears at Flo Hutter's birthday party. Put to a decision as to giving up the West and going back with her to New York or giving her up, Glenn Kilbourne refuses to give up the West, which he says has been the making of him. Carley bids him good-by—forever, she feels.

VIII

CARLEY had telegraphed her aunt and two of her intimate friends to meet her at the Grand Central Station. This reunion soon to come affected her in recurrent emotions of relief, gladness and shame. She felt like a wanderer coming home. She was restless during the long train trip.

When the train reached Albany she felt that she could hardly endure the tedious hours. The majestic Hudson and the palatial mansions on the wooded bluffs proclaimed to Carley that she was back in the East. How long a time seemed to have passed! Either she was not the same, or the aspect of everything had changed. But she believed that as soon as she recovered from the ordeal of meeting her friends and was home again she would see things rationally.

At last the train sheered away from the broad Hudson and entered the environs of New York. Carley sat perfectly still, to all outward appearances a calm, superbly poised New Yorker. Inwardly raged contending tides. In her own sight she was a disgraceful failure, a prodigal sneaking back to the ease and protection of loyal friends who did not know her truly. Every familiar landmark in the approach to the city gave her a thrill; yet a vague, unsatisfied something lingered after each sensation.

THEN the train with rush and roar crossed the Harlem River to Manhattan Island. As one waking from a dream Carley saw the blocks and squares of gray apartment houses and red buildings, the miles of roofs and chimneys, the long, hot, glaring streets full of automobiles and playing children. Then above the roar of the train sounded the high notes of a hurdy-gurdy. Indeed she was home. Next to stir her was the dark tunnel, and then the slowing of the train to a stop. Finally she found herself walking behind a porter up the long incline toward the station gate.

In the circle of expectant faces beyond the gate she saw her aunt's, eager and agitated, then the handsome pale face of Eleanor Harmon, and beside her the sweet, thin face of Beatrice Lovell. As they saw her how quick the change from expectancy to joy! It seemed they all rushed upon her, and embraced her, and exclaimed together. Carley never recalled what she said. But her heart was full.

"Oh, how perfectly stunning you look!" cried Eleanor, backing away from Carley and gazing with glad, surprised eyes.

"Carley!" gasped Beatrice. "You wonderful golden-skinned goddess! You're young again, like you were in our school days."

on a polished floor, and diners in evening dress looked on over their cigarettes.

"Well, Carley, are you still finical about food?" he queried, consulting the menu.

"No. But I prefer plain food," she replied.

"Have a cigarette," he said, holding out his silver, monogrammed case.

"Thank you, Larry. I—I guess I'll not take up smoking again. You see, while I was West I got out of the habit."

"Yes, they told me you had changed," he returned. "How about drinking?"

"Why, I thought New York had gone dry," she said, forcing a laugh.

"Only on the surface. Underneath it's wetter than ever."

"Well, I'll obey the law."

He ordered a rather elaborate dinner and then, turning his attention to Carley, gave her closer scrutiny. Carley knew then that he had become acquainted with the fact of her broken engagement.

"How's that big stiff, Kilbourne?" asked Morrison suddenly. "Is it true he got well?"

"Oh—yes. He's fine," replied Carley with eyes cast down. A hot knot seemed to form deep within her and threatened to break and steal along her veins. "But if you please—I do not care to talk of him."

"Naturally. But I must tell you that one man's loss is another's gain."

CARLEY had rather expected renewed courtship from Morrison. She had not, however, been prepared for the beat of her pulse, the quiver of her nerves, the uprising of hot resentment at the mere mention of Kilbourne. It was only natural that Glenn's former rivals should speak of him and perhaps disparagingly. But from this man Carley could not stand even a casual reference. Morrison had escaped the army service. He had been given a high-salaried post at the shipyards, the duties of which, if there had been any, he performed wherever he happened to be. Morrison's father had made a fortune in leather during the war. And on the moment Carley remembered Glenn's telling her he had seen two whole blocks in Paris piled twenty feet deep with leather army goods that were never used, and probably had never been intended to be used. Morrison represented the not inconsiderable number of young men in New York who had gained at the expense of the valiant legion who had lost.

But what had Morrison gained? Carley raised her eyes to gaze steadily at him. He looked well fed, indolent, rich, effete and supremely self-satisfied. She could not see that he had gained anything. She would rather have been a crippled, ruined soldier.

"Larry, I fear gain and loss are mere words," she said. "The thing that counts with me is what you are."

He stared in well-bred surprise, and presently talked of a new dance which had lately come into vogue. And from that he passed on to gossip of the theaters. Once between courses he asked Carley to dance, and she complied. The music would have stimulated an Egyptian mummy, Carley thought, and the subdued rose lights, the murmur of gay voices, the glide and grace of the dancers were exciting and pleasurable. Morrison had the suppleness and skill of a dancing master. But he held Carley too tightly, and so she told him, and added: "I imbibed some fresh, pure air while I was out West, something you haven't here, and I don't want it all squeezed out of me."

THE latter days of July Carley made busy, so busy that she lost her color and appetite, and something of her splendid resistance to the dragging heat and late hours. Seldom was she without some of her friends.

But she refused to go horseback riding in Central Park. She refused to go again to the Plaza. And these refusals she made deliberately, without asking herself why.

On August first she accompanied her aunt and several friends to Lake Placid, where they established themselves at a hotel. How welcome to Carley's strained eyes was the green of mountains, the soft gleam of amber water! How sweet and refreshing a breath of cool, pure air! The change from New York's glare and heat and dirt, and iron-red insulating walls, and thronging millions of people, and ceaseless roar and rush was a tremendous relief to her. She had burned the candle at both ends. But the beauty of the hills and vales, the quiet of the forest, the sight of the stars made it harder to forget. She had to rest. And when she rested she could not always converse, nor read, nor write.

For the most part her days held variety and pleasure. The place was beautiful, the weather pleasant, the people congenial. She motored over the forest roads; she canoed along the margin of the lake; she played golf and tennis. She wore exquisite gowns to dinner and danced during the evenings. But she seldom walked anywhere on the trails and never alone, and she never climbed the mountains and never rode a horse.

Morrison arrived and added his attentions to those of other men. Carley neither accepted nor repelled them. She favored the association with married couples and older people. She had always loved to play and romp with children, but here she found herself growing to avoid them, somehow hurt by sound of pattering feet and joyous laughter. She filled the days as best she could, and usually earned quick slumber at night. She staked all on present occupation and the truth of flying time.

IX

THE latter part of September Carley returned to New York. Soon after her arrival she received by letter a formal proposal of marriage from Elbert Harrington, who had been quietly attentive to her during her sojourn at Lake Placid. He was a lawyer of distinction, somewhat older than most of her friends, and a man of means and fine family.

Carley was surprised. Harrington was really one of the few of her acquaintances whom she regarded as somewhat behind the times, and liked him the better for that. But she could not marry him, and replied to his letter in as kindly a manner as she could.

Then he called personally. "Carley, I've come to ask you to reconsider," he said with a smile in his gray eyes. He was not a handsome man, but he had what women call a nice, strong face.

"Elbert, you embarrass me," she replied, trying to laugh it out. "Indeed I feel honored, and I thank you. But I cannot marry you."

"Why not?" he asked quietly.

"Because I don't love you," she replied.

"I did not expect you to," he said. "I hoped in time you might come to care. I've known you a good many years, Carley. Forgive me if I tell you I see you are breaking, wearing yourself down. Maybe it is not a husband you need so much now, but you do need a home and children. You are wasting your life."

"All you say may be true, my friend," replied Carley, with a helpless little upflinging of hands. "Yet it does not alter my feelings."

"But you will marry sooner or later?" he queried persistently.

(Continued on Page 122)

"LARRY, I FEAR GAIN AND LOSS ARE MERE WORDS; THE THING THAT COUNTS WITH ME IS WHAT YOU ARE"

JUST as in the American Revolution and in the Civil War there appeared a leader of genius, without whose wisdom, patience and unselfishness the result might in each case have been quite other than fortunate, so in the critical period of early Israelitish history—the residence in Egypt and the wandering in the wilderness—there rose from the ranks a leader, lawgiver and statesman—Moses. He must be called a great man. His public acts and private character are alike admirable. In addition to the books written about him by theologians and Bible students, he has been the subject of secular examination. Forty years ago I heard a lecture delivered by Henry George on "Moses, the Great Hebrew Statesman," and in 1920 a book was published by a scientific man, called "Moses the Physician," praising his learning, his foresight, and especially his belief in cleanliness and segregation of disease.

A famous parenthesis in the twelfth chapter of Numbers tells something definite about his character: "Now the man Moses was very meek, above all the men which were upon the face of the earth."

This passage has damaged the prestige of Moses with modern readers; Moses, "the meekest man," has seemed a milksop. For although many persons are in reality mild and timid, they like to be thought of as bold, aggressive and fierce. The difficulty here is in the word "meek," which in 1611 had a nobler connotation than in later times. It then meant gentle in manner, modest and, above all, self-controlled, the crown of courage and strength. Meekness was the finest attribute of warriors and kings. When Chaucer made his picture of the Knight, a first-class fighting man, the hero of many wars, he added this touch:

*And though that he were worthy, he was wys,
And of his port as meek as is a mayde.
He never yet no vileinye ne sayde
In al his lyf, unto no maner wight.
He was a verray parfit gentil knight.*

"I am meek and lowly in heart," is a portion of the autobiography of the only Person who ever overcame the world.

Like many great statesmen, Moses was not a fine public speaker. We are apt to believe that oratory is the main qualification for public life; whereas wisdom, foresight and knowledge are superior to rhetorical gifts. Daniel Webster was a supreme illustration of the combination of mental and oral powers; but much of the most important work in statesmanship is done in committees, and by men who cannot make an impressive public address. I suppose Benjamin Franklin was the greatest committee man in history; the ablest American constructive statesman of our time, Herbert Hoover, is not an effective orator. President Hayes gave the United States one of the best administrations we have had; he also was no speech maker. On his feet Grover Cleveland was dull, but he had the wit to know it.

Labor Troubles in Egypt

AT THE outset of his career, Moses said unto the Lord: "O my Lord, I am not eloquent, neither heretofore, nor since thou hast spoken unto thy servant: but I am slow of speech, and of a slow tongue." ("I am so bad an orator that I cannot talk effectively even when divinely inspired.") That which is the very breath of life to many politicians—public speaking—was always a terror to Moses; there was nothing he hated more. Like almost all men, Moses failed as an after-dinner speaker, as we learn from his lack of success immediately after the fall of manna.

Aaron, the Levite, was selected to do the talking; he was inferior to Moses, both in intelligence and in character; "he shall be to thee instead of a mouth, and thou shalt be to him instead of God." Moses was to tell Aaron what to say, and Aaron was to say it with emphasis and elegance. This worked well; but when Aaron, in the absence of Moses, relied on his own ideas, the result was disaster.

Labor troubles began in Egypt, as they have begun in some other countries, by oppression. The good king, Joseph's friend, was dead; and one of his successors on the throne took a familiar and natural, though erroneous, policy toward the numerous and powerful aliens in the land. He looked about him and saw that the Israelites were many in number and successful in business; that is, they were adding to the wealth and prosperity of the country. (Most natives have never been able to endure this.) Had the king dealt kindly with the Jews, there is no saying what might have been the greatness of Egypt, and the glory of the ruler; but human nature cannot be expected to show the wisdom of gentleness and the conquering power of good will. Pharaoh said to his courtiers, "Come on, let us deal wisely with them." (Now the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God.) "Therefore they did set over them taskmasters to afflict them with their burdens."

Human Nature in the Bible

By

WILLIAM LYON PHELPS

Decorations by Clara L. Ernst

The service increased in rigor and cruelty, and the workers grew ever more numerous and strong; so the policy of extermination was decided upon; instead of changing the medicine, he increased the dose. But it is difficult to subdue human beings by severity, and the Israelites found a way to escape extinction. Then a man and wife, both of the house of Levi, had a handsome boy; his mother hid him in the reeds by the river. When Pharaoh's daughter looked into the basket, the baby began to cry—about the only time in his life when his eloquence had an immediate effect; it should be remembered that his audience was composed of women. By a neat device his own mother was hired as nurse; the child grew up under her care and under the protection of the princess. Pharaoh's daughter not only saved him, but gave him his name Moses, which means "drawer out"; "and she said, Because I drew him out of the water." She named him better than she knew, for he drew the children of Israel out of slavery. She was a good girl, and I wish we knew more about her.

We are ignorant of the facts of Moses' childhood and adolescence. His first recorded act as a man was harshly resolute, and prophetic of his future powers of deliverance. He saw an Egyptian beating up a Hebrew, and he killed the tormentor. But the next day he saw two of his own people fighting, and, endeavoring to restrain them, he spoke to the aggressor, who insulted him by asking him if he meant to murder, as he had murdered the Egyptian. This was the first of a long succession of insults that Moses was to receive from his countrymen.

Moses in the Presence of God

MOSES fled, entered the land of Midian, and there married one of the seven daughters of Jethro. This man Jethro, being grateful for "meek" Moses' services in standing up alone for his daughters against a whole pack of roughs, treated him kindly. Jethro was an admirable person and later gave Moses valuable advice. It is interesting to notice that Moses unconsciously prepared himself for the position of leader of the nation by living the quiet, reflective life of a shepherd, which was later David's occupation before becoming a king.

It was while Moses was keeping the flocks of his father-in-law that he experienced the first of many divine revelations, and knew that he had been selected as the inspired leader. He saw a flame of fire in the midst of a bush, and yet the bush was not consumed. Moses turned to look at it out of curiosity; but when he heard the voice calling to him from the flame, and answered

"Here!" like a boy at school, he was told to come no nearer. Then he hid his face, for he was afraid to look upon God. After receiving his commission he rather boldly inquired, What name shall I use in speaking of the divine voice?

To this question he received a reply that shows how profoundly spiritual the religion of the Israelites was, and how superior to all their contemporaries they were in their conception not only of One God, but of that God as pure spirit. Compare this not only with the paganism and polytheism so common in the world, but with such a familiar and childish notion as le bon Dieu, where half the people use the expression naively and the other half with condescending contempt. Moses was told to say unto the children of Israel that I AM had sent him. No modern philosophy has been able to define the Supreme Reality with more accuracy, brevity and dignity. With God it is always the present tense; man is quickly in the past.

Moses, like most of his race, was not easily convinced even by God; and he knew that the people would be skeptical of his story unless he could prove it. So he was allowed to perform a variety of miracles; his rod turned into a snake, his hand became leprous and whole again, and greater works were promised.

Pharaoh Was Father of the Bourbons

MOSES and Aaron went in to interview the king, but it is plain that he regarded them as dangerous radicals, labor agitators; so far from listening to them, he tried the method subsequently adopted by Rehoboam and by many rulers in more recent times. He attempted to crush their spirit by increased severity, a plan which has many ardent advocates in all epochs, though history seems to prove its inadequacy. "Let there more work be laid upon the men, that they may labor therein; and let them not regard vain words." ("I'll show them!")

If Abraham was the father of the children of Israel, Pharaoh was the father of the Bourbons. He learned nothing and forgot nothing. He called in his magicians and had them attempt to rival the enchantments of Moses and Aaron; this is the first time that the competitive method appears, which later was to be used with such success by the prophet Elijah. The spectacle interested the royal observer, but it hardened his heart against Moses. It now became necessary to make a demonstration that should affect the whole Egyptian people; and we have the dramatic series called the Ten Plagues—a tragedy in ten acts, ending with a climax. The horrible events came in this order:

- | | |
|-------------|-----------------------------|
| I. Blood. | VI. Boils and Blains. |
| II. Frogs. | VII. Thunder and Hail. |
| III. Lice. | VIII. Locusts. |
| IV. Flies. | IX. Darkness. |
| V. Murrain. | X. Death of the First-born. |

Aaron stretched out his rod; the water in the Nile turned into blood, as well as every pond, pool and creek; even the waters in the kitchen pans became blood, and an intolerable stench arose from dead fish. This lasted seven days, and the magicians, trying their technic, found that they could turn water into blood just as easily as their rivals. Their real prowess would have been better proved if they had reversed the process; as it was, they merely added to the general discomfort. Pharaoh was no more affected by the blood than if he had been Louis XV. Kings have seldom been afraid of blood, and nothing on earth is more stubborn than your true reactionary. Then came millions of frogs; the Egyptian magicians, apparently pleased with this miracle, tried their enchantments and found that they could increase the population of frogs, though there seem to have been plenty without their assistance. But the king did not like frogs, and he sent for Moses and Aaron. It appears to me that the stupidity of this monarch reached its climax in the answer he made to the question put by Moses. The Hebrew asked: "When shall I make supplication that the frogs return to the river?" The king answered: "To-morrow." If he had had rudimentary common sense he would have said "To-day; this minute."

Next day the frogs died just where they were; and for a time they were more potent dead than alive. But no more came; and Pharaoh refused to let the Hebrews go. Then came lice, billions of them; they covered every man and beast in Egypt. Pharaoh paid no attention to them; he may have noticed nothing unusual. The magicians, who had been conspicuously successful with the frogs, tried to create lice; but they failed and were then convinced that Moses and Aaron were inspired. Their professional admiration for their competitors, in whom they recognized masters in their own art, was so great that it exceeded their fear of the king; they told him what they thought about the situation, but Pharaoh would not listen.

(Continued on Page 72)

"When I Consider Thy Heavens"—From the Painting by W. L. Taylor

When I consider Thy heavens, the work of Thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which Thou hast ordained; What is man, that Thou art mindful of him?—Psalm xxxi, 4

XII

IN THE month of May, 1857, I went to a party. This was a new thing for me; for parties had been something which I had heard of as I heard of many things outside the experience of a common fellow like me, but always thought about as a thing to be read of, like porte-cochères and riding to hounds, and butlers and books of poems.

The party was at the great Gothic house of Governor Wade, just finished, over in Benton township. The governor was never a citizen of Vandemark township, but he had some land in it. Buck Gowdy's great estate lapped over on one corner of the township, Governor Wade's on the other, and Hell Slew, nicknamed Vandemark's Folly Marsh, cut it through the middle and made it hard for us to get together a full vote on anything after we got the township organized.

The control shifted from the north side of the slew to the south side according to the way the weather was, for you couldn't cross Vandemark's Folly in wet weather. Once what was called the Cow Vandemark crowd got control and kept it for years by calling the township meetings always on our own side of the slew; and then Foster Blake sneaked in a full attendance on us when we weren't looking by piling a couple of my haystacks in the trail to drive over on, and it was five years before we got it back. But in the meantime we had voted taxes on them to build some schoolhouses and roads.

But Governor Wade's party was not local politics; or so N. V. Creede tells me. He says that this was one of the moves by which the governor made Monterey County Republican. It had been Democratic.

The governor had always been a Democrat, and had named his township after Thomas H. Benton; but now he was the big gun of the new Republican Party in our neck of the woods, and he invited all the people who he had thought would be good wheelhorses. You will wonder how I came to be invited.

Well, it was this way: I called on Judge Stone at the new courthouse, the building of which created such a scandal, where he was county treasurer. He had been elected the fall before. I wanted to see him about a cattle deal. He was talking with Henderson L. Burns when I went in.

"I DON'T see how I can go," said he. "I've got to watch the county's money. If there was a safe in this county seat any stronger than a cheese box, I'd lock it up and go; but I guess my bondsmen are sitting up nights worrying about their responsibility now. I'll have to decline, I reckon."

"Oh, darn the money!" said Henderson L. "You can't be expected to set up with it like it had typhoid fever, can you? Take it with you and put it in Wade's big safe."

"I might do that," said Judge Stone, "if I had a bodyguard."

"I'd make a good guard," said Henderson L. "Let me take care of it for you."

"I'd have to win it back in a euchre game if I ever saw it again," said the judge. "I hate to miss that party. There'll be some medicine made at that party. I might go with a bodyguard, eh?"

"So if the Bunker gang gets after you," suggested H. L., "there'd be somebody paid to take the load of buckshot. Well, here's Jake. He's our local desperado."

The Bunker gang was a group of bandits that had their headquarters in the timber along the Iowa River near Eldora.

The judge looked me over for a minute when Henderson L. suggested my name for the second time as a good man for his bodyguard. "Will you go, Jake?" he asked. "Or are you scared of the Bunkers?"

Vandemark's Folly

By HERBERT QUICK

Illustrations by N. C. Wyeth

Now, slow as I am to make up my mind, I should as a general rule have had to take half an hour or so to decide a thing like that; but when he asked me if I was scared of the Bunkers, it nettled me, and I said I'd go. I was not invited, of course; for it was an affair of the big bugs, and I never thought that an invitation was called for.

"How you going, judge?" asked Henderson L.

"In my family carriage," said the judge.

"The only family carriage I ever saw you have," said Henderson L., "is that old buckboard."

"I traded that off," answered the judge, "to a fellow driving through to the Fort Dodge country. I got a two-seated covered carriage. When it was new it was about such a rig as Buck Gowdy's."

"That's style," said Burns. "Who's going with you? Of course there's you and your wife and now you have Jake; but you've got room for one more."

"My wife," said the judge, "is going to take the preacher's adopted daughter. The preacher's wife thought there might be worldly doings that it might be better for her and the

AS I TURNED I SAW HER KNEELING THERE, HER HAIR ALL ABOUT HER FACE, WITH HER HANDS STRETCHED OUT TO ME; AND THEN I WALKED BLINDLY AWAY INTO THE LONG GRASS OF THE MARSH

Elder to steer clear of, but the girl is going with us."

"Well, Jake," said Henderson L., "you're in luck. You'll ride to the party with your old flame, in a carriage. My wife and I are going on a load of hay. Jim Boyd is the only other man here that's got a rig with springs under it."

I was disappointed when we started from Monterey Center, with Judge Horace Stone and me in the front seat and Virginia in the back. I had not been singing in the choir during the winter. The storms kept me looking out for my stock until the snow went off in the February thaw, and by that time I had stayed out so long that I thought I ought to be coaxed back into the choir by Virginia or Grandma Thorndyke in order to preserve my self-respect. But neither of them said anything about it. In fact, I thought that Grandma Thorndyke was not so friendly in the spring as she had been in the fall—and of course I could not put myself forward. I had the pure lunkhead pride.

SO I HAD not seen Virginia for months. We early Iowa settlers, the men and women who opened up the country to its great career of development, shivered through that winter, and many like it, in hovels that only broke the force of the tempest but could not keep it back. The snow drifted before our northwest winds in a moving ocean unbroken by cornfield, grove or farmstead. Our trees were yet too small of course to show themselves in the fight against the elements that first winter, and there I had hung like a leaf caught on a root in a freshet—an eighteen-year-old boy, lonely, without older people to whom I could go for advice or comfort; filled with dreams, visions and doubts.

I suppose my loneliness, my hardships, my lack of the fireplaces of York State and the warm rooms that we were used to in a country where fuel was plentiful made my visions and dreams more to me than they otherwise would have been. I dreamed of two persons—my mother and Virginia. Of my mother I found myself thinking with less and less of that keenness of grief which I had felt at Madison the winter before and on my road west; so I used to get out the old worn shoe and the rain-stained letter and try to inflame my grief so as to lose the guilty feeling of which I was conscious at my waning sense of my loss of her. This was a strife against the inevitable; at eighteen—or at almost any other age, to the healthy mind—it is the living that calls, not the dead. In spite of myself, it was Virginia Royall to whom my dreams turned all the time.

Every night, whether in the keen cold of the still nights, when the howl of the wolves came to me like the cries of torment, or in the howling tempests which roared across my puny hovel like trampling hosts of wild things, sifting the snow in at my window and powdering the floor, and making my cattle in their sheds as white as sheep, I went to sleep thinking of her, and thinking I should dream of her—but never doing so, for I slept like the dead.

I HELD her in my arms again as I had done the night Ann Gowdy had died back there near Dubuque, all senseless in her faint; or as I had when I scared the wolves away from her back along the Old Ridge Road; or as when I had carried her across the creek back in our Grove of Destiny—and she always, in my dreams, was willing, and conscious that I held her so tight because I loved her. I saw her again as she played with her doll under the trees. Again I rode by her side into Waterloo; and again she ran back to me to bid me her sweet good-by after I had given her up. Often I did not give her up, but brought her to my new home, built my house with her to cheer me; and often I imagined that she was beside me, sheltered from the storm and happy while she could be by my side and in my arms.

Oh, I lived whole lives over and over again with Virginia that lonely winter! She had been such a dear little creature. I had been able to do so much for her in getting her away from what she thought a great danger. She had done so much for me too. Had not she and I cried together over the memory of my mother? Had she not been my intimate companion for weeks, cooked for me, planned for me, advised me, dreamed with me? It was not nearly so lonely as you might think, in one sense of the word. And now I had not seen her for such a long time that I wondered if she were not forgetting me.

NO WONDER that I was a little flighty as I crowded myself into my poor best suit, which I was so rapidly outgrowing, and walked into Monterey Center in time to be Judge Horace Stone's bodyguard the night of the party—I heard it called a reception—at Governor De Witt Clinton Wade's new Gothic house, over in Benton township that was to be.

I was proportionately miserable when I called at Elder Thorndyke's to find that Virginia was not ready to see me and that Grandma Thorndyke seemed cool and somehow different toward me as she ran into the front room of the little house they were living in and told me so. When she left me I slipped out and went to Stone's.

"Thought you wasn't coming, Jake," said he. "Almost give you up. Just time for you to get a bite to eat before we start."

When we did start his wife came out in a new black-silk dress—for the Stones were quality—and was helped into the back seat; and the judge came out of the house carrying a satchel which when he handed it to me I found to be very heavy. I should say, as I have often stated, that it weighed about fifty to sixty pounds, and when he shoved it back under the seat before sitting down it gave, as I seemed afterwards to remember, a sort of muffled jingle.

"The treasures of Golconda or Goldarnit," said he, "or some of those foreign places. Hear 'em jingle? Protect them with your life, Jake."

"All right," I said, as glum as you please; for he had left the only vacant place in the carriage back with Mrs. Stone. This was no way to treat me! But I was almost glad when Virginia came out to the carriage wearing a pink-silk dress and looking so fearful to the eyes of her obscure adorer that he could scarcely speak to her—she was so unutterably lovely and angelic looking.

"How do you do, Teunis?" she said, and paused for someone to help her in. Judge Stone waited a moment and gave her a boost at the elbow as she skipped up the step. I could have bitten myself. I was the person who should have helped her in. I was a lumnox, a lunkhead, a lubber, a fool, a saphead—I was everything that was awkward and clumsy and thumb-hand-sided! To let an old married man get ahead of me in that way was a crime. I slouched down into the seat, and the judge drove off, after handing me a revolver. I slipped it into my pocket.

"JAKE'S my bodyguard to-night, Miss Royall," said the judge. "We've got the county's money here. Did you hear it jingle?"

"No, judge, I didn't," said she; and she never could remember any jingle afterwards. "Aren't you afraid, Teunis?"

"What of?" I inquired, looking around at her just as she was spreading a beautiful Paisley shawl about her shoulders. I dared take a long look at her. A silk dress and a Paisley shawl, even to my eyes—and I knew nothing about their value or rarity in that time and place—struck me all of a heap with their gorgeousness. They reminded me of the fine ladies I had seen in Albany and Buffalo.

"Of the Bunker boys," said she. "If they knew that we were out with all this money don't you suppose they would be after it? And what could you and Mr. Stone do against such robbers?"

"I've seen rougher customers than they are," said I; and then I wondered if the man I had seen with the Bushyagers back in our Grove of Destiny had not been one of the Bunker boys. They certainly had had a bunch of stolen horses. If he was a member of the Bunker gang, weren't the Bushyagers members of it also? And was it not likely that they, being neighbors of ours, and acquainted with everything that went on in Monterey Center, would know that we were out with the money and be ready to pounce upon us? I secretly drew my revolver from my pocket and looked to see that each of the five chambers was loaded and that each tube had its percussion cap. I wished, too, that I had had a little more practice in pistol shooting.

"What do you think of Virginia's dress and shawl?" asked Mrs. Stone as we drove along the trail which wound over the prairie. The judge and I both looked at Virginia again.

"They're old persimmons," commented the judge. "You'll be the belle of the ball, Virginia."

"They're awful purty," said I, "especially the dress. Where did you get 'em, Virginia?"

"They were found in Miss Royall's bedroom," said Mrs. Stone, emphasizing the "Miss"—for my benefit, I suppose;

but it never touched me. "But I guess she knows where they come from."

"They were Ann's," said Virginia, a little sadly, and yet blushing and smiling a little at our open admiration. "My sister's, you know."

I scarcely said another word during all that trip. I was furious at the thought of Buck Gowdy's smuggling those clothes into Virginia's room so she could have a good costume for the party. How did he know she was invited or going? To be sure, her sister Ann's things ought to have been given to the poor orphan girl. That was all right; but back there along the road she would never speak his name. Had it come to pass in all these weeks and months in which I had not seen her that they had come to be on speaking terms again? It was gall and wormwood to think of it. I forgot all about the Bunkers until the judge whipped up the horses as we turned into the Wade place and brought us up standing at the door.

"Well," said he, with a kind of nervous laugh, "the Bunkers didn't get us after all!"

I WAS out before him this time and helped Virginia and Mrs. Stone to get down. The judge was wrestling with the heavy bag. The governor came out to welcome us, and he and Judge Stone carried it in. Mrs. Wade, a scared looking little woman, stood in the hall and gave me her hand as I went in.

"Good evening, Mr. —"

"Mr. Vandemark," said the judge, introducing me. "My bodyguard, Mrs. Wade."

The good lady looked at my worn, tight-fitting corduroys, at my clean, boiled shirt, which I had done up myself, at my heavy boots, newly greased for the occasion, and at my bright blue-and-red silk neckerchief, and turned to other guests. But after all I was dressed as well as some of the others. There are many who may read this account of the way their forbears dressed—the Boyds, the Burnses, the Flemings, the Creedes, the Stones and others of our county aristocracy—who may be a little nettled when a plain old farmer tells of how their progenitors came to this party in alpacos, delaines, figured lawns, and even calicoes, riding on loads of hay and in lumber wagons with spring seats; but they should never mind this, for the time will come when their descendants will be proud of it. For they were the John Aldens, the Priscillas, the Miles Standishes and the Dorothy Q's of as great a society as the Pilgrim Fathers and Pilgrim Mothers set agoing—the society of the great commonwealth of Iowa.

THE big supper, served in the large room on a long table and some smaller ones, was the great event of the party. The Wades were very strict church members. Such a thing as card playing was not to be thought of, and dancing was just as bad. The Wades were certainly religious—that is, the governor and Mrs. Wade. Jack Wade, the John P. Wade who was afterward one of the national bosses of the Republican party, and Bob, the Robert S. Wade who became so prominent in the financial circles of the state, were a little worldly.

The point is that there had to be some other way of entertaining the company at the party than drinking, card playing or dancing. Of course the older people could discuss the price of land, the county organization, and the like; but even the important things of the country were mostly in the hands of young people—and young folks will be young folks.

The Flemings lived in the next farmhouse down the road, and when our party took place the families were on fairly good terms, though the governor and his wife regarded the Flemings as beneath them; and this idea began to control the situation between the families when Bob Wade began showing attentions to Kittie Fleming, a pretty, black-eyed girl a year or so older than I.

"OH," EXCLAIMED MAGNUS, "YOU SHOULDN'T TALK SO! YE GOT PLENTY TO EAT. DERE BANE LOTS PEOPLE IN NORVAY WOULD YUMP AT DE SHANCE TO YANGE PLACES WIT' US"

FROM THE PAINTING BY H. J. SOULEN

We went through the passage—and then it was as if we were in fairyland. Gone was the effect of muddy streets, of dark-clad figures, of anxious faces. Here were color, light, fragrance. In the center of the court was a lovely fountain, about which grew straight, slim cypress trees. And everywhere—on the marble pavement, standing with the immemorial grace of the East, moving swayingly or even running lightly—were upper-class Persian girls and women.—A PERSIAN WEDDING.

A Persian Wedding

By

MAUDE RADFORD WARREN

Illustrations by H. J. Soulen

AT A SIGN FROM HIM SHE SAT ON THE DIVAN. I THINK SHE WOULD HAVE PREFERRED THE CUSHIONS FROM THE AWKWARD WAY SHE PLACED HERSELF

BEAUTY tinged with melancholy—that is the guise in which Persia floats into one's memory; and against a background of shaded loveliness drift the chuddar-draped figures of the Persian women. The happiest event I saw in the country was a wedding, and even that was darkened.

Early in my travels in Persia I formed the project of seeing a wedding, led thereto by the wife of the governor of Kermanshah. My route to that beautiful little creature was as follows: A British padre and I crossed the large square in front of the palace of the governor. It was full of life; on one side was a row of dark shops, lit with gleams of brass and copper and silver and golden fruits. Here and there were carts of dates and oranges; ice-cream men with their many-colored, painted boxes; bread sellers carrying the long ovals of bread flapping against their greasy garments. There was a scribe sitting by the fountain in the center of the square, wiping his pen on his hair. There was a man with a tray of cakes balanced on his donkey's back, and in the midst of the tray a lighted lamp to show that his price was low. There was a pedestrian merchant in a long purple sweeping robe, looking like an ancient prophet; he had one rug to sell. And there was, very near the palace, a tall tree, to which the padre pointed and said:

"The other day the governor had a baker nailed by his ears to that for stealing flour; the governor's grandfather would have had the man baked in his own oven."

I had been long enough in the East not to expect an ogre, in spite of this drastic punishment. Therefore, after going through a multitude of corridors and passing at last into a magnificent scarlet-and-gold reception room, I was not surprised to find a cultivated and charming man awaiting us. Handsome, forty, not too stout, speaking perfect English, and with interest in Western ideas—such was the governor of Kermanshah. But what I waited for was the moment when, tea and cakes and sweets having been consumed sufficiently to satisfy Persian ideas of hospitality, the governor and I would leave the padre behind and go to the harem.

"I Wish I Could Travel"

OURS was an impressive passage. We went through various rooms and corridors and wings, meeting men on the way, but no figure of a woman shrouded in the black chuddar or winding-sheet sort of cover the Persian women wear when they walk where they may be seen of men. A magnificently attired lackey opened each door for us. We walked side by side until we came to a curtained narrow doorway guarded by a shriveled but strong-looking old man in a long, dark robe. Behind this was a narrow way with a curtained door at the other end. The governor moved forward a pace and preceded me, and I knew by the manner of his walk that no man but himself ever opened that second door. The convention of the seraglio spoke in his every movement, his masterful stride, the lordly set of his shoulders, the gesture with which he swung aside the curtain and opened that cloistered door.

It gave on the inner garden, the harem court, than which I saw nothing more beautiful in Persia—white as pearl, with marble fountains; flaming with flowers, red-gold and guinea-gold, scarlet and crimson. There were diamond flashes from the many windows of the harem that looked down on the court, and there was the soft, tall green of cypress and poplar trees and of long, flowing vines.

When we entered, a slim figure in a lavender silk chuddar was bending over a bush of purple flowers. Over her lovely face flashed a look of radiant welcome as her eyes met the governor's. She had been married only a week; it was four in the afternoon, and she had not expected her lord for several hours. She was only sixteen, and she let her whole soul speak freely.

We passed over a marble terrace and entered the bride's salon, which was furnished in pink and gray. Evidently her meals were served here, for a square table in the center of the room was covered with a white cloth. There was a pink divan near the door, several chairs and many cushions on the floor. The little bride waited till her husband and I were seated, and then at a sign from him she sat on the divan.

leather shoes. Her hair was in two braids. In an adjacent room I could see piles of French lingerie and silk and velvet robes. She was evidently trying to please him. Her lovely, large, soft eyes rarely left his face; her little, soft mouth was breathless for his words. It was impossible to look at the beautiful little creature without yearning over her.

The governor read my admiration. "I had not seen her since she was veiled, of course," he told me; "but I used to see her when she was a little girl, and I never forgot her face."

He explained that she could not talk French, that, indeed, she could not read Persian, because she came from a conservative family. She and I had to use him as interpreter.

He told her of my various travels, and she replied: "The lady is very fortunate to have seen so much of the world. I wish I could travel."

"That is because she knows I am going to America," the governor said.

"Will she not come with you?" I asked.

"Oh, no," he replied; and then he added hastily: "Her father and mother would not wish it."

As the Husband Wills

WHICH meant that he would not wish it. He would stay with her till his first keen interest had a little abated or perhaps until a son was born. He had divorced his first wife because she had had no children. Some day he would go seeking the interest of travel, or any other interest that his Western contacts had taught him, but for all his Western leanings, his wife in all essentials he would treat in the immemorial Oriental way. And she, unable to read and write and never allowed to leave the harem, except heavily veiled and under escort—she would have for her only interest, him. All day long she waited for the moment when that shrouded door would swing open under his hand; and the time would come when for days and weeks together the door would remain closed.

A MERCHANT IN A LONG PURPLE ROBE HAD ONE RUG TO SELL

As we talked, women hidden under cream-colored chuddars, sprigged with pink, served us with tea and cakes. They kept their covered faces averted from the governor, but they took me in avidly. I would serve as harem talk for the next year. I asked the little bride what she thought I should see, above all things else, in Persia. "Tell the Khanum," she said, "that the most beautiful thing is a Persian wedding."

As she spoke, her flowerlike face grew so tender, so sweet, that I vowed then and there that I must see a Persian wedding. This did not come about, however, till I reached Teheran. In the interim I saw many Persian women, some veiled and some, the Kurds, unveiled. Of all I saw, I admired them most. They share more or less the spirit of their men, who are the franc-tireurs of Persia, little, stocky people, excellent fighters, who go in for agriculture or shepherding or brigandage or what they please, but who make their own laws of conduct. I shall never forget one, Fakhrol-taj, tall and slim, with all the free grace of a reed in the wind. She said she was a shepherd's wife, with two little boys, and a mother-in-law whom she did not like.

"But I cook for her," said Fakhrol-taj, "and I am very kind to her, for she is old and, if it be the will of God, she will die soon and I will be rid of her."

When the question was asked her if she would be good to her husband's second wife, if he had one, she smiled radiantly.

"I would poison her," she said gently, "and my husband knows it. My husband says that a man who marries two wives is twice a fool."

Journeying forward to that wedding in Teheran, I saw the Persian women against beautiful backgrounds, standing beside their little, flat-roofed houses, as my car crawled down some tortuous pass with twilight racing past us, flowing over us and darkening our neighborhood, yet far ahead the sun, pouring over the valley, turned the hills into soft lavender velvet, made the floor of the valley first gold, then orange, then brown, the little villages taking a darker tone.

I saw the women at work in the morning hours when all the lights were high, but the surface of the steep mountains was meltingly soft. Never have I beheld such varied colors, such azures and cobalts, such amethysts and violets and purples, scarlets and blues and browns and blacks.

And I have seen the women against sordid backgrounds, against dirty villages where stalked famine and disease and every form of misery, where were men whose right hands had been cut off for stealing or who had been hamstringed for the same crime. I have seen women whose haggard faces looked as if they had never worn a happy expression and little girls who looked as if they did not know how to smile. Such villages remind one that the Persians, men and women, have to contend against age-old customs, against an ancient, lagging civilization.

In Persia, men plow with what looks like a twisted stick, pointed with iron, drawn by two slow oxen and guided with one hand. In the harvest time these same oxen trample out the wheat from the chaff. Mills consist of a couple of stones and a little stream. Except for the oil wells, which Great Britain controls, there are no real industries—no factories or foundries or quarries. There is rug weaving and dyeing, a little tanning and copper and brass work. There is no railroad, except one six miles long, running out from Teheran to the old buried city of Rei; there are only two good roads, and they not so very good at that. On these travel a few motor cars; but everywhere else, look where you will, you see only tracks on which travel four-footed carriers, camels or mules, horses or donkeys.

And these slow-moving animals are emblematic of the pace of all Persia. Stand anywhere you please in Persia and lift your eyes to the horizon and you will see a caravan. At a distance, a caravan seems to drift like a cloud and to be of the color of the earth or of shadows. Close to, a caravan seems to pace and delights the eyes with lovely colors and textures and the ear with sound. For every animal wears a myriad bells, from the deep-throated bell of the camel to a merry twinkle that makes no more sound than a baby's rattle and that is fastened on the neck of the smallest donkey. Mingled, the bells make a sweet, monotonous jangle. Saddle cloths and saddle bags are beautifully woven and patterned and dyed. Beads and ribbons deck the head-pieces of the animals, while the riding camels wear tall red-and-blue pompons fastened on the saddle. That is Persia, beauty and sordidness mingled—and lagging.

What Missionaries Have Done

IT WAS through my missionary friend, Mrs. Arthur Boyce, that I received my invitation to the Persian wedding. There is an American girls' school in Teheran, where teach Mrs. Boyce and Mrs. Jordan, wife of the president of the American college, and various other women who are doing far more than the world knows to improve the lot of the Persians. Through the college and the boys' and the girls' schools in Teheran and through the schools in Kermanshah and Hamadan, our missionaries present Western ideas to the Moslems. It is not too much to say that they are the chief agencies of progress. I saw their self-sacrificing lives, but what they have done for their pupils I scarcely realized till I attended the Persian wedding—nor did I realize how much remains to be done.

One morning, as I sat in a room not far from Bejjat Abad, the Street Built on Happiness, Mrs. Boyce presented me with a card on which was engraved some Persian writing in gold, with a wonderful capital letter and an oval seal in blue.

"Malak-taj," said Mrs. Boyce, "which means the 'Queen of the Crown,' invites you to the wedding of her daughter

THERE WAS A MAN WITH A TRAY OF CAKES BALANCED ON HIS DONKEY'S BACK, AND IN THE MIDST OF THE TRAY A LIGHTED LAMP TO SHOW THAT HIS PRICE WAS LOW

(Continued on Page 53)

Digitized by Google

The Ladies' HOME JOURNAL

BARTON W. CURRIE, Editor

Editorial

For a New Cycle

SEVEN is a mystic numeral. It contains the Biblical revelation of the mystery of creation. There are the seven ages of man; the seven wonders of the world—how few can name them! There is supposed to be great merit in being the seventh son of a seventh son. Threescore and ten fixed itself in the minds of generations as the allotted span of life, though Bernard Shaw and the life-extension propagandists bid us concentrate on the age of Methuselah and add a century or so to the common age of mankind. There have been no end of seven-year wars, seven-year droughts, seven-year blights, and so on. Which brings us to the New Year, in which we may, if we so will it, put behind us a seven-year cycle that began with the World War and that has seen more disaster inflicted upon the races of men than any similar period in revealed history.

Let's get ready, then, for a new cycle, a less exciting but a vastly happier and more progressive one. Not that it need compress itself into a span of seven years, nor yet seven times seven. Why not take off the limit? We might as well plan for an era as not.

But let's not resolve. Resolutions are banal. Particularly New Year's resolutions. Banal and boomerang.

Let's do!

And let's begin at home with the Little Things.

That's where the Big Urge comes from—the doing of the Little Things at home.

We hear the Big Noise from the market place, from the highways and public squares, from the exchanges, from convention halls and assemblies; there is a never-ceasing blare from Congress, from the state legislatures, from aldermanic and council chambers. The brass lungs of orators assail us and we are deluded by the printed rhapsodies of press agents and propagandists. But it is mostly Noise.

It is not the Big Urge, for the noisiest of them all are fake prophets.

It is we, the Unimportant People, by the tens of millions, who control and manipulate the Big Urge—and that leaves politics altogether out of the reckoning.

The Big Urge controls the spiritual as well as the practical affairs of all of us, and it is the spiritual side that is desperately in need of attention just now—the spiritual side in which Bigness and Billions are not involved.

It is not at all necessary to conduct revivals and mass meetings to attain this end. There is too much of the emotional brainstorm about such waves of reform and readjustment.

FOR our new cycle we want revivals that are home jobs. Home betterment is the only permanent background for reform. A community can be no better than the aggregate of its homes. It is not a job for great leadership to draw us out, but for little leadership to push on in every last little way that will accomplish even the smallest good. So let's settle down to calmness and reason, gentleness and reverence, and see if we can't do something really worth while with the great force we each and all of us control in our little lives.

Suppose going home to-day ten million of us think of just one little thing we could buy or create for the home to brighten a corner. If you're broke take home a smile and hold it overnight.

Do a chore cheerfully.

Feel inside of you for a song. Even if you cannot sing you can wear the singing look.

Here's a wonderful little sermon by Abraham Lincoln that is worth soaking into the heart and soul:

I do the very best I know how; the very best I can; and I mean to keep doing so until the end. If the end brings me out all right, what is said against me won't amount to anything. If the end brings me out wrong, ten angels swearing I was right would make no difference.

It is well to grieve and be sorrowful when the occasion justifies. But too much of the grief in the world is personal and selfish. There are those who cherish and coddle their grief, who nurse it into an emotion for self-glorification; who advertise it and parade it to win sympathy.

It is the same with some of the standardized virtues. In the hard times we are going to put behind us, thrift has been glorified by the miserly who could afford to spend. There is a huge gulf between those who save to have, or rather to hog, and those who save for self-protection and to give.

During the jazz-mad period after the armistice the profiteers in joy made a killing; but when the economic brakes began to lock and the whirlwind buyers lost their nerve the profiteers in gloom took hold, and they have been reaping a harvest on the exchanges and in every little nook and corner where there was a gullible victim to be frightened and made hash of.

THE fact of the matter is, a panic bogy crept into almost every home. In millions of homes he has been real and sinister. But in more millions of homes he has been pure dream stuff.

Now the job is to get him out and keep him out.

He won't stick round where there are courage and good nature.

You don't have to be a grinning ass.

You don't have to be joyful at someone else's expense. That's going back to the Java ape man. Watch any monkey's cage at the zoo and see if it isn't.

The Big Urge that is needed for our new cycle is a better frame of mind inside and out. If you can't cheer things up at home a bit nobody's going to cheer up.

We've been watching one another's grouches and imitating the worst cases. We blamed everybody else for being tightwads when we were it. Result, multitudes out of work and every charitable and generous impulse stifled.

Christmas touched the better side of us a little and brought some upturn.

The Great Chore is to hold over some of that Christmas spirit.

Let's keep on loosening up some more, every last one of us who can afford it.

It's splendid to be Santa Claus to those we love, but too many of us plug it all into one day and follow the gospel of Scrooge for the rest of the year.

All home stocks are pretty low if you can believe the economists. The lower we keep them just now the longer it will take to get back to prosperous times.

Give a little more to charity where you know it's needed. Give someone a job if you can any way afford it. Give anyone who deserves it a raise, even though it has to be a small one.

Look into the needs of your church and see where you can help. Ninety per cent of our pastors are miserably underpaid. Help build up your congregation. It'll never be any bigger or better than you as an individual help to make it.

If you don't believe in religion or the church it is your loss, and the older you grow the greater the loss. You'll freeze up inside. Science brings no balm to the unbeliever any more. Darwinism has blown up. Most higher criticism of the Bible is empty sophistry.

Faith, Hope and Charity were the three superlative symbols of grace before the coming of Christ, before Abraham walked with God, before the Sumerians built their long-vanished civilization. You can possess them through the most trifling effort—possess them for yourself and for all who are near and dear to you.

Only in such a way can we have a new cycle, such as all the world is groping for.

Let's go to it—every last little one of us. Then it's done!

You Can Change the World

A Challenge to Intelligent Women Who are Wasting Their Leisure

By EUGENE DAVENPORT

THE Creator in His wisdom has endowed us all with the same amount of time between sunrise and sunset for every day of the year, but we in our freedom have put this "stuff life is made of" to widely different uses. Necessity drives some of us to unremitting toil from tender childhood to advanced old age, while others lift not so much as a finger even to provide their own necessities. Between these two extremes lie all conceivable gradations, and yet the world as a whole may be roughly divided into two rather definite groups: Those who have too little time for all they would like to accomplish, and those whose opportunity for work considerably exceeds their desire for achievement. To the one, leisure is a luxury to be enjoyed but rarely and in small increments, if at all; to the other, time often hangs heavy on the hands, and ingenuity is exhausted in finding ways of spending it that existence may not prove burdensome from sheer monotony.

Some philosopher and moralist will one day write a book upon what to do with spare time and upon the responsibility that attaches to whatever leisure we may extract from busy lives. But more especially will he dwell at length upon the obligations resting on those supposedly fortunate people whom birth or accident or design has freed from the "grinding toil" and the "drab existence" which are assumed by many to characterize the lives of those who labor daily for their daily bread. And one chapter of this book, when it is written, will doubtless be devoted with special emphasis to those perfectly respectable but useless folk who, while doing little or nothing, smugly congratulate themselves and each other that they are not like other people, but constitute, in their own way at least, an exclusive set. Let us consider somewhat soberly what women in general are doing with that overplus of time that is commonly called leisure.

Busy People

FOR the sake of contrast it may be remarked that there are some thousands, yes, millions, of the mothers and daughters of men who have not so much as a moiety of that commodity which is called spare time. They are busy morning, noon and night in doing the necessary work of the world, and if they get any of the so-called better things of life they must literally snatch as best they can such crumbs and leftovers as chance or a kindly Providence may have thrown their way.

These are they who, if they read at all, will do it while they patch and darn. These are they who dream dreams that are never realized, but who are actuated always by ideals unattainable to them, and perhaps to anybody, but none the less inspiring. These are they who must plan days ahead to secure a few hours that may be devoted to something not essential to bare existence. These are they who, if they have leisure, must do double work to get it, and yet it is here in this class that are found most of the women who perform the bulk of the unselfish service of the world. This is why it is that nothing that may be said later can be considered as an indictment against womankind.

Just as there are women by the thousands, unmarried or widowed, who must needs earn their daily necessities but who accomplish the task by the profession of doing good in nursing or charity, so there are other thousands, rich perhaps beyond the dreams of avarice, whose homes are well ordered and whose every whim could be gratified almost without the asking, yet who devote themselves unstintingly, often sacrificially, to the doing for others what those others cannot do for themselves. They patch up the raveled places in society, encourage the disheartened, stimulate the halting, relieve distress and often defray all expenses incident to their own activities. These are they who do not let the right hand know what the left hand doeth, but when the end comes the widow and the orphan and the broken will flock to the funeral or perhaps hide themselves in grief for a good woman that is gone.

When Leisure Kills

THEY may not have even known that she was wealthy, for she has told them little of herself, and she may have been only moderately well-to-do, dividing what she had, but she had been an angel of mercy to them. Wherefore they mourn not by dropping the respectable silent tear, but by weeping their hearts out for one that will come no more to their relief. These have made a profession of their leisure.

With all this as a background, how sharp is the contrast that may be drawn as attention is turned to other thousands who, in one way or another, have been freed from the necessity of daily toil, and yet who accept nothing of the burdens of others or of society in general, but who lead an existence wholly parasitic and altogether selfish. Without wasting words over the so-called idle rich or the butterflies of fashion, we may as well pass to more promising pastures, where there is some hope at least of arousing to some sense of responsibility a small army of women who are literally spoiling for something to do that is really of consequence in the world.

There is hope here for thousands if only they can be aroused from the lethargy, I had almost said coma, that has settled down upon a very large fraction of that portion of humanity which, for one reason or another, is not compelled to labor for its necessary maintenance. There is hope here for the world as well, for matters are standing still just now, mainly because other thousands, hitherto productive, are attempting to edge into the already overcrowded class of respectable worthlessness.

Are they maiden ladies living upon the slender income of small inherited properties and maintaining a kind of threadbare respectability by carefully refraining from doing anything that could by any stretch of the imagination be considered either necessary or useful? Are they widows or divorcees or wealthy heiresses supporting themselves in comfort, possibly in luxury, by clipping coupons that represent the earnings of others? Are they wives of prosperous business men, possibly of clerks or teachers, with small families or none at all, perchance of high-class laborers, of anybody, indeed, with ability to meet the family demands without laying responsibility upon the wife? It matters not who they are or whence comes their support or whether it be generous or meager; if they belong to that class which views the world from the standpoint of self alone and recognizes necessity as the only spur to action, these are they who need to be brought to a realizing sense of what it means to consume without also adding to the store of the world's welfare.

Many of them belong to clubs, but they spend the time not in self-advancement or in finding ways for public betterment, but in whist and euchre, and even these soon pall unless a little "forfeit" is put up to add zest to the exertion of handling a few pieces of cardboard dexterously. And so develops a kind of finesse in doing nothing, and so it is elevated into an occupation, furnishing a respectable basis for that form of absorbing conversation known as small talk, which rises to the climax in wondering what is to become of the "dreadful young people" of the present day. Wondering, but doing nothing about it except to wonder and wonder and wonder, in smug satisfaction that "it was not so in our day," when these dreadful young people are no worse and no better than young people have always been, simply exhibiting folly in new ways; that is all.

The New Woman

THE demoralizing influence of the unemployed has even entered that great and vitalizing institution known as the Woman's Club. Organized and conducted not only for self-improvement but for progress in matters both social and civic, these clubs have been, are being and will be a power in civilization. But even here is felt the deadening influence of those passive souls who seek always some new thing and without bestirring themselves to create it. Where this influence has long exerted itself we find that the arduous labor of preparing papers by individual members or of finding solutions for local problems is given over permanently to the easier system of hired or invited "entertainers," threatening in this way the very existence of these powerful and beneficent organizations.

Women have struggled for and have obtained full equality with men, whatever that may mean. What are they going to do with their new-found powers, rights and duties? We know that the great mass of womankind

(Continued on Page 129)

ONE out of every four children in this country is undernourished. Who is responsible for the condition, and what can be done about it? This is a question that is of the most vital importance to every father and mother in the country. It is not the cry of an alarmist; it is a straight statement of facts that have been known to public-health officials for several years. It is time that the fathers and mothers of this land realized that the ultimate responsibility for the health of their children is in their hands.

The average parent does not understand the difference between starvation and undernourishment. People who live in rural districts or in small towns have felt that there, at least, the children were being brought up under normal surroundings, with all the advantages of a wholesome life; yet in the United States to-day undernourishment in children is more prevalent among those who live in rural communities than it is among children who live in cities. Again, undernourishment is as prevalent among the children of the well-to-do as it is among the children of the poor; in fact, we have found in many instances that the rich are the greater sufferers in this regard.

Undernourishment means that the child's body is not properly developed. The easiest way to determine whether or not the child is undernourished is to find out what its weight is and then compare the weight with its height. The Bureau of Education of the Department of the Interior at Washington, D. C., will supply to any school in this country tables showing standard weights and heights of boys and girls at different ages. They will also furnish charts that can be placed on the walls of classrooms. Each of these charts has a place for the name of the child and a column for each month of the school year so that the child's weight may be regularly entered in the appropriate column. The height of the child is usually measured once each term, while the weight should be taken each month.

If the child is more than one-tenth below the proper weight for his height, as given in these tables, it is probable that he is undernourished. The next step is to see that a further and careful examination is made by a competent physician to find out whether his lack of development is caused by an undernourished condition or whether it is a racial or family characteristic. Generally speaking, however, it has been found that children of all nationalities maintain a general standard of weight in proportion to height, and certainly any child who is one-tenth below this standard gives every indication of being undernourished.

How to Recognize Undernourishment

THE rate at which a child gains weight is another way to determine proper development. Up to fourteen years of age, boys and girls gain in weight in the same proportion. From five to eight years the monthly gain will be about six ounces; from eight to twelve years, eight ounces; from twelve to fourteen years, twelve ounces each month. After that time, boys gain more rapidly than girls. From fourteen to sixteen years of age, boys will gain about one pound a month, while girls will gain not more than half a pound in the same period. Children usually gain more rapidly during the fall and spring, and less rapidly in the cold weather of mid-winter or the warm weather of summer; but of one thing we must be sure, that there is no loss of weight. That is always a danger signal.

Other signs even more important may be readily observed by any teacher, father or mother. Occasionally we find that children will look entirely well in the face and yet their bodies show signs of malnutrition; so that it is better, whenever possible, to have the child stripped to the waist before making any sort of inspection. This can, of course, always be done at home. Sometimes it is more difficult in the school; therefore the father and mother may be the ones who can most readily recognize the signs of undernourishment.

The big outstanding symptom of undernourishment is fatigue. Undernourished children are usually pale, with dark circles under the eyes. The expression is almost always dull and listless, the features droop and the face wears an expression of fatigue which, once seen, can never be forgotten.

The way in which the undernourished child stands is characteristic. It is always a slouchy position, with nearly all the weight thrown on one foot. The shoulders droop forward so that the child is hollow-chested and round-shouldered. The shoulder blades in the back stand out at more or less acute angles to the body. There is an absence of fat between the ribs. The muscles of the body, legs and arms are soft and flabby.

The whole picture, actually pathetic, is that of a child who is chronically tired.

The Undernourished Child

By S. JOSEPHINE BAKER, M.D.

Director, Bureau of Child Hygiene, Department of Health, New York City

The behavior of the child usually bears out the physical symptoms. There are, however, two distinct types of undernourished children: One is always listless, dull and unable to make any effort. This is the child who does not want to play, who is unable to study, who is too tired to do anything except make the effort for bare existence. The other type of child is apt to be nervous and highstrung, restlessly overactive at times, emotional, crying easily and becoming very irritable for little cause. Both these types of children are apt to sleep poorly and to have erratic and unstable appetites. The undernourished child of any type always finds it difficult to concentrate its mind and to have its attention held by any one thing for any length of time. It varies in its moods and is almost always considered stupid and dull. Such a child is the victim of frequent colds and always gets every type of contagious disease that may make its appearance in the neighborhood. Such a child is suffering from a severe type of undernourishment. Sometimes a child will show only one or two of the symptoms.

Rich and Poor Alike to Blame

PROBABLY nine people out of ten will say that the reason a child is underweight is because it is not getting enough to eat. It is perfectly true that a child who is regularly underfed will probably be undernourished, but it is also true that undernourishment is the result of many other conditions, nearly all of which may be traced back to bad habits of living or to the wrong kind of surroundings. Poverty alone cannot be given as a cause of undernourishment because, as we have already seen, the condition is just as prevalent among the rich as it is among the poor. Actual starvation of children is extremely rare in this country. The trouble seems to be that we do not fully understand that, as far as the child is concerned, the results are the same whether food is lacking in amount or whether it is entirely unsuited for the child's proper nourishment.

We may have enough food, but it may be entirely of the wrong kind.

But there are many other causes of undernourishment besides even the wrong type of feeding. Probably first in importance comes lack of food; next, the wrong kind of food; irregular feeding, which means meals at all hours; and too rapid eating, with insufficient chewing and consequent bolting of food.

These are all prominent causes, yet it is not too much to say that none of them is as great a cause of malnutrition as the way in which the child's daily life is carried out. Here we can indict many parents for both ignorance and neglect, and it does not make any difference whether they are able to give their children the right environment or not.

The rich mother is equally to blame with the mother who has to get along with limited resources. Healthful environment for a child can be bought, and sometimes it is difficult to create it without some money at least; but, generally speaking—and we have proved this over and over again in the most crowded and congested districts of New York City—a child can have just as normal and favorable an environment in a congested tenement house as it can in a luxurious home, provided the father and mother are interested enough in the child's welfare to devote some time and attention to seeing that its daily life is properly adjusted.

One of the great causes of undernourishment is lack of proper rest. This may be the result of too late bedtime, too much stimulation and emotional excitement and not enough rest time during the day.

Lack of proper ventilation in both school and home, overcrowded classrooms and too much indoor life are all things that must be looked for and adjusted, if we are to give our children a fair chance for health. Other common causes of undernourishment are the presence of physical defects, such as adenoids, enlarged or diseased tonsils, defective vision or decayed teeth. The undernourished child is particularly apt to contract contagious diseases. Sometimes children who have had a prolonged illness are undernourished as a result. It is therefore occasionally difficult to tell whether the disease has caused the undernourishment or the undernourishment has caused the disease. In such cases we have what is known as a "vicious circle," which means that the round of ill-health must be broken into somewhere and strenuous measures taken to place the child in proper physical condition.

It is interesting and significant to know that, generally speaking and taking the countries as a whole, there is far less undernourishment among the children of France, Belgium and England to-day than there was before the war, while in the United States the proportion of undernourished children has constantly increased since prewar days, so that now we have twice as many in some places and three times as many in others as we had five or six years ago.

The reason for this is that the child in Europe has had its problem studied and has received proper attention. Europe cannot afford to waste its child life, consequently it is paying the utmost attention to child-welfare work and seeing that every child is reared under as wholesome and healthful conditions as possible. In this country we have been extremely neglectful of child life, and it is not too much to say that our children have not had a square deal. It is not too late, however, to put our children physically on an equal basis with the children of other countries. Bringing our children back to normal condition and preventing undernourishment in the future is a matter which vitally concerns the entire community. Parent-teacher's associations and boards of education have a grave responsibility in this regard. The school is the place where undernourishment may be most quickly detected.

There should be scales in every school in America and every child should have its height measured at the beginning of each term and its weight taken at least once a month. In the schools, the charts I have mentioned should be placed on the wall of each classroom and the weight of each child recorded at regular intervals. In some schools we have found it possible to let each child have a weight card of its own, upon which the height and weight are recorded each month. This card is taken home to the parents at regular intervals and they are required to sign it, so that the teacher, school doctor or nurse may be sure the family has had its attention called to the child's physical progress.

The Listless Child Usually a Sick Child

THE height and weight chart on the classroom wall must be regularly inspected by the teacher, if it is to be of any value. When she finds that any child's weight is below the normal standard for its height and age, or if she finds that a child is losing weight or its weight is stationary for a period of two months, she should see that the child is referred to the school doctor or nurse or, if there is no health supervision of this type in the school, it is the teacher's duty to see that the matter is referred to the family and that they are notified of the necessity of taking the child to a physician for a thorough physical examination.

In addition to noting the child's height and weight, the teacher should note his behavior. An undernourished child is physically too sick to study, and failure in examinations or lack of proper progress in school work may often be due solely to this fact.

The listless child, the dull, apathetic or stupid child is usually a sick child. They may be able to come to school, but that is all the effort they are able to make. Nearly all sickness in children is preventable, and one of the simplest ways in which to prevent it is to see that the child is kept in proper physical condition. Malnutrition is the greatest predisposing cause of disease, and the undernourished child not only becomes sick more readily, but is always more seriously ill than the child who has had a fair chance for health.

School lunches are needed even more in our rural schools than they are in the cities. Parents' associations should interest themselves

HOURS OF STUDY, PLAY AND SLEEP
AGE	SCHOOL HOURS	HOME STUDY	MEALS AND PLAY	HOURS OF SLEEP	BEDTIME
5 to 7	3	None	9	12	7:00
7 to 10	5	None	8	11	8:00
10 to 12	5	1 Hour	8	10	9:00
12 to 14	5	2 Hours	8	9	9:30

(Continued on Page 108)

Yo—ho, yo—ho, away we go
Now watch us coast like fun!
Just hold on tight, I'll steer you right—
Then Campbell's when we're done!

The right balance

How delicious and bracing a plate of good hot soup is! How quickly your appetite responds to the delicate, tonic flavors! What a whole-souled enjoyment it gives you in the rest of the meal! How perfectly it balances your diet! Eat soup every day.

Campbell's Vegetable Soup with its fifteen different vegetables and its seventeen other ingredients—thirty-two in all—is almost a meal in itself, delightful in its varied flavors and offering a completely balanced combination of the valuable food elements. Succulent vegetables, muscle-building cereals, richly invigorating beef stock, fragrant herbs and tempting spices—blended with Campbell's famous skill.

21 kinds

12 cents a can

Soup makes the ideal luncheon

At home or downtown, in the middle of a business day or in the interval between household tasks, soup is the most attractive, convenient and beneficial food you can have for luncheon. Hot, delicious soup sends you back to your work refreshed and invigorated, with your appetite satisfied and your energy greater.

Campbell's SOUPS

LOOK FOR THE RED AND WHITE LABEL

The Jazz Path of Degradation

The Prodigal American Husband is Coming Back Repentant—The Silliness of Psychoanalysis

By JOHN R. McMAHON

WHY attack the jazz dance so sharply and so exclusively?" asks a reader. "Judging from your articles on this subject, there are no other social evils of consequence. All that we must do to be saved is to stop jazzing. But how about drinking despite the law, gambling in our best circles, immodest dress, loose talk, profanity even by young folks, a new disregard of marriage vows, a general license and an accepted doctrine of do as you please? In short, why attack a mere symptom or local outbreak instead of getting after the disease itself? You should concentrate on the disease of materialism, the lost sense of duty, the lack of spiritual or even intellectual aims. While criticising the young sinners, you should indict American fathers and mothers for their criminal negligence in regard to the bringing up of their children. After all, the parents are chiefly responsible, both in the example they set and in the excess of liberty they permit."

This reader presents a broad viewpoint very ably, and the writer is not inclined to controvert it. Simply, it may be pointed out that jazz is the most widespread and openly flagrant form of the social disease and therefore deserves the most emphasis. It is hard to get people interested in such terms as hygiene and duty. But they do take notice of typhoid fever and the shocking results shown to accrue from the ultra dance.

It would be well to have medical and social treatment entirely preventive, yet as things are we wait for an outbreak of a physical or social malady before we are ready to be doctored. Nobody will believe that there is anything wrong in the early stages of an illness. When we are thoroughly infected we are willing to call in the doctor. We are cured in due time and yet often retain a permanent disability through life because of delayed treatment.

It is a tragic thought that although the dance mania of this period may be shortly purified, reformed and passed into the limbo of forgotten things, its ill consequences must abide with us into an indefinite future.

What of the Next Generation?

THE American people, or a great part of them, will never be the same as they were before they learned the disgraceful art of shimmy and toddle. It is likely that the birth rate will be affected. The next generation will show certain physical consequences. There will be more weaklings and fewer stalwarts. The crop of human weeds will increase. Instead of real men and women, we may reasonably expect an augmented stock of lounge lizards and second-quality "vamps."

If these things are not so, Emerson was wrong in his philosophy and the biologists do not understand the laws of inheritance. Of course there are sceptics and scoffers who point abroad to an alleged striking example of refutation of the race-degeneration theory through sex laxity. I do not think they prove anything except that all sorts of humans may serve as cannon fodder. The best and most efficient fighters in the late war were the cleanest and brawniest, who came from the open places of Australia, Canada and this country. There was not a shimmy shaker among these two-fisted men.

"Your campaign against the jazz is like Don Quixote's against the windmills," says an Eastern reader. "You ignore the economic causes. There was a war which upset the world and all its social relations. We are yet in a maelstrom of unrest. Morals are up in the air and will remain so until our economics settle back to an old or advance forward to a new equilibrium. Meanwhile words are wasted in criticizing social manners and conduct."

This reader's amendment is accepted with a few reservations. Most everybody admits there are economic causes for the social unsettlement and knows that the foundation must be squared to obtain a stable superstructure. But when we see the economic foundation in process of readjustment, as is now quite apparent, we are justified in giving a little thought to the needful remodeling of the house plans. If only a few of us know enough to set our houses in order against the prevailing trend, there is so much

America is not alone in postwar social laxity. England is sadly debilitated in her ideals, if we are to accept the picture shown in The Glass of Fashion by a keen observer, who is anonymous.

Enough has been said in previous articles on the subject of the jazz dance to condemn it in the eyes of the thoughtful. Yet there are some classes of persons who remain to be convinced.

Our apostles of license can stand for anything, but they must rub their eyes when they read that Soviet Russia is shocked by an outbreak of child immorality, deemed most injurious to the cause of Bolshevik freedom and success; wherefore steps are being taken to abate this evil. If immorality is hurtful to Soviet Russia it must be harmful to America.

The jazz is lewd to the physiological limit. In many cases it leads to worse things, and in others it cannot lead to worse things—being a sufficiently evil end in itself. Take alcohol: Some get drunk, and others add murder to drunkenness. Those who only jazz, but thoroughly and habitually, are sex toppers.

It is a path of degradation.

For the woman it may mean an impairment or defeat of motherhood. For the young man of marrying age it may spell a postponement into the indefinite future of the undertaking of marital responsibilities.

The increasing tendency of the age among the middle class is to marry late or never. When bachelor men and girls can have so much fun—speaking euphemistically—out of the ultra dance, why should they sacrifice careers and burden themselves with family cares? Fewer marriages and a decrease in the birth rate are bound to follow. And these are people of the better sort, so called. They are plotting their own extinction and supersession by a rude proletariat that believes in marriage and children.

A social scout reports that petting parties and necking parties have now been added to the rites of the jazz. It appears that necking is a development or evolution of cheek-to-cheek dancing and may be traced still farther back zoologically to the courtship methods of ostriches. Such familiarities among persons of opposite sex are at best vulgar and in poor taste, while their utmost consequences need not be indicated. What benighted parents or guardians can permit such parties to be held?

What becomes of self-respect and respect for others of opposite sex? The fact of public and promiscuous familiarity is an immoral element in itself.

The old-time private courtship had its imprudences, but it was not brazen in its public exhibitionism and did not tend to incite wholesale emulation. If caresses continue to be cheapened they will have less value than a Polish mark, and young people will find their last week's love letters to be of no more worth than so much waste paper.

A Mind Muffler is Needed

I DISCUSSED the nature and effect of the ultra modern dance with a number of medical specialists in New York City. They agreed generally in the conclusion of harmful effects, especially in the case of young people. On the question of treatment for social aberrations, Professor Graham Lusk, who heads the department of physiology in Cornell University Medical College, said that nothing could be better than a dose of Christian principles.

"Do you know psychoanalysis?" asked a physician, whom I shall call Doctor X, who is head of the "booby ward" in a well-known metropolitan hospital. "This tells us that people have certain impulses which are bound to be gratified, if not in one way, then in another. You know that all dancing has a sex basis. We may expect normal physiological consequences. Why repress? It can't be done anyhow. I am the director of an institution where two hundred girls are confined. There are a thousand just as bad walking on Broadway at night. Of course society must have some regulations and try to enforce some public standards of conduct."

What right has a layman to criticize psychoanalysis? Well, he can take the facts as claimed and, by applying logic, may draw a conclusion different from that drawn by the votaries of the cult. And the best medical opinion now considers that psychoanalysis has been much overrated. It has a place in mental pathology, but is of little use and really harmful to the average run of humanity.

There was once a fad to remove the vermiform appendix, and this has been followed by the rage to have a person's complex cut out. Everybody has a complex in the subcellar of his or her mind. It can be cut out for fifty dollars and up. It may be compared in some respects to opening the muffler of an automobile engine.

There is a noisy discharge of gas, smoke and carbon debris, which relieves the engine but is such a nuisance to the community that the practice is unlawful upon public highways. A muffler for minds and engines seems to be a civilized necessity.

There are a few expert medical analyzers, and more quacks and amateurs in the game. Greenwich Villagers are strong for the pastime of mutual analysis. It becomes indecency cloaked in scientific phrases. According to the cult, this is a topsy-turvy world in which virtue and humane feelings indicate opposite traits. A person who speaks for decency must have base desires, and presumably all scoundrels are saints at heart.

Freud says that ninety per cent of our buried thoughts and our dreams are of sex. Little children two years old are tainted or afflicted with amativeness. A youngster who pulls off the leg of a fly and his sister who reproves him for cruelty equally demonstrate sex motivation. All adults are loaded to the gunwales with repressed sex desires. A bunch of these may fester in the mind, creating a complex and thus offering a job to the psychoanalyst.

Not for the Normal and Intelligent

THE patient with a complex is put through a word association test, being asked to respond with the first word that comes into mind after hearing such key words as cat, clock, stocking, piano, and what not. Also, the analyst plays Daniel to the dreams of the patient. Everything dreamed is symbolic and is bound to have a sex interpretation. A brick wall probably stands for an engagement, a cookstove for a certain marriage, a ladder is a honeymoon and a desert scene is a divorce. You see, people sometimes get engaged over brick garden walls, cookstoves are useful in housekeeping, ladders are employed in elopements, and Nevada is popular for classy separations. All very ingenious and may be true. In theory, when the rankling hidden desires are dragged by the analyst into the conscious strata of the patient's mind, the latter is forthwith relieved or cured, having no further mental struggle.

But this theory of relief and cure by exposing the hidden stuff into consciousness does not seem to me entirely logical. If the seven deadly sins are grappled and hoisted to the surface of the mind, will they not simply float there instead of remaining in a waterlogged state below? Why not keep them in the depths where they belong? What satisfaction to recognize desires whose fulfillment is usually impossible? It cannot help me to learn that my secret ambition is to surpass Mr. Rockefeller in wealth or to break the matrimonial record of the late Brigham Young. After all, the dream mind is only a naughty and silly youngster, who is best kept in his proper playground and off the public streets. Give him a lot of attention and you have a spoiled child who may graduate into an utter nuisance or a jailbird.

The worst feature of the Freudian theory is the denial of free will. Add that to the ninety per cent of sex desire, and you have a doctrine of inevitable and compulsory immorality. Our desires are dominant, and we cannot help ourselves. Is it true? For weaklings, yes, and for the short-brow races who are nearest to the ape, for the tribe of defectives and for the pasty-faced denizens of cities who are sodden with pleasure seeking. It is false for the normal and intelligent, who are impelled by duty as well as desire, whose lives are not a chaos of impulses but proceed on an ordered plan, whether inspired

(Continued on Page 71)

The hands of Mury Nash, celebrated for their beauty, are an example of how proper treatment enhances natural charm. Miss Nash posed for this exquisite photographic study of her lovely hands because she is an enthusiastic user of Cutex. She says: "I don't see how I ever tolerated having my cuticle cut—Cutex is so easy to use, so quick, and makes my nails look so well. I regard Cutex as a real toilet necessity."

Baron de Meyer. Photo

Do just two things— and your nails will look professionally manicured

ALL that made manicuring slow and difficult in the past has been done away with. You don't have to soak your nails—you don't have to cut the cuticle. Just work carefully around the nail base with an orange stick dipped in Cutex Cuticle Remover; then rinse, and the hard, dry edges of dead skin will simply wipe away.

Then you are ready for the polish. If you are in a special hurry, Cutex Liquid Polish will give you a particularly brilliant shine—instantaneously and without buffing. But if you are doing a more leisurely manicure, you will probably wish first to burnish the nails slightly with one of the other marvelous Cutex Polishes. A light coat of Liquid Polish, used as a finishing touch, will make your manicure last three times as long.

You can form no idea of how quick and easy Cutex has made manicuring until you have given it a trial. This very minute, before you forget, sit down and send for the new Cutex Introductory Set. In the cunning little box of black and rose—so smart and taking in itself—you will find samples of everything you need for manicuring this new way, with a book of instructions.

Follow the directions and give yourself a complete Cutex manicure. It will seem like a miracle to you. Perhaps you may have made the cuticle at the base of the nails coarse and ragged by clipping it with the cuticle scissors. Cutex Cuticle Remover will leave it beautifully smooth and even. And you will agree that you have never used a nail polish from which you get as quick, brilliant and lasting a shine as from any one of those provided by Cutex.

Cutex Sets come in three sizes

To many thousands of people a Cutex Set is now an absolute toilet necessity. You can buy them in three sizes, at 60c, at $1.50 and at $3.00. Or each preparation can be had separately at 35c. At all department stores in the United States and Canada and at chemist shops in England.

For the quickest, easiest manicure

Then spread the Polish on the soft part of the hand and burnish by passing the nails of the other lightly over it—or, if you want a still quicker, brighter lustre, just coat each nail lightly with Cutex Liquid Polish.

First dip the end of the orange stick in Cutex Cuticle Remover, work carefully around the nail base and then rinse. The hard dry edges of dead cuticle will simply wipe away.

MAIL THIS COUPON WITH 15 CENTS TODAY

Northam Warren,
Dept. 101, 114 West 17th Street,
New York City.

Name _____

Street _____

City and State _____

Introductory Set—now only 15c

Contains besides the samples of Cutex Cuticle Remover, Powder Polish, Cuticle Comfort, emery board and orange stick, a little bottle of the marvelous new Liquid Polish that has just been perfected and is now exactly what every woman wants for an instantaneous, dazzling polish. Address Northam Warren, 114 West 17th Street, New York; or, if you live in Canada, Dept. 101, 200 Mountain Street, Montreal.

PARAMOUNT PICTURES

listed in order of release

Nov. 1, 1921, to Feb. 1, 1922

Ask your theatre manager when he will show them

William S. Hart in
"Three Word Brand"
A Wm. S. Hart Production.

George Loane Tucker's
"Ladies Must Live"
With Betty Compson
By Alice Duer Miller.

"The Bonnie Brier Bush"
By Ian MacLaren
A Donald Crisp Production.

George Melford's Production
"The Sheik"
With Agnes Ayres and Rudolph Valentino
From the novel by Edith M. Hull.

Jack Holt in "The Call of the North"
Adapted from "Conjuror's House"
By Stewart Edward White.

Thomas Meighan in
"A Prince There Was"
From George M. Cohan's play and the novel "Enchanted Hearts"
By Darragh Aldrich.

Ethel Clayton in "Exit—the Vamp"
By Clara Beranger.

Pola Negri in
"The Last Payment."

Wallace Reid, Gloria Swanson and Elliott Dexter in "Don't Tell Everything!"
By Lorna Moon.

William S. Hart in "White Oak"
A Wm. S. Hart Production.

Gloria Swanson in
"Under the Lash"
From the novel "The Shulamite"
By Alice and Claude Askew.

A William DeMille Production
"Miss Lulu Bett"
With Lois Wilson, Milton Sills, Theodore Roberts and Helen Ferguson
From the novel and play by Zona Gale.

Betty Compson in
"The Little Minister"
By James M. Barrie
A Penrhyn Stanlaw's Production.

Wallace Reid in "Rent Free"
By Isola Forrester and Mann Page.

Cecil B. DeMille's Production
"A Fool's Paradise"
Suggested by Leonard Merrick's story
"The Laurels and the Lady."

Agnes Ayres in
"The Lane That Has No Turning"
By Sir Gilbert Parker.

John S. Robertson's Production
"Love's Boomerang"
With Ann Forrest. From the novel "Perpetua" by Dian Clayton Calthrop.

Betty Compson in
"The Law and the Woman"
Adapted from the Clyde Fitch play
"The Woman in the Case"
A Penrhyn Stanlaw's Production.

A George Fitzmaurice Production
"Three Live Ghosts," with
Anna Q. Nilsson and Norman Kerry.

Keeping up with the youngsters

THE young folks do their parents every bit as much good as their parents do them.

Were it not for the children, some of you parents would not know even now what a tremendous change for the better Paramount has brought in motion pictures.

There are thousands of people who still don't know that there is as much difference between the motion pictures of 1922 and 1917 as there is between a limousine and a donkey-cart.

During that time the plans of the greatest entertainment organization on earth have had a chance to mature.

Not merely that Paramount has been able to marshal the most brilliant stars, the most resourceful directors, the cleverest dramatists and a group of the most brilliant devisers of new screen-technique, but that Paramount has arranged a schedule of operation which enables any theatre, anywhere, to have the newest of these superb photoplays almost as fast as they can use them.

Imagine! Today more than 11,200 theatres are steadily depending on Paramount for the greatness of their programmes!

A greatness of which you will see a fine example, for instance, in Cecil B. DeMille's "A Fool's Paradise," soon to be released—a Paramount picture so unusual that advance hints about it already have millions eager to see it.

What does Paramount's achievement mean, this pleasing of more than 11,200 audiences all the time?

It means that in an industry calling for infinite richness and variety in its product, high uniformity of quality has at last been introduced.

The youngsters know. They follow the Paramount trail.

Paramount Pictures

If it's a Paramount Picture it's the best show in town

The Complete Furnishing of the Little House

Walls and Ceilings—The Background of Your Rooms

OUR HOME can be beautiful without proper backgrounds. Backgrounds are primarily designed to enhance objects placed against them. In picture galleries you will notice that the walls are clad in some neutral tone planned to set off the pictures to the best advantage; you do not view the wall background and remark its strangeness or its beauty; rather you admire the pictures, as it was intended you should. You may admire especially a certain portrait; notice the canvas background in the picture. Has not the artist painted it of a hue so neutral and subtle that he has been enabled to depict the face and figure radiantly? Imagine, if you will, a strident color here, or an insistent background of grapes, birds of paradise or roses; immediately you can see that the subject of the picture would be lost. In the backgrounds of our homes we wish to have neutral surfaces against which we and the clothes we wear, our furniture, our curtains, our objets d'art, our pictures and our books look well.

We wish backgrounds beautiful in the sunlight, reminiscently lovely in shadow, capable alike of perfect accents and negations, graceful, profound. It is easy enough to determine what constitutes the background of any room; we have only to look about us—the walls, with doors and windows, fireplaces, shelves and cupboards; the ceiling above us, the floor beneath. There then are our backgrounds, and remembering how delightfully far we may go in the matter of brilliant curtains, colorful overstuffs, lamps, books, pillows and bowls of flowers, even in the gorgeous hues of painted furniture, let us determine upon restraint, lovely and pale where possible, in our walls and ceilings, restraint dusky neutral in our floors.

A room should be beautiful before there is placed in it a single table or chair, a curtain at a window or a rug on the floor. It should be luminous with promise, hospitably inviting and inexhaustible in its suggestion of any number of possible schemes. A blue-walled room is limited in its future scope; one may at most do only two or three things with it, and to the end of the chapter it will remain helplessly blue. But a gray or cream walled room has in it the capacity for being rose or yellow, blue or green, demure or riotously gay.

When I first stepped into my own living room, before it was mine, I was impressed at once by its versatility and charm. Had it never been necessary to cover the floor, to curtain the windows, to furnish it, still it would have been a delightful room, with its gracious ceiling, its dusky walnut floor, its small-paned casement windows, its colonial fireplace, its shelves for books. All were proportioned symmetrically. The woodwork was all white, the sanded walls watertoned a putty color.

I was quite lost in admiration of this austere yet friendly, empty room—empty, yet full of color; for there were cool, green views from the windows, there were warm reflections on ivory paint, dense shadows in the fireplace, wan shadows in the corners, and sunlight lay in great pools on the gleaming floor and splashed high up on the paneled door.

The Selection of Wall Tones

LATER I found my problem one of preserving intact the charm of the empty shell of this room, fearful lest here or there I should mar its loveliness. And all the while I was particularly comforted by the presence of those putty walls, knowing that when the time came I could weave against them what color or magic I would. This is as it should be in every room, and you who perchance wonder at your lack of success in decorating your home, at your heavy effects and uninspired schemes, should consider with me how you may improve your backgrounds; for this can be your only logical first step forward toward the beauty you desire.

I advise pale walls of gray or cream almost exclusively. These include many tones of neutrality, from the most delicate ivory and oyster tints, through the sand tones, the putty colors, the café au lait hues, to the more positive light tans and French grays. Between these there are many gradations that may be named or unnamed, according to the degrees of popularity they attain. But as one proceeds in this study of tones and their effect one becomes increasingly sensitive to the slight but all-important difference resulting from the use of this tone that is sufficiently warm or that tint which is grayed to the necessary coolness. For many considerations enter into the selection of wall tones.

One is exposure. Northern and eastern exposures require warmer tones on the walls—cream, putty, café au lait, tan. Further warmth may be added by a properly selected color scheme in the room furnishings. Southern and western exposures will welcome any of the tints, but it is in these rooms that the cool grays are at their best. The color schemes selected for use against these walls may be cool, also, depending for degree upon the sunniness and glow in the room; but let blue and green predominate, with accents of warm other color to enhance the coolness.

Illustration by Albert Henck

By ETHEL CARPENTER

Another consideration in the selection of a wall tone is the general color scheme desired in the room. The neutral tint that blends best must be the one selected. Tan, for instance, would be unfortunate when the predominant scheme is to be yellow. Gray is not so good a selection with very predominant blue as it is with predominant green, in the cool combinations; and gray is really better with yellow than it is with rose in the warm combination. Ivory or cream goes with everything, and a sufficiently cool putty tone, somewhat the color of bisque, may be used delightfully in any room; so when in doubt never fear to use one of these.

Light tones are quite as beautiful in the more formal rooms—the drawing, living and dining rooms—as they are in bedrooms, and it is a sure fact that even the woman who has been brought up on a somber green wall in her living room will daily sing with delight over her new walls of cream after she gets past the momentary shock of seeing her furniture silhouetted against paleness. However, if one wishes to use tan or a positive gray these tones are more suitable for the living portions of the home.

Picture Molding in Place of Border

IT HAS been said that people have better taste than they used to have. Personally I know this is true. One has but to walk through countless homes to see walls in all the rooms toned more or less alike, refreshingly cream, demurely gray, softly and palely tan. Against this sort of harmonious and continuous background one may take advantage of the most gorgeous hues it is possible to procure; one may be more daring and varied in the matter of color schemes than was the case when walls were murdered and dispositions sadly jangled by vast expanses of red, green, blue and yellow, stretched unrelievedly over the walls of neighboring rooms; with highly colored satin stripes in sleeping chambers.

Those who are newly approaching the problem of selecting wall tones for an entire house are accepting more easily this doctrine of a continuous background, the tints varied but slightly in the different rooms to meet conditions of exposure, temperament or color scheme. This custom cannot be too urgently advised, and the fact that it is being taken up by the majority of beauty-desiring laymen will recommend it to those who distrust what they term new and plain effects.

To a great extent the border is also going, but not so quickly perhaps as I might wish; for very often we still see its head sticking up persistently from the otherwise quiet and friendly wall, as though it were loath to vanish altogether into the outer darkness. Why will people persist in pasting or painting a band of color in the upper part of their rooms when top walls should be the palest part of the scheme? Walls are merely the beginning, the background, of a gracious whole, and one should not use all one's thrills, or in fact any of them, on the walls of a room.

THIS is the first article in a new series that will be, when it is finished, a complete text book of interior decoration. Next month Mrs. Carpenter will discuss floors, then, in issues extending through the whole year, will come curtains, color schemes, furniture, painting furniture, the hall, the living room, the dining room, the bedrooms, the kitchen, closets, storerooms, lights, pictures, books, and so on. You will do well to start a scrapbook to-day, saving these articles from month to month.

In place of the border use the picture molding, either painted to match the pale walls or done in white or ivory to match the room woodwork. The height of the ceiling has some influence upon where this molding is placed; but whenever possible, disregard the fact of a high ceiling and run the molding at the ceiling turn, just as you would in a low-ceilinged room, trusting to other shifts for distracting the attention from a too lofty stretch of wall. You have still your hangings and furniture to depend upon, and many illusions can be created with these.

However, the placing of the molding is not entirely arbitrary. In the low-ceilinged room it may be at the ceiling turn, or two inches below; in rooms with high ceilings it may be in the position I have originally suggested, or even three or four feet below. When a cornice can be afforded and at the same time suits the room, a simple one done in white or an off tone is far to be desired to a border.

If one simply cannot live without the border, however, it is urged that one select an architecturally designed band no wider than an inch and repeating the same neutral tone apparent in the paper, to be run at the joining line or exactly below the molding. Such a mild and inoffensive border will surely be a step to no border at all. And then we'll all be happy.

The treatment of the woodwork should not be definitely decided upon until that of the walls is rather well determined, for the two go hand in hand, both blending to form the background of the room. Of late it has been found necessary to use fewer arguments in favor of pale woodwork toning with the walls, even when this requires the painting over of dark or semidark trims. For people have just naturally found out for themselves that light-painted woodwork is more decorative, without being one whit more trouble to keep clean than dark wood is to keep waxed to a soft glow.

Of course when one has handsomely paneled or wainscoted walls of dusky woodwork, as fine and rare as old heirlooms, one builds the room around them, successfully weaving a harmony between the brown of the wood and the pale walls. But when the dark woodwork is varnished oak or chestnut, stained birch or mahogany, or a stained or grained imitation of any of these, the remedy can only be a quart or so of transforming paint. In the same way mahogany doors in white trims are snares and delusions; one may expect great things of them when used in connection with mahogany furniture, but even at the best they cut up the background unfortunately, and quite frequently tend to overweight the walls when the furniture is placed.

The most successful rooms are those boasting throughout woodwork of white, ivory or cream, though there is much latitude in the choosing of the exact tone. Since pure white is sometimes a trifle harsh, a little cream color may be added in the mixing. The new idea of painting the woodwork the exact color of the pale walls is yet more beautiful, as the background of the room is more successfully a background when there is no tone difference apparent between the trim and the walls.

Choosing the Wall Paper

MANY persons look always upon paper as the logical wall finish. It is without doubt the most popular, and very beautiful effects can be obtained with it, for the making of wall paper has well-nigh reached perfection if one considers the output of the better manufacturers. For both wear and style it always pays to get good paper, fifty cents to a dollar and a half a roll being a fair guide to the better grades. But if this cost is absolutely not to be afforded, my advice is to familiarize yourself with the best so that you will easily recognize and choose a paper among the cheaper grades that will give much the same effect. I have even seen beauty in walls of wrapping paper, and it is an old story that some excessively cheap papers are better put on wrong side out.

There has been little change in the general style of papers for the past few years. Stipples are quite in the lead, partly because of the great diversity in tone that may be obtained through this method of coloring the paper, and partly because of the fine atmospheric effects such papers give. Many of these papers are first given a pressed texture resembling grass cloth before the all-over stipples of gray and ecru are applied. You have only to stand in a room papered in this manner to prove for yourself that the walls subtly express distance, quietness and rest, besides being beautiful in themselves when examined minutely.

Closely allied to these stipple tones are the two tones, papers that are printed in small all-over designs and stripes done in two tones of one neutral color, such as a tiny vine of putty on cream, a broken diamond all-over pattern of ivory

(Continued on Page 130)

The Charm of Beautiful, Well-kept Hair

Why the Way You Dress It Makes So Much Difference In Your Personal Attractiveness

Illustrations by
WILL GREFFÉ

EVERYWHERE you go your hair is noticed most critically.

It tells the world what you are.

If you wear your hair becomingly and always have it beautifully clean and well-kept, it adds more than anything else to your attractiveness.

Beautiful hair is not a matter of luck, it is simply a matter of care.

Study your hair, take a hand mirror and look at the front, the sides and the back. Try doing it up in various ways. See just how it looks best.

A slight change in the way you dress your hair, or in the way you care for it, makes all the difference in the world in its appearance.

Importance of Shampooing the Hair Properly

IN caring for the hair, shampooing is always the most important thing.

It is the shampooing which brings out the real life and lustre, natural wave and color, and makes your hair soft, fresh and luxuriant.

When your hair is dry, dull and heavy, lifeless, stiff and gummy, and the strands cling together, and it feels harsh and disagreeable to the touch, it is because your hair has not been shampooed properly.

When your hair has been shampooed properly, and is thoroughly clean, it will be glossy, smooth and bright, delightfully fresh looking, soft and silky.

While your hair must have frequent and regular washing to keep it beautiful, it cannot stand the harsh effect of free alkali which is common in ordinary soap. The free alkali soon dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle and ruins it.

For this reason more and more women everywhere now use Mulsified Coconut Oil Shampoo. This clear, pure and entirely greaseless product cannot possibly injure, and it does not dry the scalp or make the hair brittle, no matter how often you use it.

You will be surprised to see how really beautiful you can make your hair look.

Follow This Simple Method

FIRST, wet the hair and scalp in clear, warm water. Then, apply a little Mulsified Coconut Oil Shampoo, rubbing it in thoroughly all over the scalp and throughout the entire length, down to the ends of the hair.

Dress Your Hair to Emphasize Your Best Lines and Reduce Your Poor Ones

Begin by studying your profile. If you have a short nose, do not put your hair on the top of your head; if you have a round, fat face, do not fluff your hair out too much at the sides; if your face is very thin and long, then you should fluff your hair out at the sides. The woman with the full face and double chin should wear her hair high. All these and other individual features must be taken into consideration in selecting the proper hairdress. Above all, simplicity should prevail. You are always most attractive when your hair looks most natural—when it looks most like you.

Two or three teaspoonfuls will make an abundance of rich, creamy lather. This should be rubbed in thoroughly and briskly with the finger tips, so as to loosen the dandruff and small particles of dust and dirt that stick to the scalp.

When you have done this, rinse the hair and scalp thoroughly, using clear, fresh, warm water. Then use another application of Mulsified.

Two waters are usually sufficient for washing the hair; but sometimes the third is necessary. You can easily tell, for when the hair is perfectly clean it will be soft and silky in the water, the strands will fall apart easily, each separate hair floating alone in the water, and the entire mass, even while wet, will feel loose, fluffy and light to the touch and be so clean it will fairly squeak when you pull it through your fingers.

Always Rinse the Hair Thoroughly

THIS is very important. After the final washing the hair and scalp should be rinsed in at least two changes of good,

WATKINS
MULSIFIED
COCOANUT OIL SHAMPOO
Copyright 1920
THE R. L. W. CO.

warm water and followed with a rinsing in cold water. When you have rinsed the hair thoroughly, wring it as dry as you can; and finish by rubbing it with a towel, shaking it and fluffing it until it is dry. Then, give it a good brushing.

After a Mulsified Shampoo you will find the hair will dry quickly and evenly and have the appearance of being much thicker and heavier than it is.

If you want to always be remembered for your beautiful, well-kept hair, make it a rule to set a certain day each week for a Mulsified Coconut Oil Shampoo. This regular weekly shampooing will keep the scalp soft and the hair fine and silky, bright, fresh looking and fluffy, wavy and easy to manage, and it will be noticed and admired by everyone.

You can get Mulsified Coconut Oil Shampoo at any drug store or toilet goods counter. A 4-ounce bottle should last for months.

Care of the Hair Should Start Early in Life

CHILDREN should be taught, early in life, that proper care of the hair is essential to health.

It may be hard at first to get them to shampoo their hair regularly, but it's mighty important.

The hair and scalp should be kept perfectly clean to insure a healthy, vigorous scalp and a fine, thick, heavy head of hair.

Get your children into the habit of shampooing their hair regularly once a week. A boy's hair being short, shampooing takes but a few minutes. For both the boy and the girl, simply moisten the hair with warm water, pour on a little Mulsified and rub vigorously with the tips of the fingers. This will stimulate the scalp, make an abundance of rich, creamy lather and cleanse the hair thoroughly. It takes only a few seconds to rinse it all out when through.

You will be surprised how this regular weekly shampooing with Mulsified will improve the appearance of the hair; and you will be teaching your children a habit they will appreciate in after-life, for a luxuriant head of hair is something every man and woman feels mighty proud of.

Old-Time Patchwork and Appliquéd Quilts

Secured Through the Courtesy of the Guild of the Needle and Bobbin Crafts

Beautifully quilted in alternate squares is the muslin quilt from the Emma B. Hodge collection, at the right, with its baskets made up of cherry-red and white triangles. The handles and the border of full-blown roses and buds are appliquéd. Its simplicity makes this design a good one to copy. The more nicely made quilts usually have rounded corners and are bound with bias strips. Cotton wadding, French flannel or wool makes the best padding.

The quilt at the right was made in pioneer days when the French women settlers watched eagerly for boats to come up the Mississippi bringing new materials from the homeland. It is from the collection of Mrs. Frank Bergen and is of blue toile de jouy—a heavy French cotton goods—and the landscape rambles in true Watteau style. Light-weight chintz could be used in imitating this quilt. Nearly a century ago the Wreath of Roses design was a favorite; to-day, appliquéd in lovely colors on white muslin, as in Mrs. D. L. B. Smith's quilt at the center below, it will add charm to the most modern boudoir. Because our great-grandmothers loved beautiful things and longed for the bright colors they were forbidden to wear we have in our museums to-day handmade quilts beautiful in design and gay of color. Especially colorful is the Cherry Tree design of 1820, from the Emma B. Hodge collection, shown below; orange and scarlet birds fly through gray-green foliage or peck at bright cherries; the fox grapes and the vine are brown, the tulips, red and yellow.

No pattern offered

15009

The winged circle used on the quilt at the left is the Assyrian feroher, symbol of a winged spirit that hovered protectingly over the heads of Chaldean and Babylonian kings. At the right below is an old trundle-bed quilt from the collection of Mrs. Frank Bergen—enormous in size because it had to cover the high bed under which the trundle-bed was pushed in daytime. The motifs, varied at will, offer fascinating ideas for modern application.

15010

IF YOU have an old patchwork quilt, deep in musty dreams under somebody's wedding dress, dig it out of its hiding place, air it and press it and fling it on your bed. For old-fashioned quilts are the new-fashioned quilts, and there is no touch quite so modern in the present-day bedroom as that lovely relic of grandmother's time.

Or, indeed, of great-grandmother's time, for the story of quilts in America goes away back of grandmother. It is the story of American women from Jamestown and Plymouth down; the story of their thoughts and hopes and dreams, as well as of the skill of their fingers. For a quilt will tell no tales, and into it may safely go all the thirst for adventure and the hunger for beauty that hard-working, secluded women otherwise cannot satisfy. And it is a story that is not finished yet, for to-day, in the mountains and on the plains, where distances are great and lives are lonely, women are still putting all the art that is theirs into the making of beautiful and colorful quilts, devising their own patterns, sometimes even creating their colors from root and berry dyes.

15011

(Continued on Page 102)

15012

No pattern offered

Where to Get the Money to Build a Home

By P. S. LOVEJOY

Inquiries about the houses shown should be addressed to the Architectural Department, The Ladies' Home Journal

CONTRIBUTED BY CHAS. A. BYRNE

CELLARS WERE NOT PROVIDED FOR THESE LITTLE BUNGALOWS, BUT A CELLAR COULD BE EXCAVATED TO ACCOMMODATE THE HEATER, OR A CELLARLESS HEATING PLANT MIGHT BE INSTALLED

BUILD, buy or rent? It's an urgent question for which there is no uniform answer. For many people in many communities, renting will continue to be cheaper and more satisfactory than owning. For some, whether cheaper or satisfactory or not, buying or building will be simply out of the question. But somebody must build, and soon.

We are here concerned with the problems that confront the new home builder, and with the comparatively modest home—to cost complete, say, $15,000 or less.

The first consideration, of course, is to find the approximate limits of cost.

Long and carefully checked experience indicates that the average family may properly spend one-fifth to one-fourth of its income on shelter, be it rent or mortgage money. Suppose you are paying fifty dollars a month in rent, or $600 a year, and that this amounts to about one-fourth of your total yearly income. Suppose, also, that your savings are actually accumulating at the rate of about $200 a year. That gives you $800 a year for possible payments on a new home.

Most persons have to borrow money in order to build. If the yearly sum available is figured at $800, and if it is planned to pay out within ten years, then the total cost of land and construction must fall below $8000. An investment to be paid off within fifteen years must be below $12,000. Interest payments are allowed for in each case.

Between the cost of the land and the cost of the building itself there is a fairly standard ratio. As a rule a building site that is properly adjusted to the house it carries will have cost one-fourth to one-third of the total home investment. If the total allowable investment is $10,000, then a normal cost for the building site will fall between $2500 and $3500.

If in Doubt, Go Slowly

NOW, having fixed the approximate limits of what can be paid for building lots and for the house, one is almost ready to begin shopping for the location and the house plans.

Right at this stage it is a good idea to make sure that the site and the house that you can afford will be really satisfactory. Will they be satisfactory enough to keep living in and fighting for year after year for as many years as you expect it will take you to pay for them? Suppose you must stay on living in that $7000 house on that $3000 lot year after year, paying for them slowly and perhaps painfully out of savings that may involve real scrimping? Could you do that and be content? If there is any doubt, go slowly.

At about this point will come another question: "Build now or wait?"

Everything considered, it seems quite sure that the family that really needs and wants its own home, and that can manage to finance it without too great a strain, may wisely build at once.

Assuming that you have decided to build soon, then what? First, the possibilities of financing the new home.

A good place to begin is at the bank where you do business. The chances are that a very material part of the bank's business is in the financing of homes for people such as you. Ask anybody in the bank where to go to talk over a building loan. Presently you will find the right man.

CONTRIBUTED BY CHAS. A. BYRNE

THIS BUNGALOW, DESIGNED TO "BEAT THE HIGH COST OF BUILDING," IS, LIKE THE OTHER THREE, OF FRAME CONSTRUCTION PAINTED WHITE WITH GREEN SHINGLED ROOF. CEMENT PORCH, RED BRICK STEPS

CONTRIBUTED BY CHAS. A. BYRNE

ALTHOUGH SIMPLE IN EXTERIOR APPEARANCE THIS BUNGALOW IS NEVERTHELESS QUITE ATTRACTIVE. THE EXTERIOR IS WHITE RELIEVED BY PALE-GREEN WOOD SHUTTERS, WHICH COMBINATION OF COLORS SETS OFF THE RED BRICK FLOORED STOOP

CONTRIBUTED BY CHAS. A. BYRNE

ANY ONE OF THESE BUNGALOWS WOULD COST IN THE NEIGHBORHOOD OF $4500 TO $5000 TO BUILD. TWO PLANS ARE PROVIDED TO ENABLE A VARIATION IN COST AND INTERIOR ARRANGEMENT

"About how are you fixed and about what sort of building operations are you thinking of?" and "Do you own the lot?" he will probably ask you. Then tell him all about it.

Whether you have bought the building site and, if so, where it is and what you paid will be prime considerations with the banker. If you already own a lot in a good part of town he will know that you have been getting ready to build. The location will tell him much as to your social standing, ambitions and business judgment. The size and value of the lot in proportion to the cost of the house which you are planning to put up will indicate whether you are inclined to be conservative or apt to overreach. Chiefly, of course, the ownership of a good lot will permit you to offer it as security for a building loan.

The banker will probably explain that he could not lend more than half the value of the finished home, so that, if you have a $10,000 place in mind and everything is all right, you could expect to borrow from the bank not more than $5000. The balance of the building money will have to come from other sources. He will probably tell you of the building-and-loan-association plan and whether there is such an association in your neighborhood. He can explain about first and second mortgages, notes, whom to see about real-estate values, estimates of building costs, and whether building loans are relatively hard or easy to get in your town or region, and why.

Common Means of Raising Funds

THERE are several common means of raising funds for home-building operations: Mortgage loans, building-association loans, land contracts, personal notes, and cash.

For building purposes, cash consists of actual bank balances plus Liberty Bonds and other securities that have a ready cash value. A note is a personal promise to pay and may or may not be backed by collateral. Life-insurance policies have a cash-borrowing value. Most policies provide for modest borrowings upon the premiums paid in. It is also possible to sign over an insurance policy so as to make it payable to the person from whom you have borrowed money on an otherwise unsecured note.

A mortgage loan usually works like this: You own a good lot and have some cash, but need more cash in order to build. You proceed to "hock" the lot and the lender agrees to advance the rest of the money needed. The papers are signed and the borrowed money is placed to your credit, but with restrictions which insure that it shall be spent only in buying for the house. From the time you borrow the money you begin paying interest on it.

A second mortgage is on what is secured only by what may be left of the property after the first mortgage has been satisfied. Regular banks and trust companies do not, as a rule, write or deal in second mortgages.

In addition to the regular interest, commissions are often charged for placing mortgage loans. For first mortgages the commissions usually run from one to

(Continued on Page 130)

"That's Interesting!"

A New Year lies ahead with its opportunities for doing things better than ever before. Hours and hours of time can be saved, for instance, in preparing the breakfasts of 1922.

Once you've tried Armour's Oats you know the advantages of relying on them for quick, nourishing breakfasts. They cook thoroughly in 10 to 15 minutes. Put them on the stove with the coffee, and they're both done at the same time.

And what is the result? Oats of a wonderfully satisfying flavor that appeal to sharpened appetites morning after morning.

Manufactured by Armour Grain Company
Chicago

Makers of Armour's Guaranteed Cereals—
Oats, Corn Flakes, Pancake Flour,
Macaroni, Spaghetti, Noodles

The Dutch Twins and the Storks

By LUCY FITCH PERKINS

Author of the Twins Book

Fold-A-Way Dolls

Designed by

Jessie Louise Taylor

DIRECTIONS FOR MAKING FOLD-A-WAY TOYS

Before cutting out these toys, mean them with library paste on another page of an old copy of this magazine. Heavy paper will be best for the twins. The garments, the hats and the geese need not be mounted at all, but they will last longer if mounted on light paper. When thoroughly dry, score the dotted lines and then trim around the black outlines. Cut into the lines on the bases to make the legs. Fold over on the dotted lines at the top and the dotted lines on the bases in opposite directions, as shown on the little figures. Bring the bases together, slide the long tabs from one side into the locks on the opposite side. Doll will then stand alone. Cut the slots on the body of the dolls and dresses as indicated, trim the tabs on the garments to fit into these slots easily yet snugly. Cut lines on hats, fold over on dotted line, then rip with paste underneath, but below the slit.

FROM A KODAK NEGATIVE

Keep the story of the children with an Autographic KODAK

Pictures of the children gather interest with the years—and as the picture gains in interest, the date gains in importance. “When was it made?” That’s the inevitable question that a picture of a child provokes. You know the answer now, perhaps—but later——

Through the autographic feature, exclusively Eastman, and an integral part of the Kodak, each negative may be dated—and titled, too—at the time of exposure. The result is all the story—for all time.

Autographic Kodaks $8.00 up

EASTMAN KODAK COMPANY, Rochester, N. Y., the Kodak City

The Dutch Twins and the Storks

By LUCY FITCH PERKINS

IT and Kat are twins, and they live in a snug little white house on a tidy green farm beside a canal in Holland. Kit is the boy and Kat is the girl, and they are five years old. One bright spring morning when the birds were singing and flying about, looking for places to build their nests, Kit and Kat took their breakfast of buns spread with honey and went out to the straw stack beside the stable to eat it. The geese were eating their breakfast there too. They were hunting in the loose straw for kernels of grain and were wagging their tails sideways and making soft, squeaky sounds in their throats because they were happy. The twins sat down on the straw in the sunshine.

"I'm going to eat my bun very slowly, so it will last a long time," said Kat.

"Ho," said Kit, "I am going to take big bites of mine." He opened his mouth wide and had just set his teeth in it when right above their heads there came a queer flapping noise, and a great big bird flew over the straw stack and lit on the thatched roof of the stable.

It had a long neck, long pink legs and a long red bill. Kit's eyes nearly popped out of his head with surprise, but on account of the bun he could not say a word.

"A stork!" gasped Kat.

Kit shook his finger at Kat and tried his best to say "Sh-h-h!" but his mouth was so full that he choked instead. He turned purple and looked as if he would burst, he tried so hard to keep the choke inside of him for fear of frightening the stork. All the geese were now squawking and gazing up at the roof, and the old gander waddled toward the stable saying "S-s-s-s!" in a very threatening manner.

"Oh! Oh!" whispered Kat. "That silly old gander will scare him away! Storks always bring good luck, and grandmother says that sometimes, if people are very good, they bring them a brand-new baby."

Kit tried to say "I think we are very good," but the words got all chewed up in the bun.

The stork stood perfectly still on one foot, gazing out over the level green fields as if he had not heard a sound and in a moment the geese forgot all about him and waddled down to the canal for a swim.

They were no sooner out of sight than there was another flapping noise and right over the twins' heads flew another great bird. It settled down on the roof, tucked up one leg and stood as stiff as a soldier beside its mate.

"A pair of them!" wheezed Kit through the bun. "Oh, don't you hope they will build a nest here?" whispered Kat.

Kit swallowed hard; then he said: "Father won't let them build on the roof. They'll spoil the thatch."

"Let's run and ask him," said Kat.

They slid quietly down from the straw and pattered away to the house.

They flung open the kitchen door and shouted: "There's a pair of storks on the stable roof."

FATHER VEDDER set down the box of young cabbage plants he was carrying, and Mother Vedder dropped the pillow she was shaking, and the whole family ran out of doors and stood in a row gazing up at the motionless birds.

"Oh, Father," said Kat, "won't you let them build a nest on the roof, if they want to?"

Father Vedder did not answer a word. He put his hands in his pockets and whistled softly to himself.

"Keep still," Kit whispered to Kat. "He's thinking." They both clapped their hands over their mouths and kept as still as mice.

Pretty soon Father Vedder stopped whistling, nodded his head and said: "Um." Then he went into the stable. Mother Vedder went back to her kitchen, and the two storks suddenly flew away, with their long legs streaming out behind them.

"Oh, dear, oh, dear!" sighed Kat. "Everybody"

THE story of the Dutch Twins and the Storks, together with the fold-a-way Dutch Twins paper dolls on page 34, is the first appearance of a new feature in the HOME JOURNAL. Each month this year there will be a new page of twin dolls, all nationalities, with a twin story to match by Mrs. Perkins. Watch next month for the Mexican Twins—dolls and story!

They watched the storks until they were out of sight and then sat down on a chicken coop. They were almost ready to cry.

"I don't suppose they'll ever come back," said Kit, "so you may as well eat your breakfast."

Kat still had her bun in her hand, and her fingers were all sticky with honey. She ate the bun and licked her fingers. Then she felt better. Pretty soon Father Vedder came out of the stable carrying a long pole and an old cart wheel.

He put the wheel on the end of the pole and wedged it tightly with sticks. Then he set up the pole in the stable yard.

"THERE," he said, when it was all done; "that's the best kind of a place for a stork's nest."

"But the storks are gone," wailed the twins.

"Maybe they'll come back when they see what a fine house we have made for them," said Father Vedder. Then he went away to set out his cabbage plants.

"I tell you what let's do," said Kit. "Let's get some little sticks for the nest and scatter them about in the straw."

For an hour they worked gathering twigs from the willow tree and still there was no sign of the storks.

"Oh, dear me!" sighed Kat. "I do want them to come back and bring us a baby sister with blue eyes and a dear little snubby nose. I do so want one, don't you, Kit?"

Kit thought a minute, then he said: "I think a dear little brother would be nicer."

"Maybe God will tell them to bring us one, if we ask Him," said Kat.

"All right," said Kit. "Let's ask Him."

The twins knelt down just as they did when they said their prayers at night.

"You begin," said Kat.

Kit shut his eyes and folded his hands. "Dear God," he said, "please send back the storks and tell them to bring us a baby brother."

Kat interrupted him—"A baby sister, if you please, God," she said; "but if there aren't any girls left, any kind of a baby will do. Amen."

They opened their eyes and looked up in the sky, hoping to see the storks coming; but there was not a bird anywhere in sight except a robin singing in the willow tree.

They waited ten whole minutes. Then Kit said: "I know what we can do. I've thought of a thing. Storks like frogs."

"Oh, goody!" cried Kat. "We'll catch a whole basket of frogs for them. If they see that and the wheel, they'll surely build their nest here."

THEY ran back to the kitchen and got the little yellow basket they put worms in for bait when they went fishing with grandfather. Then they hurried down to the canal. There were frogs croaking all about; but the moment the twins tried to catch them they jumped into the canal. The twins worked and worked, and by and by it was almost noon and there were only three frogs in the basket.

"I'm tired," said Kat.

"So'm I," said Kit.

"Let's take these frogs up to the stable yard anyway," said Kat, "even if the storks aren't there."

"All right," said Kit.

Kit took the basket, and they trotted up the goose path that went from the canal to the straw stack.

When they reached the stable Kit was ahead. He peeped around the corner; then he stopped so quickly that Kat bumped into him.

"Sh-sh; they're there!" whispered Kit.

Kat peeped over Kit's shoulder, and there were the storks standing in the straw and looking up at the cart wheel.

The twins hid behind the straw stack and kept very still. They were so excited they could hardly breathe. By and by Kit opened the basket—very quietly. The frogs jumped out. They jumped toward the storks and the storks gobbled them up in three mouthfuls. Then, if you will believe it, they each took a stick in their bills, flew right up to the wheel and began at once to build a nest.

The twins watched them work every day after that until the nest was finished, and then they found a place in the stable loft where they could peep through a hole in the thatch and watch the mother bird while she sat on her eggs. By and by there were three young storks in the nest, and the father and mother birds flew back and forth all day long, dropping food into their three open bills.

One day when they were watching them, Kat said: "I suppose the storks are so busy taking care of their own babies they haven't time to bring us ours."

"Maybe God forgot," said Kat. "Sometimes I forget things myself."

Kat sighed. "We have waited a long time," she said. The very next day, when they were watching the nest, they saw a strange thing. The mother bird poked one of the young birds right out of the nest. It fell in the soft straw.

"Oh, oh!" screamed the twins. They almost fell down the ladder, they were in such a hurry to get down from the loft. They picked up the baby stork, put it in Kat's apron and ran with it to the house.

"Mother, mother, the old stork threw one of her babies out of the nest, and here it is," shouted Kat, opening her apron.

"Bless me!" cried Mother Vedder. "Maybe she gave you one of her babies to thank you for all you have done for them."

"I'd rather have a real baby," said Kat; "but maybe God was out of real babies, and besides I told him any kind of a baby would do."

"You told Him what?" said her mother.

Then Kat told her how much she wanted the storks to bring a baby sister, and Kit wanted a baby brother instead, and how they had told God about it, and Mother Vedder said "Bless me!" again. Then she said: "Maybe if you take good care of their baby the storks will see you can be trusted with a baby sister or a brother."

"Of course, even a stork baby is better than none at all," said Kat. "We'll name it Stuff, because it eats all the time."

They made a nice nest for Stuff in a box, and then they hunted bugs, and grasshoppers, and worms, and frogs and fed him and fed him, and Stuff grew and grew.

In a little while he would run about the stable yard with the geese, just as if he belonged to them. The twins were very proud of Stuff.

ONE day in midsummer, when he was old enough to take care of himself, Kit and Kat went to town with their father. They went in a boat on the canal, and father let them stay all night with grandfather and grandmother. The next day they came home in grandfather's milk wagon, which was drawn by Peter and Paul, grandfather's two dogs. Grandfather and grandmother both came with them, but they walked because they were too big for the cart.

When they came in sight of the house there was father standing in the kitchen door with a bundle in his arms. Kit and Kat hopped out of the dog cart and ran to meet him.

"See what the storks brought," said father.

He turned down the little quilt over the bundle, and there was a dear little pink baby with blue eyes and a snubby nose!

Kat clasped her hands. "Is it—oh, is it—a baby sister?" she cried.

"No, but it is a real truly baby brother," said Father Vedder.

Kat held up her arms and her father placed the little bundle tenderly in them.

"God didn't forget, after all," said Kit.

RIGHT ABOVE THEIR HEADS CAME A QUEER FLAPPING NOISE, AND A GREAT BIRD FLEW OVER THE STRAW STACK

KAT ATE THE BUN AND LICKED HER FINGERS. THEN SHE FELT BETTER

Every normal skin needs two creams

A protective cream for daytime use
A cleansing cream at night

Complexion flaws prevented by a daytime cream without oil

To protect your skin from dust and wind during the day, and to keep it from looking shiny, a daytime cream made without oil must be used.

Rough, chapped skin. The dust and wind to which one is exposed in winter dry much of the natural moisture out of the skin. To make up for this you need a daytime cream that softens and protects the skin without adding a particle of oil.

Before going out into the cold air, touch your face and neck and hands with Pond's Vanishing Cream. It disappears at once, leaving the skin delightfully soft and satiny and forming an invisible protection against wind and cold.

Shiny skin. This almost universal annoyance is due to powdering the wrong way—that is, without providing a base for the powder to cling to. Try powdering this way—

First rub the face lightly with Pond's Vanishing Cream. As it contains absolutely no oil, it cannot reappear in a shine. See how smoothly and evenly the powder goes on over this base and how long it stays.

Dull, tired skin. When you are tired does your skin feel drawn and tight, as if the muscles of the face were pulled taut? Apply a little Pond's Vanishing Cream. Absorbed instantly by the weary skin, it relieves the strained look about the eyes and mouth and gives the whole face a fresh youthfulness.

Before going out, smooth a little Pond's Vanishing Cream into the skin

Flaws prevented by nightly cleansing with an oil cream

At night, a cream made with oil is essential, to cleanse deep into the pores and keep the skin supple and free from wrinkles.

Blackheads. Blackheads need a more thorough cleansing than ordinary washing can give.

Wash your face with hot water and pure soap. Then work Pond's Cold Cream thoroughly into the pores. As this rich oil cream penetrates the skin, it softens and loosens all the dirt which has lodged deep in the pores. Wipe the cream off with a soft cloth. This leaves the skin really clean. If you would have a clear healthy skin, do not neglect this nightly cleansing.

Wrinkles. When the first fine lines begin to show themselves about the mouth and eyes, give them instant attention. If you let them go for even a little while, they will get deeper and become harder and harder to erase.

For wrinkles you need a cream with an oil base, for oil is the greatest enemy known to wrinkles. Pond's Cold Cream, rubbed gently into the face at night, acts as a tonic, stimulating the blood, rousing the skin, and warding off the wrinkles. Too vigorous rubbing is apt to be harmful; but gentle, persistent rubbing, systematically done, is beneficial even to the most delicate skin.

POND'S Cold Cream

POND'S Vanishing Cream

GENEROUS TUBES—
MAIL COUPON TODAY

Start using these two creams today

The regular use of both these creams helps your skin to become continually lovelier.

Both are so fine textured that they will not clog the pores, and neither cream will encourage the growth of hair.

They come in both jars and tubes in convenient sizes. At any drug or department store. The Pond's Extract Company, New York.

The Pond's Extract Co.,
106 Hudson St., New York.

Ten cents (10c) is enclosed for your special introductory tubes of the two creams every normal skin needs—enough of each cream for two weeks' ordinary toilet uses.

Name _____

Street _____

City _____ State _____

Lincoln was talking of a day that is now more than a century ago. What is there in 1922 to "excite ambition for education" in the immediate vicinity of that log cabin and that clear flowing spring of refreshing water?

Down and across a little ravine and up the hill on the other side is the public district school. The school is within five minutes' walk of the memorial and in plain view of it. You have only to look from the doorstep or from the windows of that school to see where Abraham Lincoln was born.

This school, which I visited, is the typical one-room, one-teacher, wooden shack, of which there are tens of thousands in the United States. The teacher is supposed to train children of all the ages from primary up to eighth grade. Fifty-two children of the surrounding farmhouses are enrolled for attendance there. There were about twenty-five boys and girls present.

A ragged newspaper clipping on which was printed a picture of a Lincoln statue was pinned upon one wall of the schoolroom. There was no decent, framed portrait of Lincoln or of anybody else in the room. There was no map of the United States or of Kentucky or of Larue County; there was absolutely nothing on the walls of that room except the dirty, lopsided fragment of newspaper.

A Test in Sight of Lincoln's Tomb

THERE was no book about Lincoln in the room, not even a child's story of Lincoln. There was a book about Daniel Boone, the one promising volume in the sad little collection of free primers and arithmetics on the teacher's shelf.

"Are the children interested in the fact that Lincoln was a boy right here where they live?" I asked the teacher.

"I don't know as they're interested," she replied.

"They know he was born here, I guess, because they go over there to play sometimes and to eat their lunches where they can get water from the Lincoln spring."

Upon request the teacher, without the slightest animation or encouragement in her tone or manner, asked the children what they knew about Lincoln.

They sprawled over their own and each other's seats and were dumb. Not a hand went up.

Giving up the appeal to the school as a whole for volunteer response, the teacher asked the biggest girl what she knew about Lincoln. The girl shook her head. The biggest boy was tried and shook his head.

"Well, why do the negroes love Lincoln?" asked the teacher.

No answer.

"They love him because he freed 'em, don't they?" she asked, pointing to a boy in front. And she kept pointing at him until he nodded his head in the affirmative.

"How did Lincoln die?"

No answer.

"He was killed, wasn't he?" asked the teacher, and then she kept her finger pointed at another boy until he, too, nodded his head.

Questions as to what Lincoln was when he became a man, as to what big thing happened in the United States when he was President, were also asked, but not even the pointing finger of the teacher could wring any response from any child in that school.

Bear in mind that all these pupils were American-born white children of American-born ancestors, the purest of American stock.

There were no mentally deficient children, according to official or medical standards. I tried to talk to the teacher herself about Lincoln. Her most coherent remark was this: "They say he was born right here, but after that the family went away from here to some other state. I don't know what state it was."

And this is by no means an unusual school in Kentucky, except for the fact that it is at the birthplace of Lincoln. The teacher who didn't know where the Lincolns went from Hodgenville is above the average Kentucky school-teacher so far as "training" is concerned. She attended the county high school four years and afterward had five months of normal training. Remember that nine-tenths of the Kentucky teachers have not been to high school. There was at least one teacher in that state who did not know who Lincoln was. Superintendent Colvin, of the State Board of Education at Frankfort, told me about her.

Under a recently enacted and wise law, teachers in Kentucky must now get their certificates or permits to teach from the State Board. In pursuance of that law, printed questions were sent to all applicants for certificates for them to answer.

To answer one of these questions involved the writing of a very brief summary of the life of Lincoln. One of the women did not know who Lincoln was. She had been teaching in Kentucky several years. Unbelievable? Yes, but State Superintendent Colvin told me that himself.

Please do not think of this as a sidelight on public-school education in Kentucky, merely as Kentucky. To do so is to miss the whole point of the matter. It is something about Kentucky merely as a part of the whole United States, which boasts so much about its free education for all the people. There are many places just as bad as Kentucky, or worse.

From the school by the log-cabin birthplace I went into the village of Hodgenville, which boasts of a high school and a graded grammar school, with a good principal doing the best he can with scant material and support.

In the village I found the county superintendent of schools, a woman holding office by favor of local politics. In conversation with her I commented on the lack of information, the utter lack of interest among the children at the birthplace school in the bare facts of the existence of Abraham Lincoln.

Illiterate America

(Continued from Page 4)

"Oh, why should they be interested or know about him?" exclaimed the county superintendent. "We are all fed up on Lincoln in this country. Roosevelt and Taft and Wilson have all been here and talked about him. Every new minister thinks he's got to preach about him. We want to know about somebody else. Give us Christopher Columbus or somebody. If you went to France to ask about Joan of Arc you'd find the people there either didn't know anything about her or were sick of her. Perhaps the school children would know more about Lincoln if he hadn't been born here."

This summing up of the situation by the county superintendent of schools gave me the desperate determination not to leave that village without finding somebody who thought that some knowledge of Lincoln was worth while in the public-school life of an American child. I came the nearest to such realization in the comments of Mrs. Samuel Kirkpatrick, president of the Hodgenville Parent-Teacher Association. "I suppose our school children ought to know about Lincoln," she said, "and it's too bad that they don't. But it's because of our bringing up. You see, our ancestors never thought that the Lincoln family amounted to anything. My grandmother's brothers used to go over to the Lincoln cabin to have Lincoln's father cut their hair, and they always made fun of the family. That's the sort of he doesn't know. They're a good deal better than schools in Kentucky, and the only thing I'm sorry about are the children. I know I won't make so much money off my two hundred acres in Hodgenville as I've been making on the three hundred, and I'd like to have the children in the Indiana school, but we want to come back. The kids can go to school where I did, up by the spring where Abraham Lincoln was born. It's near the farm I've just rented."

Referring to the location of the school reminded him of something that had puzzled him in the village.

"Say, Lincoln wasn't a negro himself, was he?" he asked with considerable suddenness.

"No."

"Well, I never thought so before to-day. I knew he freed the negroes, but didn't think he was one until I saw that new image of him to-day by the courthouse. It's black."

"Yes, it's made of bronze."

"Well, I don't know what it's made of, but it's black and that's wrong. If he wasn't a negro, why didn't they make it of white stone?"

No doubt there's something in the notion of the Larue County school superintendent to the effect that the children would care more about Lincoln if he had not been born there. In the village school of Stamford, in Southern Vermont, the teacher at my request asked her children what they knew about Abraham Lincoln. There were a score of hands raised instantly. The whole roomful was eager and interested. Two boys and two girls were called upon, and each of them told something worth while about Lincoln. Perhaps a fairer comparative test between Hodgenville and Stamford would have been to ask the Vermont children about Ethan Allen. But there were flowers in that Stamford schoolroom and pictures on the wall. There was the feeling of a little something there to "excite an ambition for education."

Unfortunately, however, Stamford is not so typical of Vermont as Hodgenville is of Kentucky.

It was in Essex County, Vermont, that I found the cold schoolhouse with the stove that had been in service for sixty years and the school with the water-closets that had not been cleaned for four years. Those conditions were far more typical of the schools in the more remote and mountainous sections of Vermont than was the schoolroom window full of flowers in Stamford.

Other Teachers Like These?

CONDITIONS in the northern region of Vermont, New Hampshire and Maine give the lie to the American boasting about its public educational system as a great national whole as much as do the schools of the South. And there are things to be ashamed of in Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Connecticut, despite their liberal spending of money on their school systems and their enactment of progressive laws for the administration of those systems. New England will admit that it is deteriorating, but New England places far too much of the blame and responsibility on immigration from European countries.

In a way, the case of Vermont is more discouraging and more shameful than that of Kentucky. The Southern commonwealth has never really waked up to the problem of adequate education for all her children. As backward as it is to-day, it is no worse than it was a century ago. It is better and, what's more, it is beginning to be ashamed and to look about for the road to real improvement.

On the other hand, Vermont has been going backward for years and is still going backward. In the few small cities of the state there are creditable buildings and, of course, more money is spent on the schools everywhere. But in the rural sections there has been little improvement in the housing and a positive decline in spirit and interest. There is nothing in the country schools to "excite ambition for education."

The first normal school in the world was in Vermont. To-day Vermont has no normal school. She abolished the institution last year. There is not to-day a single young woman whose home is in Essex County training for the work of teaching. They all know that they don't have to, because the so-called emergency situations recognized by the law can always be depended upon to give them jobs without training. I talked with one of these young women who had never been beyond grammar school—eighth grade—and who was having her first year's experience as a teacher. When asked about her training she replied:

"I haven't had any. I wanted to teach a year first to see if I liked it. I didn't want to take the time and spend the money for a training course and then find out that I didn't like teaching. That would just be a waste of money. If I like teaching this year I'll go to a summer training school, because a trained teacher gets more pay. If I don't like it I'll go into the city and get a job in a store or mill."

Four other teachers in this county told the same story. They told it without the slightest hesitation or sense of shame, without the least inkling that what they were doing was ruinous to the system of common-school education.

Next year another batch of uneducated, untrained, uncultivated girls will try teaching for a year before deciding they would rather work in the mill or the store.

The scene happens to be in Essex County, Vermont, selected merely because of the chance discovery that a century ago the spirit of that place was so different that it had fruition in the country's first institution for the training of teachers of children. But for Vermont, as for Kentucky, the name of any other state in the Union may be substituted.

EDITOR'S NOTE—This is the first of a series of articles on the deplorable condition of American schools. The second article will follow in the February issue of the Journal.

Roosevelt House

THE Woman's Roosevelt Memorial Association is offering to the women of America an opportunity to become associates in the purchase of Roosevelt House, at 28 East 20th Street, New York City, and its dedication as a memorial to Theodore Roosevelt, where mementos and records of the former president will be preserved, and where American citizenship will be taught. Every contributor of one dollar or more will receive the emblem of the Association, a small bronze pin bearing the likeness of Theodore Roosevelt. The HOME JOURNAL hopes that many of its readers will respond to this call. Address the Woman's Roosevelt Memorial Association, 1 East 57th Street, New York City.

notion that's been handed down to us. And besides we've always been Democratic in politics round here."

In the public square of Hodgenville, facing the courthouse, there is a bronze statue of Lincoln erected by the Government. At one corner of the square is a bakeshop, which houses the most encouraging thing in Hodgenville so far as education is concerned. The woman who keeps the bakery is the president of the Ladies' Lincoln League, and in a room back of her store is the beginning of the league's library, housed there temporarily for the use of the community until the league can obtain different quarters. There is a considerable number of books of popular fiction and half a dozen trivial books about Lincoln—none of the great biographies of the man. One entire shelf is filled with bound volumes of the Congressional Record.

The president of the league did not know who had made the Lincoln statue in the square. "Oh, I don't know that," she said. "I'm only the president, and I'm very busy with the store. The secretary ought to know all those things." But hats off, nevertheless, to the president of the league and the village baker. She at least does not think that her neighbors are "all fed up on Lincoln," and she is willing to give up a whole room of her restricted quarters that the public may have the facilities for reading books.

To What Race Did Lincoln Belong?

IT WAS then that I met the Indiana farmer, the alumnus of the birthplace school, as a fellow passenger on the train to Louisville.

"Well, I'll get back here next month with my family," he said by way of opening conversation.

"Do you live here?"

"No, in Indiana; but I belong here and my wife belongs here, so we're coming back. I've sold out my crop in Indiana and just been in Hodgenville to rent a new farm. It's two hundred acres. I've had three hundred in Indiana of mighty good land, but I was born in Hodgenville and so was my wife and all our folks are here. We've been away seven years and had two children born in Indiana. The first one will be six next year and could begin going to school in Indiana if we stayed there. Fine schools there. When a boy gets through going to school in Indiana there isn't anything

They always like this good old-fashioned dish—

Corned beef hash made with Libby's Corned Beef is much cheaper, easier to prepare and better

THE cheapest, as well as the quickest, way to give your family corned beef hash is to make it with Libby's Corned Beef. If you want to find out how much cheaper and better it is to use Libby's, do what a housewife recently did in a midwestern city. She discovered, when she bought uncooked corned beef at 12c a pound, that a piece that weighed 3¾ pounds gave her only a pound of cooked meat. It lost more than two-thirds of its original weight in waste and shrinkage.

The pound of meat that was left had cost her 45c. She had also spent half an hour getting it ready to cook—removing the skin, bones and gristle—and two hours cooking it, before it was ready for the hash.

Meat for five, costing only 30c

She decided that if she was to have corned beef hash anywhere near as often as the family wanted it, she would have to find an easier and cheaper way to do it. So she bought a 12-oz. can of Libby's Corned Beef. This made hash enough for ample helpings for her family of five and cost her but 30c.

For there is no waste to Libby's Corned Beef. When you open the can, you slide out a solid cube of meat—deliciously cooked, tender pieces pressed together and held by a rich meat jelly.

How to do it

There is no laborious preparation, no tedious cooking, when you use Libby's Corned Beef. All you need to do is to chop it in a chopping bowl and add an equal quantity of diced cooked potatoes, pepper and onion juice. Turn into a frying pan and brown. You may add more potatoes if you like and still have a delicious hash.

And you can be sure the hash will always be as good as you would like it, because this fine corned beef is uniformly tender, delicate and delicious.

To give variety to the good old Yankee dish, Libby's chefs have worked out these delightful recipes for sauces to be used with corned beef hash:

Sauce Tartare

To 1 cup of mayonnaise dressing add ¼ teaspoon onion juice and the following ingredients finely chopped: ¼ cup olives, 2 tablespoons capers, 1 hard boiled egg, 2 teaspoons parsley and 1 small cucumber pickle.

Tomato Sauce

Cook 1 cup tomatoes, ¼ teaspoon salt, 1 teaspoon sugar, 6 peppercorns and ¼ onion for fifteen minutes. Rub through a sieve and add to 1 cup of brown gravy.

Hot Mayonnaise

Beat 2 egg yolks slightly, and slowly add 2 tablespoons olive oil, 1 tablespoon vinegar, ¼ cup water, ¼ teaspoon salt and a few grains of cayenne. Cook in a double boiler until the mixture thickens, then add 1 teaspoon of finely chopped onion.

Thousand Island Dressing

To 1 cup of boiled salad dressing add ¼ cup chili sauce and the following ingredients finely chopped: ½ green pepper, 1 pimiento and 1 hard boiled egg.

Libby, McNeill & Libby, 101 Welfare Bldg., Chicago

Libby, McNeill & Libby of Canada, Ltd.
Chatham, Ontario, Canada

Libby's

ROGER AND GALLET
Parfumeurs
PARIS CREATORS OF

Fleurs d'Amour
The most luxurious Perfume in the world.

Souvenir de la Cour
Personal fragrance of the old French nobility.

Triomphe de France
Latest triumph in the art of the perfumers.

Narkiss
Distinctly original in its sweetness.

Three generations of persistent effort give supremacy today to the many rare perfumes of Roger & Gallet.

Our guide, "Parisian Toilet Specialties," on request.

25 WEST 32nd ST.
NEW YORK

Best Dealers
Everywhere

The Gift of the Probable Places

(Continued from Page 5)

"Mercy! What this experience has cost me!" sobbed Mrs. Bent.

"One dollar, please," said Old Man Smith.

"It's a perfect miracle," said everybody.

"It ain't neither," said Old Man Smith.

"It's plain hoss sense. There's laws about findin' things same as there is about losin' 'em. Things has got regular habits and haunts same as folks. And folks has got regular haunts and habits same as birds and beasts. It ain't the possible places that I'm arguin' about. The world is full of 'em. But the probable places can be reckoned most any time on the fingers of one hand. That's the trouble with folks; they're always wearin' themselves out on the possible places and never gettin' round at all to the probable ones. Now it's perfectly possible of course," said Old Man Smith, "that you might find a trout in a dust pan or a hummin' bird in an aquarium—or meet a panther in your mother's parlor. But the chances are," said Old Man Smith, "that if you really set out to organize a troutin' expedition or a hummin'-bird collection or a panther hunt, you wouldn't look in the dust pan or the aquarium or your mother's parlor first. When you lose something that ain't got no probable place, then I sure am stumped," said Old Man Smith.

BUT when Annie Halliway lost her mind everybody in the village was stumped about it. And everything was all mixed up. It was Annie Halliway's mother and Annie Halliway's father and Annie Halliway's uncles and aunts and cousins and friends who did all the worrying about it, while Annie Halliway herself didn't seem to care at all, but just sat braiding things into her hair.

Some people said it was a railroad accident that she lost her mind in. Some said it was because she'd studied too hard in Europe. Some said it was an earthquake. Everybody said something.

Annie Halliway's father and mother were awful rich; they brought her home in a great big ship, and gave her twelve new dresses and the front parlor and a brown piano. But she wouldn't stay in any of them. All she'd stay in was a little old blue silk dress she'd had before she went away.

Carol and I got excused from school one day, because we were afraid our heads might ache, and went to see what it was all about. It seemed to be about a great many things.

But after we'd walked all around Annie Halliway twice and looked at her all we could and asked how old she was and found out that she was nineteen, we felt suddenly very glad that if she really was obliged to lose anything out of her face, it was her mind that she lost instead of her eyes or her nose or her red, red mouth or her cunning little ears. She was so pretty!

She seemed to like us very much too. She asked us to come again. We said we would. We did. We went every Saturday afternoon.

THEY let us take her to walk if we were careful. We didn't walk her in the village because her hair looked so funny. We walked her in the pleasant fields. We gathered flowers. We gathered ferns. We explored borders. We built little gurgling harbors in the corners of the brook. Sometimes we climbed hills and looked off. Annie Halliway seemed to like to climb hills and look off.

It was the day we climbed the Sumac Hill that we got our idea. It was a nice day. Annie Halliway wore her blue dress and her blue scarf. Her hair hung down like two long, loose black ropes across her shoulders. Blue larkspur was braided into her hair, and a little tin trumpet tied with blue ribbon, and a blue Japanese fan, and a blue lead pencil, and a blue silk stocking, and a blue-handled basket. She looked like a summer Christmas tree. It was pretty.

There were lots of clouds in the sky. They seemed very near. It sort of puckered your nose.

"Smell the clouds," said Annie Halliway. Somebody had cut down a tree that used to be there. It made a lonely hole in the edge of the hill and the sky. Through the lonely hole in the edge of the hill and the sky you could see miles and miles. Way down in the valley a bright light glinted. It was as though the whole sun was trying to bore a hole in a tiny bit of glass and couldn't do it.

Annie Halliway stretched out her arms towards the glint. And started for it.

I looked at Carol. Carol looked at me. We knew where the glint was. It was Old Man Smith's house. Old Man Smith's house was built of tea cups and broken tumblers and bits of plates. First of all of course it was built of clay or mud or something soft and loose like that; and while it was still soft, he had stuck it all full of people's broken dishes! So that wherever you went most all day long, the sun was trying to bore a hole in it—and couldn't do it!

It seemed to be the glint that Annie Halliway wanted. She thought it was something new to braid in her hair, I guess. She kept right on walking towards it with her arms stretched out.

OLD MAN SMITH was pretty surprised to see us. He was riding round the doorway in his wheel chair. He rolled his chair to the gate to meet us. The chair squeaked a good deal. But even if he'd wanted to walk he couldn't. The reason why he couldn't is because he's dumb in his legs.

"What in the world do you want?" he asked.

"We've brought you a young lady that's lost her mind," I said. "What can you do about it?"

Something happened all at once that made our legs feel queer. What happened was that Old Man Smith didn't seem pleased at all about it. He snatched his long white beard in his hands.

"Lost her mind?" he said. "Her mind? How dar'st you mock me?" he cried.

"We darsn't at all," I explained, "on account of the bears. We've read all about the mocking bears in a book."

He seemed to feel better. "You mean in the Good Book?" he said. "The Elisha bears, you mean?"

"Well, it was quite a good book," I admitted, "though my father's got lots of books on tulips that have heap prettier covers."

"U-m-m," said Old Man Smith. "U-m-m-m. U-m-m-m-m."

And all the time that he was saying "U-m-m-m, U-m-m-m," young Annie Halliway was knocking down his house.

With a big chunk of rock she was chipping it off. It was a piece of blue china cup with the handle still on it that she chipped off first.

When Old Man Smith saw it he screamed. "Woman! What are you doing?" he screamed.

"Her name is young Annie Halliway," I explained.

"Young Annie Halliway, come here!" screamed Old Man Smith.

Young Annie Halliway came here. She was perfectly gentle about it. All her ways were very gentle. She sat down on the ground at Old Man Smith's feet. She lifted her eyes to Old Man Smith's eyes. She looked holy. But all the time that she looked so holy, she kept right on bruising the handle of the blue china cup into her hair. It clanked against the tin trumpet. It sounded a little like the Fourth of July.

Old Man Smith reached down and took her chin in his hands. "What a beautiful face!" he said. "What a beautiful face! And you say she's lost her mind?" he said. "You say she's lost her mind?" He turned to Carol. "And what do you say?" he asked.

"Oh, please, sir, Carol doesn't say anything," I explained. "He can't. He's dumb."

"Dumb?" cried Old Man Smith. "So this is the Dumb Child, is it?" He looked at Carol. He looked at himself. He looked at my freckles. He rocked his hands on his stomach. "Merciful God!" he said. "How are we all afflicted!"

"OH, PLEASE, sir," I said, "my brother Carol isn't afflicted at all. It's a great gift, my mother says, to be born with the gift of silence instead of with the gift of speech."

He made a little chuckle in his throat. He began to look at young Annie Halliway all over again. "And what does your mother say about her?" he pointed.

"My mother says," I explained, "that she only hopes that the person who finds her mind will be honest enough to return it."

"What?" said Old Man Smith. "To return it? Honest enough to return it?"

He began to do everything all over again—to chuckle, to rock, to take young Annie Halliway's chin in his hand. "And what did you say your name was, my pretty darling?" he asked.

Young Annie Halliway looked a little surprised. "My name is Robin," she said. "Dearest—Robin—I think."

"You think wrong," said Old Man Smith. He frowned with ferocity.

It made us pretty nervous all of a sudden. Carol went off to look at the beehive to calm himself. I looked at the house. It was very glistening. Blue it glistened, and green it glistened, and red it glistened, and pink, and purple, and yellow.

"Oh, see!" I pointed. "There's old Mrs. Beckett's rose vase with the gold edge. She dropped it on the brick garden walk the day her son who'd been lost at sea for eleven years walked through the gate all alive and perfectly dry. And that chunky white nozzle with the blue stripe on it—I know what that is. It's the nose of Deacon Perry's first wife's best teapot. I've seen it there in a glass cupboard—on the top shelf. She never used it 'cept when the preacher came."

"HUSH your noise!" said Old Man Smith. "History is solemn. The whole history of the village is written on the outer walls of my house. When the sun strikes here, strikes there, on that bit of glass, on this bit of crockles, the edge of a plate, the rim of a tumbler, I read about folks' minds—what they loved, what they hated, what they were thinking of instead when it broke!" He snatched his long white beard in his hands. He wagged his head at me. "There's a law about breakin' things," he said, "same as there's a law about losin' them. My house is a sample book," he said. "On them there walls, all stuck up like that, I've got a sample of most every mind in the village. People give 'em to me themselves," he said. "They let me rake out their trash barrels every now and then. They don't know what they're givin'. Now that little pewter rosette there —"

"It would be nice, wouldn't it," I said, "if you could find a sample of young Annie Halliway's mind? Then maybe you could match it."

"Eh?" said Old Man Smith. "A sample of her mind?" He growled in his throat. "A-hem, a-hem!" he said. He closed his eyes. I thought he'd decided to die. I screamed for Carol. He came running. He'd only been bee-stung twice. Old Man Smith

(Continued on Page 43)

Two constant dangers—

We now know that food must protect us against them—

How science has revolutionized the housewife's ordering of meals . .

IT is now known that there are two dangers constantly threatening our health—not having our body tissues built up and not ridding the body of poisonous waste matter.

Science has discovered that medicine cannot do this for us—that it is our daily food which must supply these great body needs.

But many American meals lack the life giving elements which build up body tissues and the elements which eliminate waste matter.

Statistics show that every year thousands of young men and women die of old age diseases. Scientists say that faulty habits of eating deprived them of the food factors necessary to build up health and maintain resistance to disease.

A familiar food with wonderful health giving properties

Today millions are securing these needed food essentials by adding Fleischmann's Yeast to their regular diet. For yeast is the richest known source of the new found vitamine which experts maintain is lacking in many of our foods.

Because of its freshness it helps the intestines in their elimination of poisonous waste matter.

There are many delicious ways of serving Fleischmann's Yeast. Like cream cheese it combines excellently with jams as a sandwich or cracker spread. It is good in all kinds of soft drinks and in combination with many familiar dishes. Only one precaution: if troubled with gas dissolve yeast first in very hot water. This does not affect the efficacy of the yeast.

Eat Fleischmann's Yeast spread on bread, dissolved in milk or water, or just plain.

Eat 2 to 3 cakes of Fleischmann's Yeast daily, before or between meals. Have it on the table at home. Have it at your office and eat it at your desk. Ask for it at noontime at your lunch place. You will like its fresh distinctive flavor and the clean wholesome taste it leaves in your mouth. Place a standing order with your grocer for Fleischmann's Yeast and get it fresh daily. Keep it in a cool dry place until ready to serve.

Fresh yeast has received general attention from the public since recent scientific tests have proved that fresh yeast stimulates digestion, builds up the body tissues and keeps the body more resistant to disease. These original tests were all made with Fleischmann's Yeast. Beware of untested yeast-vitamine preparations that contain drugs or other mixtures. Fleischmann's Yeast (fresh) is a pure food, rich in vitamine, in which it measures up to the high standards set by laboratories and hospitals. The familiar tin-foil package with the yellow label is the only form in which Fleischmann's Yeast for Health is sold.

Send 4c in stamps for the valuable booklet, "The New Importance of Yeast in Diet." Use coupon at the right, addressing THE FLEISCHMANN COMPANY, Dept. RR-26, 701 Washington St., New York, N. Y.

Laxatives gradually replaced by this simple food

A noted specialist, in his latest book, says of fresh, compressed yeast: "It should be much more frequently given in illness in which there is intestinal disturbance. . . ." This is especially true in cases where the condition requires the constant use of laxatives.

Fleischmann's Yeast is a corrective food, always fresh, and better suited to the stomach and intestines than laxatives. It is a food—and cannot form a habit. In tested cases normal functions have been restored in from 3 days to 5 weeks.

Eat from 2 to 3 cakes of Fleischmann's Yeast a day.

Skin disorders cleared up

Many physicians and hospitals are prescribing Fleischmann's Yeast for impurities of the skin. It has yielded remarkable results. In one series of tests forty-one out of forty-two such cases were improved or cured, in some instances in a remarkably short time.

Mail this coupon with 4c in stamps

THE FLEISCHMANN COMPANY,
Dept. RR-26, 701 Washington St., New York, N. Y.
Please send me "The New Importance of Yeast in Diet."

Name _____
Street _____
City _____ State _____

"... Watching her from every corner of the crowded room"

Strangers' eyes, keen and critical— can you meet them proudly—confidently— without fear?

STRANGERS' eyes, watching you in crowded restaurants—in theatres and ball rooms—do you shrink and feel apologetic before them? Or can you meet them without awkwardness or dread?

The possession of a beautiful skin gives any woman poise and confidence. It is a charm that any woman can have if she will. For your skin changes every day; each day old skin dies and new takes its place.

By giving this new skin the right treatment, you can make it flawlessly clear and soft and smooth—free from the little defects that spoil so many complexions.

Are you using the right treatment for your special type of skin?

Skins differ widely—and each type of skin should have the treatment that suits its special needs.

There is a special Woodbury treatment for each different type of skin.

For instance, you may happen to have the type of skin that is exceptionally sensitive and delicate—so easily irritated by exposure that it is a constant problem to take care of it.

To overcome this extreme sensitiveness and give your skin the power of resistance it should have, you should use each night the following treatment:

DIP a soft washcloth in warm water and hold it to your face. Then make a warm water lather of Woodbury's Facial Soap and dip your cloth up and down in it until the cloth is "fluffy" with the soft white lather. Rub this lathered cloth gently over your skin until the pores are thoroughly cleansed. Rinse well with warm, then with clear, cool water, and dry carefully.

How you can tell that your skin is responding

THE very first time you use this treatment it will leave your skin with a slightly drawn, tight feeling. Do not regard this as a disadvantage—it means that your skin is responding in the right way to a more thorough and stimulating kind of cleansing.

After a few nights this drawn sensation will disappear and your skin will emerge from its nightly bath so delightfully soft and smooth that you will never again want to use any other method of caring for your skin.

This is only one of the special treatments for different types of skin given in the booklet of treatments which is wrapped around every cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap. In this booklet you will find complete treatments for all the different types of skin.

Get a cake of Woodbury's today, at any drug store or toilet goods counter, and begin tonight the treatment your skin needs.

The same qualities that give Woodbury's its beneficial effect on the skin make it ideal for general use—for keeping the skin in good condition. A 25 cent cake of Woodbury's lasts a month or six weeks for general toilet use, including any of the special Woodbury treatments.

A complete miniature set of the Woodbury skin preparations

For 25 cents we will send you a complete miniature set of the Woodbury skin preparations containing:

- A trial size cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap
- A sample tube of the new Woodbury's Facial Cream
- A sample tube of Woodbury's Cold Cream
- A sample box of Woodbury's Facial Powder
- Together with the treatment booklet, "A Skin You Love to Touch."

Send for this set today. Address The Andrew Jergens Co., 101 Spring Grove Ave., Cincinnati, Ohio. If you live in Canada, address The Andrew Jergens Co., Limited, 101 Sherbrooke St., Perth, Ontario.

The Gift of the Probable Places

(Continued from Page 40)

opened his eyes. His voice sounded queer. "Where do they think she lost her mind?"

"In Europe," I said. "Maybe in a train. Maybe on a boat. They don't know. She can't remember anything about it. The doctors say it's mystery."

"The doctors say what is mystery?" said Old Man Smith.

"What Annie's got," I explained. "What made her lose her mind. Mystery is what they call it."

"U-m-m," said Old Man Smith.

He reached way down into his pocket. He pulled out a box. He opened the box. It was full of pieces of colored glass, and of china. He juggled them in his hands. They looked gay. Red they were, and green and white and yellow and blue. He snatched out all the blue ones and hid 'em quick in his pocket. "She seems sort of partial to blue," he said.

THERE was one funny big piece of glass that was awful shiny. When he held it up to the light it glinted and glowed all sorts of colors. It made your eyes feel very calm.

Annie Halliway reached out her hand for it. She didn't say a word. She just stared and stared at it, with her hand all reached out.

But Old Man Smith didn't give it to her. He just sat and stared at her eyes.

Her eyes never moved from the shining bit of glass. They looked awful funny. Bigger and bigger they got, and rounder and rounder, and stiller and stiller.

Old Man Smith reached out suddenly and put the shining bit of glass right into Annie Halliway's hand. It fell through her fingers. But her hand stayed just where it was, reaching out into the air.

"Put down your arm," said Old Man Smith.

Annie Halliway put it down. Her eyes were still staring very wide.

"Look!" said Old Man Smith. "Look!" He dropped several pieces of colored glass and china into her lap.

She chose the handle of a red teacup and a little chunk of yellow crockery. She stared and stared at them. But all the time it was as though her eyes didn't see them. All the time it was as though she was looking at something very far away. Then all of a sudden she began to jingle them together in her hand, the little piece of red china and the chunk of yellow bowl, and swing her shoulders and stamp her foot. It looked like dancing. It sounded like clappers.

"Oh, ho! This is Spain," she laughed.

Old Man Smith snatched all the blue pieces of china and glass out of his pocket again and tossed them into her lap. He looked sort of mad. "Spain?" he said. "What in the Old Harry has a handful of glass and china got to do with Spain?"

"HARRY?" said Annie Halliway. "Old—Harry?" Her eyes looked wider and blinder every minute. It was as though everything in her was wide awake except the thing she was thinking about. "Har-ry?" she puzzled. "Harry?" She dropped the red and yellow china from her hand and picked up a piece of blue glass and offered it to Old Man Smith. "Why, that is Harry," she said. She reached for the pigtail that had the blue larkspur braided into it. She pointed to the pigtail that had the blue fan braided into it.

"Why, that is Harry," she said. She made a little sob in her throat.

Old Man Smith jingled his hands at her. "There—there—there, my pretty," he said. "Never mind—never mind."

He opened his hands. There were some little teeny-teeny pieces of plain glass in his hands. Little round knobs like beads they were, very shining. They made a nice jingle.

When Annie Halliway saw them she screamed, and snatched them in her hand, and threw them away just as far as she could!

"I will not!" she screamed. "I will not! I will not!" Her tears were awful.

When she got through screaming her face looked like a wet cloth that had had everything else wrung out of it except shadows.

"Where—is—Harry?" said Old Man Smith. He said it very slowly. And then all over again. "Where—is—Harry?" You wouldn't have dar'st not tell him if you'd known.

Annie Halliway started to pick up some blue glass again. Then she stopped and looked all around her. It was a jerky stop. Her jaw sort of dropped. "Harry—is—in—prison," she said.

Even though she'd said it herself, she seemed to be awfully surprised at the news. She shook and shook her head, as though she was trying to wake up the idea that was asleep. Her eyes were all crunched up now with trying to remember about it. She dragged the back of her hands across her forehead. First one hand and then the other. She opened her eyes very wide again and looked at Old Man Smith.

"Where—is—Harry?" he asked.

ANNIE HALLIWAY never took her eyes from Old Man Smith's face. "It—it was the night we crossed the border from France to Spain," she said. Her voice sounded very funny and far away. It sounded like reciting a lesson too. "There were seven of us and a teacher from the Paris art school," she recited. "It—it was the March holiday. There—there was a woman—a strange woman in the next compartment who made friends with me. She seemed to be crazy over my hair. She asked if she might braid it for the night."

Without any tears at all Annie Halliway began to sob again.

"When they waked us up at the customs," she sobbed, "Harry came running. His face was awful. 'She's braided diamonds in your hair,' he cried. 'I heard her talking with her accomplice—a hundred thousand dollars' worth of diamonds. Smugglers and murderers both they are. Everybody will be searched.' He tore at my braids. I tore at my braids. The diamonds rattled out. Harry tried to catch them. He pushed me back into the train. I saw soldiers running. I thought they were going to shoot him. He thought they were going to shoot him. I saw his eyes. He looked so—so surprised. I'd never noticed before how blue his eyes were. I tell you I saw his eyes. I couldn't speak. There wasn't anybody to explain just why he had his hands full of diamonds. I saw his eyes. I tell you I couldn't speak. I tell you I never spoke. My tongue went dead in my mouth. For months I never spoke. I've only just begun to speak again. I've only just —"

She started to jump up from the ground where she was sitting. She couldn't. She had braided Old Man Smith and his wheel chair into her hair! When she saw what she had done she toppled right over on her face and fainted all out.

Over behind the lilac bush somebody screamed.

It was Annie Halliway's mother. With her was a strange gentleman who had come all the way from New York to try and cure Annie Halliway. The strange gentleman was some special kind of doctor.

"Hush—hush!" the special doctor kept saying to everybody. "This is a very crucial moment. Can't you see that this is a very crucial moment?"

He pointed to Annie Halliway on the grass. Her mother knelt beside her, trying very hard to comb Old Man Smith and his wheel chair out of her pigtail. "Speak to her," said the doctor. "Speak very gently."

"Annie!" cried her mother. "Annie! Annie! Annie!"

Annie Halliway opened her eyes very slowly and looked up. It was a brand-new kind of look. It had a bottom to it, instead of being just through and through and through. There was a little smile in it too. It was a pretty look. "Why, mother," said Annie Halliway, "where am I?"

THE special man from New York made a queer little sound in his throat. "Thank heaven!" he said. "She's all right—now. I wouldn't have missed it for anything."

He slanted his head and looked at Old Man Smith. "We arrived," he said, "just at the moment when the young lady was gazing so—so intently at the piece of shiny glass." He made a funny grunt in his throat. "Let me congratulate you, Mr.—Mr. Smith," he said. "Your treatment was most efficient. Your hypnosis was perfect. Your —"

"Hip nothing," said Old Man Smith. "Of course in a case like this," said the special man from New York, "the power of suggestion is always —"

"All young folks," said Old Man Smith, "are cases of one kind or another, and the most powerful suggestion that I can make is that somebody find 'Harry.'"

"Harry?" said Annie Halliway's mother. "Harry?" Why, I've got four letters at home for Annie in my desk now from some im—impetuous young man who signs himself 'Harry.' He seems to be in an architect's office in Paris. 'Robin' is what he calls Annie—'Dearest Robin.'"

"Eh?" said Annie Halliway. "What? Where?" She sat bolt upright. She scrambled to her feet. She started for the carriage. Her mother had to run to catch her. The special man from New York followed them just as fast as he could.

Old Man Smith wheeled his chair to the gate to say "Good-by."

Annie Halliway's mother never stopped talking a single second. "Oh, my pet!" she cried. "My precious! My treasure!"

WITH one foot on the carriage step, the special man from New York turned round and looked at Old Man Smith. He smiled a funny little smile. "Seek—and ye shall find," he said. "That is—if you only know how and where to seek."

Old Man Smith began to chuckle in his beard. "Yes, I admit that's quite a help," he said, "the knowing how and where. But before you set out seekin' very hard for anything that's lost, it's a pretty good idea to find out first just exactly what it is that you're seekin' for. When a young lady's lost her mind, for instance, that's one thing. But if it's her heart that's lost—why, that of course is quite another."

Annie Halliway's face wasn't white any more. It was as red as roses. She hid it in her mother's shoulder.

The horse began to prance. The carriage began to creak.

Annie Halliway's mother looked all around. "Oh, dear—oh, dear! Mr.—Mr. Smith," she said, "how shall I ever repay you?"

Old Man Smith reached out his hand across the fence. There was a sort of twinkle in his eye. "One dollar, please," said Old Man Smith.

A dinner gown of charm—not only when it is new, but after a season's wear!

Skinner's All-Silk Satin—either regular or charmeuse finish—has qualities hidden beneath its rich lustre and graceful drape—qualities of endurance not found elsewhere in so beautiful a dress fabric.

And in this, a season of black, Skinner reigns supreme, for Skinner's has a real jet-like depth.

Skinner's All-Silk Satin

may be obtained in 90 different shades—all with the unvarying Skinner wearing quality. For frocks—formal and informal—underthings, blouses or skirts, ask for Skinner's Silks and Satins, and always

"Look for the Name in the Selva."

Write for new cut-out booklet in colors showing various uses of Skinner's All-Silk Satin.

WILLIAM SKINNER & SONS

New York Chicago Boston Philadelphia
Mills, Holyoke, Mass. Established 1848

"LOOK FOR THE NAME IN THE SELVA"

Better for the family health

Do you eat to live—live to eat, or just eat as a habit without considering whether it is a pleasure or nourishing? In either case there is only one answer—home made food is by all odds the very best.

Stop and think what you would use when you make biscuits or any hot breads or cake. Do you imagine bakers would use as good things?

It will pay you to send for a free Rumford cook book and get its hints and recipes for making all kinds of hot breads, cake, etc. It may not make epicures of your family, but it will at least show them what good, digestible, delectable food is, so that eating will be worth while.

Rumford Baking Powder is really a wonderful aid in producing delicious wholesome food of the nourishing kind.

Many helpful suggestions are contained in our new book, "The Rumford Modern Methods of Cookery"—sent free.

RUMFORD COMPANY
Dept. 22, Providence, R. I.

The Vanishing Girl

(Continued from Page 7)

she'd mistaken the room; she was a nice girl, and I was afraid she'd be terribly embarrassed when she realized. But before I could say anything, she crossed to my closet, opened the door and—walked in." Duff paused. "I jumped out of bed and rushed over to the closet; I didn't know what to think. And —"

"There was no one there," Doctor Blake concluded.

"No," Duff said, "there wasn't anyone there. And I tell you I saw her, doctor."

The doctor smiled again reassuringly. "My dear Duff," he said kindly, "it's perfectly simple. And it's nothing serious. You must remember that your nerves are not normal. Somewhere, sometime you saw that girl in just that gesture, the gesture of taking off her cape. By some shock it was impressed on your mind; I mean that just as your eyes rested on her, before your conscious mind had fully grasped the picture, something interrupted. Your eyes simply visualized the picture again at Sleepy Valley. You say you were reading; what was it?"

"ESSAYS on opera, I think," said Duff. "But I tell you I never saw that girl before in my life. Heavens, doctor, don't you suppose I'd remember her if I had? She was the most beautiful —" He paused, embarrassed.

"You've forgotten," the older man said gently. "You needn't worry about it. It's perfectly —"

"Perfectly natural be hanged!" Duff exploded. "I beg your pardon, doctor. But if I ever saw that girl —"

For a moment they stared at each other. Doctor Blake had been a little taken aback by Duff's sudden rage; it was difficult for him to realize that it was not the boy Duff, but a grown man who faced him across the flat desk. Duff laughed shortly.

"Well—what are you going to do about it?" Doctor Blake asked, breaking the silence.

"I don't know. I can't work. I can't play. There doesn't seem to be anything I —"

The older man looked at the younger sympathetically. "You need an interest of some sort, Duff. It's true that you're not in condition to play—if you call this hectic round of entertainment that Elisabeth and the rest of them indulge in, playing. But I do think it would be good for you to have some contact with young people. Come along home with me for dinner and meet Anita again; I imagine she's forgiven you the past. Remember how she used to hate you when you were youngsters?"

Duff smiled faintly. "It's awfully nice of you," he said politely. "But honestly, Doctor Blake, I don't feel like seeing people. I'm sort of—oh, I don't know. I—I don't know what I do want."

BLAKE frowned. If Duff had been any patient he would perhaps have shrugged his shoulders and let him depart; but he liked the boy and wanted to help him. He leaned forward with a quick smile. "I've got it, my boy," he said. "Why don't you find the girl?"

"Find the girl?"

"Yes."

"Find—the—girl." For a moment Duff stared at the wall, and the doctor knew that he was revisualizing the phantom figure that had blundered into his chamber. Suddenly Duff held out his hand. "By heaven, I will," he said.

During the early spring Duff searched New York. A dozen times a day he thought he had found her, only to discover a strange face staring blankly into his when he had reached her. A few days before the Schuyler family moved to The Elms he was sure the quest was at an end. The red cape of a slender figure winding down Fifth Avenue caught his eye; as his footsteps hastened he saw a glimpse of profile; a lock of dark hair escaped from beneath a scarlet hat.

He stopped abruptly at her side; he was so sure this time that he blocked the girl's way, and again there was an exchange of blank glances. Duff flushed and raised his hat.

"Hello," the girl said, smiling.

"I beg your pardon," he said stiffly. "I thought you were someone else."

The girl laughed; she was exceedingly pretty, he admitted grudgingly. "Well, does it matter so much—Duff Schuyler?" she asked, tilting her chin.

It was a second shock to find that she was someone he knew. He racked his memory as he looked at her dancing eyes.

"Elinor Webster," she supplied finally. "You went to college with my brother. To think that it should come to this too! Don't you remember, Duff —"

When at last he left her at the door of her home, with promises to call again soon to look up all the old crowd, he strode to his own house indignantly.

Blake was an absolute fool; but not so great a fool as he himself had been. He would look for the girl no longer; he flushed as he considered the absurdity of the whole affair, the humor of his quest. Yet in Scarborough he found himself unconsciously following dark-haired ladies and girls in scarlet, only to discover, when he reached them, that they were old or fat or ugly—or merely not The Girl.

"DUFF, you ought to get married," Elisabeth said firmly one day at luncheon. "At least you ought, if you'd marry a girl I like. You're getting awfully old, and —"

He laughed grimly—at least he felt that it was grimly.

"I think you ought to marry Helena Morton, if she'd have you," she continued calmly. "She's a nice girl, and I'm sure you'd like her. You don't go out enough, anyway; you'll never meet any girls. Freddy Burns wants me to go to the movies to-night, and mother won't let me go with him. And, really, I do think you ought to meet more girls."

"Elisabeth, your approach is nothing if not subtle," said Duff. "May, oh may I have the pleasure of your company at the Idle Hour this evening? Mother won't mind, I'm sure."

The theater was crowded when they arrived, and Elisabeth engineered him to a bench in the rear where a group of boys and girls were eating peanuts and giggling. He went through the introductions mechanically and sighed a little as he saw Freddy's hand close over his sister's.

The picture slid across the sheet hazily, and he watched it without caring what it was all about. He was half asleep when suddenly, while the figures still moved about on the screen, weaving the plot into a pattern more and more involved, the electric lights in the hall snapped on, outlining the walls and the audience for a brief moment before darkness dipped over them again. The light had lasted only a few seconds, but it had been long enough for Duff to see a dark-haired girl in a belted red coat disappearing through the exit at the right of the stage. He leaped to his feet, rushed down the aisle and fairly tumbled down the stairs. There had been no mistaking her, although she had been illumined so briefly.

The country street was entirely deserted except for the huddle of cars beside the wooden hotel. Duff stared about him with a stupid sense of unreality when suddenly he felt a hand on his arm; he turned reluctantly toward Elisabeth.

"What is it, Duff?"

FOR a moment he stared at her. "Oh—nothing," he said. He felt an utter fool, and he knew that his cheeks were flaming.

"Nothing!" Elisabeth repeated scornfully. "Funny sort of nothing! Oh, Duff, and we thought you were so much better. You didn't even jump when I blew up that paper bag in the hall."

"Really, it wasn't anything," he said. "I can't explain, Elisabeth."

He followed her to the car and sat down beside her; he was forbidden to drive himself. As they swung past the ice-cream store, two doors down from the theater, again came the flash of a red coat.

He clutched his sister's arm excitedly. "Oh, Elisabeth, do you—I mean, would you like a soda?"

She looked at him indulgently. "I think we'd better go home, Duff dear," she said gently; infuriatingly gentle she was. "Be a good boy."

He clenched his fists angrily. If he had seen her he was a fool not to follow through to the end. And he had seen her! But if he hadn't; if it was all hallucination, all — He sighed, and his sister looked at him sharply.

For days following he wandered about Scarborough, searching. Because his mother and sister regarded him with such obvious distrust and apprehension, he decided in self-defense upon a hobby. He announced that he had always been interested in photography and intended to make a Scarborough scrapbook. It was an unexciting pursuit and would keep him out of doors.

One day as he was strolling along the beach, regarding dark-haired ladies and girls in red with a curious, detached and uninviting eye, he remembered that he had left his camera on a lobster pot half a mile down the shore. He walked back and found it where he had left it, snapped the films aimlessly, and left the roll at the developer's.

A week later, when he remembered to call for his prints, he looked them over idly. Suddenly his heart gave the familiar imitation of a machine gun, and he leaned against the counter, staring at the photograph he held in his hand.

THE woman behind the counter looked at him solicitously. "Come out bad?" she asked, peering over his shoulder. "Why, I call that real nice."

Duff did not answer; he remained staring at the print. It was a better piece of photography than any of his attempts—the picture of a slender girl standing at the edge of the water, dark hair blowing back from her low, white forehead, her dress fluttering in the wind. Her lips were parted slightly, and her eyes looked straight into the camera, wistful eyes, half mocking, half entreating.

"Is anything the matter?" the woman demanded of Duff suddenly.

He stared at her and shoved the picture behind the others abruptly. "No, thanks," he said, and walked out of the shop.

He was not conscious of the distance he traveled or of the number of times he pulled out the picture and studied it.

(Continued on Page 47)

L'Empire de la Joie

(Adapted from an old French Fairy Tale)

But the last knight, le dernier chevalier, bore in his hand only a little bouquet, les fleurettes de la Jeunesse.
But there was in them so much of sunshine and starshine and soft, dewy fragrance that to keep them meant youth in the heart forever.

© 1921 A. H. S. Co.

How do "les Parisiennes" achieve a true Harmony of the Toilette?

IT IS so necessary if Madame would be in tune with the French fashion of the day, la mode du jour, that she follow the decree of Paris for a perfumed unity of the modern toilette.

That decree so known in the boudoirs of the élite among Parisiennes—each nécessité de la toilette shall gently breathe but a single fragrance—a fragrance of French charm.

Dames Américaines! For the sake of your beauty, do obey. And what fragrance brings to you more qualité française than Djer-Kiss itself?

For the bath, par exemple, savon Djer-

Kiss—that soap so pure, fragranced with the French essence of Djer-Kiss itself. Après le bain—Talc Djer-Kiss; and for the smooth, gently rounded arms a little Djer-Kiss Toilet Water sprinkled on the bath sponge.

As Madame proceeds, soft Djer-Kiss Vanishing Cream for the slender throat and the delicate complexion. Then a wise natural touch of Djer-Kiss rouge with the soft finish of Djer-Kiss Face Powder si exquise. And for the final comble de triomphe, a drop of Djer-Kiss Extract, so fragrantly chic, and Parisian. C'est fini, merveilleusement! How beautiful is Madame!

Djer-Kiss Cold Cream

There is no Spécialité de Djer-Kiss which adds more lasting beauty to Madame, to Mademoiselle, than pure Djer-Kiss Cold Cream. Used daily as a cleansing cream it restores a charming loveliness to the skin, keeping it smooth, white and fine of texture. Let its pure smoothness and French fragrance add to your beauty, Madame, Mademoiselle!

FREE—A Beautiful Calendar

The six exquisite paintings by Willy Pogany are reproduced in the new Djer-Kiss calendar. To receive this calendar free simply send your name and address to the Alfred H. Smith Co., 40 West 34th St., New York City.

EXTRACT • FACE POWDER • TALC • TOILET WATER • VEGETALE • SACHET • SOAP • ROUGE • COLD CREAM • VANISHING CREAM

These spécialités, Rouge, Soap, Compacts and Creams, temporarily blended here with pure Djer-Kiss concentré imported from France

Djer-Kiss

Made in France

Can you make fried foods greaseless and dainty enough for dessert?

A New Fried Apple Dessert

An apple, boiled in syrup, then fried in Crisco, gives a dessert of a new and delicious taste. Follow this exclusive recipe — one of many in the cookbook offered below:

Apples with Red Currant Jelly

6 cooking apples	6 glace cherries
4 tablespoons flour	red currant jelly
1 egg	Crisco
cake crumbs	syrup
apricot jam

Choose apples as much as possible same size; peel and core them carefully, so as not to break them. Put 1 cup syrup in stewpan or baking tin, put in apples and cook over fire or in oven until nearly done. Baste them occasionally with syrup. Let them get cold, then roll them in flour, brush over with beaten egg, toss in sifted cake crumbs, and fry in hot Crisco a golden brown. Drain on piece of paper, fill centers with apricot jam, cut out some rounds of red currant jelly, place 1 on top of each apple and a glace cherry on that. Dish up and serve hot or cold. An apricot syrup should be sent to table separately with apples.

Should Fat be Heated in a Hot or a Cold Kettle?

The answers to practical questions like this, covering all branches of cookery, make "A Calendar of Dinners" one of the most helpful books a housekeeper could have. Its author, Marion Harris Neil, formerly cookery editor of "The Ladies' Home Journal," fills 231 pages with cookery instructions drawn from her wide experience, gives instructions for marketing and carving, tables of weights and measures, cookery time tables, 615 exclusive recipes, and 365 complete dinner menus—one for every day in the year. You can not duplicate this book at any bookstore. Each book costs almost fifty cents to print. You can get one copy for only 10c in stamps mailed with your name and address to Section D-1, Department of Home Economics, The Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati, Ohio.

HALF the credit for dainty, greaseless fried food goes to the skill of the cook, and half to the frying fat.

The cook's part lies in knowing how to heat the fat without spoiling its quality; in knowing how much fat to use and how hot it should be; in knowing how to coat the food for frying and tell when it is done; and in knowing how to drain off the surplus fat while the food is still warm.

The fat, for perfect results, should be of vegetable origin, so it will not make the food hard to digest; it should be tasteless, so it will give no fatty flavor to delicate foods; it should give up its heat quickly to form on the food a protecting crust that will keep the fat out and the flavor in; it must heat without smoking, so that the frying kettle is pleasant and easy to use; it must not take up any food odors or flavors, so that it can simply be strained after each frying and kept always ready to use again.

You can get all of these qualities for perfect frying in Crisco, the modern, vegetable cooking fat. You can get the expert directions that will enable you to do your part right, in the complete cookbook offered at the left. You need not be a user of Crisco in order to get the cookbook. But we are sure that if you once try Crisco, as directed, you never will go back to old-fashioned methods or old-fashioned cooking fat.

Crisco is sold by grocers everywhere, in sanitary, sealed cans, holding one pound, net weight, and upwards. Never sold in bulk.

CRISCO

For Frying - For Shortening
For Cake Making

The Vanishing Girl

(Continued from Page 44)

Finally he turned back and reentered the store. "I didn't take this photograph," he said without further preliminaries, holding it towards her but not surrendering it to her outstretched hand. "I guess there's a mistake; do you think the films could have been mixed?"

"I'm sure they weren't. You have the only camera of that size in Scarborough's far as I know. It was on your roll right enough." She smiled tolerantly upon him from the heights of middle age. "Someone must have played a joke on you and picked up your camera. Did you leave it anywhere?"

"Oh, I'm always leaving it somewhere," Duff answered. "But—" Again he held out the picture. "Say, do you know this girl?"

SHE looked at the photograph again, smiling quite broadly now. "Pretty, ain't she? I think I've seen her around—couldn't be sure, though. But—"

"You think you've seen her," Duff said incredulously. Without another word he left the shop, and the woman's laugh followed him.

He was whistling when he swung up the driveway of The Elms.

"You look so much better, Duff," his mother said as he sat down on the piazza beside her.

"Better!" said Duff. "Gee, you don't know how good I feel!"

He grinned expansively; he could not remember ever having felt more exhilarated, more radiantly happy in his life. The Girl was real! She not only was real, she was in Scarborough. He was absurdly gay during dinner; afterwards he bore Elisabeth to the pavilion and refused to surrender her to Freddy Burns for a single dance.

"My land, you're getting human, Duff," Elisabeth sighed happily as they climbed into the car. "I've had the peachiest time. You dance better than any man I know. It's great to have you like this."

"This, my child, is nothing to what I'm going to be," Duff said.

"Then you will let me have parties at the house for you to meet everyone?"

"Let's have a coming-out party tomorrow," said Duff. "I want to meet every girl in Scarborough—especially the brunette ones."

"If only you didn't crawl into your shell so every time I mention Helena Morton—" Elisabeth began.

"Kismet!" Duff interrupted. "Abracadabra! Also, presto and eureka! Tell me, what color hair has Helena Morton?"

"Black," his sister answered, giggling. "She —"

"Stop the car," ordered Duff. "I want to talk. Listen! Is it too late to call on her now?"

"Helena? Now? At twelve o'clock?"

DUFF laughed.

"Honest, I'm not going crazy again. If I'd been born with an atom of sense—Elisabeth, I know that flappers try not to have memories; they're so wearing. But can you remember the first time you mentioned Helena Morton to me?"

"I'm not a flapper," said Elisabeth quite seriously. "I'm eighteen; that's legally a woman. I think it was in New York. I sort of remember —"

"I've got it!" Duff said excitedly. "She was the girl you pointed out to me at the opera the night I fainted like a Victorian heroine."

"I guess she was there," Elisabeth admitted. "But what on earth, Duff —"

"Eyes and subconscious mind register—whoopee! Oh, don't you think she'd be awake now, Elisabeth?"

Elisabeth giggled. "I'm sure that you're crazy, Duff," she said, "but you're sweet that way. And she probably is still up; she went to the Yacht Club dance, and that lasts later than the pavilion. Do you really want —"

"You're the chauffeur—worse luck," said her brother. "But I can help step on the gas. Take me to her."

Helena Morton was sitting on her piazza steps with her beau of the dance; her hair was like a dark cloud, her face delicately lovely above the mist of her pale-green chiffon scarf. She was so thoroughly pretty that Duff drew a deep breath of admiration before he drew the second breath of disappointment. For she was all that a man might desire; everything in the world—except that she was not The Girl.

He concealed his disappointment manfully as he took her hand and received one of those smiles that make a man tingle from his toes to the top of his head.

"We were beginning to think you were a myth," she said as he sat down beside her. "It's thrilling to find that you actually do exist. But you've got to be frightfully interesting after all the mystery you've created."

"In time, in time!" Duff said with an airy wave of his hand, while Elisabeth watched him with unconcealed admiration. "But you mustn't mind if I just stare at you for a few years."

SHE blushed prettily; altogether the hour on the piazza steps with the moonlight sifting over them was delightful.

"By the way, how's the photography going?" she asked, and bit her lower lip as he lifted his eyes questioning. She had risen and was standing in the doorway, the light from the hall behind her making the edges of her filmy dress glisten.

"Very well," Duff watched her closely. There had been something in her tone that made him wonder. "I had rather a strange experience the other day —" he began tentatively, and Helena Morton threw back her head and laughed, while Elisabeth and the young man listened, uncomprehending.

"It wasn't a mistake, either," said Helena Morton. "It was the challenge direct, the slap with the glove. And I see it worked!" Her hand was on the knob of the screen door, and Duff leaped up and caught it.

"Who is she?" he asked.

But her eyes met his challengingly. "It'll give you something to dream about," she said. "And if you've really recovered from being an interesting mystery and will come to the masquerade at the country club tonight —" She laughed again and closed the door.

Before he slipped into bed he took out the photograph of The Girl. "You're not so pretty as Miss Morton," he told her honestly. "Nobody could be. I think she's almost too pretty. I think I'll like you better, and I'm going to find you."

That evening he fussed about having to wear a borrowed Yama-Yama suit, and protested as irritably as any debutante because the tarlatan ruff was crushed. Finally, at nine o'clock, when Elisabeth had adjusted his tight black cap and his mother had bent the wire stem of the pom-pom that waved from his head, he was satisfied.

"You look very pretty," Elisabeth said, sinking on the couch. "But we've certainly worked."

"Oh, I'm the handsome boy," he answered cheerfully, snapping on his mask. "Ready?"

THE country club was decorated in the usual style—balloons, papier-mâché flowers, confetti. The dancers wore the usual costumes—pierrettes and harlequins, cowboys and dancing girls, pirates and court ladies. Duff surrendered Elisabeth to Freddy and crossed to the end of the room, where the shy and critical males were assembled and stood unsocially apart watching the dancers. He recognized Helena Morton; he had known she would be a Carmen; he might

(Continued on Page 49)

YOU and every man, woman and child thoroughly enjoy the flavor of sweet sugar cane.

The delicacy of Domino Syrup will delightfully surprise you. For Domino Syrup is a cane sugar product. Domino Syrup can be used every day on the table or in the kitchen. Because of its unusual flavor it wins its way with all the members of your family.

Domino Syrup is made by the refiners of Domino Package Sugars.

American Sugar Refining Company

"Sweeten it with Domino"

Granulated, Tablet, Powdered, Confectioners, Brown, Golden Syrup

Domino Syrup

As Foods

Puffed Grains are whole grains steam exploded. They are made by Prof. A. P. Anderson's process.

The grains are sealed in guns, then rolled for an hour in a fearful heat. The bit of moisture in each food cell is thus changed to steam.

When the guns are shot there occur in every kernel more than 100 million explosions. Every food cell is thus blasted so digestion is made easy and complete.

Puffed Grains are the best-cooked cereals in existence. Every element in the whole grain is fitted to digest. Every granule feeds.

That was the great purpose of this invention. It makes them supreme among grain foods.

Puffed Wheat in milk is the supreme dish for supper or for any hungry hour

Puffed Rice with cream and sugar is the finest breakfast dainty children ever get

As Tidbits

These steam explosions puff the grains to eight times normal size. They come out as bubble grains, crisp and airy, flimsy as a snowflake.

This makes them fascinating morsels, both in texture and in taste.

Being fragile and flavory, the grains add much delight to fruit.

Many people like them best doused with melted butter.

Children crisp and butter them to eat like peanuts when at play.

They make ideal toasted wafers for your soups.

There are countless ways of serving such flavory grain bubbles. Encourage them if you want your children to eat whole-grain food in plenty.

No other method known makes whole wheat half so tempting.

Puffed Rice will give to any fruit dish a multiplied delight. Try it with stewed raisins

Crisp and lightly douse with butter for hungry children after school. Tastes like toasted nuts

As Confections

The fearful heat gives to the grains a taste like toasted nuts. So they use these Puffed Grains in home candy making and as nut meats on ice cream.

The grains are so porous and so flimsy that they fairly melt into the cream. And they make the candies light and airy.

Thus millions of children now revel in Puffed Grains morning, noon and night. Whole-grain dainties often take the place of sweets, etc., not so good for children.

Serve both kinds and in plenty. The two grains differ vastly. In some ways of serving Puffed Wheat is the favorite, in other ways Puffed Rice.

Puffed Rice is used to make home candies light and nutty

Scatter Puffed Rice like airy nut meats on ice cream. Learn how much this adds is whole wheat steam exploded—puffed to eight times normal size.

Puffed Wheat

The Quaker Oats Company

Sole Makers

Puffed Rice

is whole rice puffed to bubbles—flimsy, flavory, delicious.

The Vanishing Girl

(Continued from Page 47)

perhaps have claimed her for a dance had not The Girl, unmasked, appeared in the doorway.

In a photograph her costume would have been demure: a tight little bodice, a skirt that billowed over generous hoops, starched pantalettes, ankle ties and mitts. In the hall, after adjusting her mask, she made anything but a demure figure; for the primness of her gown was shattered and almost burlesqued by its color, the inevitable but ever-arresting scarlet. She was like a flame; if she had appeared with a screaming of sirens and an explosion of shells, the effect would scarcely have been intensified. The color of the other dancers faded into a pleasant background for her slender figure; as she moved slowly alone across the floor, a spotlight might have followed her.

Duff bounded forward with a leap that outrivaled Nijinsky for sheer joyousness, with a speed that shamed the art of Babe Ruth. "My dance," he said, and they swung off before she had even answered him.

"I haven't the slightest idea who you are," The Girl said finally. "But don't tell me. I shall hope against hope that you're an interloper, the villain who takes advantage of a masquerade to accomplish his desperate purpose."

She had not spoken before, but Duff had always known her voice would be like that. "You're absolutely right," he answered. "Funny that you should guess." He looked down at her happily. "I know who you are, though."

"Really?"

"But I don't know your name. It isn't important; names are so impermanent."

"Yes? You interest me strangely, Arsène Lupin."

HE LAUGHED. "Oh, I'm only beginning," he assured her. "By the way, I might as well break it to you now that your dances are all mine."

She drew her breath. "Not really?" she said mockingly.

"Yes. But we're not going to dance them all. In fact"—skillfully he had drawn her from the dancers and now he helped her over the threshold to the piazza—"we're going to commence some important talking this minute."

The piazza was deserted so early in the evening and, although he had not been there before, he found the corner by the azalea bushes by instinct—or was there a slight guiding pressure of her hand on his arm?

The girl took off her mask.

"Now then," he said, sitting down. "To begin at the beginning, it really wasn't you who came into my room at Sleepy Valley, was it?"

"What?"

He laughed. "I thought it wasn't," he assured her. "The doctor said it wasn't."

But one has to be exact. You did leave the moving-picture theater three weeks ago Saturday in the middle of the picture, didn't you?"

"You're not a desperate criminal," The Girl remarked calmly. "You don't deceive me in the least. You're a madman."

"I thought it was you that time," he said. "Thanks. And this photograph?"

In the moonlight he saw the color creep over her face.

"Right again," he said triumphantly. "You don't know what a relief it is to have these things settled."

"Would you mind trying to tell me what you're talking about?" she asked.

"That's just what I brought you out here for," he answered, and told her the story from the very beginning.

They were silent when he had finished.

"You're sure I'm real now?" she asked.

"Almost. But I want to tell you that I'm madly in love with you before you vanish, and I don't know how to begin."

SHE jumped to her feet with an embarrassed laugh. "Well, Duff Schuyler," she said, gasping a little as she spoke, "if I hadn't known you since you were about seven years old and used to drag that moth-eaten Airedale pup around with you, I think I'd either be frightened or annoyed. As it is I'm just going to—vanish."

She was gone before he caught her, and he followed slowly into the hall.

"The plot thickens," he said to himself happily. "Known her since I was seven, have I? Huh!"

For a moment he could not find her, then he discovered her with Helena and Elisabeth talking excitedly. A passing pierrette seized him and whirled him to the midst of the dancers. When he returned to his corner, The Girl had vanished.

He caught Elisabeth as she danced by and dragged her from her partner. "What happened to that girl I was dancing with?" he demanded.

"What girl?"

"In red. You saw her, Elisabeth; you were talking to her a little while ago."

"I haven't seen any girl in red," she answered. "Let me finish this dance, Duff."

He held her wrist firmly. "The girl in the red hoop skirt," he persisted. "Of course you saw her."

She squirmed impatiently. "You're seeing things again," she said, but her eyes were not worried as she looked at him. "Let me go."

He released her impatiently and sought Helena Morton.

"But I haven't seen any girl in red," she protested. "Really I haven't. Do you insist on red, Duff Schuyler?"

He waited for an hour and then went home disgustedly. "She is real," he said to himself, "and she's adorable. I'm going to find her if I have to get a job as gas collector and stop at every house."

In the morning he took the car from the garage and set forth, his mother's warning of not more than twenty miles an hour following him. He drove slowly about the town during the entire morning.

After lunch he set forth doggedly again.

The cool wind rippled through his fair hair as he drove; the whole countryside was sweet and fragrant. He was not aware of another car until a gray automobile

(Continued on Page 50)

"My dear, you look like a new person!"

WHATEVER have you done to improve your skin so wonderfully? Why, it's as soft and clear as a baby's! Do tell me the secret."

But there is no secret to tell—the adoption of Resinol Soap for her daily toilet and bath explains it all.

There is a world of hope in that statement for the discouraged woman who has tried various treatments and finds her complexion is still sallow and muddy or her skin coarse, oily, rough, blotchy or otherwise blemished.

It seems incredible that anything so simple as regularly bathing the face with Resinol Soap and warm water could restore skin health and beauty when other things have failed. Yet it can, and does, because in addition to its unusual cleansing qualities, it has just the soothing, healing, corrective properties necessary to overcome these facial imperfections.

Use Resinol Soap for one week and you will know why you will want it all the year round.

May we send you a dainty trial size cake free? If so, write Dept. 1-B, Resinol, Baltimore, Md.

Resinol products at all drug and toilet goods counters.

Resinol Soap

BERKEY & GAY Furniture

"The Churchill" — January's Feature

To own such furniture as this Berkey & Gay dining suite is to know ceaseless pride of possession.

Reflecting those Irish designers of the Queen Anne period who gave a delightful interpretation to the accepted styles, "The Churchill" yet has a character distinctly its own. In its beautiful combination of plain and figured walnut, with the Berkey & Gay finish bringing out the glory of the wood, there is abiding charm.

See "The Churchill" at the better stores during January. Ask to be shown also other distinctive Berkey & Gay Furniture — of enduring merit, moderately priced.

We invite you to write for our Brochure, describing "The Churchill" Dining Suite and other Berkey & Gay Furniture, together with name of nearest dealer.

BERKEY & GAY FURNITURE COMPANY
440 Monroe Avenue Grand Rapids, Michigan

This shopmark is inset in every Berkey & Gay production. It is the customer's protection when buying and his pride ever after.

The Vanishing Girl

(Continued from Page 49)

sped suddenly from behind him and tore past. The driver was easily making fifty miles an hour, but as the car shot by he caught a glimpse, in the round mirror beside the wheel, of an oval face, a low, white forehead below dark hair, and a curving red mouth.

His foot jammed down on the accelerator; twenty miles an hour became a limitation of the past. The trees ran together like wet water colors. A small white hand was thrust out, and Duff stepped on the brake, barely missing collision as the gray car whirled recklessly around a curve and began gobbling the long stretch of road unrolled like a carpet before them.

"You won't drive like that after you're married to me, young woman," he said between his teeth as he followed.

The wind whipped against his face, and the landscape grew more and more dizzy. On and on. . . . If she was a ghost he was willing to drive over a cliff after her; if there was a cliff in the way he probably would, anyway, at the rate they were moving. On and on. . . .

AGAIN the small white hand; he felt the blood beat against his temples as he jammed the brakes, stalling the engine. The gray car had disappeared around a corner and he pressed the self-starter impatiently. His car shot forward, taking the corner in a sudden leap. Before him stretched a long, straight highway, a dusty ribbon of road, lying flat as far as he could see, bordered by a dense wall of trees—and not an automobile was anywhere in sight!

Somehow he collected himself enough to stop the car. He sat there dizzily, his heart thumping, his breath coming in gasps.

"What's the big idea—stopping in the middle of the road?" called an indignant masculine voice as a small car climbed around him.

He did not answer or move; for nearly five minutes he sat watching the small car move up the long stretch of road toward the horizon. The gray car had been traveling quickly, but it could not have made that distance in the few minutes that had separated them.

It was five minutes more before he mustered enough courage to start the car and turn it about. He drove back over the road slowly, looking straight ahead. It was several minutes before he discovered where he was; then the Unitarian church, calm and peaceful in the middle of its green, told him that Doctor Blake's house was only a few doors down the side road. He drew up outside the door and waited for a moment at the wheel before he felt that he could trust his legs.

Then he walked dizzily up the path between the rows of hollyhocks and lifted the brass knocker.

"I want to see Doctor Blake," he said to the maid.

THE doctor entered the room and looked at Duff. "Hello," he said, crossed briskly to his laboratory and returned with a glass of liquid. "Drink this."

It steadied Duff. His hand was more controlled as he set down the glass.

"You look about all in."

"I am. Doctor Blake, was there ever any insanity in my family?"

"Pish-tush!" said the doctor firmly. "Duff, before you tell me what's up, I want you to listen to this. When I examined you a week ago you were in perfectly normal condition. I don't believe there's anything the matter with you now except imagination. You'd better get it out and let me see what I can do for you. This sort of thing has got to stop."

The assurance in Blake's voice steadied him. "Well, it's beyond me," he said. "It may be all right."

Quickly he told about the three encounters with The Girl that had followed her first appearance in Sleepy Valley.

The doctor's eyes narrowed as he described the ride which had just occurred.

"And I don't know much about this spirit photography business," Duff concluded, "but there's an awful lot of rot about it in the magazines. Look at this." He pulled the picture from his pocket, handed it to Blake. "Of course Miss Morton—oh, heavens, I'd forgotten that. They took the picture. I suppose it's all explainable."

"What about Helena Morton?" asked the doctor, smiling at the photograph.

Duff told him about the meeting with Helena.

Blake roared.

"THAT rather settles the ghost business, doesn't it?" he asked. "I think these two young women have been having a good deal of fun with you." He laughed again.

Duff flushed. "Oh, I suppose so," he said. "But that blinking race simply turned me upside down."

"I should think it would about finish anyone, from the way you've described it," Blake returned. "You haven't been in Scarborough for some time. Duff, but have you forgotten the old mill road that turns off the causeway at right angles? It's a short cut to this place. It's a terrible turn to take when you're driving fast and the trees are so thick on each side that you'd hardly know it was there. Dangerous corner that." He shook his head. "But you know what girls are like these days—can't do anything with 'em. Result of the war, I suppose."

Duff looked up uncomfortably. "Oh, I suppose you can explain it all away," he said. "I know I must seem an utter idiot to you. I suppose she is a real girl as you've said all along, but if this sort of thing goes on much longer —"

"It won't," the doctor answered confidently, still smiling at the photograph. "Duff, I asked you to come home to dinner with me the night you got back from Sleepy Valley, the only place where you ever saw a ghost, if you want to call it that. Pretty husky ghost, I'll say." He handed the photograph to the young man and grinned outright. "Will you take your physician's advice and remain with me for dinner tonight?"

"I don't know what you're driving at," said Duff; "but I don't feel as though I knew much of anything. I'll do whatever you say."

"ONE question more, then," said Doctor Blake. He seemed to be enjoying himself hugely, and his patient felt uncomfortable. "You really do want this mystery solved? You're not afraid of meeting your girl and pricking the bubble of this little romance?"

"Good heaven, no!"

"All right." The doctor crossed to the hallway. "Oh, Anita!" he called. "Anita! Come here a minute!"

"Yes, father." It was a pleasant voice, warm and vaguely familiar.

Duff waited, his eyes on the door, his brain hardly moving.

"I think I'll leave you," said the doctor.

And The Girl appeared in the doorway.

Duff hesitated only a fraction of a minute before he seized her. "I have known you ever since we were kids," he said, speaking so rapidly that his words almost choked him, and tightening the hold of his arms about her. "And you've been making my life hectic for over a year now. I may not like you a bit after I really know you again—you were a nasty little girl—and you may not like me. But I'm going to kiss you now, and there's nothing in the world that can stop me."

For a moment Doctor Blake, shaking with silent laughter in the next office, heard nothing.

Then the voice of his daughter, clear, but warmer and more vibrant than he had ever heard it: "I was not a nasty little girl, Duff Schuyler!"

Smell the real naphtha in Fels-Naptha

The last little piece still holds its naphtha

The easiest way to get clothes clean through and through—put them to soak half an hour, soaped with Fels-Naptha! Its real naphtha gets at every thread of the clothes and quickly makes the dirt let go. Only a light rubbing, a thorough rinse, and the washing is done.

No matter how much the golden bar of Fels-Naptha is worn down when you use it, the real naphtha stays in to the last little bit, and makes clothes just as clean as when the bar is new and big.

Clothes washed with Fels-Naptha always get a double cleansing—one with naphtha; the other with soap-and-water. They are cleaner than you could get them with ordinary soap and hard rubbing. Yet you only have to rub a little with Fels-Naptha.

The only way you can get the benefit of this double cleansing-value in soap is to be sure you get Fels-Naptha—the original and genuine naphtha soap—of your grocer. The clean naphtha odor and the red-and-green wrapper are your guides.

What is Naphtha?

It is that powerful yet harmless dirt-loosener used by professional dry-cleaners to cleanse safely and to freshen dainty fabrics and delicate colors. Naphtha is good for clothes because it thoroughly cleanses. Real naphtha is perfectly combined with good soap in Fels-Naptha.

FREE

If you haven't seen or used Fels-Naptha lately send for free sample. Write "Fels-Naptha, Philadelphia."

© 1921, Fels & Co., Philadelphia

FELS-NAPTHA

THE GOLDEN BAR WITH THE CLEAN NAPTHA ODOR

Armstrong's Linoleum

for Every Floor in the House

In this cheerful, inviting living-room the floor of Armstrong's Brown Jaspé Linoleum harmonizes perfectly with the walls and furnishings, and makes a pleasing background for the fabric rug.

Look for the CIRCLE "A" trademark on
the linoleum back

Architects Are Specifying Permanent Linoleum Floors

In many modern houses you will find that floors of linoleum are as much a part of the permanent construction as the walls or the windows.

Architects are specifying these floors for new houses. The linoleum is laid over soft wood underflooring; it makes a beautiful and durable floor, upon which the finest fabric rugs are displayed to advantage.

You will find floors of Armstrong's Linoleum in bedrooms, dining-rooms and living-rooms of homes where good taste prevails. These floors are smooth, solid, restful to walk on and stand on, easy to keep clean.

First cost is less than that of other good floors, and there is never any necessity for expensive refinishing. An occasional waxing keeps a linoleum floor looking like new.

If you want to see really beautiful linoleum for permanent floors, ask your merchant to show you the Armstrong Jaspés—gray, green, blue, and brown. Handsome plain colors, too, and the many artistic Armstrong patterns.

A room 12 x 14 feet can be floored with Armstrong's Linoleum in Brown Jaspé at a cost of about $52.00 (slightly higher in the far West). This includes cementing the linoleum down over builders' deadening felt, which is the most satisfactory way to lay linoleum as a permanent floor.

All Armstrong's Linoleum is guaranteed to give entire satisfaction.

The Art of Home Furnishing and Decoration (Second Edition)

By Frank Alvah Parsons, President of the New York School of Fine and Applied Art. Sent, with de luxe color plates of fine home interiors, on receipt of twenty cents.

ARMSTRONG CORK COMPANY, LINOLEUM DEPARTMENT
920 Mary St., Lancaster, Pennsylvania

If one of these Armstrong patterns is more appropriate for your living-room than No. 11, shown in the illustration, order (by number) from your linoleum merchant.

Armstrong's Linoleum Rugs

You can also buy rugs of Armstrong's Linoleum, suitable for kitchen, dining-room or bedroom, and fully guaranteed to give satisfactory service. Send for free booklet, "Armstrong's Linoleum Rugs," showing color plates of many pleasing and artistic designs.

A Persian Wedding

(Continued from Page 21)

Farkhunde, which means 'Happiness.' Farkhunde was one of the pupils of our missionary school, the daughter of a rich Moslem. You could not find a better example than this of a household that remains strictly Mohammedan and yet wants to take advantage for its women of some of our Western ideas."

Translated, the wedding invitation read:

In blessedness and prosperity, on Tuesday, the first of the month Shaban, 1338, a wedding assembly for my daughter, Farkhunde Khanum, in the house of your slave is arranged for. I request that four hours to sunset you will decorate your slave's house by your blessed steps for (drinking) sherbet and (eating) sweets, and make her grateful and blessed. The seal of Malak-taj.

So on Tuesday, about three o'clock, we set out for the wedding. As we drove along my friend pointed to a small procession of porters. "There," she said, "is a part of the wedding."

The men were carrying on their heads wide, flat trays on which were displayed wedding presents—the silver-wrought objects for which Persia is famous; pieces of priceless embroidery; rich lengths of silk. Passers-by were staring and estimating.

"It is always done," Mrs. Boyce said. "The dowry is displayed in the same way, too, all of it that can be; sometimes a wedding is delayed until a dowry can be assembled that will make enough show to correspond with the family pride."

We turned down a side street and stopped before a small door in a high wall. Not till the chauffeur had driven away did we knock. The door was opened cautiously by a woman completely covered with a black chuddar. All we could see of her was a glint of dark eye. We went through a small passage—and then it was as if we were in fairyland.

The Bride's Girl Friends

GONE was the effect of muddy streets, of dark-clad figures, of anxious faces. Here were color, light, fragrance. We were in a court; two of its gleaming walls were made by the wings of the house; the other two were garden height, and beyond we could see tall trees and violet hills. In the center of the court was a lovely fountain, about which grew straight, slim cypress trees. Here and there stood an orange tree; thick vines, flower-hung, were draped along the walls and over the doorways. And everywhere—on the marble pavement, standing with the immemorial grace of the East, moving swayingly or even running lightly—were upper-class Persian girls and women.

But not as I had known them in the streets, dark, shrouded figures with a white, thick covering over the face, even the eyes hidden by a thick lattice of embroidery. No melancholy here, nothing gloomy or furtive. They all wore white or pale lavender or blue, and over their heads were white, filmy veils, fastened in the most charming way under the chin. The Persians are, I believe, the only Moslems who use veils fastened in this fashion. Most of them had their hair arranged in two braids down the back, the usual Moslem custom, but some of them wore it in French style. All the dresses were after French patterns, but of a style of some two years ago, before the skirts made motions of vanishing completely.

They were not all pretty; some of them had eyes too deeply set, too near together, noses too long and chins that receded. But others were as lovely as a dream, with delicate oval faces, large eyes and regular features. I could have looked a long time at the picture they made, so charming an impression did they give me of gayety and spontaneity and delight.

The bride's sister, a pretty girl in pink, who spoke English perfectly, ushered us upstairs into the reception rooms, a series of three furnished with chairs delicately upholstered and with many little sandalwood tables. The chairs in a Persian house are always set against the wall, with little tables in front of them. A few priceless Persian rugs covered the floor, while one or two were hung—and well they might be, for they were what we should call museum pieces. The one the family seemed to value most was beautifully woven enough, but was made grotesque by being patterned with pictures of some former shah.

Against this background sat forty or fifty women and girls, repeating the same delicate colors I had seen in the court. More of them were standing on the balcony that ran the length of the reception rooms, calling down to their friends below.

Presently we were seated, like all the others, with a little table before us on which the feast was spread.

And such a feast! Cakes and nuts and sweets of all sorts. Sherbet was brought in first, quite the most delicious I have ever tasted.

The Wedding Ceremony

SERVANTS brought us in tea or pressed more sherbet on us.

Presently half a dozen of the women were smoking tobacco in water pipes, putting the ends of the long tubes in their mouths, and inhaling so that the water in the bulbous vessels below made the most fascinating bubbles.

"When does the real wedding begin?" I asked Mrs. Boyce; "when do the bride and groom appear?"

I took it for granted that sometime or other a little wedding procession would come in and all the Moslem guests would shroud themselves in their chuddars.

"Didn't I tell you?" she replied. "The aghd, or religious ceremony, is going on now, downstairs. None of the company attends that."

"Not even the father and mother?"

"Not even the bridegroom," said Mrs. Boyce. "The poor little bride gets married all by herself. She sits or stands on one side of a screen and the mullah or priest on the other. For two or three hours he tells her her duty and preaches and prays, and performs all the ceremonies necessary to bind her fast from the religious standpoint."

"But where is the bridegroom? Doesn't he have to go through this aghd?"

"The bridegroom is in Resht just now. Oh, yes, he will be married in the same way. Not necessarily to-day, but sometime soon. Then in a week, or a month, or a year, whatever time suits the two families, there will be a social function; relatives will meet with the bride and groom in the home of the parents of the bride. There will be a party like this. Then the young couple will go to their own home, or to the home of the parents of the groom, or wherever it is they are going to live."

"The essential part of the wedding, however, is this present religious ceremony."

"It will go on, perhaps, for another hour, and then the bride will come upstairs for a few minutes. She will then be legally married."

A wedding without a groom, and all these women and girls attending a wedding without seeing the ceremony, without seeing any men! Of a sudden it all seemed rather pitiable to me. I fought against the feeling, for all these women seemed happy enough, delighted to be together, taking in each other's clothes—and ours. There was not a jarring note. But presently I yielded to the feeling, for Mrs. Boyce and I were told we might see the bride, because the American visitor had come so far and had never seen a Moslem wedding.

We went downstairs and were taken to a little dark room at the end of a wing. Not here were there any gleams of sunshine, though the room was richly furnished enough. Heavy, magnificent rugs were on the floor; there was a large chair, arranged on a platform, rather like a throne, draped with rugs, and there was a tall, dusky sort of mirror. The chair and the mirror are essential to the setting of the bride during the religious ceremony.

Against this background stood Farkhunde, dressed in a magnificent satin wedding gown with a sweeping train, white flowers in her hair, her veil flowing back. She looked precisely as any American bride might look, except for her expression. Her face was sad and nervous. I believe that Moslem brides are supposed to look sad during their wedding, but Farkhunde did not have to assume anything. Her dark eyes were troubled, her full lips were trembling, her little olive hand shook as she extended it to me.

When Mrs. Boyce kissed her she clung to her a little. Her mother was with her, and her elder sister; on the other side of the screen, behind the mirror, was the mullah.

"We are going to leave her now," the sister said; "the ceremony is over, but the mullah is going to speak to her again."

So we wished Farkhunde happiness and left her looking wistfully after us. The gleaming court was as lovely as ever, the light-colored figures as graceful, but for me the radiance was dimmed. That little sad bride being married all alone, preached at and nagged at by the priest for three hours; so pretty in her bridal finery and no lover present to tell her so, proud to have a horde of wedding guests admiring her and then eager to take her away from them all.

The whole wedding was symbolic to me of the fate of the average Eastern wife: not a companion of her husband, only a chattel, like anything else he owns—no tenderness, no real sacredness, no comradeship.

Emblematic of such a beginning is the whole course of the average Persian woman's married life. She lives in the shadow of the chuddar, shut off from the world, bearing children, seeing her husband only when he chooses to be with her, perhaps sharing him with other women, but never a vital part of his life nor of the lives of her sons.

The Dawn of a Better Day

MY DEPRESSION lifted a little as we talked to Farkhunde's mother, Mrs. Boyce translating for me. I saw that, after all, there is a trend in Persia toward better conditions for the women. Education is the first step toward lessening polygamy.

"Farkhunde is rather old to be married," said Malak-taj; "but it took some time to decide on her husband. The young man is her second cousin. I had been thinking of him for her for some years now, but it is not always easy to arrange a marriage. We were very fortunate to have a second cousin of an age to marry her."

"She won't say in so many words what she means," said Mrs. Boyce, "but it is this: When a family can marry a daughter to a cousin he is not very likely to take a second wife; there is too much family pressure against it. The mothers know what a woman suffers when there is a second wife to share a man, and I suppose the fathers understand enough, at least the progressive ones."

The next day I drove to Kasvin, with Willamalie, an Indian driver. As we were passing a village, I heard bitter sobbing.

"That is Zahra," he said, "the daughter of the man who lives in that corner hut. Last week her husband divorced her because she is so old; I think she is twenty-five. He sent her back to her father's house, and he kept the six children; the youngest is two weeks old. Zahra's father is making her marry the old one-eyed saddler who has already two wives. Zahra says she will have to work hard, but it is not that; she wants her children, and to-day her husband is marrying a young wife of thirteen who she knows will beat them. Her husband has the right to divorce her for old age or anything else and to keep the children. She knows it is fate, but she weeps."

The Persian women submit to fate, but they weep.

Just 4 ways

Just four of the many simple, economical ways in which you can use a single Del Monte product—Canned Peaches—to put summer freshness into winter meals.

Just four dishes—but they illustrate your endless opportunity to delight tired appetites—to put a new zest into every-day meals—with the many delicious varieties of canned fruits, vegetables and food specialties that Del Monte makes available all the year round.

PEACH PIE—Put syrup from 1 large can DEL MONTE Peaches in sauce pan, add ¼ cup sugar and cook peaches a few at a time until glazed. To syrup add 1 ½ tablespoons corn starch mixed with 2 tablespoons cold water and cook until thickened. Reserve 6 halves of peaches, cut remainder in thin slices and add thickened syrup. Fill baked pastry crust with the peaches, garnish with reserved peach halves and with meringue.

PEACH SALAD—Drain one large can DEL MONTE Peaches. Fill wet flat mold with orange jelly mixed with ¼ cup broken walnut meats and ¼ can DEL MONTE Cherries. Set in refrigerator overnight. Turn out jelly and cover with peaches, using a little melted jelly to stick them. Serve with mayonnaise and remainder of cherries, on lettuce.

PEACH COCONUT PUDDING—Mix ¼ cup of corn starch with ¼ cup cold water and add 1 cup of hot milk; cook in double boiler 15 minutes, and add ¼ cup of coconut. Line a wet mold with DEL MONTE Canned Sliced Peaches, pour in pudding and when cold turn out on a serving dish.

PEACH ISLAND—Place 6 halves DEL MONTE Canned Peaches in a serving dish. Beat 2 egg yolks with 2 tablespoons of sugar and ¼ teaspoon of salt, add 1 cup of hot milk, cook in double boiler until thick, cool, add ¼ teaspoon of vanilla, fold in 2 beaten egg whites, pour over the peaches and sprinkle with coconut.

And for more of them

Send for "Del Monte Recipes of Flavor"—a book that is just crowded with over 500 other equally tasty, healthful and inexpensive suggestions for serving better meals with canned fruits and vegetables. It is free.

Address Department A
CALIFORNIA PACKING CORPORATION
San Francisco, California

3420

3419

3417-2668

3416

Southern Clothes that are Harbingers of Summer

THE women who go to Palm Beach started it, this business of making summer clothes in midwinter, but it didn't take the rest of the feminine world long to find out that Christmas money plus January sewing equal spring gladness to the nth power. Spring fever and spring sewing were never very good friends anyway; and besides, it's such a delightfully snug feeling to know that warm weather cannot creep up and catch you unprepared, as it certainly will your less forehanded neighbor, sending her some happy April day into a mild frenzy of fitting, sewing and shopping, while you smilingly dig in your garden.

The signs are up now, pointing the way. The materials are made and in the shops, the patterns are cut, the style ball is already rolling merrily for 1922. What, then, are some of the outstanding influences in clothes that Paris has sent over, Palm Beach is now wearing, and we all must have, sooner or later, to be really of this year's fashion?

As to materials, it seems that for cottons this is something of a ratine and éponge year. It is a natural consequence of silk crêpes, and these cottons, which somewhat resemble the silks in weave, will no doubt be used extensively for daytime dresses, tailored frocks, sports clothes, both in colors and in white. There is a square open-meshed éponge which, when made into a sweater or sports coat, looks very much like crocheted work, and comes in gay colors—rose, orange, green—especially suitable for this use. This material, too transparent to be used for an entire frock, is also being pressed into service in combination with linen or cotton crash for one-piece dresses.

Ginghams will be more in demand than ever this summer, and in addition to the usual pretty checks and plaids, there are some smart new small-line checks in fast-dyed fuchsia, yellow, henna, clear blue, rose and green colorings.

Voiles, too, promise to be in the fashion picture; but these are voiles that have gone far beyond their humble forbears. They are voiles with batik colorings, innumerable lovely shades melting and fading into each other with perhaps a stab of cerise here and a vein of purple there; voiles with tiny embroidered dots in broken squares, dots in every conceivable new arrangement, a refreshing change from the dotted Swisses of last year, though reminiscent of them; and voiles with small, old-fashioned patterns embroidered or stamped, giving an impression of quaintness and primness that is one of the season's most persistent notes.

This back-to-grandmother movement in materials is, of course, natural enough in a year in which the clothes of the real lady are the clothes to wear. Bare backs and short skirts have been discarded; with them have gone the more striking designs, and in their place we have quaint, old-fashioned patterns. Cretonnes, which will be seen more generally than ever in dresses, will carry out this prunes-and-prisms note, and we shall even be wearing that modest stuff, percale, which blooms forth this year in bright, close little designs in yellow and black, orange and black, and green and yellow, very tempting for trimming as well as for an entire frock.

3418

3421

3415

One of the most popular fabrics for chemise dresses will be a stout, close cotton material with a linenlike weave, whose colors are all those of the rainbow, colors that are likewise absolutely guaranteed to be as unquenchable as those celestial hues. It is a point of great pride with American manufacturers this year, by the way, that many colors are to be fade-proof and others as nearly fade-proof as is possible.

It would seem that colors this season will be better than they have ever been before. As for the rest of the summer fabrics, linen will be used a great deal, both handkerchief linen and the heavier varieties. In silks, crêpe of all sorts is still at the head of the class.

The 1922 silhouette follows in general the popular chemise line, with many variations in detail. Dresses with or without blouses have a tendency to cling to the long waistline. Fullness at the hips, flounces in new and unexpected places, will be used a great deal in soft materials for the fluffier type of summer clothes. A new note on many frocks is that of a deep yoke, either actual or simulated. Aprons remain steadfastly with us, quite as if they had enjoyed their climb into society and meant never to go back to the kitchen where they came from. Capes also refuse to be routed, and are appearing in new guises every day.

An unusual treatment of white linen is found in frock No. 3420, where the material is embroidered in black. It might also be braided, or if less work is desirable—and it usually is—an embroidered flounce might be bought and laid on. The pattern comes in sizes 16 years, and 36 to 42 inches.

The indispensable frilly frock, without which no summer is really summer, is shown opposite, made in white handkerchief linen, fluttering with scallops, fine pink linen flowers here and there, and a flyaway sash that quite belies the demure little surplice bodice. It would be lovely also in a dotted or flowered voile, or in a light silk crêpe of a soft coloring. A frock like it was headed lightly in the scallops. It is a model with a dozen possibilities; the important thing is to keep the rose-petal, flowery effect. The pattern number is 3419; it comes in sizes 16 and 18 years, and 36, 38 and 40 inches.

The white cloth suit, with skirt No. 2668 and coat No. 3417, is a smart, boyish little affair whose only concession to femininity is in its wide bell sleeves. It is braided in white silk braid on the sleeves and a round yoke, and may be braided at the bottom of the coat, or may have a hip border of the same width of navy blue crêpe de Chine. The Puritan collar of cloth may be used as in the sketch, or a choker collar of fur might be worn with it. The skirt is plain and straight. In navy or black tricotine or gabardine, collared demurely in white linen and braided in self or contrasting color, this would be the last word in modishness for spring. The skirt pattern comes in sizes 16 years, and 26 to 32 inches, while the coat pattern may be secured in sizes 14 to 20 years.

(Continued on Page 102)

Patterns may be obtained from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City.

Dresses, 35 cents; Coats, 35 cents; Skirts, 30 cents.

Lucette
FROCKS

THIS is perhaps one of Lucette's most charming frocks of gingham.

The long, graceful roll collar of crisp organdie with frilled edge, the effective panels piped in white and the new sleeve are interesting notes.

And this is only one of a delightful array of frocks pictured and described in the new Lucette Style Book. If you haven't a copy, write us today and we will tell you at the same time where you may see these frocks for yourself.

Wherever you find the Lucette label, you will find smart lines and conscientious tailoring.

Send for your Lucette booklet today.

H. LINSK & COMPANY
Central Building, Philadelphia

Lucette
FROCKS

Paris Points the Way to January Bargains

PARIS, December, 1921.

MY DEAR MR. EDITOR: Though every day is bargain day to the Parisian shopper, this is the season when the first houses of France have their most exclusive finery on sale. Dresses that have been described by telegraph round the world can be picked up for just the fewest number of dollars. But the French woman considers that nothing is cheap which does not go with all her wardrobe, actual and potential. Buy a dress for twenty-five dollars in the Great Emporium basement, she reasons, but call it a little flyer in extravagance unless it accords with your last winter's coat and your next winter's furs. What do the French women choose as winners in the fashions' speed and endurance race?

After Vionnet had her opening, people not invited all but stood on her doorstep

Very generally becoming in a wide variety of materials is the slip-on frock at the right. For winter wear tricotine, Canton crepe, duvetyn or velveteen, with braided pockets, is good, and, velveteen excepted, any of these is equally appropriate for spring. Pattern 3414, in sizes 36 to 46.

Mole-colored duvetyn, with collar and cuffs of moleskin and a colorful metal girdle, makes the unusually smart coat below. This is a good type of coat to make for late winter with a view to wearing it, on occasion, throughout the summer. Pattern 3412, in sizes 16 and 36 to 44.

to ask what materials she used. You know she waited until most of the possible purchasers left and then "invited a few friends in." These friends spread the news to an attentive world that a cloth called drapella would be fashionable. Chéruit, Callot, Worth and others had already been using it for some time, and gowns of it are what the bargain hunters fight for. It is just about to start on what will probably be a long run. At first sight you would say it was broadcloth, and so it is, but worked to a thin, soft silkiness that makes it feel like crêpe de Chine. In draperies it takes on the soft lines of evening materials. And it has a sheen. You can figure out by the law of averages that shiny materials are on their way to power. Dead crêpe and mourning effects are still

(Continued on Page 65)

In the center below is another frock, equally smart, in winter fabrics or in any of the heavier summer materials. The side panel, with its rows of self-covered buttons, gives a new touch to the Russian effect of the long-waisted bodice. The pattern is No. 3388, sizes 16 and 36 to 44.

Because of its simplicity, the smartly tailored suit below is well within the powers of the home dressmaker. If made of black broadcloth, with narrow bands of caracul edging collar and pockets, it still may be worn during spring and early summer. Pattern No. 3413, sizes 16 and 36 to 42.

Patterns may be obtained from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City. Dresses, 35 cents; Coats, 35 cents; Skirts, 30 cents.

Armour's

"SIMON PURE" LEAF LARD

"Make them with leaf lard"
—say famous cooks

Biscuits of rich crustiness and flavory goodness—biscuits that do not "dry out"—or lose their savor during the baking—depend upon genuine Leaf Lard for the qualities that make them a household favorite.

—to be sure of getting lard from pure leaf fat only—rendered in open kettle—insist on Armour's "Simon Pure." Buy it in small quantities if you prefer—in the convenient 1 lb. cartons, or in 2.5 and 10 lb. pails.

—under the Armour Oval Label you can get highest quality foods—Star Ham; Star Bacon; Veribest Canned Meats; Evaporated Milk; Dry and Fresh Sausage; Cloverbloom Butter; Nut-ola Margarine; etc. Look for the Oval Label—it "takes the guesswork out of buying." Armour and Company, Chicago.

Old Clothes and Make-Over Magic

THERE is a certain horror in every woman's closet beside which the well-known skeleton who is reputed to live there is a cheery, companionable fellow, without a terror to his name. It is the horror of old clothes, of shabby suits, limp blouses, out-of-style dresses, hanging there neglected and forlorn, ghosts of a former day, when they were useful and pretty and admired. But sartorial ghosts, like all others, must be laid. One cannot go on living with them forever. And so the moment comes when we must clean out that closet. But what to do with the old clothes—that is the problem.

There are several methods of dealing with them. One school gives everything away, practicing charity with one hand and expediency with the other. Another wing advocates selling to the Old Clothes Man, and that individual is sent for and bargained with—two suits, a frock, three blouses and a skirt yielding about $3.85. Another group runs a practiced eye over the antiquated collection, rolls up its sleeves and evolves something new from something old, a process known as "making over." For these last named the accompanying sketches are suggestions for the use of old coat suits, dresses and blouses, and can be fashioned with any good basic pattern. They are chosen from new French models, and there are no seams beyond the requirements of the original model.

girdle which ties in a small bow or buttons in the back. Buttons also may be used on the front, one in each upper corner of the bib. Lengthwise inverted tucks may be put in the belt under the arms and extend a couple of inches into the bib if a casual wrinkled effect across the front is needed. For the worn-out long sleeves remove the old cuff, slit the sleeve to the elbow, cutting out the worn spot, and edge all the way up with double bias fold of the silk crepe, about an inch wide, thus making one of the new open, wide sleeves. Add a small round collar, also of the crepe.

For B about one-third to one-half yard of new material is required. Of this make front and back panels, having edges picoted. Fasten the front and back together with a small belt which buckles or buttons at each side of the front panel. Cut off the sleeves above the elbow and add a wide finish, made of two bias pieces cut from the lower part of old sleeve.

This is picoted around the edge, hemstitched onto the sleeve, left open at the elbow and caught together on the inside, and makes a wide, loose cuff effect. Make a bateau neck line, cutting away the Georgette of the blouse, press the blouse, put it on, and let your friends guess where you bought it.

To make a dress out of an old cloth suit requires dressmaking surgery of a little more skillful sort, yet the models shown in C, E, J and K are really quite easy for the woman who sews at home. The trick in C lies in the inverted plaits, which are set in from shoulder to hem and effectually take care of the dart in the front of the jacket, which is so bothersome.

Inverted Plaits First Aids

THESE plaits may be of the same material as the suit in matching or contrasting color, or of silk—gray or chambray is especially attractive if the suit is black or navy blue. The plaits may be repeated in the back if desired. In making a back entirely of the suit material—and this method can nearly always be followed in turning a suit into a dress—make a center panel in the waist by straightening the center back of the coat if it is curved, then cutting new underarm pieces, piecing them alike on each side of the waist, if piecing is necessary. If the coat is a rather long one these new underarm pieces can usually be cut from the old without piecing. The center panel should be sewed in place in the same way that the skirt of E is joined to the waist. At the low waistline use a fancy metal girdle to cover the place where waist and skirt are seamed together, and on the old sleeves put wide cuffs of the same material as that used for the plaits.

A suit with a box coat that is no longer fit for society can be made so by converting it into the coat dress shown in sketch E. The long-waisted effect is the chief ambition of this frock, and it is accomplished by putting the skirt and coat together at the hip line. To make this a good tailoring job, fold the edge under about a quarter of an inch at the top of the skirt, and then lay it up just above the edge of the waist, stitching down very close and firm. The coat will probably be full enough to bring over to one side for a double-breasted effect, whether the original suit was double-breasted or not. A narrow tailored cloth belt, or a metal one, around the bloused waist, buttons for trimming, and cut-off sleeves, if preferred, will finish the dress.

For the tailored frock shown in J an old suit with narrow skirt can be used. Slit the skirt up the sides to the hip line, giving the apron effect in front and back. Lap the front apron over the back three or four inches if material is plentiful; otherwise have the two aprons just meet. A silk skirt made from an old dress can be used under these aprons; either black or a contrasting color would be good. For the upper part use two panels in front, taken out of the old coat, and make the back as in sketch C. Run one wide or several narrow rows of flat silk braid in front and across the neck at back, around the belt and the front apron, and finish off the old narrow sleeves with a wide cuff edged with braid.

If you have some old suit material badly cut up, the model K can be followed for a very effective street dress, as the bandings of soutache braid make many piecings possible in both waist and skirt. This dress is worn over a black silk slip with fancy girdle. The coat sleeves are given a wider cuff effect, as in A.

For making over an old evening gown or afternoon dress

(Continued on Page 102)

Can you detect the difference? One of the above is hand-made and the other is a "B. B." Valenciennes reproduction.

Which Is Which?

The beauty and enchantment of hand-made lace are both to be found in

"B. B." Laces

But hand-made laces require extreme care in handling and in cleansing, while with no more than ordinary care all "B. B." Laces are guaranteed to wash and wear to your entire satisfaction.

"B. B." Laces will normally outwear the material or garment on which they are used.

You will find this quality-mark on every twelve yards of Genuine "B. B." Laces—sold by all high-class retail stores. "B. B." Laces are also found on high-grade lingerie in ready-to-wear departments and specialty shops.

Berkin & Company
73 Fifth Avenue - New York, N. Y.

Annual Sale
McCutcheon's
Household Linens

Special Price Reductions for January only

Send for Catalog

ONCE a year since 1893 "The Linen Store" has held a special reduced-price sale of Household Linens and White Goods. It is McCutcheon's January Sale—the big Linen event of the year, eagerly awaited by housewives all over the country.

For this occasion we have prepared a new catalog—a catalog that brings this Special Sale to you, whether you live in New York or San Francisco. You turn over the pages, make your selection, and mail your order to us. It receives the most careful personal attention. In fact it's just as though you yourself were shopping in our store.

For the home—there are Damask Table Cloths, dainty Luncheon Sets, Towels, Linen and Cotton Sheets, and fluffy, warm Blankets.

For the individual—Handkerchiefs of all sizes and styles, Lingerie irresistibly alluring, Children's and Young Girls' Dresses, Imported Dress Cottons, Sweaters, with Hats and Scarfs to match—all distinctive and very wearable.

These lovely things are illustrated and priced in our new catalog—priced decidedly lower than even the low prices at which we have been selling all year.

Write today for this new Catalog No. 56
Take advantage of McCutcheon's
January Sale NOW

James McCutcheon & Co.
345 Fifth Ave.
New York

The Clothes We Like to Wear from Eight to Fourteen

NOT so many years ago small daughter considered the donning of her winter coat a hateful ordeal to be postponed as long as the Fates, and mother, could be propitiated. And little wonder, when that coat was made of material so heavy and stiff it dragged on her shoulders and half submerged her in its boxlike depths. More fortunate is the growing girl of to-day, whose topcoat of duvetyn, velours, or one of the soft twilled materials has lines as graceful and becoming as those of her daintiest frock.

Sketched above is an excellent example of the modern coat, effective in any of the fabrics mentioned and good-looking also in black velvet, with self-covered buttons and a lining of old-blue crêpe de Chine. Both practical and smart for school wear or "best" is the suit of navy tricotine, with collar faced in red, sketched at the right. Other materials would be equally attractive; wool homespun, tweed, velours de laine, duvetyn and gabardine suggest themselves, and, for more formal wear, black velvet or corduroy, faced with broadcloth. The coat may be lined with foulard, flowered in the same shade as the collar facing, or with self-toned crêpe de Chine.

The child who spends her winter school hours in a sleeveless serge dress and a washable guimpe will look spick and span each morning and not grow too warm in the steam-heated classroom. The sleeveless dress of navy serge at the extreme left has a deep hem of plaid material and may be worn with a narrow patent-leather belt. One does feel particularly well dressed, there is no denying the fact, in a Russian blouse of black velvet with cuffs and crushed collar of squirrel. If one has a squirrel muff and toque to match, so much the better. The blouse may be worn with a black velvet skirt, as in the sketch; or, for more utilitarian purposes, with collar and cuffs of velvet instead of fur, it is very good-looking with a skirt of plaid wool. This pattern, like all the others for the clothes on this page, comes in sizes 8 to 14.

Patterns may be secured from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City. Dresses, 35 cents; Coats, 35 cents; Blouses or Skirts, 30 cents; Children's Patterns, 25 cents.

Shall They Suffer

As you did from film on teeth?

PEPSODENT is largely for the coming generation. It brings to adults whiter teeth, new protection. But to children it means a new dental era.

Your teeth, perhaps, have always been film-coated, save right after dental cleaning. The luster has been dimmed by film. Film has caused decay, no doubt, despite your daily brushing.

Now dental authorities urge you to fight film. Above all, have your children fight it daily in this scientific way.

How troubles come

Modern science traces most tooth troubles to a film—to that viscous film you feel. It clings to teeth, enters crevices, and stays.

If not removed it forms a constant danger. Millions of teeth are made dingy by it and millions of teeth are ruined.

Night and day that clinging film threatens damage to the teeth. So able men have long been seeking a daily film remover.

Makes teeth dingy

Film absorbs stains, making the teeth look dingy. Film is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Germs breed by millions in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of many troubles, local and internal.

Dental science has for years been seeking a way to daily combat that film. It is the teeth's great enemy.

Two ways now found

Two effective film combatants have been found. Able authorities have subjected them to many careful tests. Dental science now approves them, and leading dentists, here and abroad, urge their daily use.

A new-day tooth paste has been perfected, complying with modern requirements. It is called Pepsodent. And these two film-combating methods are embodied in it.

Also starch deposits

Starch deposits also attack teeth. In fermenting they form acids.

Nature puts a starch digestant in the saliva. It puts alkalis there to neutralize the acids.

Pepsodent multiplies that starch digestant, also the alkalinity. Thus Nature's teeth-protecting forces are multiplied.

Thus twice a day, in all these ways, Pepsodent combats the enemies of teeth.

Millions of people now use Pepsodent, largely by dental advice. Anyone who once employs it can see and feel its need.

Watch the added beauty

Send the coupon for a ten-day test. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

The lasting benefits appear more slowly. But all who love clean, glistening teeth will see effects at once. And the book we send explains the reasons for them.

The glistening teeth you see everywhere now are largely due to Pepsodent. Learn how you can attain them. Cut out the coupon now.

Pepsodent PAT. OFF.
REG. U.S.

The New-Day Dentifrice

The scientific film combatant, approved by modern authorities and now advised by leading dentists everywhere. Each use brings five desired effects. All druggists supply the large tubes.

TEN-DAY TUBE FREE 764

THE PEPSODENT COMPANY

Dept. 398, 1104 S. Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill.

Mail Ten-Day Tube of Pepsodent to

ONLY ONE TUBE TO A FAMILY

You've got to know more than your mother

MOTHER used to look on gasoline as something to clean gloves with—and kerosene as something that smoked up lamp chimneys.

Today you ride around in automobiles run by gasoline, and cook your Thanksgiving turkey in the oven of an oil cook stove.

These are days of progress, and things that were once unbelievable are perfectly understood today. We tell you that the Florence Oil Cook Stove burns like a gas stove with a blue flame that turns on and off—high or low—and you believe it.

Then you are interested and want to see the stove.

The Florence Oil Cook Stove is the best-looking oil cook stove made and is a modern convenience.

It means more heat, less care.

Its wickless burner turns the oil into gas—and a blue gas flame never smokes.

Kerosene is the cheapest fuel you can use.

The Florence Oil Cook Stove saves enough expense on wash days, ironing days, baking days, and in the preserving season to pay for itself in a short time.

At any store where the Florence is for sale there is one filled with oil, and you can see it work. Light it yourself and see what a convenience and help it will be in your home.

More Heat
Less Care

Note how the heat reaches up and is directed close up under the cooking by the powerful burner.

Write for Free Illustrated Booklet

CENTRAL OIL & GAS STOVE CO.

385 School Street, Gardner, Mass.

Makers of Florence Oil Cook Stoves (1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 burners),
Florence Portable Baking Ovens, Florence Tank
Water Heaters, Florence Oil Heaters

Made and Sold in Canada by McClary's, London, Canada

FLORENCE OIL COOK STOVES

3374

3381

3355

And Now the Costume Blouse

PARIS introduced the costume blouse at the fall fashion openings, intending it primarily for wear with the seven-eighths jackets of the new suits. Its possibilities, however, have proved almost limitless. An old suit, for instance, is quite transformed by a costume blouse of crêpe de Chine in a contrasting color. If the jacket is long, the blouse is a fraction shorter, and when the coat is removed the effect is that of a dress; if the jacket is short, a topcoat is worn over the blouse. Then there is in every wardrobe an out-of-style satin or crêpe de Chine, which can be used for the foundation slip sketched above, if one has no suit skirt. The smart blouse at the top of the page with its wide sleeves and bateau neck-line is excellent for crêpe or chiffon, while the other blouse is well adapted to make-over purposes, since the skirt is split up sides, sleeves are pieced and blouse can be cut in two parts and joined under arms. Sleeves are open down top and velvet disks used for trimmings are pasted to material. Various material and color combinations may be worked out: Plain chiffon over a foulard foundation, figured chiffon over satin or crêpe de Chine, and any of the crêpes over serge, tricotine or satin.

Patterns may be secured from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City. Dresses, 35 cents; Coats, 35 cents; Blouses or Skirts, 30 cents; Children's Patterns, 25 cents; Lingerie, 25 cents.

Pompeian Night Cream

The Cold Cream for Beauty

Beauty's Reward

His eyes rest tenderly upon her lovely, glowing beauty. Upon her dainty finger he slips the crowning jewel of her happiness—the sparkling solitaire that proclaims his love. Such is the reward of beauty. And she holds the secret of lasting youth and girlish loveliness.

For every night before retiring she uses Pompeian NIGHT Cream (the cold cream for beauty). It brings while she sleeps the beauty of a soft, youthful skin.

Just try this simple treatment every night before retiring: First, coat your face thickly with Pompeian NIGHT Cream, patting it gently into the pores. Then, with a soft cloth remove the surplus cream, which will bring with it all the day's dust and grit.

Next, wring out a cloth or towel in warm water and lay it on the face. Pat it gently—do not rub. Now, rinse the face in cool—not cold—water. Dry without rubbing.

Then again apply Pompeian NIGHT Cream (the cold cream for beauty), and leave it on the skin to "youthify" you through the night. It brings beauty while you sleep.

Pompeian NIGHT Cream is for sale at all druggists' at 50c and $1.00 a jar.

GUARANTEE

The name Pompeian on any package is your guarantee of quality and safety. Should you not be completely satisfied, the purchase price will be gladly refunded by The Pompeian Co., at Cleveland, Ohio.

"Its fragrance brings you instant charm."

"Brings Beauty While You Sleep"

Get 1922 Panel—Five Samples Sent With It

"Honeymooning in Venice." What romance! The golden moonlit balcony! The blue lagoon! The swift-gliding gondolas! The serenading gondoliers! Tinkling mandolins! The sighing winds of evening! Ah, the memories of a thousand Venetian years! Such is the story revealed in the new 1922 Pompeian panel. Size 28 x 7 1/4 inches. In beautiful colors. Sent for only 10c. This is the most beautiful and expensive panel we have ever offered. Art store value 50c to $1. Money gladly refunded if not wholly satisfactory. With each order for an Art Panel we will send samples of Pompeian BEAUTY Powder, DAY Cream (vanishing), BLOOM, NIGHT Cream (an improved cold cream), and Pompeian FRAGRANCE (a talc). With these samples you can make many interesting beauty experiments. Please tear off coupon now and enclose a dime.

THE POMPEIAN COMPANY, 2001 Payne Avenue, Cleveland, Ohio
Also Made in Canada

TEAR OFF NOW

To mail or to put in queue as shopping-reminder

THE POMPEIAN COMPANY
2001 Payne Avenue, Cleveland, O.
Gentlemen: I enclose 10c. (a dime preferred) for 1922 Art Panel. Also please send five samples named in offer.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____

State _____

Natural shade powder sent unless you write another shade.

THIS is the Fuller Handy Brush—lots of folks call it the most useful little helper in the home. It cleans vegetables, or meat or fish, or pots and pans; it sprinkles clothes, and fills a dozen other needs.

The Fuller Man gives this brush when he calls at your home. This is his way of making people familiar with the Fuller Trade-Mark and the Red Tip Tag which are found only on genuine Fuller Brushes. He just asks in return that it be used, in order to show how handy and helpful Fuller Brushes are. The Fuller Man also gives many useful tips on short-cuts in housekeeping—for that is his business. He shows many novel ways to use the 45 Fuller Brushes. He points out why Fuller quality and service are economical.

The Fuller Man is always welcomed because he brings this real service to the home, and because we have picked men who are courteous. He is a man whom one need never hesitate to admit. You will know him by his Fuller Trade-Mark button.

Fuller Brushes are never sold in stores. When the Fuller Man gives this Free Handy Brush he brings the only opportunity to learn the best methods of making daily tasks easier by the aid of proper brushes.

Write us for "The Handy Brush Book"—it's free.

The Fuller Brush Company
Hartford, Connecticut

Fuller Brush Company, Limited
Hamilton, Canada

Branch Offices in over 150 cities—consult telephone directory

FULLER BRUSHES

69 USES—HEAD TO FOOT—CELLAR TO ATTIC

Paris Points the Way to January Bargains

(Continued from Page 56)

This cut-in-one-piece navy serge at the right may be fringed to the depth of an inch, or wool ' fringe may be used with a neckband and belt of rust-colored duvetyne. Pattern in sizes 4 to 12.

Perfect poise from six years to fourteen is insured by the cut-in-one-piece serge frock at the left. Rows of soutache black or alternately red and blue are a feature, with serge belt and black grosgrain tie.

good for blouses and dresses; but more and more garments are growing shiny. You are quite safe in buying the lustrous satins that are being thrown on the bargain counters so cheaply. They will be the fashion of day after to-morrow.

For evening and even late afternoon a softly brocaded material has no rivals, even supplanting the embroidered effects, so ever popular in France. Crêpe de Chine and velvet are an excellent combination, the former for the draped dress and the heavier material for the ever-present detachable cape.

Callot has a one-piece dress in that awfully popular brocade. It is in light blue and silver, and it puckers up into a fastening at the waistline on the left, the puckers spreading like an open fan over the corsage and skirt. It is for evening, but one American woman I know has it in black crêpe for daytime, and it is very chic. This and a low-belted, baggy waist over a narrow, slinky skirt, and with big chiffon sleeves, constitute the principal silhouettes of the day.

Renée has a model belted somewhere in the general neighborhood of the knees. Wide belts are very smart in braided leather, like dog's ruffs. For Palm Beach—and therefore for next summer—white ribbed velvet is good, and long jumpers, embroidered where they turn back, over pleated skirts. Hats match belts and are bell or panama in shape.

As to color, one may indulge in any latent savagery of sense, for it can be vented through sleeves of contrasting hue. The woman of the fashion capital is straying a little into bleu de nègre and fuchsias, but cautiously. For she has learned that when she wears black she always registers as smart.

Economy in Paris is not confined to the thrifty Frenchwoman. The other day I heard Monsieur Jean Worth advising Mrs. Harry Lehr of New York and Newport what to order for the Riviera. "Three white velvet gowns and one in fuchsia—" He never finished his sentence, for her husband exclaimed: "No, no; she can't afford it—she will sit on cane-bottomed chairs, and they leave the mark of the waffle iron." Nothing, however, is so elegant for this and every other winter.

The smartest French houses, as a matter of fact, arrange for you to be able to dress economically. When I entered the door of Monsieur Rodier's the last time, he said: "Callot made your frock." He could see only a V-shaped cut of it under the rolling fur of the coat collar. But he recognized the shade of dark blue. It is dedicated to her, and a good many seasons have passed since any variation of it has been allowed to enter her establishment. If you say "dark blue," whether you have in mind a material in shiny satin or dull crêpe, in rough wool or smooth tricotine, the shade produced will be the same.

Callot has probably more rich clients than any other establishment in the world. They come from South America, from South Africa and as far east as Japan.

And she keeps the same shade of dark blue for them from one year to another, so that they can not only "scramble their clothes" of several seasons, as a smiling young thing put it, but they can wear in a single toilette garments that have been bought over a period of years.

The other day Callot Sœurs still further helped me to answer the question how the rich dress—and by telephone. One of their very chic customers, a French lady of distinction, the wife of a man whose income ran into not less than two hundred thousand dollars a year, had just gone into mourning, and they were only then finishing her fall wardrobe, which she wished to sell at a great reduction. Her measurements were almost identical with mine. Shouldn't I like to come and look at some of her lovely things? Before I could get there the evening things were gone, but in the brocaded dressing room lay the wardrobe which was to get her through from early morn until sunset—and what did it consist of?

There were three costumes complete, and they were all off the same piece of cloth! This was so that the cape of one could be transferred to the dress of another, or the cape of one even requisitioned to button on as an ornament to the coat of another, thus providing in a very economical manner for the newest, most futile style of the day. Of course, only a soft dark wool could serve as the self-effacing background for such a performance.

Since Paris clothes are always smart for several seasons, and January sales are annual events in America, you have but to buy with these outstanding features in mind and your bargains will be bargains in the truest sense of the word.

Yours very sincerely,

May Burch Williams

How would you like to be still more Charming?

"MY DEAR," said a very wise mother to her daughter, "there is something very important I want to tell you about—I wish I could talk to every girl just before she dresses for such occasions as a dinner party, a dance, the theatre, or other crowded gathering.

"A girl's great asset in life is her daintiness and feminine charm; and, for whatever occasion she dresses, she does everything in her power to preserve and enhance them.

"When preparing her toilette, she takes infinite pains with her gown, her hair, her hands, and the many other little touches that mean so much—for, after all, the thing that counts most is her fascinating attractiveness.

"And yet after she has taken such pains to make a perfect toilette, how often, as the evening wears on, and the inevitable odor of perspiration and the other body odors begin to assert themselves—how often the effect of this careful toilette is greatly impaired!

"She may not be conscious of it. But others notice it. If neglected, it affects her whole life most unfortunately. She has fewer intimate friends, she receives fewer invitations—yes, opportunities in business are fewer too.

"And there's no need of this. These odors can be entirely kept away by using 'Mum,' the great discovery of an eminent physician. 'Mum' takes all odor out of perspiration and all other body odors. All you have to do is to apply a little once a day and you have the comfortable assurance that you will be entirely free from all body odors the whole day and evening.

"There is not the slightest danger of injury or discomfort of any kind in using 'Mum.' It does not irritate the skin or even make it uncomfortable. You can use it as often as you like, even after using a depilatory. No after-cream is needed after 'Mum.'

"And there's nothing in 'Mum' to stain or injure your clothes, no matter how delicate they may be. You can put them on immediately after using 'Mum.'

"So 'Mum' is the word for every woman who wants to be sure that no body odors of any kind can embarrass her or prevent her from realizing the full effectiveness of her natural daintiness and charm."

"Mum" is the word

THE advice which this wise woman gives to her daughter is good advice for every girl or woman.

"Mum" is the real foundation of a woman's daintiness. And every woman will be more charming for using "Mum."

With each jar of "Mum" you will find a pamphlet which tells more about this delicate subject and explains why "Mum" is especially the friend of womankind.

This woman might also have told her daughter about a delightful talcum powder which is really a Perfume in Powder form. "Amoray" is its name—"Amoray," the distinctly feminine talc with the rich exotic fragrance that lasts all day.

Get these toilet helps at your drug- or department-store.

"Mum"—for all body odors—25c.

"Amoray"—the distinctive feminine talc—35c.

Special Offer to introduce "Amoray"—Send us 50c and your dealer's name. We'll send you both "Mum" and "Amoray" postpaid. Use the coupon.

Mum Mfg. Co.
1100 Chestnut St., Philadelphia

I enclose $_____ Please send me the articles checked below:

☐ "Mum" 25c ☐ "Amoray" 35c

☐ Special Offer "Mum" and "Amoray" 50c

Name _____

Address _____

City _____

Dealer's Name _____

Dealer's Address _____

Patterns may be secured from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 16th Street, New York City. Dresses, 35 cents; Coats, 35 cents; Blouses or Skirts, 30 cents; Children's Patterns, 25 cents.

MUM MFG CO 1100 CHESTNUT ST PHILADELPHIA

Makers of "Mum," Amoray Talc (a powder perfume), Evans' Cucumber Jelly, Elderflower Eye Lotion

French Lingerie With Directions for Making

By RUTH SILL

EVERY woman owes it to herself, her family and the rest of us to look as well as possible always. For a woman to be well dressed she must know her type and discriminatingly choose clothes and decorations to make the most of that type. She should think of herself as a unit. She should examine that unit with a very critical eye, know the good, bad and indifferent points, and select clothes to emphasize the best and to conceal the worst.

For example, the well-dressed woman buys her hats not only to fit her head, but to be an attractive top to her unit. She buys her shoes not only to fit her feet, but to be an attractive base for her unit. She keeps in mind simplicity and appropriateness.

To be truly well dressed she must select her lingerie with keen discrimination, too, for top garments fit well or ill according to the underpinnings. The long straight silhouette being the popular mode in clothes, lingerie, too, is straight, soft and flat. Some women adopt the chemise and knickers, wearing the chemise under the corset, while others prefer a soft shirt under the corset and a combination on top. All wear a soft straight slip of silk or cotton hanging from the shoulders under the straight dress.

To make straight, soft and flat lingerie one needs soft materials, like nainsook, batiste, handkerchief linen, crêpe de Chine, silk Jersey, washable silks and satins. Quaintly patterned dimities, checked or striped dimities in white, pink, blue, yellow or lavender, and plain or delicately flowered voiles also make attractive lingerie, and offer an interesting use for discarded frocks or left-over materials. One thing, though, must be borne in mind in connection with such festive lingerie—it cannot be worn under transparent waists. Cotton crêpe is sometimes desirable, when laundry is a problem, because it can be washed and need not be ironed. But for plain, honest-to-goodness everyday wear, select a good quality of nainsook—a piece closely woven with lengthwise and crosswise threads of about the same weight. This will stand many tubbings and always come out fresh.

Testing the Pattern

THE trimmings of course must harmonize with the material. Attractive lingerie, like attractive top clothes, is made of fine material, well sewed, and needs little decoration. If you are a novice, look over the designs and workmanship of an artist and then make your plans. Always plan a garment before beginning work, and remember that it is not necessary to put all your ideas into the first garment—simplicity again.

Let's consider first the step-in combination. The home dressmaker has an excellent opportunity with this, for with a pattern, used intelligently, the results are certain to be gratifying.

Combination patterns are bought according to bust measurements; therefore, have your bust measure taken accurately, and after buying your pattern, examine it carefully and be sure that you understand directions. Certain lines of the pattern must be placed on the straight of material, certain lines on the fold, and so forth. All are indicated on the pattern by marks, and an experienced person never takes liberties with these marks.

The envelope chemise at the left may be of nainsook, with yoke of wide insertion and edging of lace, or of all-white checked dimity, with the material used for the yoke and narrow ruffles. Pattern 16, 36, 40 and 44.

Soft white batiste with bias bindings of colored batiste makes the dainty step-in combination at the right. Very youthful is the rounded neck, which is gathered slightly by satin ribbon. The pattern is in sizes 16, 36, 40, 44.

In case you are not quite a perfect thirty-six it is wise to test the pattern. Take your own lengthwise measurement from the shoulder to the length desired for the finished combination, then test this measurement on the pattern, remembering whenever testing a personal measurement on a pattern to apply it carefully to that part of the pattern which would come over the part of the body measured. For example, you have taken your length measure from shoulder to knee, or any desired length. Test that measurement on the pattern as line A-B in the diagram on page 69. If the pattern be too long or too short make the alteration at the waistline on C on diagram. If too long, make a tuck so that line A-B will measure the desired length. If too short, cut through the pattern at the waistline at point marked C, and set in a piece of paper so that the line A-B will measure the desired length.

A commercial pattern is sometimes too wide on the shoulder. Test your pattern by holding it up to your person. If it seems to extend too far out make a little tuck at point D on the diagram in front and at the same point in the back.

Now your pattern is ready for action. The amount of material necessary is estimated on all patterns; so note the exact amount desired for your particular size and buy that amount. Thirty-six-inch material cuts to advantage. There are certain general rules for cutting all garments.

First, straighten your material by a thread. Some material may be torn, other material must be straightened by pulling the thread and cutting through the line so made.

Second, pull the material into shape. Straight material often appears uneven at the ends and may be straightened by pulling the corners diagonally until the ends are straight.

Third, place the pattern on the material in the most economical fashion, observing carefully the marks on the pattern.

Fourth, pin the pattern in place and trace the seam lines, the desired neck lines and the notches. Never cut out notches.

Fifth, cut out your garment, keeping the material flat on the table while cutting.

Sixth, mark the notches and the center front and center back with colored thread, as shown in the diagram on page 69.

The Felled Seam Best

TO PREPARE the combination for fitting, join the shoulder seams by placing the two right sides together, matching the notches, pinning the tracings exactly together, and basting on the tracing line. Join the underarm seams by placing the two right sides together, matching the notches, pinning the tracings from the notches to the armhole and from the notches to the bottom, then baste on the tracing line. These edges are bias; so, in order to avoid stretching, baste the seams flat on the table. To hold the neck line in place for fitting, run a basting thread around the neck. Now try the combination on, adjust the neck line to fit, take a general survey of the garment to see if the neck line is a becoming one, the seam lines in good places and the general hang of the garment satisfactory.

If alterations are necessary, fit the right side only. Remove the combination; make the corrections, such as changing the shoulder seam, and so forth, by pinning on the right side; open the corrected seams and fold the back and front exactly through the centers. Place the original tracings together and make the alterations on the left side. Now baste the garment on the corrected lines.

The felled seam is the most satisfactory finish for the seams of lingerie. To make a fell place the right sides together and stitch on the seam line. Then trim one side of the seam, usually the front, to less than one-eighth inch, and fold the wide side over the narrow until you have the desired width of

(Continued on Page 68)

Lacing Hooks
for boys' and girls' shoes—just about as natural and necessary as the lace itself! Quick and easy in every-day use, they are most convenient for mother or child.

Every dealer can secure footwear with the handy shoe hooks. Insist on having what you want!

LACING-HOOKS-FOR-MEN'S, WOMEN'S AND CHILDREN'S SHOES

How young will you be at fifty?

Had Your Iron Today?

Free We'll send 100 Luscious Raisin Recipes in a free book to anyone who mails coupon below, also new booklet, "Eating Raisins for Health and Beauty."

A Vital Attraction

that some women overlook

—the proper use of foods frequently determines youth or age. Note what a famous sanitarium prescribes

There's a reason for stewed raisins—a dainty breakfast dish—that transcends their unique attraction for the palate.

That reason is food-iron. Raisins are rich in it.

Food-iron is the basis of a rare vitality and magnetism that are woman's greatest charms.

Some women overlook these real attractions, thinking mainly of trim features and rosy lips and cheeks. Yet iron promotes true beauty, too, by producing natural color that cosmetics cannot imitate. There's no beauty that is so beautiful as the good looks of good health.

Not youth's sole rights

These attractions don't belong to youth alone. Women of forty-five and fifty may preserve them and enhance them. And certain foods—the "iron-foods" like raisins—are prime aids.

You need but a small bit of iron daily, yet that need is vital.

That dish of luscious stewed raisins enjoyed regularly each morning is a safeguard to proper iron supply.

At Battle Creek

Stewed raisins are part of "the treatment" in the famous sanitarium at Battle Creek for pale-cheeked, listless women who are old before their time.

Physicians thus attest the power of raisins as a regular breakfast dish. Take their advice and try it for yourself.

It's good food if you're well, to retain those vital powers and that natural beauty if you have them. Begin tomorrow to make a two weeks' test. If you feel under par or are a little pale, this dish may "re-make" you in just the way you wish.

SUN-MAID RAISINS

We make Sun-Maid Raisins from finest California table grapes—kinds too delicate to ship fresh long distances. The grapes are juicy, tender, thin-skinned, and so are the raisins. Try them stewed. There never was a daintier breakfast dish.

Seeded, blue package (seeds removed), best for pie and bread; Seedless, red package (grown without seeds), best for stewing; Clusters (on the stem)—a luscious, quick dessert. All dealers sell them. Insist on Sun-Maid brand.

Raisins are cheaper by 30% than formerly—see that you get plenty in your foods.

CALIFORNIA ASSOCIATED RAISIN CO.

Membership 13,000 Growers

Dept. A-101, Fresno, California

The Iron Food for Vitality

Stewed Raisins

Cover Sun-Maid Raisins with cold water and add a slice of lemon or orange. Place on fire, bring to a boil and allow to simmer for one hour. Sugar may be added, but is not necessary, as Sun-Maid Raisins contain 75% natural fruit sugar.

Red package, Seedless Raisins, best for stewing.

100 Recipes Sent Free

We've compiled 100 tested recipes in a valuable free book which we'll send to any woman on request. They suggest the most attractive ways to serve these fine fruit-meats. Simply mail the coupon and get them by first mail.

CUT THIS OUT AND SEND IT

California Associated Raisin Co.
Dept. A-101, Fresno, Calif.

Please send me copy of your free book, "Sun-Maid Recipes," and new book, "Eating Raisins for Health and Beauty."

Name _____

Street _____

City _____ State _____

SUN-MAID RAISINS

for your Complexion's sake This winter

let me suggest that you try Hinds Honey and Almond Cream. Of course there are lots of good creams, but for some reason Hinds Cream seems to keep the skin so naturally soft all the time that it won't roughen or chap in the least. Then it is so cleansing and refining, so invigorating and refreshing, that you feel sure of yourself on the street or indoors at evening affairs. Everybody in our house uses Hinds Cream. You can buy it everywhere. Ask Mr. Hinds to send you a little sample for 2c. or a trial bottle for 10c.

A. S. HINDS
Dept. 38
Portland
Maine

Our dainty
WEEK-END BOX of Six Toilet Requisites: 3 kinds of Cream,
Soap, Talc, Face
Powder, 50c.
Postpaid

French Lingerie With Directions for Making

(Continued from Page 66)

the fell (usually a generous one-eighth inch), trimming the raw edge if necessary, so that it will not touch the line of stitching already made. Now baste flat to the cloth beneath and hem or stitch into place.

A French seam is sometimes used on the long seams. It is made by placing the two wrong sides of the material together, basting on seam line, and then stitching one-eighth inch outside of the seam line. Now trim both edges to less than one-eighth inch, crease the seam open sharply and fold with the two right sides together so that the seam just made will come exactly on the top edge. Baste close to the edge to hold the material in place and stitch on the seam line.

If tucks are to be used to hold the fullness in place at the neck, work from the center line outward on each side. Of course the two sides of the front and the two sides of the back must be alike; therefore fold the front or the back on the center line, with the top edges exactly together, and crease crosswise the desired depth for the tucks. Put a basting through this crease, too, so that the line will not in any way be lost.

To Whip in Tucks is Easiest

TUCKS must be perfectly straight with the threads of the material. Always use a card measure to get the correct line for the tuck, and always measure from the sewing of the last tuck and prick where the next tuck is to come, creasing on the line of pricks, as shown in the diagram on page 69. You will find it easiest to whip the tucks in place.

Tucking may be most decorative and add much to the beauty of a garment, or it may be just a means of holding in the fullness. When fitting the garment notice the amount of material that can be used up in tucks. Then plan to use that amount, so that your tucking may do its part towards making a well-balanced and interesting garment.

Bias Bindings

BIAS bindings are used successfully to trim tops and bottoms of combinations. These bindings must be cut accurately on a true bias to give the smooth binding. A true bias is the line made by folding a lengthwise straight of material on a crosswise straight. Be perfectly sure that the lengthwise and crosswise threads are parallel. Then measure out from the fold the desired width of the binding, mark and cut. All cuts must be parallel to the first fold. To join the bias pieces, have the ends of the strips straight with the thread of the material. Place the two right sides together, the straight ends together, the bias sides forming right angles. The line of sewing must follow the thread of the material and starts and finishes at the intersection of the bias edges. The binding is cut twice the width desired when it is finished, plus the seams. Place the right side of the binding to the right side of the garment, baste and stitch the desired width of the seam, crease the seam sharply on to facing, turn in the remaining raw edge the width of the seam allowed, fold over to the wrong side and baste so that the folded edge just covers the first line of the sewing, and hem into place.

For its tailored appearance, so welcome to the business woman, the nainsook combination sketched above must give credit to the bias strips binding its neck and the pearl buttons down front. Pattern comes in small, medium and large sizes.

For very sheer material you may get the same effect on the straight edge by making a tuck on the wrong side of the garment. For instance, if one-quarter-inch binding is desired measure from the raw edge one inch and crease, run in one-quarter-inch tuck, crease sharply down and fold the raw edge toward the right side of garment one-quarter inch; then crease the folded edge up to the stitching of the tuck and hem into place. This is often done for the shoulder straps on fine materials.

To make a scalloped or pointed finish for lingerie a facing is basted along the edge of the garment, right side to right side, and the design is traced onto the facing as in diagram. After stitching around scallops, trim closely, turn right side out and crease sharply. Raw edge at top of facing may be turned in straight or scalloped. When applying bias bindings, be sure to place right side of binding to right side of garment.

Another attractive finish is to shape the edge of the garment into scallops, points, and so forth. This is done by means of a facing. Make an accurate pattern of the design, then place the right side of the facing to the right side of the garment, baste in place and transfer the pattern on to the garment, as shown in the diagram. Stitch on this shaped line and trim, leaving a narrow seam; turn right side out and crease the seam sharply, then crease the facing on the wrong side. Baste in order to hold the seam exactly on the top, and either shape the remaining edge like the first edge or make this line straight. It is held in place by plain hemming or some embroidery stitch, such as scalloping, chain stitching or feather stitching. Sometimes the bottom of the combination is finished with a binding or facing, while the top is daintily trimmed with lace and entre-deux.

In choosing trimmings be sure your selection harmonizes in texture with the top of the garment, in addition to being an attractive trimming. The French lingerie shown here offers all kinds of interesting suggestions.

When ribbon is used to draw up the neck, it may be run through a narrow casing, held by a row of hemstitching about half an inch below the top of the garment; or, over a band of lace or insertion, folds of batiste or footing may serve as ribbon carriers. To make the batiste folds, cut from the lengthwise straight of the material twice the desired finished width, plus a scant quarter inch for making.

Casings for Ribbon

TURN in one-eighth inch at end, crease down center and press or baste to hold smooth, then place the raw edges of the fold and the edge of the lace together and whip securely. Footing may be used instead of batiste, in which case narrow lace must be sewed on top of the fold or a line of stitching run a little below the top, to keep the footing from stretching out of shape. When a broad, straight band finishes the top of a chemise or camisole, the garment will fall in better lines and be more attractive if ribbon is run through two casings, one at the top and one at the bottom of the band. Double-faced satin wash ribbon, in white or the pastel shades of pink, blue, orchid or lavender, is daintiest and in best taste.

When tucks are used to hold the fullness in place below the neck, a card measure will assure their being in correct lines. Always measure from the sewing of the last tuck and prick, creasing on the line of pricks as shown in the diagram above.

Accuracy in Preliminaries

REMEMBER when making any garment, from a chemise to the most elaborate gown, one always works in exactly the same way, carefully planning the entire garment, carefully cutting, carefully marking and making. Accuracy in preliminary fittings is well worth while, for in this way only can one be sure that the effect of the finished garment will be just what is desired. Special care should be taken, both in choosing a pattern and in adapting it to one's personal requirements, to obtain a becoming neck line, for an ugly or unbecoming line about the neck may spoil an otherwise charming bit of lingerie.

The finest, daintiest and prettiest lingerie is, of course, made by hand. A French woman would be horrified at the idea of sewing her undergarments on a machine; but sometimes this is necessary, and saving in time and strength more than offsets any loss of charm.

There is one thing to bear in mind, however—a plain piece of lingerie, without elaboration of cut or trimming, is smarter and more distinctive than a be-decorated, machine-wrought affair.

Nothing could be more simply made than this very attractive nightgown. In a width of dimity or nainsook twice one's length, a square hole is cut for the neck, tucks hold the fullness back and front, the sides are sewed up, leaving wide armholes to be finished with lace or folds. The pattern is in sizes 16, 36, 40, 44 and 48.

Patterns may be purchased from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City. Dresses, 35 cents; Coats, 35 cents; Blouses or Skirts, 30 cents; Children's Patterns, 25 cents; Lingerie, 25 cents.

When Jill came tumbling down the hill,
And Jack dropped down upon his head,
He asked her, "Do you mind the spill?"
"I'm feeling quite upset," she said.
"But still I know I am secure,
My dress is fastened safe and strong,
My footing may not be too sure—
My hooks and eyes are all De Long."

Adapted from an old De Long advertisement

How do you fasten your children's clothes?

DE LONG Hooks and Eyes are ideal fasteners in places where there is particularly great strain on the clothes. Especially on children's garments are they good, for they will not discolor the cloth or rust through repeated washings.

For most fastenings, however, De Long Snaps are the best and most convenient. They lie flat under the sheerest materials. The covered springs grip tightly, yet release instantly at the proper touch. The clasps cannot be sewn on wrong, for either side up is right. Rust? Never!!

For thirty years women have bought De Long Hooks and Eyes and found in them all the qualities needed. And now De Long Snaps are supplementing De Long Hooks and Eyes in places where snaps are better.

All De Long fasteners—Hooks and Eyes, Snaps, Safety Pins, Toilet Pins, Hair Pins—are made with little refinements that make enough difference in use and wear to lift them above the ordinary.

Look at the illustrations on the left. Whenever you buy any of these, take the time to get De Long. They are sold on a blue card with a red circle and the famous old trademark, "See that hump?"

DE LONG HOOK & EYE COMPANY
St. Marys, Canada Philadelphia, U. S. A.

DE LONG SNAPS

See that hump?
De Long Snaps

Send 14 cents and your dealer's name and we will mail you our useful little Handy Kit which contains some Hooks and Eyes, Safety Pins, Toilet Pins, Hair Pins, Snaps and Klips.

Don't go to bed with "Acid-Mouth"

How to tell if you have "Acid-Mouth"

First, send for Litmus Test Papers and generous Trial Tube of Pebeco

Then moisten a blue Litmus Test Paper on your tongue. If it turns pink, that indicates an acid condition of the mouth. Brush your teeth with Pebeco and make another test. The paper will not change color, thus demonstrating how Pebeco helps to counteract "Acid-Mouth."

Fill out the coupon, enclose ten cents and mail to us now. The Litmus Test Papers and big Trial Tube of Pebeco will be mailed you at once.

During the long hours while you are asleep "Acid-Mouth" gets in its work on your teeth. "Acid-Mouth" is a condition that causes premature decay. One by one your teeth are sure to go unless you check this work of destruction.

Start at once to clean your teeth at night with Pebeco Tooth Paste. Do the same in the morning. Pebeco keeps the teeth clean and sound, and counteracts "Acid-Mouth."

LEHN & FINK, Inc.

635 Greenwich Street, New York

Makers of Lysol Disinfectant

Harold F. Ritchie & Co., Selling Agents for the United States and Canada
171 Madison Avenue, New York City 10 McCaul Street, Toronto

For sale by druggists everywhere

LEHN & FINK, INC.
635 Greenwich Street, New York

Enclosed find 10 cents, for which please send me your Litmus Test Papers and large Trial Tube of Pebeco.

Name _____

Street and No. _____

City or Town _____

State _____

The Jazz Path of Degradation

(Continued from Page 26)

by reason or religion. It is a dangerous and pernicious philosophy for unsettled youth and for grown-ups who have never thought out the problems of life. There may be infinite mischief done when supposed scientists and medical men promulgate the doctrine that is a denial of morality and an indorsement of laissez faire—do as you please because you can't do otherwise.

We can perhaps see how manners, social vices and fundamental ideas are connected and interrelated. We can see ground for criticism of mere frivolity and empty-headedness.

If there is only froth inside and nothing in the way of principle or serious aims we know that the field is at least prepared for a growth of noxious weeds.

Cynics and idlers and those who cry "On with the dance!" are next door to a diseased state, if not already in the clutches of mental and physical malady. Lack of faith in good things or in anything except the ephemeral is the chief token of the world's present sickness.

The first step toward health is belief. Let us believe that it is worth while to clean up, and tackle the job enthusiastically, armed with the trusty broom, the mop and eke the vacuum cleaner.

What if the neighbors are not interested and refuse to cooperate? There is an example in the case of Epictetus, a slave, who stood alone in the world of Roman corruption and decided upon a line of independent conduct, whereby his name yet lives in contrast to the forgotten line of tawdry, jazzy wearers of the imperial purple. History plays up quite a few notable bad women. But this has been explained on the ground that the historians were men, and in the future there will be women historians to make a more equitable selection.

It is indeed time to clean up and to throw out psychoanalysis along with the jazz and other rubbish.

A neurologist told me that he was asked by many idle, feverish women to analyze them and extract their complexes. He always refused. He knew of a case of a young girl who was analyzed, and the terrible picture, whether real or false, that was evoked from the depths of her unconscious self so preyed upon her mind that she committed suicide. Then there was a gifted young married woman, clever and almost brilliant. She was curious and had herself analyzed. Next she must needs persuade her husband to be mentally unraveled by the same expert. The upshot was the discovery that the couple were not ideally mated and could not live together.

A Wife's Complaint

THEY obeyed the dictum of the subconscious and are yet separated. It seems more sensible for people to get a divorce for good, old-fashioned reasons, like the wife throwing flatirons or the husband failing to provide. For there are no absolutely ideal marriages except during honeymoons and golden wedding celebrations and in stories and movies.

Speaking of marriage, a reader who lives in the Middle West writes to this office asking why husbands have gone downhill so after the war. There is a note of sincerity and of personal experience that is touching. "Our husbands, who before the war were respected and respectable citizens of the community," says the writer, "are now demoralized to the point where they have no sense of right and wrong, and their brains are so soggy that they cannot or will not keep themselves up to their former point of efficiency. Their finer sensibilities are so dulled and distorted that they are more pleased to do a willful hurt than a loving kindness. Many men who served overseas are in far better condition to-day than others who were stationed at army camps on this side, where they learned to 'jazz around' night after night in the many places provided for that most vicious form of entertainment.

"There are dozens of women of every class to-day nearing the forty-year mark—a period when they need the material assurances and the sympathetic understanding that would make those difficult next few years easier and more certain—who find themselves bereft of the companionship, loving support and also of the financial security to which they were accustomed and could reasonably expect as their due. Some can find no solution other than the divorce courts, and what a poor one that may be!

"It is a tremendous task for the trained woman even, to be forced to take over, say, a family of three children with frail financial support from a husband who gives grudgingly and because the court compels him to do so.

"The majority of women who have been married for ten or fifteen years are unfitted to make quick, satisfactory decisions and sudden, big readjustments. Lots of these women will 'go down' along with their falling men, through sheer physical fear and utter unpreparedness for this phase of the toll exacted by the Great War.

"Those who are able to weather the situation on the financial side are nevertheless shocked and ravaged quite as hopelessly as the victims of shell and gas."

Signs of Repentance

WHAT solution can we look for? What do the doctors of the human mind say to give encouragement to the women whose husbands know them not, or perhaps better, those wives who find themselves married to hostile strangers?

"Shall they look forward to an eventual righting of the wrong? Or is there no assurance that moral sanity and just reason and wholesome balance will be restored to these men? It would help many women to get adjusted if they could know whether they have taken over a life work now, since they are virtually widows.

"Is there a good prognosis for mental sickness of the sort that makes beasts and brutes out of superior and gentle men?"

This letter brings into relief a new aspect of dance dissipation and of general deterioration. If jazzing were an innocent and wholesome pastime it would still be a crime because of its injury to the home. How many married folk who dance are skulkers and deserters from their own firesides? If they do not neglect each other they are probably neglecting their children. It is a mania of selfish amusement. The idle female jazzer is a poor sort. Worse is the married male who side-steps his family obligations while practicing the newest movements with strange partners upon the waxed floor. He has "a right to his recreation," but he did not say that to the court-martial when he took French leave during the war. There were no apron strings on soldiers, yet every man was held responsible for conduct that undermined his health and efficiency.

It is quite proper that the writer quoted should mention the financial aspect. Dollars and cents are included in duty. Wicked extravagance and wastefulness belong to the jazz pastime. A husband who neglects his family to jazz is a defaulter as well as a deserter. He is wasting home time and money as well as his own resources, his strength and his character. All this is not yet written in the statute books, but it is equity and will some day prevail.

Will the errant husbands recover from their war dissipation and turn over a new leaf? The signs are hopeful and indicate a generally affirmative answer. There are economic forces that make for righteousness. The era of easy living and spending has already passed. A lot of gay Lotharios and their feminine counterparts are now studying the want columns of the newspapers. The prodigal husband is coming back home with sincere if inexpensive peace offerings, taking advantage of the bargain rates in candy. He no longer has important business engagements nights.

The lurid dance itself is going out under the stress of public opinion, municipal regulation and the enlightened selfishness of the organized dancing profession. The ban of the church has been added, though somewhat tardily, as exemplified by the action of the Episcopal denomination in and round Louisville.

Yet it would be a mistake to regard the immoral dance as totally routed and permanently abolished. It is a sensuous poison as insidious and as hard to eradicate as King Alcohol, who yet defies the United States Government and an army of enforcement officials. Dancing and wine drinking were scriptural pastimes. Whisky and jazz are modern inventions.

There is a beautiful lake that lies like a jewel in a multiple-curved setting of hills in an Eastern state. At night it is a fairy paradise under the stars and with the twinkling lights from castlelike dwellings that loom indistinctly on the edges of cliffs and at the points of jutting, forested promontories. Speedy fireflies of chugging refrain streak across the dark waters and disappear mysteriously in hidden coves. It is an ideal place to rest and to commune with the majesty and perfection of Nature.

Amid this paradise the traveler's vision is smitten with a blaze of light. It is a popular dance hall for the young folks who spend their summers at the lake. Three or four hundred of the best types of American youth, stalwart lads of bronzed skin and comely girls whose cheeks need no paint, are gathered for their nightly bout of social festivity. It is a pretty sight at some distance. Closer, you see that these men and women of to-morrow are jazzing, mostly rather innocently; only a few extreme postures and movements by certain couples. There can't be anything very much out of the way, what with abbreviated dance periods, plenitude of chaperons, and refreshments limited to ice cream and soft drinks.

Perhaps Darwin Was Wrong

BUT not far away there is a graduate school of the jazz in a fashionable hotel, where the lights burn until close to day-break. Here, appropriately in a gaudy cellar room, men and scantily clad women, with a sprinkling of precocious youth of both sexes, go the dance limit and the drink limit. Nothing is barred.

Satyr and faun perform antics that seem to interest only themselves. A young girl with a bandaged arm snatches up, as she juggles past a table, a glass of liquor and empties it at a gulp. The episode threatens trouble for a moment. Apparently the only crime remaining on the calendar or recognized here as such is the theft of liquor, although the air reeks with the odor of alcohol. The old-fashioned qualities known as modesty and the sense of shame are conspicuous for their total absence.

The people here are dressed in the conventional style of human beings of the prosperous class. Their behavior seems to prove that Darwin was wrong; we are not traveling up from but down to the simian race.

Nature's paradise on the lake was profaned, polluted and made utterly distasteful to any normal mind by these doings. Perhaps it may be all summed up, without recourse to moral code or physical hygiene, in the English critic's conception of manners. People of good manners respect Nature and themselves, enjoy beauty and are satisfied with wholesome things. The ill-mannered suffer from some kind of an internal kink.

Let's behave ourselves!

"I paid my bills by easy work at home"

"My husband was taken ill. The cost of living during the last few years had exhausted our savings. So, with his weekly income cut off, things were serious.

"I saw I must earn the money to buy our food and other necessities.

"But how? I knew nothing of stenography or business. Besides, my husband needed me at home, as we couldn't afford a nurse.

I read the Gearhart Plan

"In casting about for something I could do I turned to the advertising pages of a magazine.

"One of them carried an advertisement of the GEARHART STANDARD KNITTER.

"It told how, without even leaving the home, men and women of all ages could earn $1.50 a dozen pair knitting ALL-WEAR hosiery. You see, they offered to pay for all the ALLWEAR hose I knit, or I could sell them profitably to my neighbors, friends or to the stores. Besides, they replace free the amount of yarn used in the ALLWEAR socks sent them. And it said I could knit as much or as little as I chose.

"It seemed just the thing, particularly since no experience was necessary.

The Knitter arrived

"Anyway, I sent for one. With it came instructions how to use the Gearhart Knitter. They were easy to understand and I set the knitter up myself.

"The knitter came with a sock already started on it, and there was a lot of very fine yarn given free with it, too.

My problem was solved

"Not only was I able to earn enough money to keep things going, but when my husband was able to sit up he knit, too.

"And now, though he has gone back to his work, we are more comfortable than ever before because my knitting money buys lots of little things we need to make our lives happier."

Whether you have illness in your family, your income has been reduced or you just want little things you don't feel you can afford, you may earn all the extra money you need without leaving your home, with a Gearhart Standard Knitter. Use the Coupon.

Gearhart Knitting Machine Co., Inc.
Home Dept. D, Clearfield, Penna.

Gearhart Knitting Machine Co., Inc.
Home Dept. D,
Clearfield, Penna.

Please send me my copy of the free Profit Guide Book. Knitting samples and full particulars about making money at home with the Gearhart Standard Knitter.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

The Safe Course in Dental Hygiene

COLGATE'S RIBBON DENTAL CREAM

does these important things:

- 1 It cleans teeth safely and thoroughly.
- 2 It polishes the tooth surfaces, so that deposits are less likely to adhere to them.
- 3 It helps to maintain a normal, healthful degree of alkalinity in the mouth.

This fact also should be kept in mind: Colgate's contains nothing to injure the tooth structure, the gums, or the delicate mouth membranes.

It is not enough to know that the dentifrice you are using whitens your teeth. Be sure that it does them no injury, and that it does not cause dangerous conditions to develop in your mouth.

Chalk and Soap the Logical Tooth-Cleansing Combination

THE principal constituents of Colgate's Ribbon Dental Cream are fine precipitated calcium carbonate (chalk) and pure edible vegetable oil soap.

When the precipitated chalk is brought into action by the wet tooth-brush it loosens deposits upon the teeth.

At the same time, thorough washing is effected by the pure soap ingredient.

No débris is left to ferment in the mouth. Colgate's washes it out.

How Colgate's Promotes Normal Mouth Conditions

ACID is the chief immediate cause of tooth decay. Deposits that are permitted to remain upon the teeth become breeding places for bacteria, which generate lactic acid. This acid eats into the substance of the teeth, and decay is begun.

In addition to its effectiveness in loosening and washing out the deposits in which bacteria germinate, Colgate's Ribbon Dental Cream is mildly alkaline, due to the pure vegetable oil soap content.

Where a normal degree of alkalinity is maintained, acid is neutralized and bacterial activity suspended.

Since the alkalinity of Colgate's Ribbon Dental Cream corresponds to that of the normal, healthy mouth, it follows that the use of this superior dentifrice tends to prevent the development of disturbing or dangerous acid conditions.

Depend Upon Colgate's and Your Dentist

BRUSH your teeth twice a day with Colgate's Ribbon Dental Cream, and have them examined twice a year by your dentist. This is the safe, common-sense course for the prevention of tooth troubles.

Where it is difficult to get children to adopt the healthful habit of cleaning their teeth night and morning, start them with Colgate's. Its delicious flavor makes care of the teeth a treat, not a task.

Colgate's is recommended by more dentists than any other dentifrice.

GOOD TEETH - GOOD HEALTH

Human Nature in the Bible

(Continued from Page 16)

Then came the flies; it was unendurable; Pharaoh spoke to Moses, who abolished the plague; immediately the king was himself again. Then came a murrain, a pestilence which destroyed all the cattle; Pharaoh was interested sufficiently to make inquiries as to the extent of the disease; but he remained firm. Then came boils, which later were to try the patience of Job, but the king would not relent. Then there was a frightful storm, thunder and lightning and hail, which wrought untold damage to man, beast and crops. Pharaoh could not endure it, and he said quaintly: "I have sinned this time." The storm ceased, carrying Pharaoh's repentance with it. There came a fresh east wind, bringing numberless locusts, which ate up everything that the hail had spared, so that the farms looked as if recently visited by the army worm. Pharaoh had another attack of remorse; the west wind came and blew the accursed locusts into the Red Sea, so that there was not one left in the whole country.

A friend writes me: "I wonder do you know of the locust plague in Jerusalem, during the war? The locusts came 'out of a clear sky,' suddenly. They ate every vegetable thing except wood, stripping a tree to its bare twigs and branches within an hour. The government ordered everyone to bring in his peck or so of dead insects each day. The poor earned their living collecting the daily quota for others. Tin is the best offensive. The American colony's special technique was to 'shoo' the insects along converging, low, tin-walled canals into sunken gasoline tins. But this seemed like trying to empty the ocean with a medicine dropper. Finally, when no green thing is left, the plague passes on abruptly. And no one knows whither the locusts go, as no one knew whence they came."

They Borrowed Jewelry and Departed

THE plague of locusts was followed by Egyptian darkness, thick darkness for three days, so that no man could see and no man dared move. Pharaoh sent for Moses, and when the darkness was lifted and the pleasant light returned, he said bitterly to the man of God:

Get thee from me, take heed to thyself, see my face no more; for in that day thou seest my face thou shalt die.
And Moses said, Thou hast spoken well, I will see thy face again no more.

Then came the last terrible plague, the killing of the first-born in the night, and the first passover, when the Lord passed over the favored people—an event that is still annually and solemnly celebrated by millions.

There arose a great cry in Egypt; both the king and the people besought the aliens to depart. In the midst of this turmoil there is one touch of humor. The children of Israel "borrowed" of the Egyptians jewels of silver and jewels of gold, and raiment. They had been in Egypt four hundred and thirty years when the great exodus began; and then they were not allowed to take the short way to the Promised Land through the country of the Philistines, but were led southeast to the Red Sea. In front was the Pillar of Cloud by day and the Pillar of Fire by night.

Pharaoh ought to have been glad to see the last of them; but either he regretted his defeat or the loss of the borrowed jewels; he pursued them with chariots and horsemen; so the Israelites, who preferred life to honor, and slavery to death, bitterly attacked Moses and for the first time raised a protest that was to be heard more than once: "We were better off in Egypt."

But the Red Sea opened; the timid and querulous multitude passed through in safety. Then in the darkest hour before the dawn the waters returned and swallowed up the Egyptian host, soldiers, chariots and horsemen. And in the morning light the children of Israel saw the pleasantest sight their eyes had ever beheld:

"Israel saw the Egyptians dead upon the seashore."

I remember hearing Phillips Brooks preach a notable sermon on that text. We may have sorrows in the future; we may have enemies to-morrow; but there are difficulties, there are evils that we survive. They can never annoy us again. "Israel saw the Egyptians dead upon the seashore."

The immediate troubles of the Hebrews were over; the troubles of Moses began. He had more vexations with his own people than he had had with his avowed enemies. Human nature asserted itself in the wilderness. In spite of their great deliverance and the mighty evidences of God's favor and of the inspiration of Moses, the people were constantly discontented; they were always on the point of rebellion. The genius for complaining, which is inherently human, found almost daily expression; until the patience of Moses was exhausted.

Forty Years Under a Great Leader

THE shortest distance from Egypt to the Promised Land is considerably less than the distance from Philadelphia to New York. So far as miles were concerned, Canaan could have been reached in a week. But Israel was not fit to occupy Canaan or indeed any other country, as the behavior in the wilderness abundantly proved.

Furthermore, during these wanderings a complete system of laws, both moral and technical, became established; the health of the people was cared for by a definite set of hygienic regulations; the ritual for worship was proclaimed. The Israelites reached Canaan when, and not before, they were mentally and physically fit to settle there.

It was perhaps natural that in comparison with the privations and hardships of the wilderness, Egypt looked good; they saw it only in retrospect and, as is frequently the case, the difficulties of the past faded out of the picture, and they remembered only their homes and their regular meals, as indeed a free man will sometimes during a vacation spent in voluntary camping. They complained of the lack of food, so manna rained down from heaven. It covered the ground like a frost, was white to the eye and sweet to the taste. When the people complained of thirst and nearly mobbed Moses, he was divinely ordered to strike a rock, and pure water gushed out. These are some of the chief events that were recorded during the journey.

The laws established by Moses were fair and reasonable, and in all that concerned man's dealing with man were adapted to the times and the people. They often went beyond mere scrupulosity, and enjoined kindness to strangers, gentleness to widows and orphans and consideration for animals. The nineteenth chapter of Leviticus contains rules that ought to be remembered to the eternal honor of their maker. People were forbidden to reap the corners of their farms; gleanings must be left for the poor and the stranger. Laborers must be paid at the end of the day's work; "the wages of him that is hired shall not abide with thee all night until the morning." Cruel practical jokes were forbidden. No doubt some boys thought such things were funny. "Thou shalt not curse the deaf"—I have heard American boys do this—"nor put a stumblingblock before the blind." Rich and poor were to be treated exactly alike in court. "Thou shalt not go up and down as a talebearer."

(Continued on Page 74)

GIVEN TO YOU

Four Books That Should Be in Every Home

HERE are four books that should be in every home where there are children or where children are expected. Together they cover every problem that faces the mother—from pre-natal care to the moral and intellectual training of the growing child. They are comprehensive and authoritative, but written in simple English that is easy to understand and follow. Each represents years of experience and study by a foremost expert in the field it covers—they are not quack "doctor books," but capable, reliable scientific works. They are the very best manuals on their subjects obtainable at any price—but you need pay no money to obtain any or all of them. We offer them to you COST-FREE.

① THE PROSPECTIVE MOTHER by J. Morris Slemons

Many puzzling questions occur to the woman about to become a mother. Since these questions are reasonable and natural, they should be frankly and scientifically answered. That is exactly what Doctor Slemons, Professor of Obstetrics in Yale University, does in this competent manual endorsed by hundreds of prominent physicians. It covers such practical subjects as first signs; calculating the date; appetite; diet and food requirements; care of the body; recreation; influence of work; confinement; nursing the baby.

② THE CARE AND FEEDING OF CHILDREN by L. Emmett Holt, M. D.

Hundreds of thousands of American men and women have been raised on this book and are using it as a guide to the bringing up of their own children. For twenty years it has been regarded as the most trustworthy authority in print. Doctor Holt asks every question that is likely to perplex the mother and then gives complete, constructive answers. The information is definite, specific and to the point, not general and vague. We offer the latest and enlarged edition, with the 1921 revisions.

③ THE HOME CARE OF SICK CHILDREN by Emelyn L. Coolidge, M. D.

It is not Doctor Coolidge's purpose to show you how to dispense with a doctor's services in the case of serious illness, but to tell you when you need to call a doctor and how best to work with him when he is needed. It covers the care of the sick-room; the sick child's toilet and clothing; amusements; recipes to tempt the appetite; foods best suited to different diseases; the care of infectious diseases; administering medicine; bathing; etc. It is intended to help the mother become a trained nurse for her sick children.

④ HOW TO KNOW YOUR CHILD by Miriam Finn Scott

This book aims to tell mothers how to develop the best in their children and how to prevent the growth of the bad. Some of its chapter headings suggest its scope: About Modern Educators, Discovering a Human Continent, When Faults Are Virtues, The Secret Doors of Childhood, "My Child is Disobedient—," Unspoiling Your Spoiled Child, The Person Your Child Might Be, Materials For Play, Your Children's Clothes, Fathers and Children. This book will supplement articles by the same author coming in The Journal.

Yours Without Charge

YOU, as a reader, are best qualified to introduce The Ladies' Home Journal to those not now subscribers. To show our appreciation of your doing so, we are making this exceptional offer to Journal readers who want these books to read or present to their personal friends: Secure just one new yearly subscription from someone outside of your family who does not live at your address. Collect the low pre-war price, $1.50 (Canada, $2.00; Foreign, $3.00). Forward to us the order and the money with a request for any one of the books described above, giving us the address, not that of your subscriber, to which you wish us to send the book you select. It will be forwarded at once, even carriage charges prepaid.* For any two books, send just two subscriptions; for any three, three subscriptions; for all four, four subscriptions—the orders to be obtained and forwarded, in every case, as outlined above.

*Not including Canadian or foreign customs duties.

THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL ·

388 INDEPENDENCE SQUARE, PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA

Complexion Secrets

What Scientists Know About Your Skin

A CLEAR, radiant, youthful complexion, what else but internal cleanliness can produce it? A clean system is the originator of charm, the handmaid to beauty, the basis of personal attractiveness. The texture of your skin, the brightness of your eyes and the sheen and lustre of your hair, all depend upon cleanliness—internal cleanliness. Truly, the fastidious woman keeps clean inside. She is careful to see that her bodily organs function properly, particularly those organs that eliminate waste from the body. If these do not act regularly and thoroughly, poisons are formed, absorbed by the blood and carried to the great covering of the body, the skin. They poison the skin cells, causing facial blemishes, muddy skin and sallowness. These poisons are the most common cause of personal unattractiveness.

Result of Research

Experts have conducted exhaustive research to find some method of eliminating these poisons in a harmless and natural way and thus keep the system clean.

The result of their experience in treating thousands of cases has been the discovery that Nujol has the unique property of dissolving readily many intestinal poisons. These it carries out of the body along with the food residue, as Nature intended.

It thus promotes internal cleanliness by preventing the insidious poisoning of the skin cells, the most common cause of skin troubles.

This is why so many women have found Nujol to be an invaluable aid to a clear, radiant, youthful complexion.

Nujol is for sale by druggists everywhere.

Nujol

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

How and why the elimination of intestinal toxins will bring beauty and attractiveness is told in a plain, instructive and authoritative way in the booklet, "A LOVELY SKIN COMES FROM WITHIN." Fill out and mail the attached coupon today.
Nujol Laboratories, Standard Oil Co. (New Jersey), Room 821E, 44 Beaver Street, New York.
Please send me a copy of "A LOVELY SKIN COMES FROM WITHIN."

Name _____

Address _____

Human Nature in the Bible

(Continued from Page 72)

Courtesy and etiquette were taught by law. "Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head, and honor the face of the old man." They must see to it that they have just balances and just weights.

Those who maintain that the Mosaic Law was harsh and cruel, and exacted on every occasion an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth, should remember that the following verses are in Leviticus, though many seem to have forgotten the fact:

Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thine heart.

Thou shalt not avenge, nor bear any grudge against the children of thy people, but thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.

When our Lord gave the eleventh and twelfth commandments he was quoting from Moses, as He was when He said: "I will give you rest."

The presence of laws forbidding all kinds of strange sins and crimes seems to indicate that so-called unnatural evils were known to exist there and then, as they have in all nations since.

There was the same fondness for superstition and the same eagerness to be gulled as there are to-day. "Regard not them that have familiar spirits, neither seek after wizards."

The Ten Commandments, which have had such a prodigious influence in human history, are all prohibitions except one. The chief sins are forbidden in the Tables of the Law, and it would be difficult indeed to have arranged at that time a list of regulations that would have covered a wider area of human conduct with fewer words.

I. Thou shalt have no other gods before me.

In the ancient world man was polytheistic; here was the promulgation of one divine principle. Literally translated, it reads: "You shall have no gods except me." More and more this commandment is seen to be the expression of philosophical truth. Later, the children of Israel ran after other gods with tragic consequences; and in the twentieth century the German Empire broke the first commandment, worshipping the gods of iron and steel as revealed to man in huge armaments.

"A Jealous God"

AND just as nations have madly worshiped other gods, so individuals have constantly substituted other gods for the Ideal; the gods of money, of influence, of pleasure, of social position, of fame; most common of all and most tragically absurd is the substitution for the Eternal Spirit of Truth and Right—One's Own Self.

II. Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image . . . for I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me; and shewing mercy unto thousands of them that love me, and keep my commandments.

It was necessary to forbid idol worship, to which the Israelites continually surrendered, copying, as so many nations do, only the evil features of their rivals; remember how Rachel, Jacob's wife, stole the images out of her father's house, and how bitterly ironical was the language of the prophet Isaiah in dealing with this form of superstition. The awful words, "I am a jealous God," give offense to many people to-day, but they are a statement of simple fact. Religion is the most jealous thing in the world—more jealous than any woman. There is only one place in the human heart for religion—the first place. It must have that or nothing. It must either dominate a man's life, be the supreme, controlling factor, or it becomes as ornamental as a graven image, and as powerless.

Those who use religion as a decoration, or as a last resort in fear and sickness, betray their real paganism in brushing it aside when their personal, selfish interests are concerned. Religion is never content with a weekly contribution, or a large occasional present, or a tribute of courtesy; religion demands the heart, the inmost citadel; and unless it has that it wants nothing. Either religion is the most vital of all truths or else it stands for silly superstition, and should not be allowed to annoy and harass conduct any more than Napoleon permitted it to interfere with his purposes.

The Fruits of Evil

THE last part of this commandment, which speaks of the remote consequences of evil doing (and also, be it remembered, of virtue) particularly enrages the enemies of religion. Thomas Hardy sneered at it in Tess of the D'Urbervilles, saying it might be good enough for Divinity, but was scorned by average human nature. Precisely so; it is scorned by average human nature, which is one reason why there are so many unfit children born into the world. Their lifelong weakness and suffering come from the selfishness of their ancestors, who scorned this commandment just as they scorned the established truths of science, of which this is a powerful affirmation.

The second commandment will be supported by every family physician, and by students of society like Henrik Ibsen.

III. Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain.

Never was this commandment more needed than in the twentieth century. Swearing is instinctive in human nature; all men are naturally cursers, but that does not make them admirable. There has been an enormous increase in swearing within recent years. Of all habits, it is the most difficult to break.

IV. Remember the sabbath day, to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work.

Dean Brown, of Yale, wisely pointed out the fact that there is now more profanation of the second sentence than of the first. "Six days shalt thou labor." If this commandment were universally followed, there would be enough food, fuel and clothing for everyone in the world. Every lazy, idle and useless person breaks the fourth commandment six times oftener than other men. The first clause means: "Remember the day of rest and keep it inviolate." Take one day in seven off, provided you have earned it; don't let anything interfere. It is curious that so many persons have thought it much more wicked to have recreation on Sunday than to work.

Sunday was never meant to be a day of gloom; it ought to be the happiest day in the week, for God blessed it. Forget business and the regular round of toil. Experience seems to show that people need one day in seven; the French Bolsheviks tried to make it one day in ten, but the experiment was not successful. An excellent way to spend the day is to go to church and thank God in the morning, and enjoy some outdoor sport in the afternoon. The Sabbath was established for man's health and happiness, as our Lord pointed out.

V. Honor thy father and thy mother.

This is often called "the only commandment with promise," but those who say so forget the second. That length of days should be associated with filial affection seems curious; for some cruel sons have lived long. But, more closely examined, it is not longevity,

(Continued on Page 76)

This Beauty

Every Girl Can Have

The charm of a fresh, schoolgirl complexion depends more on care than Nature

MANY a girl would be considered pretty if she would only remedy those defects of complexion which so greatly detract from charm. Too often she doesn't realize that a dull, lifeless, sallow skin is fatal to beauty. And that blotches and blackheads affect her popularity and prevent the attention and admiration which every girl craves.

There is no need to have such a complexion—improving it is easy. A little time and care each day will quickly be repaid with becoming freshness, smoothness and fine texture.

What every complexion needs

Thorough cleansing once a day with fine, mild soap on whose soothing properties you can rely. Most women will tell you that this soap is Palmolive.

Massage the profuse, creamy lather well into the pores so that every trace of oil, dirt and perspiration is removed.

Don't be afraid to be thorough—the mild, gentle Palmolive lather soothes while it cleanses. The result is a skin healthfully cleansed from the accumulations which are the original cause of most disfigured skins.

What neglect does

When you fail to cleanse your face thoroughly once a day this is what happens:

The network of pores which compose the surface of the skin becomes clogged with dirt and oil. The pores collect powder and accumulate excess cold cream.

This clogging causes enlargement—your once fine skin becomes coarse. You have blackheads and ugly blotches. Your complexion is dull and sallow.

The day you begin to cleanse with the soothing Palmolive lather you notice decided improvement. Each succeeding day rewards you with a fresher, finer skin.

The safe facial soap

Palmolive is the modern scientific blend of rare oriental oils, famous for 3,000 years as cosmetics. Olive oil contributes softening, relaxing qualities. Richness and body are due to palm oil.

The smooth, creamy Palmolive lather soothes while it cleanses, leaving the skin velvet smooth.

Volume and Efficiency enable us to sell 25c quality for 10c

There is no danger of irritation—the most sensitive skin thrives when cleansed with Palmolive.

Let it do for your body what it does for your face

Because the skin of the face is burned by the sun, roughened and chapped by the wind and made sensitive by temperature changes, the greatest care must be observed in its cleansing. It must be with soap, but such fine, mild soap that the skin is soothed and healed. Such soap is Palmolive, blended from palm and olive oils.

Use Palmolive for bathing, and the dry, rough, itching condition doctors call winter itch will be greatly relieved. It is caused by living in moistureless rooms and bathing with drying soap. The combination exhausts the natural oil supply which lubricates the skin.

Bathe with Palmolive and you remove one cause of discomfort and help the other. The mild lather softens the skin, lessens the dryness and soothes the itching. If you value comfort in cold weather, bathe with Palmolive and let it keep the skin of your body as smooth as your face.

All for 10 cents

If made in small quantity Palmolive would cost at least 25 cents a cake. It is volume that lowers price. Popularity keeps the Palmolive factories working day and night. It compels the importation of the costly oils in vast quantity.

Result, the finest, mildest soap which can be produced at a price which all can afford for every toilet purpose.

THE PALMOLIVE COMPANY
Milwaukee, U. S. A.

THE PALMOLIVE COMPANY OF CANADA, Limited
Toronto, Ont.

Copyright 1921, The Palmolive Company 1413

Do You Want to Make $25 to $50 a Week In Your Own Home?

THERE'S a wonderful new way of making money at home—a modern, up-to-date method that will appeal to every woman. How often you have felt the desire to be financially independent—to have an income of your own to do with as you want! How often have you wanted a new dress for some special occasion but had to deny yourself because of the expense!

Consider then how satisfactory it would be for you to have a way to make from $25 to $50 a week in your own home—and in addition to have all the pretty stylish clothes you want for only the bare cost of the materials. The offers you these opportunities. Without expense or obligation to you it invites you to fill in and mail the coupon below for full information of its Wonderful Introductory Offer. Learn how you can get our Free materials and trimmings with which to make six pretty and serviceable garments. How you get also a beautiful Oriental Sewing Basket filled with sewing equipment, and a valuable dress and skirt form.

School of Modern Dress

We believe this to be the most wonderful offer ever made by any School. No woman should miss getting full information about it. It's absolutely free and places you under no obligation. Mail the coupon today.

School of Modern Dress, 821 Jefferson St., Buffalo, N. Y.

School of Modern Dress

Dept. 171-R, 821 Jefferson St., Buffalo, N. Y.

Without cost or obligation you may send me full information about your Special Introductory Offer and how I can make $25 to $50 a week at home.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____

State _____

L. H. J. 1-22

Human Nature in the Bible

(Continued from Page 74)

but continued residence on the family property that the statement emphasizes. Affection and care for one's parents keep up the estate; neglect of them means wandering, and the invasion of strangers. It is unfortunate that parents love their children so much more intensely than children love their parents; but the whirligig of time brings in its revenges. There is no commandment that parents must love their children, for the commandments were in every instance directed at common sins.

VI. Thou shalt not kill.

Do no murder. Some extremists have held that this means one should not kill a quail or a woodcock. Nonsense; it is true that as we grow older we more and more appreciate the gift of life and hate to take it away. Few young people think shooting is wrong; but there are plenty of conscientious objectors among adults—Thomas Hardy, for example, and Emerson, who said: "Hast thou named all the birds without a gun?" A little common sense is useful here, as elsewhere; the wanton destruction of animals is no doubt wicked; but if it be wrong to go out and shoot an occasional partridge, then it is even more wrong to kill chickens. For you feed chickens and pretend that you are interested in their welfare, when in reality you are a traitor. The wickedness in shooting enormous bags of game, raised for the purpose, consists in the fact that many wounded ones escape, and while you are eating your dinner and talking of a "good day's sport" these creatures are in agony.

VII. Thou shalt not commit adultery.

Every adulterer is also a liar and usually a sneak. It is interesting to observe that many men, who would not lie to others in business, will break their word given in the church before many witnesses. The reason is largely a matter of cowardice. If a man breaks his word to another man, penalties follow; whereas a man can break his word to a woman with impunity. But adultery is founded on falsehood and dishonor fully as much as corrupt dealing in trade. In the fifth chapter of Numbers there is a strange but impressive method of dealing with jealousy and adultery.

VIII. Thou shalt not steal.

Which ought to apply as much to embezzlement and crooked manipulation as to housebreaking or borrowing apples.

IX. Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor.

Which refers, I suppose, not merely to perjury, but to slander and malicious gossip.

X. Thou shalt not covet.

The Moral Constitution

OBERVE that all these commandments are meant to preserve from harm those who accept them, not merely those who might be victims. It is not pleasant to have a thief steal from you, but it is much better for you than to steal something yourself; it is unfortunate to be killed, but it is better than to go out and kill somebody. That is, the commandments were not only necessary for the welfare of society, but fidelity to them is necessary for individual happiness. The tenth is wholly devoted to this purpose; it does not hurt your neighbor if you covet his house; some persons are so constituted that this adds to their delight; but it hurts you horribly and poisons your peace of mind. I suppose covetousness of one's neighbor's possessions drives more people into financial difficulties than any other one thing.

The twentieth chapter of Exodus, containing the Ten Commandments, which might be called the Moral Constitution, is immediately followed by a succession of chapters which might be called the by-laws, because they give specific regulations. Then follow detailed directions for the ritual of worship—very tedious reading this is to-day, but doubtless important then—in order that the people might have ever before them the thought of divine leadership.

Human nature lost little time in asserting itself; despite the wonders they had seen, despite the terrible majesty of the promulgation of the Law, what do we hear of the people's behavior? Well, they did exactly what millions are doing to-day: they forsook the worship of God for the worship of the Golden Calf. Moses could not trust the people out of his sight; they behaved like bad boys in the absence of the teacher. Moses was away in the mount; and the children of Israel said to Aaron: "Up, make us gods, which shall go before us; for as for this Moses, the man that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we wot not what is become of him." To the eternal discredit of Aaron, he surrendered to mob sentiment at just the moment when a strong voice was most necessary. Apparently the women had much jewelry, perhaps the finery they had "borrowed" from the Egyptians; Aaron fashioned the whole collection into the form of a golden calf and worshiped it with song and dance.

God Above Popular Clamor

IMAGINE the feelings of Moses coming down the mountain with the two tables of the Law, his mind still in the solemn obsession of the Divine Presence. That honest young lieutenant, Joshua, hearing the racket below, said to Moses: "There is a noise of war in the camp." Moses replied crisply: "It is not the voice of them that shout for mastery, neither is it the voice of them that cry for being overcome: but the noise of them that sing do I hear."

When he saw the calf and the idiotic dancing around it, ungovernable rage possessed him; he smashed the tables he was holding. When a man is in a state of terrific rage he simply has to smash something or burst; it is an immense relief to take it out on the furniture.

The rest of this narrative is downright funny. Moses took the golden calf, burnt it, powdered the ashes, made a soup of it, and forced the whole congregation to drink it! If you want your calf, down with it! Then Aaron behaved even worse than Adam in Eden; in response to the sharp questions of Moses he said: "Thou knowest the people, that they are set on mischief." Then he declared that he had taken their golden contributions. "So they gave it me: then I cast it into the fire, and there came out this calf." Was there ever a more ridiculous, a more childish lie? Can't you see the liar's face?

Observe that meek Moses was not rebuked by God for smashing the tables; he was given new ones in their place. He was punished for only one thing—because he had momentarily lost confidence in God at the waters of Meribah, when he was more afraid of popular clamor than of God Himself. For this reason he was not permitted to enter the Promised Land.

Moses lived to be one hundred and twenty years old, in sound bodily and mental health. His eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated. His farewell charge to the people is filled with poetry and splendid imagery, containing many promises and many warnings. Like all persons, they needed advice, received it, and forgot it. Human nature is revealed in their shortness of memory; for nothing is more frequently heard than good advice, and there is nothing so quickly forgotten. The first alluring picture is enough to drive it out of the mind.

One passage in his farewell speech retains its flavor: "Thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow."

Moses stood on Pisgah Height, on Mount Nebo, and looked with what emotion we can only imagine on the fair panorama of Canaan. He could not enter it any more than Abraham Lincoln could live to see the growth of the mighty nation he had saved. But Moses, though he had little confidence in the people, knew that their immediate future was assured, that the results of his wisdom and foresight would last long; he saw the travail of his soul and was satisfied.

NOTE—In the next issue Professor Phelps will discuss famous fighters in Canaan, dealing with the tragedies of the wilderness, with comments on Moses and the color line, the conquest of Jericho, and the story of the Benjaminites.

Vandemark's Folly

(Continued from Page 19)

The thing that made the party a sad affair to me was the attentions paid to Virginia by Bob Wade. I might have been comforted by the nice way Kittie Fleming treated me if I had had eyes for anyone but Virginia; but when Kittie smiled on me I always thought how much sweeter a smile Virginia had than she. But her smiles that evening were all for Bob Wade. In fact, he gave nobody else a chance. So I was wretched, especially when the younger people gathered in the big dining room, from which Jack Wade had the tables cleared and began turning the gathering into a "play party."

NOW there was a difference between a play party and a kissing party, or kissing bee, as we used to call it. The play party was quite respectable. In it the people taking part sang airs, each with its own words, and moved about in a step to the music. The absence of the fiddle and the "calling off" and the name of dancing took the curse off. They went through figures a lot like dances; swung partners by one hand or both; advanced and retreated, "balanced to partners," bowing and saluting, clasped hands, right and left alternately with those they met, balanced to places, and the like. Sometimes they had a leading couple to lead them, as in the dance my granddaughter tells me of called the german; but usually they were all supposed to know the way the play went, and the words were always such as to help. Here is the one they started off with that night:

*We come here to bounce around,
We come here to bounce around,
We come here to bounce around,
Tra, la, la
Ladies, do si do,
Gents, you know,
Swing to the right,
And then to the left,
And all promenade!*

I have seen Wades and Flemings and Holbrooks and all the rest singing and hopping about to the tune of We Come Here to Bounce Around, and also We'll All Go Down to Rowser, and Hey, Jim Along, Jim Along Josie, and Angelina Do Go Home! and Good-by Susan Jane, and Shoot the Buffalo, and Wevilly Wheat, and Sandy He Belonged to the Mill, and I've Been to the East, I've Been to the West, I've Been to the Jay-Bird's Altar, and Skip-to-My-Lou, and The Juniper Tree, and Go In and Out the Window, and The Jolly Old Miller, and Captain Jinks, and lots more of them; and Boyds and Burnses and Smythes tripping the light fantastic with them, and not half a dozen dresses better than alpacas in the crowd, and the men, many of them, in drilling trousers and half of them with hayseed in their hair from the party they rode to the party on.

I WENT around with the rest of them, for I had seen all these plays played on the canal boats, and once or twice taken part in them. Kittie Fleming went around with me, and she was very graceful and gracious as she bowed to me and as I swung her around. Bob Wade still devoted himself to Virginia, who was like a fairy in her fine pink-silk dress.

"This is enough of these plays," shouted Bob at last, after looking about to see that his father and mother were not in the room. "Let's have the Needle's Eye!"

"The Needle's Eye! The Needle's Eye!" was the cry, then.

"I won't play kissing games!" said one or two of the girls.

"Let's have the Gay Balanza Man," shouted Doctor Bliven, who was in the midst of the gayeties, while his wife, too, plunged in as if to outdo him.

"Oh, yes!" she said, smiling up into the face of Frank Finster, with whom she had been playing. "Let's have the Gay Balanza Man! It's such fun!"

The Needle's Eye won, and we formed in a long line of couples—Wades, Finsters, Flemings, Boyds and the rest of the roll of present-day aristocrats—and marched, singing, between a boy and a girl standing on chairs with their hands joined. Here is the song—I can sing the tune to-day:

*The needle's eye
Which doth supply
The thread which runs so true;
And many a lass (sung by the boys)
And many a beau (this by the girls)
Have I let pass (boys)
Have I let go (girls)
Because I wanted you!*

AT THE word "you" the twon on the chairs—they were Lizzie Finster and Charley McKim at first—brought their arms down and caught a couple—they caught Kittie and me—who were at that moment passing through between the chairs—which were the needle's eye; and then they sang, giving us room to execute:

*And they bow so neat!
And they kiss so sweet!
We do intend before we end, to have this couple meet!*

Crimson of face, awkward as a calf, I bowed to Kittie and she to me, and then she threw her arms about me and kissed me on the lips. I saw her wink slyly at Bob Wade. Then Kittie and I became the needle's eye and she worked it so we caught Bob Wade and Virginia, even though it was necessary to wait a moment after the word "you." She meant to do it! As Bob's lips met Virginia's I groaned and, turning my back on Kitty Fleming, I rushed out of the room.

Judge Stone tried to stop me. "Jake, Jake!" he whispered in my ear, looking anxiously around, "have you seen the governor in the last half or three-quarters of an hour?"

"He hain't been in here," I said, jerking away from him.

"Sure?" Judge Stone persisted. "I've looked everywhere except in his office where he put the money—and that's locked."

WELL, the party came to an end presently, and Judge Stone came out and called for me to bring the team. When I drove up to the door he came to me and asked me in a low tone to come and help carry the money out. The governor unlocked his office, and then unlocked the safe and took out the bag, which he handed to Judge Stone.

"Heavy as ever," said the judge. "Catch hold here, Jake, and help me carry it."

"A heavy responsibility at least," said the governor seriously.

As I looked about among the governor's working people, who were gathered to see us go, I saw a head taller than the rest, Pitt Bushyager. He was looking at me with that dare-devil smile of his, the handsomest man there, with his curling brown mustache and goatee; and nodded at me as the judge got into the carriage in the back seat with Mrs. Stone, and Virginia came up in her pretty pink silk, with the Paisley shawl around her shoulders, to be helped up into the front seat discovered, ages ago, how to start a fire. And at once he commanded his wife to keep the home fire burning.

(Continued on Page 79)

A Barbarian Husband

From that day to this, thru many centuries of barbarism and civilization, woman has always been the fire-watcher. Even today in kitchens the world over, except where there is a "Lorain," woman watches the fire—lest it burn the food she is cooking for her husband and family.

Knows Her Cooking Will Be a Success

But how different in every kitchen where there is a "Lorain." There the housewife puts food into the oven and needs never look at it again until it is delightfully done and ready to serve. No fire-watching, no oven-slavery, no guessing, no worrying, no "unlucky days," no cooking failures. For "Lorain" controls all oven heats and controls them exactly; and whether the oven contains bread or cake—or even an entire meal of vegetables, meat and dessert, at one time—the housewife knows beforehand just when it will be done, and that it will be done perfectly. She never has to look.

Makes Good Cooks Better, All Cooks Happier

Some women like to cook, but to some cooking is drudgery. "Lorain" makes cooking delightful and sure, banishes all thought of drudgery, gives the family better food and at less trouble to cook it, and makes good cooks better and all cooks happier.

Wonderful, simple, accurate, reliable—that's "Lorain." We want you to know all about it, and shall be glad to have you read "An Easier Day's Work," which is a most interesting book. Simply mail the coupon for your copy.

AMERICAN STOVE COMPANY
21 Chouteau Avenue, St. Louis, Mo.
Largest makers of gas ranges in the world

We manufacture oil and coal stoves for use where gas is not available, but the "Lorain" cannot be used on these

LORAIN
OVEN HEAT REGULATOR

Only these famous Gas Stoves are equipped with the "Lorain"

CLARK JEWEL—
George M. Clark & Co.
Div., Chicago, Ill.

DANGLER—
Dangler Stove Co. Div.,
Cleveland, Ohio

DIRECT ACTION—
National Stove Co. Div.,
Lorain, Ohio

NEW PROCESS—
New Process Stove Co.
Div., Cleveland, Ohio

QUICK MEAL—
Quick Meal Stove Co.
Div., St. Louis, Mo.

RELIABLE—
Reliable Stove Co. Div.,
Cleveland, Ohio

AMERICAN STOVE CO.
21 Chouteau Ave.
St. Louis, Mo.

Please send me free booklet, "An Easier Day's Work."

Name _____

Address _____

City _____

State _____

Of the six stoves listed above my favorite is _____

JELL-O

America's Most Famous Dessert

METHODS of living have undergone great changes in America in the last few years. Elaborate desserts, such as boiled and baked puddings and dyspepsia-producing pies, have given place to the more attractive and healthful desserts made from Jell-O. These desserts are economical both in money and time. Why should any woman stand for hours over a hot fire, mixing compounds to make people ill, when in two minutes, with an expense of a few cents, she can produce such attractive, delicious desserts? Its economy is particularly in point now that it is again selling at 2 packages for 25 cents.

THE GENESEE PURE FOOD COMPANY
Le Roy, New York Bridgeburg, Ontario

Vandemark's Folly

(Continued from Page 77)

with me, just after the satchel of money was placed under the seat where the judge could feel it with his feet.

We drove off in that silence which comes with the drowsiness that follows excitement, especially at night. The night was dark and still. Virginia's presence reminded me of those days of happiness when we drove into Iowa alone together, but I was not happy. I had lived with this girl in my dreams ever since, and now I faced the wrench of giving her up; for I repeated in my own mind over and over again that she would never think of me with such big bugs as Bob Wade shining around her.

The judge and Mrs. Stone were talking together now, and I heard references to the money. Then I began slowly to turn over in my slow mind the fact, known to me alone, that there was a man at the Wade farm who was one of a band of thieves and who knew about our having the money. If he really was connected with the Bunker boys, what was more likely than that he had some way of passing the word along to some of them, who would be waiting to rob us on our way home? All this time Virginia seemed to be snuggling up a little closer.

Jim Boyd's light buggy had got far ahead of us, out of hearing, and the lumber wagons with the bulk of the crowd were far in the rear. We were alone. As we came to a road that wound off toward the south, where there was a settlement of Hoosiers, I turned off and followed it, knowing that when I got to the Hoosier settlement I should find a road into the Center. It was a mistake made a purpose, done on that instinct which protects the man who feels that he may be trailed. I was on a path unexpected to anyone waiting for us.

After a while the judge noticed that we were off the road. "Stop!" he commanded, and when I explained that we would soon reach a trail which would lead right into the Center he still persisted.

"If we were robbed on this out-of-the-way road," said he, "it would look funny."

"It would look funnier," I said, "if we were to go back and then get robbed. Anyone waiting to rob us would be on the regular road, wouldn't they?"

So I stubbornly drove on, the judge grumbling all the while for a mile or so.

AND then came one of the interesting events of this eventful night. We turned into the main road to Monterey Center, just where Duncan McAlpine's barn now stands, and I thought I saw down in the hollow, where it was still dark, though the light was beginning to dawn in the east, a clump of dark objects like cattle or horses—or horse-men. As I looked they moved into the road as if to stop us. I drew my pistol and fired it over their heads, and they scattered. Then I was scared still more by a sound as of a cavalry or artillery platoon coming behind us. It was three loads of people on the hay-racks, who had overtaken us because we had come by the roundabout way, coming at a keen gallop down the hill to have the credit of passing a fancy carriage. They passed us like a tornado, shouting as they went by, asking what I had shot at, and telling us to hurry up so as to get home by breakfast time. The horsemen ahead, whatever might have been their plans, did not seem to care to argue matters with so large a force and rode off in several directions, while I pressed close to the rear of the last hayrack. Thus we drove into Monterey Center.

"What did you shoot for?" asked the judge as we stopped at his house.

"I wanted to warn a lot of men on horseback that were heading us off that there'd be trouble if they tried to stop us."

"Foolishness!" said the judge. "Well, come in and let's have a bite to eat." Virginia was staying with them the rest of the night, and I helped her out, feeling in her stiffness that she was offended with me. As we went in carrying the satchel the judge lifted it up on the table. "We may as well take a look at it," said he. Mrs. Stone and Virginia and I all stood by the table as he unsnapped the catch and opened the bag. It was full almost to the top.

"That ain't the way I packed that money!" said the judge. His hands trembled as he pulled the contents out. It was full of the bags and wrappers in which the money had been packed, according to the judge's tell, but there was no money in the wrappers and the bags were full, not of coins, but of common salt. That was what made it so heavy. "I am ruined!" Judge Stone fell back into a chair, groaning. Then he jumped to his feet. "They've taken it out while we were at the party!" he shouted. "The canting, sniveling old thief! No wonder he's got money! He probably stole it where he came from! Jake, we've got to go back and make him give this money back! Come on!"

"Make who give it back!" I asked.

"Who?" said he. "Why, old De Witt Clinton Wade, the old thief! Who else had the key to the office or knew how to open that safe? Come on, Jake, and bring your pistol!"

I handed him the pistol. "I agreed to guard you and the county's money," I said, "and that's all. You hain't got the county's money, it seems, and my job's over. I've got to break prairie to-day, and I guess I'd better be going!"

XIII

IOWA lived in the future in those days. It was a land of poverty and privations and small things, but a land of dreams. We shivered in the winter storms, and dreamed; we plowed and sowed and garnered in; but the great things, the happy things, were our dreams and visions.

I was sorry for the people in the towns, and sold most of my eggs, fowls, butter, cream and milk on credit; and though Virginia and I were not on good terms and I never went to see her any more, and though Grandma Thorndyke was, I felt sure, trying to get Virginia's mind fixed on a better match, like Bob Wade or Paul Holbrook, I used to take the Elder's family eggs, butter, milk or flour almost every time I went to town; and when the weather was warm enough so that they would not freeze, I took potatoes, turnips, and sometimes some cabbage for a boiled dinner, with a piece of pork to go with it. When the Elder found out who was sending it he tried to thank me, but I made him promise not to tell his family where they came from, on pain of not getting any more.

But there were days of dark despondency. Magnus Thorkelson, however, tried to cheer me up. I had been wishing that I had never left the canal, for there I always had good clothes and money in my pocket. We couldn't stay in this country, I said.

"Oh," exclaimed Magnus, "you shouldn't talk so! We got plenty to eat. Dere bane lots people in Norway would jump at de chance to yange places wit' us. What nice land here in Iovay!"

One trouble with all of us Vandemark township settlers was that we had no money. I had long since stopped going to church or to see anybody because I was so beggarly looking. Going away from our farm to earn wages put back the development of the farms, and made the job of getting started so much slower. I hated to work for Buck Gowdy, but when Magnus came to me one

(Continued on Page 80)

FROM doubt to exuberance
—the swift changes in this baby's face would put a regular grown-up actor to shame.
He is the son of Mrs. A. A.
Beard, Priest River, Idaho.

What is finer in children than steady, normal progress?

ROBERT BEARD is what every child has a natural right to be—healthy, normal, perfect in every way. He has always been that way—for he has been fed on Eagle Brand since he was three months old.

When he was born he weighed nine pounds. At five months he weighed eighteen pounds. When he reached the age of sixteen months he tipped the scales at twenty-seven pounds and was in sturdy health—just as you see him in the picture.

All of it steady, regular progress—as it should be. Robert "never has had a sick day," his mother tells us, in spite of "the intense heat" of last summer.

Of course Robert started life with a fine constitution—even if his mother does give to Eagle Brand the credit for his fine progress. He is but one example of what Eagle Brand has done for thousands of other normal children. Thousands more who were weak and under nourished—who were unable to retain other foods—have thrived and grown strong on Eagle Brand, too. Doctors recommend it in difficult feeding cases—it is so very digestible.

No thoughtful mother would experiment with her baby. Unquestionably you should nurse him if you can—but don't risk giving him foods of which you are doubtful. Eagle Brand has been the standard infant food for three generations. It is not a "special baby food" at all. It is milk—just pure milk and pure sugar, the natural food when mother's milk fails. Eagle Brand maintains its uniform quality and perfect purity no matter where you buy it—and you can get it anywhere.

Write us for "The Best Baby"—a beautiful little record book for your baby. It is free. We will also be glad to send you information and feeding chart for Eagle Brand.

THE BORDEN COMPANY
Borden Building New York

Borden's EAGLE BRAND Condensed Milk

Rigaud's Parfum Mary Garden

Rigaud's Mary Garden will make you beautiful and keep you young

Mary Garden! So marvelous is her loveliness that all the world pays her homage. Yet even beauty such as hers must be preserved—enhanced—glorified.

If you would bring out the compelling charm of a lovely face, touch it with just a little

MARY GARDEN Rouge
and then impart a rose-petal softness with MARY GARDEN Face Powder
Both are fragrant with the exquisite
Parfum MARY GARDEN

Send for a Bijou Box of the Face Powder for your handbag

GEO. BORGFELDT & CO., New York, Sole Distributors

GEO. BORGFELDT & CO., Distributors
Enclosed is 10 cents for which please send me your Bijou Box of Mary Garden Face Powder.
Name _____
Address _____

Vandemark's Jolly

(Continued from Page 79)

day after we had got our oats sowed and said that Mr. Gowdy wanted hands, I decided that I would go over with Magnus and work a while.

I was astonished, after we had walked the nine miles between the edge of the Gowdy tract and the headquarters, to see how much he had done. There were square miles of land under plow, and the yards, barns, granaries and houses looked almost as much like a town as Monterey Center. We went straight to Gowdy's office. His overseer was talking with us when Gowdy came in.

"Hello, Thorkelson," said he, "you're quite a stranger. Haven't seen you for a week."

MAGNUS stole a look at me and blushed so that his face was as red as his hair. I was taken aback by this, for he had never said a word to me about the frequent visits to the Gowdy place which Buck's talk seemed to show had taken place. What had he been coming over for, I wondered, as I heard Gowdy greeting me.

"Glad to see you, Mr. Vandemark," said he. "What can I do for you-all?"

"We heard you wanted a couple of hands," said I, "and we thought —"

"I need a couple of hundred," said he. "Put 'em to work, Mobley," turning to the overseer; and then he went off into a lot of questions and orders about the work, after which he jumped into the buckboard buggy, in which Pinck Johnson sat with the whip in his hands, and they went off at a keen run.

We lived in a great barracks with his other men and ate our meals in a long room like a company of soldiers. It was a most interesting business experiment which he was trying; and he was going behind every day. Most of the aristocrats who came early to Iowa to build up estates lost everything they had, and became poor; for they did not work with their own hands, and the work of others' hands was inefficient and cost as much as it produced or more. Gowdy would have gone broke long before the cheap land was gone if it had not been for the money he got from Kentucky. I could see that his labor was bringing him a loss, every day's work of it; and at breakfast I was studying out ways to organize it better when a small hand pushed a cup of coffee past my cheek and gave my nose a little pinch as it was drawn back. I looked up, and there was Rowena, waiting on our table!

"Hello, Jake!" said she. "I heard you was dead."

She was as pretty a twenty-year-old lass as you would see in a day's travel. No longer was she the ragged waif to whom I had given the dress pattern back toward Dubuque. She was rosy, she was plump, her new calico dress was as pretty as it could be, and her brown skin and browner hair made with her dark eyes a study in brown and pink, as the artists say.

It was two or three days before I had a chance to go to her house and talk with her. She had changed a good deal, I sensed, as she told me all about her folks, and now she was about to change her situation in the Blue-grass Manor establishment. She was going into the big house to work under Mrs. Mobley, the wife of the superintendent.

"Well, that'll be nice," said I.

"I don't want to," she said. "I like to wait on table better."

"Then why do you change?" said I.

"Mr. Gowdy —" began Ma Fewkes, but was interrupted by her daughter, who talked on until her mother was switched off from her explanation. Then she came over and sat by me. "Tell me, Jake," she said, "how you're gittin' along. Off here we don't hear no news from folks over to the Center at all. We go to the new railroad, an' never see anyone from over there —"

"Exceptin' Magnus," said Ma Fewkes.

"You ain't married yet, be you?" Rowena asked.

"I should say not! Me married!"

We sat then for quite a while without saying anything. It was getting embarrassing, and her next remark made it even more so.

"How old be you, Jake?" she asked.

"I'll be twenty," said I, "the twenty-seventh day of next July."

"We're jest of an age," she ventured—and after a long pause: "I should think it would be awful hard work to keep the house and do your work ou'doors."

I told her that it was.

"Well," said she, "for a smart, nice-lookin' young man like you, it's your own fault —"

And then there was a tap on the door. Ma Fewkes opened, and there stood Buckner Gowdy. He came in with his easy politeness and sat down among us.

"I didn't know you had company," said he; "but now I remember that Mr. Vandemark is an old friend."

He took me into the conversation, but he sat where he could look at Rowena. He seemed to be carrying on a silent conversation with her with his eyes while he talked to me, looking into my eyes, too, a good deal, and stooping toward me in that intimate, confidential way of his.

AFTER working a time for Gowdy I took home money enough for some new clothes. Both Magnus and I were glad to see the long black streaks of new breaking in the section of which my eighty was a part, and two new shanties belonging to new neighbors. Magnus stopped at his own place, and I went on. I saw that there had been a lot of reding up done; and as I came around the corner of the house I heard sounds within as of someone at the housework. The door was open, and as I peeped in, there, of all people, was Grandma Thorndyke putting the last touches to a general housecleaning.

The floor was newly scrubbed, the dishes set away in order and all clean. The churn was always clean inwardly, but she had scoured it on the outside. There was a geranium in bloom in the window, which was as clear as glass could be made. The bed was made up on a different plan from mine, and the place where I hung my clothes had a flowered cotton curtain in front of it, run on cords. It looked very beautiful to me; and my pride in it rose as I gazed upon it. Grandma Thorndyke had not heard me coming, and gave way to her feelings as she looked at her handiwork in her manner of talking to herself.

(Continued on Page 83)

The House Plan Contest

WE ARE still hopeful of being able to announce in our February issue the names of the winners in the HOME JOURNAL House Plan Contest. We received 6000 plans—a splendid response—and so many of them came in the last week of the time allowed that the House Plan Contest Editor was fairly swamped. At this writing he is working day and night, examining each one with the utmost care, and he reports encouragingly that he is finding some wonderfully good ideas. Watch the February JOURNAL for the names of the prize winners, and the March JOURNAL for the winning plans.

STARTEX

STARTEX

This is the new dish towel that leaves no lint
Send for this sample towel (15c) and know why

A STARTEX towel will dry and polish the finest glass, china and silver-ware without leaving lint. Moreover, it has the highest absorbent qualities. This fact has been proved by scientific tests conducted by Professor Haven of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

The low price of Startex has caused some people to confuse it with so-called "union linens" in which flax is woven only one way. Startex, however, is an entirely distinctive fabric. In this product flax and cotton fibres are spun together in every thread of Startex so that the linen is woven into it both ways, warp and weft alike. This is why Startex toweling launders better and wears much longer than ordinary towels.

In order that you may test for yourself the remarkable drying qualities and the real economy of this new fabric, we have made up a limited number of sample towels in 27 inch lengths. If you will return the coupon with 15 cents, we will mail you one.

STARTEX

CRASH TOWELING

Has linen spun and woven both ways

INTERNATIONAL COTTON MILLS
 LAWRENCE & CO., Selling Agents

BOSTON, NEW YORK, PHILADELPHIA, ST. LOUIS, SAN FRANCISCO, LONDON

SEND THIS COUPON
 and 15 cents for a 27-inch sample Startex towel, and test this quick-drying, lintless new fabric.
 Address: STARK MILLS, MAINTON, N. H.
 Name _____
 Address _____

Making your attic of real use

Important Notice
Floor coverings (including rugs) made upon a felt paper base are not linoleum, and to describe, advertise or sell them as linoleum is a violation of the law. Felt paper floor coverings have a black interior which is easily detected upon examining the edge.

Many a big attic room, now practically useless, can be made such an attractive family recreation center that the boys and girls will be glad to stay home these long winter evenings.

In harmony with any decorative scheme you may select for such a room a Blabon floor of Art Linoleum will be not only most appropriate but will yield the maximum of service. Pattern No. 350 Inlaid is shown on the floor above.

The colors of Blabon plain and "Invincible" battleship linoleums, as well as the inlaid patterns, go through to the burlap back, and stay bright and clear as long as the linoleum lasts.

Blabon floors are quiet and comfortable to walk upon. They are easy to keep clean by a light regular going over with a damp cloth or mop. For every room, upstairs and down, they are beautiful, sanitary, and economical, whether used as a floor or as a background for fabric rugs.

For genuine linoleum look for the name Blabon. Write for illustrated booklet.

Blabon Rugs of genuine linoleum have the soft rich colorings of costlier fabric rugs at a fraction of their cost. Mothproof, sanitary, durable. A variety of beautiful patterns and color combinations. Ask your dealer for Blabon Rugs of genuine linoleum.
The George W. Blabon Co., Philadelphia
Established 70 years

Look for this label on the face of all Blabon Art Linoleums

BLABON ART Linoleums

Vandemark's Folly

(Continued from Page 80)

"That's more like a human habitation!" she ejaculated, standing with her hands on her hips. "It looked like a hoarow's nest!"

"It looks a lot better," I agreed. She was startled at seeing me, for she expected to get away when Henderson L. Burns came back from his shooting of golden plover, before I came in. But we had quite a visit all by ourselves. She said quite pointedly somebody had been keeping her family in milk and butter and vegetables and chickens and eggs all winter, and she was doing a mighty little in repayment. Her eyes were full of tears as she said this.

I got all the news of the town from her. Several people had moved in; but others had gone back East to live with their own or their wives' folks. Elder Thorndyke, encouraged by the favor of "their two rich men," had laid plans for building a church, and she believed their fellowship would be blessed with greater growth if they had a consecrated building instead of the hall where the secret societies met. On being asked who their two richest men were she mentioned Governor Wade, of course, and Mr. Gowdy.

"Mr. Gowdy," she ventured, "is in a very hopeful frame of mind. He is, I fervently hope and believe, under conviction of sin. We pray for him without ceasing. He would be a tower of strength, with his ability and his wealth, if he should, under God, turn to the right and seek salvation. If you and he could both come into the fold, Jacob, it would be a wonderful thing for the Elder and me."

"I guess I'd rather come in alone!" I said.

"YOU mustn't be uncharitable," said she. "Mr. Gowdy is still hopeful of getting that property for Virginia Royall. He is working on that all the time. He came to get her signature to a paper this week. He is a changed man, Jacob—a changed man."

I can't tell how thunderstruck I was by this bit of news. Somehow I could not see Buck Gowdy as a member of the congregation of the saints—I had seen too much of him lately; and yet, I could not now remember any of the old hardness he had shown in every action back along the Old Ridge Road in 1855.

But Virginia must have changed toward him, or she would not have allowed him to approach her with any kind of paper, not even a patent of nobility.

"This ain't the last time, Jacob," said Grandma Thorndyke as she climbed into Jim Boyd's buggy that Henderson L. had borrowed. "You may expect to find your house redd up any time when I can get a ride out."

I was in a daze for some time trying to study out developments. Buck Gowdy and Mrs. Mobley; Rowena and Magnus Thorndyke; Gowdy's calls on Rowena, or at least at her home; Rowena's going to live in his house as a hired girl; her warmth to me; her nervousness, or fright, at Gowdy; Gowdy's religious tendency in the midst of his entanglements with the fair sex; his seeming reconciliation with Virginia; his pulling of the wool over the eyes of Mrs. Thorndyke, and probably the Elder's — Out of this maze I came to a sudden resolution. I would go to Waterloo and get me a new outfit of clothes, even to gloves and a pair of "fine boots."

XIV

LIFE dragged along for all of us from one year to another in the slow movement of a new country in hard times, only I was at bottom better off than most of my neighbors, because I had cattle. They grew in numbers, and keeping them was just a matter of labor, for I could use the land of others for pasture and hay without paying rent. Town life went backwards in most ways. My interest in it centered in Virginia, and through her in Elder Thorndyke's family; but of this family I saw little except for my visits from Grandma Thorndyke. She came out and redd up the house as often as she could catch a ride, and on the other hand I kept up my now well-known secret policy of supplying the Thorndyke family with my farm, dairy and poultry surplus.

Virginia never came with Grandma to help redd up. Grandma often told me that now I was getting pretty nearly old enough to be married, or would be when I was twenty-one, which would be in July. She began bringing girls with her to help fix my house up.

"Why don't you bring Virginia out some day?" I asked on one of these occasions, when it seemed to me that Grandma Thorndyke was making herself just a little too frequent a visitor at my place.

"Miss Royall," said she as if she had been speaking of the Queen of Sheba, "is busy with her own circle of friends. She is now visiting at Governor Wade's. She is almost a member of the family there. And her law matters take up a good deal of her time too. Mr. Gowdy thinks he may be able to get her property for her soon. She can hardly be expected to come out for this." And Grandma swept her hands about to cast down into nothingness my house, my affairs, and me.

SO, WHEN I furnished the cream for the donation picnic at Crabapple Grove in strawberry time, I went prepared to see myself discarded by my love. She was there, and I had not overestimated her coldness toward me. Buck Gowdy came for only a few minutes, and these he spent eating ice cream with Elder Thorndyke, with Virginia across the table from him, and he looking at her in that old way of his. Before he left she went over and sat with Bob Wade and Kittie Fleming; but he joined them pretty soon, and I saw him bending down in that intimate way of his, first speaking to Kittie, and then for a longer time to Virginia—and I thought of the time when she would not even speak his name! Once she walked off by herself in the trees, and looked back at me as she went; but I was done with her, I said to myself, and hung back.

I do not remember that I was ever so unhappy, not even when John Rucker was in power over me and my mother; not even when I was seeking my mother up and down the canal and the Lakes; not even when I found that she had gone away on her last long journey that bleak winter day in Madison. I now devoted myself to the memory of my old dreams for my mother, and blamed myself for treason to her memory, getting out that old letter and the poor work-worn shoe and weeping over them in my lonely nights in the cabin on the prairie.

It was not more than a week after this donation picnic when I came home for my nooning one day and found a strange covered wagon in the yard and two strange horses in the stable. This was in the early summer of 1859, almost a year from the time Magnus and I left Bluegrass Manor. When I went to the house, there were Old Man Fewkes and Mrs. Fewkes, and Surajah Dowlah and Celebrate Fourth. I welcomed them heartily. I was so lonesome that I would have welcomed a stray dog, and that is pretty nearly what I was doing.

"I guess," ventured the old man after we had finished our dinner, "that you are wondering where we're goin', Jake."

"A long ways," I said, "by the looks of your rig."

"YOU see us now," he went on, "takin' steps that I've wanted to take ever sen' I found out what a den of iniquity we throwed ourselves into when we went out yon," pointing in the general direction of the Bluegrass Manor.

"What steps are you takin'?" I asked.

"We are makin'," said he, "our big move for riches. Gold! Gold! Jake, you must go with us! We are goin' out to the Speak."

I had never heard of any place called the Speak, but I finally got it through my head that he meant Pike's Peak. We were in the midst of the Pike's Peak excitement for two or three years; and this was the earliest sign of it that I had seen, though I had heard Pike's Peak mentioned.

"Where's Rowena?" I asked.

Silence for quite a while. Then Ma Fewkes spoke. "Rowena," she said, her voice trembling, "Rowena ain't goin' with us."

"SHE ain't no longer," said Old Man Fewkes, "a member o' my family. I shall will my property away from her. I've made up my mind, Jake. Now let's talk about the Speak. Our plans was never better laid. Celebrate, tell Jake how we make our money a-goin', and you, Surajah, denote to him your machine f'r gittin' out the gold."

I was too much absorbed in thinking about Rowena to take in what Surajah and Celebrate said. I have a dim recollection that Celebrate's plan for making money was to fill the wagon box with white beans, which were scarce in Denver City, as we then called Denver, and could be sold for big money when they got there. I have no remembrance of Surajah Dowlah's plan for mining. I declined to go with them, and they went away toward Monterey Center, saying that they would stay there a few days "to kind of recuperate up," and they hoped I would join them.

What about Rowena? They had been so mysterious about her! Not that she would be the worse for losing her family. But the tremor in Ma Fewkes' voice and the agitation with which Old Man Fewkes had delivered what in books would be his parental curse led me to think that they were in deep trouble on account of their breach with Rowena.

WHEN I next saw Magnus I asked him if he knew that Rowena and her people had had a fuss. He looked very solemn and said that he had seen none of the family since we had finished our work for Gowdy—a year ago.

"What said the old man, Yake?" he asked anxiously.

"He said he was going to will his property away from her!" I replied. "He said that she ain't no longer a member of his family, Magnus. Don't that beat you!"

"Yes," said Magnus gravely, "dat beat me, Yake." He bowed his head in thought for a while, and then looked up. "Ay can't go to her, Yake. Ay can't go to her. But you go, Yake; you go. An' you tal her dat Magnus Thorndyke bane ready to do what he can for her. All he can do. Tal her Magnus ready to live or die for her. You tal her pat, Yake!"

I had to think over this a few days before I could begin to guess what it meant; and before three days were past she came to see me. It was a Sunday night after harvest. I had put on my new clothes, thinking to go to hear Elder Thorndyke preach, but when I thought of how I had no longer pleasure in the thought of Virginia, no chance ever to have her for my wife, no dreams of her for the future even, I sat down until it was too late to go, and then I walked out to look at things.

Rowena came into my view as she passed the house. I went to meet her, astonished, for she was alone. She was riding one of Gowdy's horses and had that badge of distinction in those days, a sidesaddle and a riding habit.

She came up to me and stopped, looking at me without a word.

"Why of all things!" I said. "Rowena, is this you?"

"What's left of me," said she.

I stood looking at her for a minute, thinking of what her father and mother had said, and finally trying to figure out what seemed to be a great change in her. There was something new in her voice and her manner of looking at me as she spoke; and something strange in the way she looked out of her eyes. Her face was a little paler than it used to be, as if she had been indoors more; but there was a pink flush in her cheeks that made her look prettier than I had ever seen her. Her eyes were bright as if with tears just trembling to fall, rather than with the old glint of defiance or high spirits; but she smiled and laughed more than ever I had seen her do. She acted as if she was in high spirits, but when she was silent for a moment her mouth drooped as if in some sort of misery.

I swung her from the saddle and tied her horse. I stopped to put a halter on him, unsaddled him and gave him hay. When I got back to the house I found that she had taken off her long skirt and was sitting on the little stoop in front of my door. She wore an old apron, and as I came up to her she spread it out with her hands to call my attention to it.

"You see, Jake, I've come to work. Show me the morning's dishes, an' I'll wash 'em. Or maybe you want bread baked? It wouldn't be breakin' the Sabbath to mix up a bakin' for a poor ol' back like you, would it? I'm huntin' work. Show it to me."

WHEN it came time for dinner, which on Sunday was at one o'clock, she insisted on getting the meal, and seemed to be terribly anxious for fear everything might not be good. It was a delicious meal, and to see her preparing it and then clearing up the table and washing the dishes gave me quite a thrill.

"Now," said she, coming and sitting down by me and laying her hand on mine, "ain't this more like it? Don't that beat doing everything yourself? If you'd only try havin' me here a week, nobody could hire you to go back to bakin' it ag'in. Think how nice it would be jest to go out an' do your chores in the morning, an' when you come in with the milk find a nice breakfast all ready to set down to. Wouldn't that be more like livin'?"

"Yes," I said, "it—it would."

"That come hard," said she, squeezing my hand, "like makin' a little boy own up he likes a girl. I guess I won't ask you the next thing."

"What was the next thing, Rowena?"

"W'y, if it wouldn't be kind o' nice to have someone around, even if she wan't very pretty, and was ignorant, if she was willin' to learn, an' would always be good to you, to have things kind o' cheerful at night—your supper ready, a light lit, dry boots by the stove, your bed made up nice and maybe warmed when it was cold."

Dumbhead as I was, I sat mute and looked as blank as an idiot. In all this description of hers I was struck by the resemblance between her vision and mine, but I was dreaming of someone else. She looked at me a moment and took her hand away. She seemed hurt, and I thought I saw her wiping her eyes. I could not believe that she was almost asking me to marry her.

"I never looked your place over," said she at last. "That's what I come over fur. Show it to me, Jacob."

THIS delighted me. We looked first at the wheat and the corn, and some of my cattle were near enough so that we went and looked at them. I told her where I had got every one of them. We looked at the chickens and the ducks, and the first brood of young turkeys I ever had. I showed her all my elms, maples, basswoods and other forest trees which I had brought from the timber, and even the two pines I had made live, then not over a foot high. Then we sat down on the blue grass under what is now the big cottonwood in front of the house. Rowena leaned back against the gray-green trunk and patted the turf beside her for me to be seated.

"I never have had a home," she said. "I never had no idee how folks that have got things lived—till I went over—over to that—that hell hole there!" And she waved her hand over toward Bluegrass Manor. I was startled at her fierce manner and words.

A feeling of impending evil came over me as I looked at her. I turned my back to her as I sat on the ground, and she took me by the shoulders, pulled me down so that my head was lying in her lap and began smoothing my hair back from my forehead with a very caressing touch.

(Continued on Page 85)

95 OUT OF EVERY 100 WOMEN HAVE FAULTY POSTURE

Faulty posture causes backaches, headaches and often more serious ills, as well as loss of grace and style

THE SPENCER SUPPORTING CORSET WILL CORRECT FAULTY POSTURE

We have studied the individual measurements of 1,000,000 women. They prove the truth of the startling statement often made by physicians that 95% of American women have faulty posture. And it is their corsets—oftener than not—that are directly responsible for this condition.

Probably the foremost public health organization of the world has declared that of the thousands of women examined by its experts "70% were wearing incorrect corsets without knowing it"—and that their corsets were wrong because they were either (1) improperly made or (2) "did not meet the specific needs of the wearers."

And wrong posture is as injurious to good style as it is to good health. For style is that indefinable poise which goes with an alert, graceful carriage and reflects perfect comfort and abundant vigor.

Faulty posture leads to ptosis—which means sagging of the abdominal muscles and inner organs, often causing backaches, headaches, poor digestion and more serious ills. Seventy of every 100 women already have ptosis and need special abdominal support.

Many women suppose that an abdominal support is a cumbersome appliance; they think of all supporting corsets as surgical corsets. But the Spencer Supporting Corset, although prescribed by thousands of physicians, is primarily a style corset.

The Spencer Supporting Corset will immediately lift the organs of the abdominal cavity into place and relieve strain on the spine. This gives the erect, graceful carriage and trim straight lines that every woman seeks. The improvement in appearance is instantaneous.

Many women who do not have ptosis have one or more faulty figure lines which show a tendency toward incorrect posture. The Spencer Designing Service will arrest this tendency and restore the perfect lines of the youthful, well-balanced figure.

Every Spencer Corset of every kind is designed and made according to the exact measurements and individual requirements of the woman who is to wear it. If your measurements indicate that special support would give you better health and style, the Spencer Corsetière who measures you will include this in her instructions to our designers. And the corset that they create for you will be yours as no other corset can be. Every line of it, the placing of every seam and bone will be planned to benefit you in style, comfort, and the correct posture that means good health.

As proof of this unique individual service you receive with your Spencer Corset a guarantee backed by a $1,000 bond that every measurement and the description of your figure were actually used in designing and making the corset.

Because we make no corsets except from individual measurements, Spencer Corsets cannot be found in stores or listed in catalogs.

The Spencer Corsetière in your locality is at your service. If you will send for her she will be glad to tell you more about the Spencer System.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT—We make supports for every purpose upon physicians' prescriptions. The designers in our Medical Department are required to have a training equivalent to a course in anatomy and dissection at a medical school of the first class.

We shall be glad to hear from well-bred, capable, earnest women who desire to represent us. Those whose applications we accept will be given free training in the Spencer System of Corsetry. Spencer Corsetry is a profitable occupation in which you have the satisfaction of rendering service to others.

SPENCER Rejuveno CORSETS

Never sold in stores

Reg. U. S. Pat. Office

Wrong posture—fatigue type

In the fatigue posture, which is very common, the sagging abdominal wall, rounded shoulders and flattened spine allow the abdomen to fall forward. Every organ in the abdominal cavity is forced out of place and its action disturbed. Headaches, backaches, indigestion and other more serious ailments are often due to this condition. A wrong corset makes this condition worse. Often the front clasps at the top of the corset poke into the body. A Spencer Corset, especially designed to support the abdomen and relieve the strain on the spine, will correct this condition and prove to you that comfort and style go hand in hand.

Wrong posture—lordosis type

The lordosis, or "sway back" posture is often due to a poorly designed corset which was too tight at the waist line in back. Note the exaggerated curve of the back at the waist line. The result of this posture is that the stomach and other organs sag out of place and cannot function properly. Frequent backaches, headaches, indigestion and many other ills are caused by this condition. A Spencer Corset, designed especially for the needs of the individual, will correct lordosis.

Correct posture—erect type

This is the erect, or normal posture. It is the ideal posture—head and body erect, shoulders square and the weight supported evenly on both feet. Normal posture not only insures better health; it also gives a graceful erect carriage and a smart looking figure, which lends an air of distinction to the simplest garments. If your figure is still youthful, a Spencer Corset will keep it so. If you are one of the 95 out of 100 women whose posture is wrong, a Spencer Corset especially designed to meet your needs will bring it back.

Spencer Corsets are made by The Berger Brothers Company, 141 Derby Avenue, New Haven, Connecticut. If you do not find our representative in your telephone book under the listing "Spencer Corsetière," write direct to us for the address.

Vandemark's Folly

(Continued from Page 83)

"Well," said she, "we won't spoil our day by talkin' of my troubles. This place is heaven to me, so quiet, so clean, so good! Let's not spoil it."

And before I knew what she meant to do she stooped down and kissed me on the lips—kissed me several times. I cannot claim that I was offended, she was so pretty, so rosy, so young and attractive; but at the same time I was a little scared. I wanted to end this situation; so, pretty soon, I proposed that we go down to see where I kept my milk. I felt like calling her attention to the fact that it was getting well along in the afternoon and that she would be late home if she did not start soon; but that would not be very friendly, and I did not want to hurt her feelings.

So we went down to the spring at the foot of the hill. She did not seem very much interested, and soon went over to a big granite boulder and sat down as if to rest. So I went and sat beside her.

"Jacob," said she, with a sort of gasp, "you wonder why I kissed you up there, don't you?"

I should not have confessed this when I was young, for it is not the man's part I played; but I blushed and turned my face away.

"I love you, Jacob!" She took my hand as she said this, and with her other hand turned my face toward her. "I want you to marry me. Will you, Jacob? I—I—I need you. I'll be good to you, Jake. Don't say no! Don't say no!"

Then the tragic truth seemed to dawn on me, or rather it came with a flash; and I turned and looked at her as I had not done before. I am slow or I should have known when her father and mother had spoken as they did; but now I could see. I could see why she needed me.

"Rowena," said I, "you are in trouble."

SHE knew what I meant. I hope never again to see anyone in such agony. Her face flamed and then turned as white as snow. She looked at me with that distressful expression in her eyes, rose as if to go away, and then came back and, sitting down again on the stone, she buried her head on my breast and wept so terribly that I was afraid.

"I ain't bad, Jacob," she cried. "I ain't bad. Take me, and save me! I'll always be good to you, Jake; I'll wash your feet with my hair! I'll kiss them! I'll eat the crusts from the table and be glad, for I love you, Jacob. I've loved you ever since I saw you. If I have been untrue to you it was because I was overcome, and you never looked twice at me, and I thought I was to be a great lady. Now I'll be mud, trod on by every beast that walks, an' rooted over by the haws unless you save me. I'll work my fingers to the bone for you, Jacob, to the bone. You're my only hope. Oh, let me hope a little longer!"

The thought that she was coming to me to save her from the results of her own sin never came into my mind. I only saw her as a lost woman, cast off even by her miserable family, whose only claim to respectability was their having kept themselves from the one depth into which she had fallen.

I knew there was no hope in the cold heart of Buckner Gowdy to which she could appeal. She had told me of his blame in the matter, of her appeal to him, of his light-hearted cruelty to her, of how now at last, after months of a losing rivalry between her and that other woman, the wife of Mobley the overseer, she had come to me in desperation. I tried to look in the face of what I should have to give up if I took this girl for my wife. I pushed her hands from my shoulders and rose to my feet; and she knelt down and clasped her arms around my knees. "I must think!" I said. "Let me be! Let me think!"

I TOOK a step backward, and as I turned I saw her kneeling there, her hair all about her face, with her hands stretched out to me; and then I walked blindly away into the long grass of the marsh. I finally found myself running, as if to get away from the whole thing, with the tall grass tangling about my feet.

All my plans for my life with Virginia came back to me; I lived over again every one of those beautiful days I had spent with her. I remembered how she had come back to bid me good-by when I left her at Waterloo and turned her over again to Grandma Thorndyke; but especially, I lived over again our days in the grove. I remembered that for months now she had seemed lost to me, and that all the hope I had had appeared to be that of living alone and dreaming of her. I was not asked by poor Rowena to give up much; and yet how much it was to me!

I caught my feet in the long grass, fell—and it did not seem worth while to rise again. The sun went down, and the dusk came on as I lay there with my hands twisted in the grass which drooped over me.

Then I thought of Rowena, and I got upon my feet and started in search of her, but soon forgot her in my thoughts of the life I should live if I did what she wanted of me. I was in such a daze that I went within a rod of her as she sat on the stone without seeing her, though the summer twilight was still a filtered radiance. Suddenly all went dark before my eyes and I fell again. Rowena saw me fall and came to me.

"Jacob," she cried, as she helped me to my feet, "Jacob, what's the matter?"

"Rowena," said I, trying to stand alone, "I've made up my mind. I had other plans—but I'll do what you want me to!"

(Concluded in the February Home Journal)

Helpful Ladies' Home Journal Books

NEW JOURNAL BUNGALOWS. Price, 50 cents.
NEW JOURNAL HOUSES. Price, 50 cents.
YOUR FIREPLACE AND HOW TO BUILD IT. Price, 5 cents.
HOW TO BUY YOUR HOME. Price, 15 cents.
WHAT YOU SHOULD KNOW WHEN BUILDING A LITTLE HOUSE. Price, 10 cents.
PLANNING THE LITTLE HOUSE GARDEN. Price, 10 cents.
JOURNAL BIRD HOUSES. Price, 25 cents.
WEAVING THE NEW BASKETS. Price, 25 cents.
BASKETS FOR GIFTS AND BAZAARS. Instructions for Pine Needle Work are included. Price, 25 cents.
HOW TO SEW FOR THE CHILDREN. Hints on saving time and money. Price, 10 cents.
CHILDREN'S PARTIES AND BIRTHDAY CELEBRATIONS. Price, 15 cents.
HOW TO DRY FRUITS AND VEGETABLES. Price, 10 cents.
THE BOOK OF CROCHET AND NEEDLEWORK. Full of ideas for fancyworkers. Price, 15 cents.

THE BOOK OF SWEATERS AND KNITTING. Containing the latest designs. Price, 15 cents.

Order the following booklets directly from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City:

FASHION SELECTIONS FOR FALL AND WINTER. Contains a large variety of fall and winter fashions. Send a two-cent stamp.
MASQUERADE COSTUMES. Novel designs for all occasions. Price, 15 cents. Patterns supplied for all costumes.
THE BRIDE'S BOOK. Charming illustrations, with information regarding the bride's trousseau needs. Price, 15 cents.
YOUR CHILDREN'S CLOTHES. Illustrations and instructions for cutting and making. Price, 15 cents.
THE MATERNITY BOOK; with a comprehensive selection of infants' clothes. Price, 15 cents. Patterns supplied for all designs shown.
SIMPLIFIED SMOCKING. The one-process method of smocking with a pattern for each design. Price, 25 cents.

Except as otherwise noted, address the Service Bureau, THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

Every woman will want this new Dromedary book. Your copy is now ready. We invite you to send for it. There is no charge; no obligation. Address Dept. 10.

The book is full of delightful suggestions for salads, desserts and new Dromedary dishes tested in our kitchens for the average American household.

How we found the most delicious Cocoanut Dishes for you

FIRST a group of cooking authorities was consulted, among them the editor of a famous woman's magazine, the head of the domestic science department of a big university and the chef of a famous Fifth Avenuerestaurant. The oldest and best cook books were searched. The favorite cocoanut recipes of housewives, social leaders and domestic science teachers were assembled.

Finally from a large number the best were tested and are now published. To make the book more complete we included a number of new and original recipes for dates and tapioca.

Get a package of DROMEDARY COCOANUT from your grocer; make up just one good dessert—any one you select from the book—let every member of the family taste it and DROMEDARY COCOANUT is in your home to stay.

THE HILLS BROTHERS COMPANY • 375 WASHINGTON ST., NEW YORK
NEW YORK • LONDON • RUSSORAH • SAN JUAN • SMYRNA • PARÁ
THE OLDEST AND THE LARGEST BUSINESS OF ITS KIND IN THE WORLD

Dromedary Cocoanut

DROMEDARY PRODUCTS

TAPIOCA that is ready in an instant.
COCOANUT that keeps fresh to the last shred.
GOLDEN DATES from the Garden of Eden.

Housing the Foodstuffs

Some Iceless Cooling Devices

By M. H. CARTER

SOME time ago a farmer's wife described her daily routine to me. Enumerating the chores she put through between breakfast and dinner—making beds, washing dishes, scalding milk tins, churning, bunching vegetables for market and cooking dinner, which always included a pudding or three or four pies as mere details—she added in a casual tone: "At harvesting time I have to bake bread every day and ten or twelve pies. From eighteen to twenty-two people sit down to dinner then, all of 'em starving hungry, and when they get up there isn't a crumb left of those pies. If I have fruit enough handy, I make up another batch in the afternoon for supper; if not, I make three or four loaves of cake."

Subsequently I repeated this to a friend by way of illustrating the "simple life" on the farm; but without apparently noticing my point, she pounced on me with the question: "Where does she cool all those pies when she takes them out of the oven?"

I said I hadn't asked—why should I?—and got an amused smile as my friend replied: "I guess I've caught you on something you don't know about kitchens—where you cool your pies when you bake them by the dozen. Since you evidently don't know, just let me tell you it's a big problem to the housekeeper. I find it the main problem about making pies, even three or four. So naturally I wondered how your farmer's wife managed with a dozen on hand at once and dinner to get besides, because in the ordinary kitchen your worktable is the only place large enough to hold so many pies, and cooling them means that you have to give it up when you're needing it most for preparing the next meal."

The whole problem of housing the food until eaten—and especially the breadstuffs products that are cooked in batches to last over several days—has been pretty much left to solve itself as best it can everywhere in the country except in New England. New England tackled that problem in colonial times and solved it with the "buttery."

The Refrigerator Annex

DID you ever see a genuine, well-built New England buttery opening directly out of the kitchen? It is worth seeing—and having. It is a room six or seven feet long by four or five feet wide, occasionally larger, seldom smaller, with a window always faced to the north. Shelves line the walls. Below them, in every properly tailored buttery, is a series of small closets and drawers. The shelf running level with the window sill is the widest, and in my young day was familiarly known as the "pie shelf."

A den of temptation always, I suspect, was that New England buttery to the rising generation, though the New England conscience was supposed to be up and resisting as soon as a child could lisp its name. The buttery itself was an offspring of that same conscience; it was New England's answer to the "Sunday Blue Laws" when no food was cooked in the house from Saturday sunset until Monday morning, and the big families of those days had to be fed their three accustomed meals a day, Sunday or no.

As an adjunct to the kitchen of the average own-your-own-home family, modern architecture has never developed anything superior to the old New England buttery. It provided adequately for the cooling and housing of cooked foods in the breadstuffs line, which must be kept on hand and need a dry, well-ventilated atmosphere or they mold; the upper shelves held dishes, the lower closets and drawers took care of the pots and pans, table silver and linens; and under the pie shelf stood the flour and sugar barrels. In those days the thrifty housewife felt she wasn't really keeping house unless she could dip both out of the barrel with her own hands.

But the high style of living changed all that. The early rising generation that ate in the kitchen gave place to a socially rising generation demanding a separate dining room with a butler's pantry wedged between it and the kitchen. Floor space in the kitchen paid the bill. The capacious buttery found itself transmogrified into a small windowless kitchen closet and a butler's pantry—each useful enough in its way of course. But neither singly nor in combination can they take the place of the old-fashioned buttery, if only for the reason that a butler's pantry is the general thoroughfare between the kitchen and the main body of the house and quite unsuited to the cooling or the housing of cooked foods.

If, however, the dusty butler's pantry and the unventilated kitchen closet are already in your home, you can probably put in the next best thing to the New England buttery, a refrigerator annex.

By rights, a refrigerator annex should be built with the house; and by preference it should be placed in the cellar stairway, both to save kitchen floor space and for greater coolness. But the preference is scarcely possible unless you have an upper landing which will give the kind of corner shown below. At any rate, wherever you place your refrigerator annex, one of its sides must be an outer wall, in order to insert the ventilators on which its keeping powers depend. The annex here shown has two built-in ventilators protected by slat shutters with wire fly screen tacked on the outside. The upper ventilator can be seen in the picture; the lower one is let in at floor level. To create a "draw," each of the three-cornered shelves had its tip cut off, making an open passage between the two ventilators. There is thus a continuous flow of fresh air circulating between the shelves and carrying off odors and vapors when the annex door is shut.

The lady in whose bungalow this annex stands cools there first for about an hour everything that is to go into the refrigerator—left-over meat and vegetables from the table, berries, melons, soup stocks, and so on; she says it effects a noticeable saving in her ice

THE UBIQUITOUS WINDOW-BOX REFRIGERATOR ANNEX ADDS NOTHING TO THE ARCHITECTURAL BEAUTY OF THE HOUSE

A REFRIGERATOR ANNEX BUILT IN THE CORNER OF A CELLAR STAIRWAY. IT AIRS ITSELF AUTOMATICALLY

Another great merit of the refrigerator annex not to be sniffed at these days is its trifling cost, and it would probably save the whole of that out of the ice bill the first year of its use.

If you have no cellar-stair landing, and kitchen floor space cannot possibly be spared, there is another type of refrigerator annex that takes up no floor space whatever: you build it in the wall. This is shown in another illustration bill. In winter she dispenses with her refrigerator entirely and lets the annex do all the refrigerator's work besides its own, which consists in taking care of the nonrefrigerator foods and breadstuffs.

EXTERIOR VIEW OF THE FLOORLESS REFRIGERATOR ANNEX SHOWS JUST A PLAIN SHUTTER

A FLOORLESS REFRIGERATOR ANNEX BUILT INTO A KITCHEN WALL

I asked her, if she were forced to give up one or the other, the refrigerator or the annex, which she would keep. She replied instantly, "The annex!" Its chief merit in her eyes was that it "aired itself out automatically all the time."

"At least once a week," said she, "I have to air out the refrigerator and clean it, and every two or three weeks scald it and pour boiling water down its throat, or it gets smelly. It takes a lot of time to keep a refrigerator in a sanitary condition, to say nothing of cleaning up after the ice man every day, when he carries dripping cakes of ice across my nice kitchen floor. All the sanitary work the annex needs is an occasional wiping off with a damp cloth, and once or twice a year a coat of lime wash that you can mix up in an old tomato can and put on in half an hour."

and was worked out in detail by the owner, who with his wife's help and suggestions designed his house and home himself and had it built the way they wanted it.

Their refrigerator annex works like a charm. The shelves are of woven wire to allow the freest possible circulation of air; the slat shutter is covered with cheesecloth inside to exclude dust and flies. On the outside you see merely a shutter set between two windows.

Compact, convenient, thoroughly aired, needing no floor space, this type of refrigerator annex is admirably adapted to the summer home, the bungalow, the tiny house that must count the cost of every foot of space. But there is one criticism that most of my readers have already perceived. If taken on faith in its good looks alone, this neat cooler promises more than it can sometimes perform; like many another and greater thing, it suffers from the "defects of its virtues," one of which is being so very open-faced and airy, a fine virtue when the outdoor thermometer stands at sixty in the shade. But with the thermometer at ninety the butter will be grease; and at ten above the vinegar will burst its bottle and yesterday's cold roast will have to be carved with an ax. So look before you leap into putting this type of refrigerator annex into an all-year home; look into the annual temperature range of your building site and find out for how many weeks the outdoor thermometer stands at ninety in the shade or zero in the sun, because during those weeks the annex will be of little service except for foods that are not hurt by heat or freezing; and in ordinary housekeeping they are few and far between. This particular specimen, which is just outside of Philadelphia, can be used right along for nine or ten months of the year.

Of stationary refrigerator annexes, the last, the smallest and the cheapest is too familiar to need description—the ubiquitous window box; and if you want a piece of sheer ugliness to add to the outside looks of your house, this is a genuine seek-no-farther. Just how much ugliness you can acquire as your very own for about a dollar-fifty you will see by the picture, and let us hope you will save your one-fifty. Wouldn't you think that that insignificant lean-to kitchen annex was bad enough without hanging out a galvanized iron box, different in color from everything else in the place? There is no concealing that box with vines; it would obtrude its gray back through a Dorothy Perkins in full bloom.

Nothing else about the house counts in the way of looks, because nothing else is looked at. That box catches and holds your eye in spite of you.

The Window-Box Annex

BUT if you care nothing about the outside looks of your home as seen from the trolley car and think only of the convenience of having a little refrigerator annex attached and handy, let me drop this hint.

The temperature range will be even greater than that of the wall-type annex. A friend of mine tells me that when the summer sun falls on her "iron oven," as she calls it, she can "just about roast an egg; and things mold in it worse than anything you ever saw." There is practically no ventilation, no escape for heat or moisture, because the holes in the bottom—when there happen to be any—are covered over by the dishes, pitchers and boxes put in there to keep cool. Side holes improve the ventilation and—present you with quarts of rain water.

"Oh, but you open the window to which the box is attached when you want to ventilate it. I leave my window open all night."

Yes, I know. And you have a mouseproof kitchen. If you haven't, unless you remember to cover every article in the box, so it doesn't get ventilated, you fish a drowned mouse out of the milk pitcher in the morning. Not for me, thank you!

My opinion of the window-box cooler is that it is worth all it costs—to get rid of it.

The New England buttery and the large refrigerator annexes are stationary and permanent features of the kitchen, part of its general architecture; and though it is possible to add any one of them, when you desire, to a completed home, they should be planned and put in at the time of building if you would have them without the high cost of afterthoughts.

All three in common are reached on the floor level of the kitchen without intervening steps or stairs, and satisfactorily solve the food-housing problem for breads and flour products, whose great enemy is mold. And all three depend on fresh air for their keeping powers, not on a low temperature. The low temperature that comes along in winter is merely incidental; sixty-two is adequate for all ordinary purposes. Fresh air—figure out first how to get a plentiful automatic supply of that, and with these hints and illustrations you can design housing arrangements for breadstuffs to suit your kitchen.

Clothes that Belong in the Smartest Gathering

And for less money than any clothes you ever made before

IMAGINE it! The kind of clothes you have always longed for, and for less money than any clothes you ever made before! Imagine having the fulfillment of your dearest desires become an economy instead of a luxury! A wonderful invention—the Deltor—makes it all possible! For now every woman, no matter what the skill of her needle or the limitations of her purse, can revel in clothes that bespeak Paris.

Though the Deltor endows every woman with the talent of a Parisian modiste, its saving comes in addition to that effected by making clothes at home!

Lines! Paris lines! and at less than any clothes ever cost you before!

ENCLOSED in the envelope with your new pattern is this wonderful Deltor. It is not a part of the pattern itself, but a separate patented service—a picture-guide especially planned for the pattern it accompanies. It is a practical, easy-to-follow and marvelously economical interpreter of the smartness that is Paris!

The first thing that the Deltor does is to save you money by an individual layout chart (yes, individual, not just a general chart but one for your exact size and for each suitable width of material). Because of it you buy $\frac{1}{4}$ to $1\frac{3}{8}$ yards less material than would otherwise be possible—a saving of 50c to \$10 on materials alone.

The DELTOR

Saves you 50c to $10 on Materials

Suggests Correct Fabrics
for Each Fashion

- I. YOU buy $\frac{1}{4}$ to $1\frac{3}{8}$ yards less material because of an individual layout chart.
- II. IT guides you in putting your garment together so that you attain the fit, drape and finish of an expert.
- III. IT gives you Paris' own touch in finish—those all-important things upon which the success of your gown depends.

BUTTERICK
Style Leaders of the World

Then you follow the inspired originator, as he tells you, through the simplest of pictures and words, just how he would put your own frock together. You take every step he would take, sewing instinctively, with real professional finesse. Indeed, making Parisian clothes, the Parisian way, becomes far easier through the Deltor than even ordinary dress-making could be!

And finally—the smartest new ideas of finish! This year, with the irregular hem, the bizarre sleeve, bateau neck and oddities of trimming, the finish is the most important part of the frock. But the Deltor illustrates any puzzling new whim which your frock may embody—tells you exactly how the Parisian would achieve the smartest effect!

Your winter wardrobe—brimful of Paris Clothes!

SELECT your winter wardrobe from among the new Parisian fashions which appear at Butterick counters simultaneously with their acceptance in the Butterick Shop in Paris on the Avenue de l'Opéra.

From the simplest blouse for a boy to the most intricate frock for yourself—your sewing can attain a new professional appearance. And no matter how small the garment, the Deltor saves money always!

ESMOND

JACQUARD Blankets

Two Blankets in One

You'll forget the snowy, blowy outdoor chill when you're snuggled under an Esmond Two-in-One Blanket.

The warmth of two blankets—the lightness, convenience and economy of one.

And you don't know how beautiful blankets can be until you see the Esmond Jacquard patterns. From simple plaids to exquisite flowered designs—from pastel boudoir tints to rich dark shades. Any color scheme can be matched.

Esmond Blankets are so practical, too. Their all-over patterns require fewer tubings—finest quality, moth-proof and moderately priced. Esmond Cortex Finish gives unequalled softness.

When you buy blankets ask for Esmond and be sure you see the Esmond label.

The Two-in-One Bed Blanket is a "pair" woven as one, in colors. Originated and made only by The Esmond Mills. Washes better, warmer, and lasts longer than the ordinary pair of blankets of the same weight.

The same beautiful colorings are found also in Esmond Blanket Comfortables, Esmond Crib Blankets and Esmond Indian and Outdoor Blankets.

Send 10 cents for Doll's Blanket and story of "Bunny Carter," a book for children.

THE ESMOND MILLS — ESMOND, R.I.

CLARENCE WHITMAN & SONS, INC. — Selling Agents

"Soft as Rabbit Skin"

Thirty-Cent Meat Dishes for a Family of Four

By CAROLINE B. KING

GIVEN thirty cents' worth of meat, with a few inexpensive vegetables and flavorings, any woman possessed of a little ingenuity and liking for things culinary may provide her family of four with such nourishing, attractive and toothsome dishes that they will cease to demand the costly steak or chop and declare themselves entirely content with the good things she has prepared. To be sure, she must spend a little more time in the cooking of these less expensive dishes, and she must also take especial care in the selection and ordering of her thirty-cent meats. A knuckle of veal may be had for as little as ten cents a pound, or, if it contains a great deal of meat, for fifteen or eighteen cents; or a beef brisket at the same price; or a kidney, the basis of several delightful dishes; or stewing lamb; or a calf's heart, at a cost of about twenty-two cents a pound. How does it happen that we hold them all in such light esteem?

Round steak at twenty to twenty-eight cents a pound is not, I will admit, very fine when broiled, but it is a very adaptable, satisfactory sort of meat when properly prepared. Beef liver, selling in most shops at fifteen to eighteen cents a pound, when cooked appropriately and served in a tempting manner will prove very appetizing; so, too, will lamb's kidneys, which you may have at twenty to twenty-five cents the half dozen and transform into such dainties as are usually served in exclusive hotels and restaurants.

And the possibilities that lie in a calf's head! There is a breakfast of mock sweetbreads to be made from the brains; or if you prefer you may have scrambled brains with eggs or creamed brains on toast. The tongue will provide a delightful little luncheon dish, if braised with vegetables; and there is a choice of several tasty dinner dishes, with a soup for the following day, to be made from the head itself. And the whole cost of a calf's head is not more than fifty cents.

As to corned beef: I purchased a good, juicy piece of corned brisket not long ago for eighteen cents a pound, and when it came to the table as planked corned-beef hash, with its colorful garnishes of carrot and turnip cones and sliced pickle, and accompanied by a tasty coleslaw, it was so heartily received that the very nice orange gelatin, which was to follow it as a sweet course, met with only lukewarm approval. The meat, a nice, juicy piece, was placed over the fire in cold water to which half an onion and a bit of celery were added, and permitted merely to simmer until it was quite tender. Then it was cooled in the liquid, drained and chopped very fine.

A Hash Par Excellence

COLD boiled potatoes were also finely chopped and measured, so that there would be just one and a half times the quantity of meat; then the two were mixed well, a teaspoonful of grated onion and a tablespoonful of finely chopped green pepper added, with salt, pepper and paprika to taste. Then the mixture was moistened with a little of the water in which the meat was boiled, and milk and a tablespoonful of melted butter stirred into it.

Meantime the oak plank was heated very hot and well greased, then the hash was made into a nice oval mound on it and placed in a hot oven to bake fifteen minutes; then it was placed under the flame of the gas broiler—the upper part of a very hot oven would answer as well—and left to brown very delicately. Then little cones of carrot and turnips were placed alternately about the edge of the plank, and small cucumber pickles, cut in quarters lengthwise, arranged in upright fashion around the base of the hash; a sprig of parsley ornamented the top.

Beef pot pie has for its base a pound of round steak cut very thin. Cut the meat into finger lengths, flour these and brown them nicely in hot fat. Slice one large carrot and one white turnip crosswise; then cut each slice in halves or quarters and place in the pan with the meat to become brown also; add two cups of boiling water and simmer gently, keeping the sauce pan closely covered, for an hour. Season well at the end of this time and thicken the gravy with a tablespoonful of flour rubbed to a paste with a quarter of a cupful of cold water; cook for five minutes, then turn into a baking dish and cover with a baking-powder biscuit crust rolled half an inch thick. Bake twenty minutes and serve with baked potatoes and lettuce salad.

Ask the butcher to skin and split the head for you, keeping the brains and tongue whole, and when you receive it in your kitchen wash it well in several waters. Then place it over the fire to boil in slightly salted more costly. But it is not necessary to demand the top of the round, the most desirable section for other dishes; beef from the neck, leg or shoulder will answer quite as well, only be very sure that it is always fresh, wholesome beef.

For croquettes the meat should be rather finely ground, and added to two cupfuls of white sauce made with a tablespoonful each of butter and flour, and a cupful and a half of milk and water mixed, half a teaspoonful of salt, one-quarter teaspoonful of pepper, a teaspoonful of finely chopped onion and a pinch of parsley. Cook till the sauce has thickened, then add the meat and a cupful of bread crumbs. Cook until the meat is done, then turn the mixture into a flat greased pan to cool. Half an hour before dinner form into croquettes, roll in bread crumbs, place in a buttered pan and bake to a crisp brown.

A knuckle of veal, usually regarded as fit only for the soup kettle, will afford a choice and delectable dinner if prepared as follows: Select a knuckle which has plenty of meat on it, even though it may cost a trifle more; at most its price should not exceed twenty-eight cents. Place the knuckle over the fire just covered with cold water, adding a piece of bay leaf, a small onion, a sliced carrot and a small piece of salt pork, diced.

Deviled Kidneys

SIMMER the meat with the vegetables for two hours, then remove from the liquid and place on a hot platter. Make a drawn butter sauce of the liquid in which the meat was boiled, using two tablespoonfuls of flour and one of butter. Season with a dash of mace and the usual salt, pepper and paprika, add a teaspoonful of chopped parsley and serve in a gravy boat.

Deviled lamb's kidneys. Cut half a dozen kidneys in slices, removing the hard cores, then lay them in a sauce made by mixing together a tablespoonful of chili sauce, a tablespoonful of highly seasoned tomato sauce, half a teaspoonful of dry mustard, a tablespoonful of melted margarine, with a quarter teaspoonful of salt and, of course, a dash each of pepper and paprika, also a tablespoonful of lemon juice.

Coat the kidney slices all over with this sauce, then roll them in fine, dry bread crumbs; let them stand a few moments, then cook them in hot fat for six minutes, turning often. Pour the rest of the sauce over them and serve on a hot dish. Heat the plates also, as kidneys are uninviting unless eaten very hot.

Tripe à la Creole. A pound will make a generous amount, as it is very light. Cut the tripe as it comes from the market in pieces for serving, cover with boiling water and simmer fifteen minutes, then drain well, rinse with cold water to blanch, and place in the oven for a few moments to draw out superfluous moisture. Melt two tablespoonfuls of margarine or butter in a frying pan and add one small onion finely chopped and half a green pepper also cut in small pieces and sauté them to a light brown; then stir in the strained juice of a small can of tomatoes and, when boiling, thicken with a tablespoonful each of flour and water stirred to a paste; now add the tripe with a quarter teaspoonful of curry powder, half a teaspoonful of salt and a quarter teaspoonful of pepper, also a single dash of cayenne. Simmer five minutes and serve.

A combination kitchen cabinet, table and refrigerator that holds 75 pounds of ice saves much space.

This versatile cabinet, white-enameled, is just as convenient as it is good-looking.

water, adding one carrot, one onion, a bit of celery and a pinch of marjoram. When it is very tender, remove the kettle from the fire and leave until quite cool. Then cut the meat from the bones and trim it into neat pieces. Make a white sauce by cooking together till smooth two tablespoonfuls of butter or margarine and two of flour, then adding two cupfuls of water in which the head was boiled and half a cup of rich milk. Season well and add the meat with half a canned pimiento cut in small pieces and half a green pepper shredded coarsely and sautéd in a little margarine. Simmer fifteen minutes and serve on toast fingers.

Baked Croquettes of Chopped Beef

STRAIN the rest of the liquid in which the head was boiled and skim it well, then it may be boiled with fresh vegetables for a second day's luncheon or dinner.

The calf's head may also be simply boiled, the meat removed in large pieces and served with Hollandaise sauce. Or, if preferred, it may be dressed after boiling, as calf's head piquant. In making the piquant sauce, cook the same quantity of margarine and flour together, mix with two cups of water, and cook smooth; season well, adding a quarter cup of strained tomato juice, a tablespoonful of vinegar, a small cucumber pickle cut in minute pieces and a single dash of cayenne.

Baked croquettes made from three-quarters of a pound of chopped beef are enough for four persons. Chopped beef may be purchased at between eighteen and thirty cents a pound; if cut to order it is usually —Quite natural that the careful hostess should choose Del Monte. It shows her high appreciation of fine flavor and delicacy.

Where foods must have the daintiest appeal

Whether it be peaches, pears, apricots, cherries, plums, asparagus, spinach or any of a hundred other delicious fruits and vegetables—she knows that Del Monte always gives her the very choicest that Nature can produce.

The convenience and dependability of Del Monte Products make them ideal for every-day use all the year round. Always ready to serve—at less expense than if you had canned them yourself—they lend themselves to endless tempting, healthful menu combinations.

As an illustration of their ready adaptability to any need, serve the following salad the next time you want an especially dainty dish:

JELLIED ASPARAGUS SALAD—Dissolve 1 envelope of softened gelatin and 2 bouillon cubes in $1\frac{1}{2}$ cups of boiling water; add 1 teaspoon of salt, $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoon of pepper, 1 can of DEL MONTE Canned Asparagus. Tip cut in pieces, $\frac{1}{2}$ cup of chopped celery, and 1 chopped DEL MONTE Canned Red Pimiento. Pour into a wet mold, set in cold place until firm and serve with mayonnaise.

For 500 other thrifty suggestions for adding tempting variety to every-day meals with canned fruits and vegetables, you should have a copy of our new book, "Del Monte Recipes of Flavor." Write us for a free copy.

Address Department A
CALIFORNIA PACKING CORPORATION
San Francisco, California

DEL MONTE
ASPARAGUS

No. 751—"Dove" Envelope Chemise of flesh-color crêpe de Chine, trimmed with ecru Val lace and Appenzell embroidery medallions. Two-tone ribbon; satin ribbon shoulder straps. (Center drawing; left-hand figure.)

No. 7429—"Dove" Camisole of white nainsook. Ecru Val lace insertion across front. Lace edge at top and on shoulder straps.

No. 1748—"Dove" Step-in Bloomer of lustrous, flesh-color batiste. Narrow lace edge and pink hemstitching.

No. K5117—"Dove" Pajama, two-piece, of white batiste, hand-embroidered in blue. Hemstitching at neck, sleeve and ruffle.

No. 572—"Dove" tailored style Night Gown of flesh-color Radium silk. Hemstitched with two clusters of tucks in front. Two-tone ribbon bow at neck. (Center drawing; right-hand figure.)

No. 5236—"Dove" Night Gown of white nainsook, trimmed with embroidery insertion and medallions and fish-eye Val lace. (Center drawing; center figure.)

New Lingerie with the Spirit of Paris —but Modest in Price

BEAUTY and novelty of fabric and trimming and equal beauty and novelty in style—these are the essentials of really interesting lingerie. "Dove" Under-garments with their truly Parisian freshness of design satisfy every requirement, not only of beauty but of dependability in making.

"Dove" Under-garments this year celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of their makers. For fifty years we have searched the world for the new and beautiful in materials and trimmings—for the daintiest of America's superb cotton and silk fabrics—for the laces made famous by Calais, the embroideries authorized by St. Gall.

Never before in the whole half-century have "Dove" Under-garments been so attractive as this year, we think. Novelty—restrained or daring—inspires every garment.

Such Fine Cottons and So Charmingly Trimmed

The simplest cotton Night Gown or Envelope Chemise reveals real judgment in choosing the fabric and taste in applying trimming. No matter how small the price may be, the style is tasteful, the laces or embroideries and ribbons are well-chosen, and you may depend upon ample sizes and careful sewing of every seam. If your taste demands the frillest of lacy garments, you will be delighted with the "Dove" styles your leading stores are showing. If you prefer tailored models, the style range from which you may choose is equally broad.

No. E78—"Dove" Hand-Made Night Gown of white batiste. Hand-embroidered and hand-hemstitched, with tucked front.

FROM Porto Rico and the Philippines come hand-made Night Gowns, Envelope Chemises and other garments which rival the best work of the famous French convents. The designs are our own and they show the true French inspiration. The workmanship is superb. Truly, no woman who loves fine and individual hand-made lingerie can fail to appreciate the remarkable quality of these imported "Dove" Under-garments. Nor will she be less impressed by their very reasonable prices—little more than half the cost of similar lingerie last year.

"Dove" Philippine and Porto Rican lingerie brings real hand-made under-garments within reach of almost every woman. This is a distinct achievement, because there has been no lowering of the highest French standards in either the quality of the material or the character of the hand-embroidery and drawn work.

No. 389—"Dove" Under-shirt of flesh-color, washable satin. Tucked blouse of fine ecru Val lace imported from Calais. Two-tone ribbon trimming.

SILK under-garments this year are rich with lace and colorful in material. Some of the most inexpensive styles are made from clever silk-and-cotton fabrics which are as durable as they are novel and pretty. Radium, best of all Fashion's charming creations in silks this year, is the basic fabric of many superb Night Gowns and Envelope Chemises. And satins, georgette, and rich, shimmering crêpes de Chine, in white, flesh, peach or orchid (the last shade so becoming to many women), are used in other equally smart creations.

"Dove" Under-garments of silk are especially notable for their correct, full cutting. So many women have been disappointed by skimpy, incorrectly sized silk under-garments! You may be sure, if the "Dove" label is on a silk under-garment, of full sizes.

The "Dove" Label— What It Means

All our under-garments bear a little blue label with the name "Dove" and the dove picture. If you wish to take advantage of the unusual value and satisfaction which our long experience and high degree of specialization offer, please look for this label.

Although "Dove" Under-garments are sold by one or more leading stores in almost every city in America, and you should have little difficulty in finding them, you may write us direct, if you like, for the name of the store nearest to you. Please do not ask us to sell direct to you. We cannot fill mail orders.

D. E. SICHER & CO., INC., 45-51 W. 21ST STREET
NEW YORK, N. Y.

"World's Largest Makers of Lingerie"

DOVE  Under-garments
Beautiful, well-made Lingerie

Sold by Leading Stores Everywhere

THIS YEAR—1922—IS THE GOLDEN ANNIVERSARY OF D. E. SICHER & COMPANY, INC.

Easy Soups for Busy-Day Dinners

By MARY D. WARREN

BUSY-DAY dinners we call them at our house; those good, savory, nourishing soups that come to the table, not strained and denuded of all their homely, wholesome vegetables and flavorings, but thick and rich, and altogether satisfying, making a whole meal in themselves. We serve them on those occasions when it is desirable or necessary to cut the process of dinner-getting to mere essentials—wash day, house-cleaning time, or when the dress-maker comes. No pièce de résistance is required when such a soup is served. A salad, perhaps, if a simple one, may be relished, with a dessert of fruit, or crackers and cheese with black coffee; nothing more can possibly be desired.

There are three kinds of soup which may be served, if not as entire meals, at least as the principal dish—the substantial soups which have meat or bone for their foundation, those made from the legumes or dried vegetables, and the cream soups.

Naturally, the best broths and soups require fresh meat and bone for their making; but it is possible to make good soups from the left-overs, bits of meat and fowl, ends of roasts and steaks, the bones which accumulate in every kitchen, and the trimmings from steaks, chops, veal cutlets, and roasts, whether beef, mutton, veal or lamb, which are always sent home with the meat itself. These may be used in the manufacture of stock. Ham bones, too, are useful in soup making, even if not a scrap of meat remains on them; and the turkey or chicken carcass; even the trimmings from fish, with the heads and tails, go into a separate stock kettle reserved for them.

BUT this does not mean that the stock pot is always steaming and simmering away on my kitchen range, after the manner which is mistakenly believed to be prevalent in France. Such a course would never yield a fine soup. The bones and bits of meat are collected and kept in a cold place until a sufficient quantity has accumulated for use; then they are cut into small pieces, the fat removed, the bones cracked and placed in the kettle with the meat, a small onion, a sprig of parsley, a very tiny piece of bay leaf, a medium-sized carrot and a sprinkle of celery seed or a few leaves of celery, with a teaspoonful of salt, a dash of pepper and cold water to cover well. The kettle is placed on a cool part of the range to simmer gently for two or three hours, when the liquid is strained and set away to cool. Then the fat is skimmed from it, and it is ready for use in my soups or gravies. If to your scraps and left-overs you add one-third their quantity of fresh soup meat or bone, you will obtain a fine quality of stock.

If soup is to form a standard dish in your household during the cold weather you will wish to make a stock that may be used for several kinds of soup. Here is the process:

Purchase a piece of shin or soup meat weighing about three pounds, crack the bone in several places, and cover with five quarts of water, adding three teaspoonfuls of salt, and let it stand while the flavorings are being prepared. Insert two cloves in an onion and add it with a sprig or two of parsley, a medium-sized carrot, sliced, and half a bay leaf to the soup kettle; a stalk of celery or a half teaspoonful of celery seed with a quarter teaspoonful of black pepper will also be needed; then the kettle is placed on the range, and the liquid is brought very slowly to the boiling point; then it is permitted only to simmer for four or five hours. At the end of this time it may be strained and cooled; later the fat, which will have formed in a solid cake, may be removed from it. The liquid will be clear and amber colored and delicately flavored. The fat may be reserved for frying, and the meat, bones and vegetables, which have been strained from the stock, again covered with water and cooked very slowly, when they will yield a second stock, weaker but excellent for gravies and sauces. These stocks may be poured, while hot, into jars, sealed, sterilized and kept for weeks, ready for instant use.

SPANISH SOUP WITH RICE AND CROUTONS

is one of the many soups which has beef stock for its foundation. It is made by heating a quart of the stock to the boiling point, then adding to it two cups of canned tomatoes, a green pepper chopped fine and sautéed in a tablespoonful of butter with a small, finely chopped onion, and a teaspoonful of Worcestershire sauce, or the same quantity of grated horse-radish with a teaspoonful of vinegar. Season the soup to taste and simmer it for fifteen minutes, then thicken it with a tablespoonful of butter rubbed to a paste with two tablespoonfuls of flour. While the soup is simmering, boil half a cupful of rice in plenty of salted water till tender, then drain it and rinse with cold water. Strain the soup, add the rice and serve in a tureen, with the croutons, which are merely little squares of fried bread, floating about.

BROWN ONION SOUP WITH CHEESE—Use the meat stock also in its making, allowing two large Bermuda or Spanish onions to one quart. Slice the onions and fry them a golden brown in margarine or butter; then add them to the boiling stock and simmer for a few moments. Meantime toast a slice of bread for each plate, and pour the steaming soup over it; sprinkle thickly with grated cheese—Parmesan preferably, though any hard cheese can be used—and serve immediately. Pass a dish of grated cheese with the soup.

For VEGETABLE SOUP a marrow bone or a shin of beef weighing from two and a half to three pounds is the first essential. This should be covered with a gallon of water, two teaspoonfuls of salt added, and left to stand for half an hour before it is placed on the fire. Then it must come but slowly to the boiling point and be left to simmer gently for two to three hours. At this point skim the liquid well, so that little fat remains. Some fat is permissible, but do not be too generous with it. Now add a cupful each of carrots, turnips, celery and onions, each cut in small pieces; also a sprig of parsley, a bay leaf, two cloves and a pinch of thyme. Simmer again very slowly for two hours, then add a cupful of potatoes, pared and cut in tiny bits, and half a cupful of barley which has been soaking in cold water for an hour. Cook until the barley is tender, season to taste and serve without straining.

Canned corn, rinsed with cold water, Lima beans, string beans or chopped cabbage may go into the soup kettle when old-fashioned vegetable soup is under way, if one wishes,

For a really pleasant morning in the kitchen, one should wear a cheerful apron, perhaps like that pictured above. It is of gay, yellow print with yellow bands.

TO THE unquestioned economy of Middy Suits and Blouses, clever designers have added that indefinable touch of smartness which distinguishes all "Miss Saratoga" garments. "Miss Saratoga" Middies have the authentic lines of naval uniforms; snug fit at hips; tailored roll collars; hand embroidered correct insignia; loose blouse sleeves; genuine ivory buttons. These features combined are exclusive to "Miss Saratoga" garments.

Fabrics are both beautiful and practical. Strictly tailored models in serge, Jean, flannel, poplin, Heathergold (knitted wool), real Irish linen and other materials in a wide range of colors. Suitable models for all girls from 6 to 22 years. Prices very moderate.

See the "Miss Saratoga" garments at your favorite store. Write us direct (Baltimore, Md.) for the new style book.

CRIPPEN & REID, Baltimore, Md.

New York Office
1182 Broadway

Miss Saratoga Tailored MIDDY SUITS and BLOUSES

WEAR-EVER ALUMINUM
TRADE MARK
MADE IN U.S.A.

A Good Cook is an Artist

HER kitchen is her studio, and her daily masterpieces of cookery delight her family.

"Wear-Ever"

Aluminum Cooking Utensils

enable such a woman to give best expression to her art.

Made from hard, thick sheet aluminum. Cannot chip, cannot rust—pure and safe.

The Aluminum Cooking Utensil Co., New Kensington, Pa.
In Canada: Northern Aluminum Co., Ltd., Toronto

A one-quart "Wear-Ever" stew pot will be sent postpaid anywhere in U.S. or Canada on receipt of 40c. Stew pot and cover will be sent for 50c. Extra pots for Christmas Gifts, 40c. each (50c. including cover). Offer expires Jan. 31, 1922.

(Continued on Page 92)

Have you a row of Griswold Cast Iron Skillets?

IT'S worth while getting the best kitchen utensils just as it pays to buy good furniture! Both are intended for long use.

And there's a satisfaction in a row of Griswold cast iron skillets which only a woman understands. For the longer you have them the more useful they become. Cast iron wears a lifetime, it doesn't warp and it has no enamel to chip off and get into food.

What delicious fried dishes there are, popular with all the family and so easily prepared! Once you've heated the fat in a Griswold cast iron skillet, it takes very little heat to keep it at the right high temperature; and every good cook knows how important that is! The skillet stays hot evenly all over, too—food isn't burned in one place and underdone in another.

Griswold cast iron skillets come in about a dozen different sizes—you need three or four at least. They range from the smallest, 4¼ inches in diameter, to large ones, 13½ inches across the bottom.

THE GRISWOLD MFG. CO.

DEPT. F-2, ERIE, PENNA., U. S. A.

Makers of the Bala Oven, Extra Finished Iron Kitchen Ware, Waffle Irons, Cast Aluminum Cooking Utensils, Food Choppers, Reversible Dampers and Gas Hot Plates.

MENDEL

Going South this Winter?

YOU will enjoy a new convenience, and a new satisfaction, if you travel with a Mendel Dustproof trunk.

It's wonderfully spacious, and arranged for compact packing. Your garments are safe from wrinkles, safe from dust and grime. You need not unpack until you get home again.

Everywhere Mendel Dustproof trunks are recognized as the choice of those who know.

Write for booklet!

THE MENDEL-DRUCKER CO.

Dept. A. CINCINNATI, OHIO

Look for the Dustproof moulding on the trunks you buy.

Easy Soups for Busy-Day Dinners

(Continued from Page 91)

and a cupful of tomatoes, canned or fresh. In adding cabbage take care not to cook it too long; fifteen minutes should suffice.

BLACK-BEAN SOUP—Soak a pint of washed and picked-over beans overnight or for several hours. Cover a two-pound soup bone with two quarts of cold water, add the beans with the water in which they were soaked, one medium-sized onion, three cloves, a generous pinch of marjoram, the same quantity of thyme and three sprigs of parsley; then simmer gently until the beans are very soft. Now remove the bone, and rub the soup through a coarse sieve, season it highly, not forgetting a tiny pinch of cayenne and a teaspoonful of Worcestershire sauce, and return to the fire to become thoroughly hot. Cut two hard-boiled eggs in quarters, place them and a thinly sliced lemon in the tureen and pour the hot soup over them.

HOLLANDAISE SOUP—A knuckle of veal or a veal shin weighing about two pounds forms its foundation. It should be placed in the soup kettle with cold water to cover it well, two teaspoonfuls of salt, a celery stalk, a small carrot and an onion. Simmer the broth for two hours, or longer if convenient, then strain and pour it over two tablespoonfuls of flour cooked smooth with the same quantity of butter, stirring well to prevent the soup from becoming lumpy. Add half a cupful each of canned green peas, and string beans cut in lengthwise strips, and stir in two eggs beaten with a cupful of rich milk. Cook very gently for a few moments, then remove from the fire and add quickly a tablespoonful of lemon juice and one of finely chopped parsley. Pour into the tureen and sprinkle generously with paprika.

CHICKEN AND MEAT BROTHS are usually more interesting when boiled rice, macaroni rings, noodles or the like are added. As to the noodles, here is a way to make a very delicious variety which has always been popular in my household: Beat one egg lightly and add a generous pinch of salt to it, then work in as much flour as it will take, and knead the ball of dough until it is firm and pliable. Set it aside to become rather hard and dry; then grate it on a coarse grater, in little ricelike grains, to be dried gently in a cool oven, then dropped into the boiling soup.

COCK-A-LEEKIE soup, according to the original Scottish recipe, calls for a tough old fowl; but I prefer a pullet, as the meat is to be served as well as the broth. Clean a chicken weighing from two to three pounds and place it over the fire in sufficient water to cover it well. Cut one-quarter of a pound of bacon into dice and add it with two bunches of leeks cut in small pieces—the Scots like their soup "thick o' leeks"—and cook gently until the chicken is tender; then remove it from the broth and press the latter with the leeks through a sieve. Cut the chicken into pieces for serving and return them to the liquid with a pint of water, a dozen large prunes which have been soaking for several hours, and seasoning to suit the taste. Cook slowly until the prunes are quite tender, then thicken slightly with a tablespoonful each of flour and butter rubbed to a paste, and pour into a tureen on squares of toasted bread. In serving, each plate should receive a portion of chicken, a bit of toast and a prune or two.

POTAGE BELGIQUE is merely a good red-cabbage soup, which may be made with ordinary winter cabbage. Cook a small soup bone in two quarts of water for two hours; then strain and to the hot liquid add a tablespoonful of dripping from ham or bacon, or the same quantity of butter; also one small onion cut in pieces, half a medium-sized head of red cabbage shaved very fine, two potatoes pared and chopped, with salt, pepper and paprika to taste. Cook slowly until the cabbage and potatoes are done.

PHILADELPHIA PEPPER POT has honey-comb tripe as its chief essential, with one-quarter of a cupful of sliced onions and half a cupful each of chopped green pepper and celery and a cupful of diced raw potatoes. Melt one-quarter of a cupful of butter and add the vegetables to it; sauté them to a delicate brown, stirring them constantly; then add two tablespoonfuls of flour and continue cooking a moment or two longer. Pour six cupfuls of boiling water over the vegetables and add half a pound of tripe cut in small pieces, a teaspoonful of salt and half a teaspoonful of pepper. Cook an hour and a half; then add a cupful of cream or rich milk and a teaspoonful of butter. Cook for just a moment, and add more salt if necessary.

SPLIT-PEA SOUP is just the thing for a cold day's dinner. Soak a pint of split yellow peas overnight, and in the morning place them in a kettle with a ham bone, cooked or raw, and two quarts of water. Chop one onion and a stalk of celery fine; sauté them in a little butter or dripping and drop into the kettle; then let the contents cook slowly until the peas are very tender. It would be well to stir the soup occasionally during this process, as the peas are only too prone to stick to the kettle. More water may be required from time to time also if the liquid becomes too thick. Season with salt, pepper, paprika and a dash of nutmeg and press through a sieve. Return to the fire and when the soup begins to boil once more, thicken it with a tablespoonful of butter rubbed to a paste with two of flour diluted with some of the hot liquid before adding to the pot. A cupful of cream or rich milk may be added just before serving.

Bean soup is made in this same way, using small navy or pea beans; red kidney beans or lentils may also be used.

The cream soups require no meat basis, but are very substantial and satisfying, nevertheless. They make excellent luncheons for the children coming home from school, and, followed by an apple and a cookie, are all that a normal child will require at noon.

CREAM OF TOMATO SOUP is one which many persons find troublesome and uncertain as to results, but it is an easy matter to overcome their difficulties. The talisman of success lies in the little pinch of soda added to the tomatoes and the manner in which the ingredients are combined.

Half a three-pound can or a two-pound can of tomatoes should be placed over the fire to cook for fifteen or twenty minutes, with a slice of onion and a bit of parsley; and while this process is going on a white sauce is made by cooking together two tablespoonfuls each of butter and flour, then adding a pint of milk, half a teaspoonful of salt and one-quarter teaspoonful of pepper. Let the sauce simmer until thick; add half a teaspoonful of soda to the tomatoes and as soon as they have finished foaming press them through a sieve. Now combine the two liquids, stirring well, but do not permit them to boil or even simmer again.

All the cream soups are made in the same way, except that the soda is omitted from the others. CREAM OF BEET soup calls for two large beets pared and chopped fine while raw, then cooked twenty minutes in a pint of water, and next pressed through a sieve into the white sauce. A pinch of mace adds a piquant savor to this, as well as to CREAM OF LETTUCE or SPINACH SOUP.

That one may be serenely conscious of looking her best, even while washing the dishes, a trim frock of white percale with coin-dots in old blue and white bands is advisable.

As light and dainty, as refreshingly colorful as if created by the magic touch of Spring herself, these newest L'AIGLON Dresses give expression to fashion's latest dictates.

Their exquisitely fine fabrics and painstaking workmanship assure that well-gowned appearance, as well as the economical wear, every thinking woman demands.

"Cicely" Model—Checked gingham, piqué trimming. Colors red, blue, pink, green, lavender, tan and black. Sizes 16, 18, 20, 36 to 46. Price $7.00.

"Felicia" Model—Checked gingham, organdie trimming. Colors tan, pink, lavender, blue, green and black. Sizes 16, 18, 20, 36 to 46. Price $6.50.

"Vera" Model—Small checked gingham, organdie trimming. Colors tan, helio, green, pink and blue. Sizes 16, 18, 20, 36 to 46. Price $4.50.

"Joyselle" Model—Checked gingham and organdie. Colors red, blue, pink, green, lavender, tan and black. Sizes 16, 18, 20, 36, 38, 40. Price $7.50.

L'Aiglon Dresses

The leading stores everywhere refer to the L'AIGLON label on every dress as the strongest endorsement of both quality and value.

Don't neglect to send for the Spring Issue of the L'AIGLON STYLE BOOK. It displays full figure fashion plates of leading actresses wearing them. Free on request.

BIBERMAN BROTHERS, INC., Biberman Building, Philadelphia

Manufacturers of L'Aiglon Wash Dresses, Bathrobes, Maids' and Nurses' Uniforms

Should your merchant not be able to show you the dresses you desire, send us his name and address. Give names of dresses, colors and sizes, enclose money order covering price, and we will see that you are supplied. Prices slightly higher in Canada and Far West.

The four dresses shown are:

An epicure's way of baking Premium Ham

Premium Ham, because of the delicacy of its flavor, the fine texture of its tender meat, has long been the choice of those who appreciate the best.

For enjoying to the full its rare, delightful flavor, many new ways of serving it have been devised. Of these, one of the most delicious and original is the special pride of a New York epicure —with a hobby for working out unusual new dishes. By baking it with maple syrup he adds a unique, subtle flavor to the always appetizing savoriness of Premium Ham.

Cover a Premium Ham with water and simmer gently, allowing 30 minutes to the pound. Bake the ham in a moderate oven one-half hour and baste with Maple Syrup.

Swift & Company, U. S. A.

Swift's Premium Ham

It is not necessary to parboil
Swift's Premium Hams before broiling or frying

Look for this "no parboiling" tag when you buy a whole ham or when you buy a slice

THE LAST OF THOSE LITTLE DEMON BILLS I SETTLED WITH THE MONEY I MADE IN THE GIRLS' CLUB.

How Alice Smith Herself Paid those Worrying Bills

DID the sight of the mailman around the first of the month ever make you feel sick at heart because you knew that the handful of slim letters he had for you were all "please remit" bills that you hadn't the money to pay?

That has been the experience of another HOME JOURNAL reader, but with a difference: Just when she was feeling so blue over owing money, Alice Smith found a way to make enough extra dollars to settle all those bills.

Let me tell you how she did it. Her plan has worked out with equal success for thousands of other girls and women who have tried it. If you'd like to have extra money it will work out for you!

IT STARTED that morning when Alice Smith, to her amazement and consternation, found that the unexpected bills which had come in since the first of the month amounted to forty dollars.

As she sat there looking at them, it seemed to Alice that those bills were possessed of impish little demons that grinned back at her expressively: "You know you can't pay us. It will take you months to get out of this hole. Easy to spend, but squeezing forty dollars out of your house money is a very different matter! Just forget those things you wanted for the children, and your new shoes, if you please!"

"And I haven't a thing to show for it," thought Alice despairingly. "Five dollars for fixing that chair—I never dreamed it would be so much. And a double gas bill. And here's that bill for the children's 'unders' I sent for in a hurry—I forgot all about that. Oh, why did last week have to be the time for me to break my glasses, on top of these other things!"

Alice hated to owe money. But she hated worst of all to tell her husband, Worry Charley, as generous as he was, when to help her he had gone without a new overcoat this winter, badly as he needed one? "Never!" thought Alice. And then and there she determined to pay those bills somehow.

Now please skip two weeks' time and shift the scene to my own office here with THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL. Come and read a letter from this same lady.

Oh, say, dear Manager, but I am one happy woman! Do you know that I have made fifteen dollars already? It is the first money I ever made in my life! Oh, I am so angry at myself for not writing you long ago! I thought your plan would be something I couldn't do—and here I am just delighted with it.

Two weeks later came this second letter:

Dear Manager: The last of those little demon bills I have settled with money I made by your Girls' Club plan! Isn't that great? Indeed, I think it is perfectly wonderful that The Ladies' Home Journal will give a married woman like me this perfectly splendid way to make over forty dollars in less than a month, without neglecting her family in the slightest. I am making the "grandest plans" for some pretty things for the children and new furniture which I will buy with what I shall be making from now on. I am very much excited!

It is exciting to make extra money. Think of all the things that can be done with it!

A little librarian who joined us "merely out of curiosity" made $75 extra in two months. Results: A lovely muff, a set of ivory toilet things, a new evening dress. Over $50 was earned by a business girl recently, who worries no longer about her doctor's bill. Silverware, trousseaus, talking-machine records, an automobile fund, payments on a little house, insurance—these are a few of the things other girls and women readers of THE JOURNAL are doing with these extra dollars they make so easily.

And you can join us too! All you have to do is to write and find out how we make this money. Write that little note this very minute! Just say: "Tell me how Mrs. Smith and other JOURNAL readers are making money in their spare time." Don't you think THE HOME JOURNAL's special plan ought to be good? I will send you all the particulars immediately, so that you can begin at once. No expense of any kind to you, now or later. Just address me as the

Manager of The Girls' Club

THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL
384 INDEPENDENCE SQUARE
PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA

STEERO BOUILLON CUBES

Reg. U.S. Pat. Off. Patented Oct. 31/1910

How You Can Be Eager at Meal Time

"Oh, boy, some feed!" When you hear a college boy enthuse over just food, don't you have a tinge of envy? Don't you wish that you could get the real joy out of a meal that you formerly did?

Why not try hot STEERO bouillon at the beginning of your meal and then see how good the food tastes?

No bother to make hot STEERO bouillon. Simply put a STEERO cube into a cup and add boiling water.

Order STEERO bouillon cubes today. Be sure the trade-mark STEERO is on the wrapper of every cube.

Send for Free Samples

Let us send you free samples of STEERO bouillon cubes so that you may learn how good hot STEERO bouillon tastes, what a wonderful flavor it has. Write today. If you enclose ten cents we will also send you the 64-page STEERO Cook Book, full of practical and delicious recipes—helpful to every housewife.

Schieffelin & Co.
260 William St., New York
Distributors for American Kitchen Products Co.
New York

"A Cube Makes a Cup"
"Simply Add Boiling Water"

STEERO BOUILLON CUBES—the trade-mark STEERO is on every wrapper—are sold in boxes of 12, 50, and 100. If not readily obtainable at your dealer's, we will mail direct upon receipt of 15 cents a box of 12. Ask for STEERO bouillon cubes.

Dust this Easy Way

A few drops of 3-in-One on a piece of cheese cloth or any soft cloth makes as fine a dustless dust cloth as you could possibly want. Picks up the dust instead of scattering it in the air to settle on other things. Shake your 3-in-One dustless dust cloth out of doors and use over and over again. When it becomes very soiled, wash with soap and add fresh 3-in-One.

3-in-One The High Quality Household Oil

also makes excellent Polish Mops when applied to any ordinary twine mop. Picks up dust and lint from floors, oilcloth, linoleum. Can be shaken out of doors, washed and re-oiled, just like your 3-in-One dustless dust cloth.

There are many, many other uses for 3-in-One in the home—lubricating, cleaning, polishing, preventing rust and tarnish. Read the Dictionary of Uses, wrapped around every bottle. 3-in-One is sold at all stores in 1-oz., 3-oz. and 8-oz. bottles and in 3-oz. Handy Oil Cans.

FREE. Generous sample and de luxe edition of Dictionary. Write for both on a postal card.

THREE-IN-ONE OIL CO., 165D BROADWAY, NEW YORK CITY

FREE This Book on HOME BEAUTIFYING

THIS book contains practical suggestions on how to make your home artistic, cheery and inviting. Explains how you can easily and economically refinish and keep furniture, woodwork, floors and linoleum in perfect condition. Use coupon below.

JOHNSON'S Paste - Liquid - Powdered PREPARED WAX

Johnson's Prepared Wax cleans, polishes, preserves and protects—all in one operation. It does not catch dust and lint—takes all the drudgery from dusting—rejuvenates the original finish and gives an air of immaculate cleanliness. Johnson's Prepared Wax comes in three convenient forms—Paste Wax for polishing all floors and linoleum. Liquid Wax, the dust-proof polish for furniture, pianos, woodwork and automobiles. Powdered Wax for dancing floors.

Mail coupon for our Free Book on Home Beautifying. Tells just what materials to use and how to apply them. Includes color card—gives covering capacities, etc.

S. C. JOHNSON & SON, Dept. LH1
Racine, Wis. (Canadian Factory: Brantford)

Please send me free and postpaid your Home Beautifying Book, "The Proper Treatment for Floors, Woodwork and Furniture."

My Paint Dealer is _____

My Name _____

My Address _____

City & State _____

Out of the Frying Pan

By MARIE JACQUES

BEFORE telling about the dishes cooked in the "friture," which is Colette's word for the big pan of dripping in which things are fried, it may be well to say a word, first of all, as to the friture itself. Any kind of nice dripping will do, provided that it is rendered down and cleansed—not clarified, but just cleansed—by having cut away from it any dark matter that may fall to the bottom when the dripping is set. It should be kept in the pan in which it is used, this pan being deep and large enough to take in the frying basket easily. Before each using warm the pan just a tiny trifle, to loosen the hard cake of dripping from the sides. Slip it out, turn it upside down, and scrape away any little burnt bits that you may find at the bottom. By this means the fat is kept always clean and nice.

Colette does not use a real frying pan for her deep frying. She has a round iron pan, about twelve inches deep, with a little round handle at each side. She always keeps two sets of friture—the big one for things in general and the little one for fish. You can do fish in the general friture, if you like; but you always run the risk of tanging the fat, with the result that you will get fishy fritters and sweets for the rest of the chapter.

There is nothing equal to good beef dripping for the friture. There is nothing equal to fresh butter for eggs and omelets, cooked in an open frying pan; lard makes a good second, while oil fries things to a most lovely color and makes them very crisp.

Friture Batter. 1. Put into a good-sized basin half a pound of flour, one tablespoonful of lemon juice, one tablespoonful of olive oil, and a pinch of salt (no salt if the batter is for a sweet dish). Sift the salt into the flour, and then make a hole at the center and pour in the oil and lemon juice. Pour in also a little cold water, and begin to mix from the center, stirring all the time with a wooden spoon. When you have put in enough water to make a mixture of the consistency of whipped cream, begin to beat across and across, raising the spoon well at each stroke, so that plenty of air may get into the batter. When you have beaten for five minutes put the batter aside and let it stand in a cool place for two hours.

It is not possible to tell the exact quantity of water that you will want, because the amount differs with different kinds of flours. But the batter ought to be thick enough to coat the back of a spoon; also it ought to follow the spoon in a kind of thread when you raise the spoon from the basin (of course, the thread breaks when it is a few inches long); but, on the other hand, it must be so thin that it does not make lumps; it must be a running mixture, not a paste.

2. This is more delicate and more suitable for sweet things. Sift a very tiny grain of salt into the flour, and mix it with sweet milk to the consistency given above. When well mixed, and before you start beating, add a small half-teaspoonful of vinegar. This batter may be used at once if you wish. The whipped-up white of an egg, stirred in batter just before use, is always an improvement to it; but, except in the case of very good dishes, it is rather a needless extravagance.

Fried On Brains. Clean the brains carefully and soak them for one hour in cold salt and water. Put them into a pan with enough cold water to cover them, pepper, salt, half plate, from which it may be scraped off and used again. Keep them very hot. Pile them on a hot dish and garnish with parsley.

A GLASS TOP FOR THE KITCHEN TABLE MAKES AN IDEAL PLACE FOR ROLLING OUT PASTRY. IT IS HYGIENIC AND GOOD-LOOKING, AND WITH REASONABLE CARE SHOULD LAST A LIFETIME.

Any other kind of brains may be served in the same way, though most others need only a few moments of boiling.

CROQUETTES OF VEAL. Any kind of white meat—chicken, rabbit or pork—may be prepared in this way. Melt in a pan two tablespoonfuls of lard or butter. Add one tablespoonful of chopped parsley, pepper, salt, a grate of nutmeg, and two tablespoonfuls of flour, well piled up. Stir all together with a wooden spoon and, when well mixed over the fire, add slowly a small cupful of hot milk, or, if you prefer, a little good gravy. Stir the sauce over the fire till it becomes as thick as porridge. Cut your meat into neat, little squares—quite tiny, please—and mix them into the sauce. Let the mixture get quite cold, and then you will find it firm enough to handle. Roll it into small croquettes, and roll them in fine white crumbs. Beat up an egg. Dip the croquettes into it. Crumb them again. Drop them into deep fat, heated to smoking point, and cook them just like the brains. Serve them very hot indeed, garnished with fried parsley.

PETITES PÂTES FRITES. Take one pound of any nice short pastry that you know best how to make. Roll it out to the thickness of a quarter inch and cut it into circles with something just a trifle larger than a tumbler. Damp the edges of the circles. Now mince any cooked meat that you happen to have, season it well with pepper, salt, mixed spice and, if you like, a little grated onion or chopped parsley. Add to it enough good gravy to make a rather damp paste of it. Put a large spoonful on one side of a round of pastry; double the other side over, press the edges together and pinch them up and down with your fingers to make a sort of frilly border. Now you have things the shape of English turnovers. Drop them into the friture, which has been heated to smoking point, and fry them a nice bright brown. Serve very hot folded in a napkin.

A spoonful of jam folded into the pastry gives a sort of little sweet pie which, when sprinkled with sugar, is most delicious.

FITTERED OYSTERS. Take the oysters from their shells and drop them into boiling water, to which the juice of a lemon has been added. Let them cook in it for a half hour. Drain them very well. Sprinkle them generously with pepper and salt. Dip them into the friture batter and fry them in deep fat heated to smoking point. Pile them up high in a dish, and garnish them with fried parsley.

a lemon sliced, and three small onions. Cover the pan and boil gently for one and a half hours. Drain the brains. Cut them into pieces of the size of an egg. Dip them in the friture batter.

Now heat the friture till it stops bubbling and begins to give off a thin blue smoke. Try it with a bit of bread; if the bread turns crisp and brown at once, the friture is ready. Put in the pieces of brains, one at a time, with a little pause between each. Leave plenty of room in the pan, so that they may not touch each other. Fry them to a good golden brown. Take them out with a drainer, and put them on a sieve with a plate underneath, so that whatever excess fat there may be will drip through the sieve on to the © 1921 S. R. M. Co.

Makes roses bloom in children's cheeks

Comet Uncoated White Rice

COMET RICE makes healthy, happy children, rosy cheeked and alive with vitality. The little ones love the delicate flavor—and Comet Rice is so nutritious.

Grown-ups, too, as well as children, like rich full flavored Comet Rice.

It cooks up pure white—sepal grained. Get a package from your grocer today. Look for the Comet on the yellow package with the red band.

COOK RICE RIGHT—the Comet way

HEAT 6 cups water, with pinch of salt, in large saucepan. When boiling violent add slowly 1 cup Comet Rice. Continue boil 20 minutes—or until grains are soft. Drain colander, set on back of stove until grains are apart. Do not cover—that makes rice hard and soggy.

BROWN RICE. Doctors recommend whole rice with the natural outside coating retained. Try Comet Natural Brown Rice.

Seaboard Rice Milling Co.
Galveston and New York

She Knows That Label Well

FOR more than twenty years the Carnation label has been associated with purest milk. Hence this label is accepted everywhere as a symbol of highest quality. Convenient, economical, pure, use it for every milk purpose. To reduce the richness of Carnation to that of ordinary milk add one part water to one part Carnation. Add a little more water if you have been using skimmed milk in your cooking.

CARNATION MILK PRODUCTS CO.
140 Consumers Building, Chicago
240 Stuart Building, Seattle

Carnation Milk

"From Contented Cows"
The label is red and white

Oyster Stew—1 pt. oysters, 3 cups water, 1 cup Carnation Milk, pepper, ½ tsp. salt, 2 tsp. butter. Clean and drain oysters. Add butter and seasonings to scalded milk. Bring to the boiling point, add oysters and serve. This recipe serves six people.

Chicken Croquettes—Seasoning, 2 cups cold cooked chicken, 1 tsp. parsley, 1½ cups Thick White Sauce. Grind or chop chicken fine. Lemon juice, onion juice and celery salt may be used for seasoning if desired. Add chicken to Thick White Sauce, cool and shape. Roll in bread crumbs, then in slightly beaten egg and again in crumbs and fry in deep fat. Drain and garnish with parsley. This recipe serves six people.

Pie Cakes—2 eggs, 1 cup sugar, ¼ cup water, ½ cup molasses, ¼ cup Carnation Milk, ½ cup butter or substitute, 1 tsp. soda, 2½ cups flour, ¼ tsp. allspice, ¼ tsp. nutmeg, 1 tsp. cinnamon, 1 tsp. baking powder. Cream the butter or substitute, add sugar, well beaten eggs, molasses and milk. Mix and sift the flour, soda, baking powder and spices. Add to mixture and bake in muffin pans in a moderately hot oven. This recipe makes sixteen cakes.

The Carnation Cook Book contains more than 100 tested, economical recipes. You will find many helpful suggestions in it. It will be sent free at your request.

BOULETTES OF COLD MEAT. Mince a pound of any sort of cold meat with a quarter pound of cooked bacon. Now boil and mash two pounds of potatoes; mix well into the meat, adding pepper, salt and a bit of grated onion. Add two beaten eggs, and roll all into wee balls. Dip them in flour, brush with beaten egg, and roll in crumbs. Put them in the frying basket, and brown them well in deep fat. Serve piled up in a high pyramid at the middle of a hot dish with thick tomato sauce poured round the base of it.

CAULIFLOWER FRITTERS. Take the flowers only, and break them into nice neat little sprays. Wash them very well, and boil them in salt and water till they are tender. Drain them. Sprinkle them with salt and pepper and a few drops of vinegar. Dip them into the batter, and fry them in smoking fat.

BEIGNETS OF POTATOES. Steam your potatoes, peel them while hot and beat them through a sieve. Salt them well and mix in enough flour to bind them into a firm, smooth paste. The paste must be just well bound, but not so stiff that it is tough. Work it into a ball, roll it out on a floured board to the thickness of a half inch and cut it into rounds with the edge of a tumbler. Heat your friture till it smokes, drop in the rounds, one at a time, and fry them fast. They swell up enormously, and become almost like balls in shape. Take them up with a skimmer as soon as they are brown; let them drip dry, roll them in sifted sugar, and serve at once. They must be got on to the table without a moment of delay, for as soon as they become cold they fall, and are no longer either pretty or good. If served very hot they are the least expensive and the most delicious of puddings; if made without sugar, they are served as a vegetable.

CRÊPES. That is the French name for pan-cakes, eaten on Shrove Tuesday almost as a matter of religion and at many other times as a matter of pleasure. Put into a deep dish one pound of flour. Make a hole in the middle and break three eggs into this hole. Add two tablespoonfuls of lemon juice, a good pinch of salt, and a tablespoonful of olive oil. By way of flavoring you may add either a little orange flower water or the grated rind of a lemon. Add a little cold water and begin to stir from the center with a wooden spoon, putting in water a few drops at a time, till the mixture is like a thin custard. It should just coat the back of a spoon smoothly, but not thickly. Put the dish in a cool place when the batter has been well beaten, and leave it for three hours. Melt in a small omelet pan a little piece of lard. Pour off into a cup as much of the lard as will come, leaving only enough to grease the bottom of the pan. Put the pan on a brisk heat till it is quite hot, and then, with a tablespoon, pour in the batter, tipping the pan as you do so, in order that the batter may run fast all over the bottom of it, covering it very thinly. Let the crêpe fry for a moment, and when it is brown underneath turn it and fry the other side too. When all are done, fold them; pile them up in a scaffolding on a dish, sprinkle them with lots of sifted sugar and garnish them with slices of cut lemon. The batter must be constantly stirred all the time the frying is going on, so that the thick part may not drop down to the bottom.

CRÊPES WITH APPLES. Make the batter as above. Take very nice cooking apples, peel and core them, and cut them into wafer-thin slices, going right across the apple at each slice. Just before frying the crêpes stir the apples into the batter, and when frying try to arrange things so that at least two good slices are in each crêpe. Lay them flat on a hot dish, sprinkling each thickly with powdered sugar.

FRIED STICKS. Make a store of these at a time, then reheat them to serve with stewed fruits, custards and other soft sweets. Sift one pound of flour on to the pastry board, mixing in with it a good teaspoonful of powdered cinnamon and a half pound of sifted sugar. Chop roughly in it a half pound of good butter, and then rub the butter in with the tips of your fingers till the mixture is like bread crumbs. Make a hole at the center of the flour. Break an egg into the hole, and add two or three tablespoonfuls of cold water. Begin to mix with your fingers, adding a little more water from time to time, till the whole is of the stiffness of pastry. Knead it just like bread till it leaves your hands quite clean. Then roll it out to the thickness of a quarter inch; cut it into narrow strips and twist them, just like cheese straws. Some people turn the strips into little rings; others tie them in wee bows. The paste is so firm and at the same time so flexible that it is easy to handle, and all kinds of pretty things can be made with it. Put a few at a time of your dainty things into the frying basket, and brown them lightly in the hot fat.

A LAUNDRY HAMPER OF RUST-PROOF METAL IS LIGHT AND DURABLE. IT SHOULD BE ENAMELED TO MATCH THE WALLS OF THE ROOM

HERE A THICK SHEET OF GLASS COVERS THE WORKING LEDGE OF A VERY CONVENIENT CUPBOARD, AND ADDS VERY MUCH TO THE APPEARANCE OF THE KITCHEN

Your Boy is getting ready to drop the pilot!

He used to come to you with all his problems, the cut finger, the injured pride, the rankling insult, the flush of a victory, the enthusiasm of a discovery, the pride of a compliment. You helped him understand things. You gave him a sense of proper proportions. Now, he is growing undemonstrative. He is becoming reserved. You are being left out of his confidence. He is getting ready to drop the pilot. The whole duty of parentage is to make the boy independent—to consciously develop his latent resources, to strengthen the weak spots. You should want your boy to think for himself, to be able to judge righteous judgments, to act intelligently—not to need you. From 10 to 20 years is the difficult age with boys. They feel the urge to do things for themselves. They resent interference. But they especially need a friendly hand on the helm. This is the mission and purpose of THE AMERICAN BOY.

Its editors are men who have never forgotten that they were boys. They know the boy slant. They have the gift of being able to put themselves in the boy's shoes. As a result AMERICAN BOY stories are red-blooded, invigorating and inspiring. There is nothing soft, preachy or molly-coddle about them. Each one teaches a real boy-lesson. They handle boy problems with bare fists—their heroes are real fellows who are put to it and who find the clean, honorable, gentlemanly way out. The success of this sort of companionship, suggestion and leadership for boys is found in the loyal, enthusiastic following of THE AMERICAN BOY. A half million wide-awake boys look forward to it hungrily each month. They delight in its stories. They revel in its authentic articles on sports, mechanics, outdoor life and nature. Subscribe to THE AMERICAN BOY for your boy. Give him the comradeship of its authors and editors. Let them help him prepare for the time when he will drop the pilot, work out his own navigation, and steer his own course over dangerous shoals and reefs and ledges. Start with the January number. Mail the coupon today.

PRICE REDUCED! THE AMERICAN BOY is again $2.00 a year by mail; 20 cents a copy at news-stands. Subscribe for a year, or leave a standing order at your news-dealer's.

The Sprague Publishing Co.
No. 358 American Bldg., Detroit, Mich.
Enclosed find $2.00, for which send THE AMERICAN BOY for one year, beginning with the current issue, to

Name _____
Address _____

Some Smart Summer Sweaters Will be Ribbonzine

By ELSA KRAWIEC

IF YOU like new things you will want one of these smart ribbonzine sweaters for summer. If you are also forehanded you will make it now. Paris sponsors them, and American women are eagerly buying them for the Palm Beach and other Southern resort seasons. Fashion, recognizing their appealing qualities, has been very obliging about the matter, even going so far as to decree that nothing shall be quite so distinctive as the simple knitted jumper blouse over a plaited skirt of wool or silk. Ribbonzine, as you probably know, is a kind of lustrous ribbon, loosely woven and "baby" width. It can be purchased in the art-needlework department of almost any large store. It is perhaps a little expensive for sweater use, but the satisfaction of having the newest thing and the knowledge that a ribbonzine sweater made at home at a cost of twelve to fifteen dollars would be sixty or more in the shops go a long way toward a serene and quailless mind.

The Way of the Slip-Ons

THE peacock blue with latticework of silver gray which Alison Bradshaw, of "Mr. Pim Passes By," wears so charmingly in the photograph at the right requires 5 gross of 144 yards each of the blue ribbonzine and 1 gross of silver gray. Two kinds of needles are used: 1 pair of No. 5 amber knitting needles and 1 pair of steel No. 12.

The following directions for knitting the ribbonzine may also be applied to silk-wool floss or Shetland floss, in which case 7 ounces of yarn are required and 1 ounce of contrasting color. If heavy 4-ply knitting yarn is used No. 4 needles must be selected.

With amber needles and peacock-blue ribbonzine, cast on 90 sts. knit in ribbing of 3 plain and 3 purl for 2 inches, then knit 1 ridge with gray. Again knit 1 inch with peacock in ribbing, then 1 ridge with gray, 2 inches with peacock in ribbing. Now decrease at end of last needle, by knitting the last 2 sts. together, so 89 sts. remain. Knit 1 ridge in gray. The lattice pattern is now made as follows:

FIRST NEEDLE: Knit 2 sts. in peacock, slip the next stitch with yarn behind stitch, knit 5 sts., slip next stitch, knit 5, slip next, and so on to end of needle, where 2 sts. will remain.

SECOND NEEDLE: Purl 2, slip gray stitch in purl fashion, having yarn in front of slipped stitch, as this is the wrong side of sweater, purl 5, slip stitch purl fashion, purl 5, and so on to end of needle, where 2 sts. remain after slipped stitch. Repeat first and second needle until 6 needles are knit in all, then change to gray and knit one ridge (2 needles), also knitting the gray slipped stitch, which will draw up long and loose to form the lattice effect.

NINTH NEEDLE: With peacock knit 5 sts., slip next gray, knit 5, slip gray, and so on to end of needle, where 5 sts. will remain.

TENTH NEEDLE: Purl 5, slip gray stitch purl fashion, purl 5, slip gray, and so on to end of the needle, where 5 sts. remain. This change forms the lattice design. Continue in this way until 6 needles are made, then knit 1 ridge in gray. Begin again at first needle and repeat this design throughout the sweater. No further mention will be made of the pattern. Knit until entire piece measures 17 inches, then cast on 60 sts. for sleeves at each side of work. Knit until sleeve measures about 6 inches in width (about 5 designs). Divide for fronts in making the second needle of the gray ridge, as follows: Knit 82 sts., bind 45 sts. for neck, knit in pattern on the remaining 82 sts. for 2 lattice designs. Then knit other 82 sts. up to same point. Cast on 45 sts. in center, and join, again having 209 sts. on needle. Allowing for the 2 designs at shoulder, knit until there are about 5 designs in second half of sleeve (12 in all). Bind off the 60 sts. of sleeves on each side and continue knitting in pattern until there are as many lattice patterns in the body sections of the front as there were at the back before the

For a strenuous game of golf on a sunny Southern morning Miss Bradshaw deems a slip-on sweater of peacock-blue ribbonzine with latticework of silver gray entirely practical and smart.

A simple slip-on blouse of silver-gray ribbonzine, knitted in blocks and banded in white Angora, proves most becoming to Alison Bradshaw, the lovable and talkative "Dinah" of "Mr. Pim Passes By." Miss Bradshaw is also known on the screen.

sleeves were cast on. Then knit the ribbing on front, like at back. Bind off loosely.

CUFFS: With steel needles pick up 40 sts., knit in ribbing for 4 inches.

FINISH AT NECK: With steel needles No. 12 begin at shoulder, pick up 57 sts., to other side of shoulder, across the front of sweater, knit in ribbing of 3 plain and 3 purl for 2 inches. Pick up 57 sts. on back of sweater, same as on front from shoulder to shoulder, knit same 2 inches. Bind loosely. Join the seam on ribbing at neck, and turn ribbing back onto sweater and baste in place.

For Miss Bradshaw's silver-gray slip-on blouse 6 gross of 144 yards each of ribbonzine are used and a half-ounce ball of Angora wool. Use 1 pair of No. 5 bone knitting needles and 1 No. 4 crochet hook. In Shetland floss or silk-wool floss, 8 ounces are required.

Cast on 90 sts., knit in ribbing of 3 plain and 3 purl for 6 inches. Then knit in block stitch of 4 plain and 4 purl, alternating after every fourth needle until the entire piece measures 17 inches. Now cast on 60 sts. at each side of work for sleeves, having 210 sts. on needle, knit until the sleeves measure 6 inches in width. Now knit 95 sts., put on a stitch holder, bind 20 sts. for neck, knit 4 blocks on the remaining 95 sts.; then increase 1 stitch at neck in each block, and bind off the 60 sts. of sleeve, when this is 12 inches wide in all. Continue knitting on the remaining sts., increasing as usual until there are 4 blocks knit after the binding off of sleeve. Then put these sts. on a stitch holder and knit other side of front up to same point. Join, and continue knitting until there are as many blocks from where sleeves were bound off as there are at back. It is more reliable to count the blocks after measuring, to assure perfect accuracy. Knit the ribbed section at bottom of blouse same as on back. Join the underarm and sleeve seams. With Angora wool crochet 4 rounds of single crochet stitches around neck, beginning at inside of garment, then turn back onto blouse and baste in place. There are also 3 rounds at cuffs, beginning at inside of sleeve. Turn up about 1 inch of sleeve to form cuff. If heavier yarn is used No. 4 needles must be selected.

Making the Tuxedo

MISS BRADSHAW'S beaded Tuxedo sweater is made of 12 balls of silk-wool floss or Shetland floss and 1000 wooden or glass beads, and is knitted with 1 pair of No. 5 amber needles and 1 pair of No. 70 needles for cuffs.

With amber needles cast on 96 sts., knit 1 ridge. The beads for border—about 160 beads—must be strung onto yarn before casting on sts. Knit 3 sts., slide a bead over close to last stitch made, knit 3 sts., again drop bead, and so on to end of needle. Knit 5 needles, which will form 2 ridges on the bead side of work, then knit another "bead" needle. Continue in this manner until there are 5 rows of beads. Then knit in block stitch of 3 plain and 3

Sports wear can be distinctly feminine, as Miss Bradshaw has discovered; here she wears a Tuxedo blouse of silk-wool floss in dull blue, bordered with rows and rows of black wooden beads.

purl, for 3 needles. In fourth needle alternate, knitting the purlled stitch plain and the plain stitch purl, thereby forming the block design. Continue in this pattern, alternating after every third needle, until the entire piece measures 18 inches in length without stretching. Then cast on 42 sts. at each side of work for sleeves. Knit on these 180 sts. for 4 inches. The bead border at neck is now to be started as follows: Knit in block-stitch pattern for 69 sts., drop bead, knit 3 plain, drop bead, knit 3 plain, and so on until 15 beads have been dropped and 69 sts. remain on other needle. Knit these 69 sts. in block-stitch design. Repeat this last needle, knitting the stitches of border where beads are dropped plain, the others in design. When there are 4 bead rows, each having 5 needles between them, like at bottom of sweater, divide the sts. for fronts. Knit 79 sts., put on a stitch holder, bind 22 sts. for neck, knit 3 blocks on the other 79 sts. There will be a border of 4 beads at neck and down the fronts of sweater. Always knit 10 stitches in this border plain, the others in block stitch. Increase at neck to form V, in the first stitch after the 10 sts. of bead border, by adding 1 stitch in each block, until the sleeves are 12 inches in width, then bind off the 42 sts. of sleeve and continue the increases in every block at neck for 6 blocks. Then knit border as usual, and design without increases, until there are as many blocks in front as there were in back section before the sleeves were cast on. Then knit the plain knit border as on back, having 5 bead rows. Take sts. off stitch holder at shoulder, knit other front in same manner. Pick up the sts. of sleeve, about 40, knit 1 ridge plain, then knit bead rows until there are 4 bead rows. Transfer to steel needles and knit cuffs in ribbing of 2 plain and 2 purl for inches. Bind off.

BELT: Cast on 14 sts., knit 1, drop bead, knit 3, drop bead, knit 3, drop bead, and so on until 5 beads are dropped and 1 stitch remains. Knit 5 bead rows, then knit plain ridges until belt measures 52 inches, then finish with bead rows like at beginning. If heavier yarn is used large beads must be purchased.

Minute Tapioca

A Friend of the Family

Minute Tapioca Pudding is liked by them all. The flavor appeals to Father's sweet tooth. Bill likes it because he can always have two helpings. It looks pretty and so it is Sister's choice. Grandma knows how digestible and nutritious it is. Mother likes it because the family like it and it is so quickly and easily made.

Serve it Often

Minute Tapioca should be used in many other favorite dishes. Use it in soups, baked dishes, for thickening pies and gravies, as well as for desserts. It blends with fruits, vegetables, fish or meat. It is an energy-building food. It is good for children as well as for the grown-ups.

Requires No Soaking

Minute Tapioca is always ready for use. It may be thoroughly cooked in fifteen minutes. It is always to be identified by the red and blue package.

Send for the Free Minute Cook Book containing over a hundred splendid receipts MINUTE TAPIOCA COMPANY, 11 Jefferson Street, Orange, Mass.

Makers of Minute Tapioca, Minute Gelatine and Star Brand Pearl Tapioca

Minute Tapioca Cream

Boil in a double boiler 15 minutes, one quart of hot milk, 3 heaping tablespoons Minute Tapioca and a little salt, stirring frequently. Beat together the yolk of one egg, $\frac{1}{2}$ cup of sugar, one tablespoon cold water, and at the end of 15 minutes stir into milk and tapioca. Boil until it begins to thicken like custard. Remove from fire and add any flavoring desired, then, while it is hot, fold in the white of the egg, which has been beaten until very stiff and dry. Put in oven to brown the meringue if desired. This is delicious poured when cold over oranges or any fruit or berries.

NONE SUCH MINCE MEAT

"Like mother used to make"

—and Mince Pie with Coffee

What could be better for the end of a good meal than None Such Mince Pie?

The eleven good things that go into None Such are prepared for you in our spotless kitchens. None Such goes to you with nine-tenths of the work in pie-making done. All you have to do is to add the finishing touches. Pie made with None Such is delightful; it is nourishing and easily digested as well.

Order None Such Mince Meat from your grocer or a None Such Pie from your baker. Remember that None Such Mince Meat has set the standard for over thirty-five years.

Many other delightful dishes can be made with None Such Mince Meat.

Try this recipe

NONE SUCH DRESSING FOR DUCK

Make dressing in the usual way; add one package None Such Mince Meat and more apples and some celery to suit individual taste.

Merrell-Soule Sales Corporation, Syracuse, New York

None Such Mince Meat comes in two convenient forms: in cans, ready for use; in packages, condensed

EVERY THURSDAY IS NONE SUCH MINCE PIE DAY

Little Things to Give a Touch of Style

3409

A prosy coat suit suddenly develops personality when one of these new silk duvetyne vests is worn under it. One is gray, trimmed with steel nailhead buttons; the other is henna, with black jet buttons down front.

3374-Transfer, 15006

ONE feels inclined to indulge in superlatives and call the frock above the easiest dress in the world to make. For it is really so simple as to make failure practically impossible. All you have to do is to cut out the neck and sleeves and sew it up, just as you used to make doll's dresses of a primitive order. The only difference is that for this dress you do take the trouble to plait the extra fullness that comes under the arm. It was a superfluous touch for a doll dress, of course. The neck is finished with a cord and the waistline with a girdle.

But what you escape in actual dressmaking you make up in handwork on this frock, for that nine-inch embroidery is done right on the dress. The pattern is an Egyptian one. The color possibilities for this embroidery are many. Brick red or henna would be especially attractive with a few threads of gold outlining the border. Rich yellows, browns and coppers, any metallic thread, would be suitable.

The dress might be made of tricotine, in which case the design might be embroidered in lightweight wool in bright colors. For summer the frock of white linen, embroidered in black and white, would be stunning. The new fast dyes in embroidery cottons make this feasible.

The silk duvetyne vests shown above might be made in any popular color to

A one-piece dress, which is cut from the material literally in one piece, is this of black Canton crepe whose brick-red Egyptian embroidery gives it a touch of rareness. The dress pattern is 3374 and comes in sizes 16, 36, 40 and 44.

tone up the workaday suit. They are worn, too, in place of a blouse, when the coat is not to be removed. The new fuchsia shade would make an extremely attractive vest to wear with a navy-blue suit; all reds, a soft light yellow, grays and chamois colors

PHOTO BY NICHOLAS HURRY

15007

3410

Banish the old telltale narrow sleeve, put in one of these new wide ones, and last year's dress can face the world with equanimity. For the coat, a wide cuff of fur, as in top-most sketch, will turn the trick. The pattern, in three sizes, includes all the sleeves except the coat sleeve.

would be good. The vest at the left has a link belt of the duvetyne and V neck.

There's many a left-over dress this year whose sleeves, being narrow and therefore old-fashioned, stand between it and public appearance. But, presto! Above are four ways out for the blouse or dress and one for the coat.

The device for the coat sleeve is simple enough. Great cuffs cut from fur are put on the sleeve near the elbow, where they hang in shaggy elegance, brazenly pretending they have been there all the time!

The dress sleeves are of various types. The two upper ones have big armholes, which are especially to be recommended if the old blouse or dress has worn places under the arm. The lower ones reverse the order, having small armholes and flaring cuffs. Printed silk crepe may be used, as well as plain colors, with all kinds of wool frocks, and plain or printed chiffons with silken ones.

The Parisian bags shown at the left are especially beautiful ones and sell in New York shops for from $35 to $50. They can easily be made at home, for the patterns give directions both for mounting on a frame and for gathering the bag on a cord.

If you buy these lovely French bags, there won't be much left to put inside, but to make them costs comparatively little. One is blue taffeta beaded in steel, the other is of softest gray satin beaded in steel. The pattern gives complete directions for making both.

Patterns may be secured from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City.

How to use powder

This Chatty Little Booklet, "The Etiquette of the Powder Puff," tells of dainty arts that every woman can master...

...we want you to have it

A fresh, youthful skin, velvet-smooth and aglow with healthful color, is not a favor bestowed by chance on a favorite few—women are learning more and more, as did the beauties of the Old South, that it is largely a matter of simple care and knowledge of the true arts of the toilette.

In a friendly, authoritative way, this interesting little booklet tells of those intimate arts of the complexion. It tells, too, about powder, and how to use it in the toilette, and it introduces you to Freeman's, for almost fifty years the preferred powder of those dainty women of the Old South.

May we send you a copy? Your name and address on the attached coupon, with ten cents in coin or stamps, will bring it promptly, together with generous samples of Freeman's, in four tints.

—Since 1876—
Freeman's
FACE POWDER Talc-Rouge

Freeman's, in four natural tints—white, flesh, pink, brunette—for exactly your individual coloring, can be had at almost any drug store, department store or beauty shop. Ask for a box today—compact, powder or rouge—know the joy of a smooth, velvety skin of petal-like loveliness.

Fill out and mail today

The Freeman Perfume Co.,
2001 Norwood Ave.,
Cincinnati, Ohio.

Gentlemen: I am enclosing ten cents in stamps (or coin) for your booklet, "The Etiquette of the Powder Puff," and four samples of Freeman's.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____

State _____

Give Your Skin Every Chance

You would not venture into the cold, wintry outdoors with hands ungloved; then surely your face deserves equal protection from the harsh winds and snappy frosts of winter. The soft texture of a fine skin must be guarded to be retained. Use D. & R. Perfect Cold Cream and you will know that your skin is getting the best of care to keep it at its best.

D. & R. Perfect Cold Cream will insure you against the inroads of bitter weather. The charm of a really good skin never loses its appeal. This "perfect" toilet requisite keeps your skin fine and soft. In tubes, 12c, 30c, 60c. In jars, 40c, 60c, $1.00, $1.65.

TRY IT FREE—Write for free tube of this perfect skin cleanser and complexion beautifier. Address: Daggett & Ramsdell, Dept. 924, D. & R. Building, New York.

DAGGETT & RAMSDELL'S
PERFECT COLD CREAM
"The Kind That Keeps"

The Original
Knit Waist

For Boys and Girls

Nazareth Waist

This is a high-quality knit waist at a popular price. We have maintained our high-quality service for 35 years. This fact is proof that the Nazareth Waist is made to wear well, to add to the comfort of children and to satisfy mothers with the service it gives.

Suspender tapes support outer garments. Buttons front or back for boy or girl. Metal pin-tubes prevent garter tears. Look for the Nazareth name in red. Sizes 2 to 15 years.

Nazareth Waist
Union Suit

Introduced years ago, this three-in-one undergarment has continued to give satisfaction because it saves you time, labor and money. One garment to put on, wash and buy instead of three separate undergarments. Sizes 2 to 15 years for boys and girls.

SEND FOR NAZARETH DOLL CUT-OUTS

Two dolls in color, with two costume changes for each one; enclose two-cent stamp.

NAZARETH WAIST CO., Dept. K, Nazareth, Pa.

Old-Time Patchwork and Appliqued Quilts

(Continued from Page 31)

A quilt will tell no tales, and into it are stitched the gay barbaric colors that a pioneer woman may not have in her clothing; into it go the eccentric design that is her escape from the dull routine of the usual, the inevitable; into it go her gaiety and humor unquenched even by the dry life of hard work. Note the humorous names of quilts: "Shoo Fly," "Toad in the Puddle," "Hair-pin Catcher," "Old Maid's Puzzle," "Hobson's Kiss."

It may seem to be a poor substitute, this vicarious adventuring instead of the real thing, but the thrill of playing with colors, of creating new patterns for them, of putting blue where everybody else puts yellow, of doing the unexpected, the novel, the daring thing, with bits of cloth and a needle and thread, is a real thrill just the same, and artistically satisfying, however humble its sounds. And there is no need to apologize for the humbleness of quilt making, for in the world of handicraft it has a high and honorable position.

It is not known when quilt making first began in this country. Probably the first quilt was made of "pieces" over here during the first spare hours of the earliest English or Dutch women settlers. Quilting as a type of needlework was common in England and Holland during the period of America's colonization, and the new country presented rigorous winters, so it was as a matter of course that the Colonial mothers sat down to piece quilts in their odd hours of leisure (?) between the labors of apple drying, candle making, weaving, baking and washing. They pieced quilts for the beds, curtains for the doors and windows, petticoats and jackets for the family.

This was the beginning of a woman's art that soon well-nigh reached perfection. Mother taught daughter, and neighbor taught neighbor, patterns were eagerly exchanged. And to-day we have in public and private collections about four hundred and seventy-five patterns which have been retained for their beauty and originality.

Old Clothes and Make-Over Magic

(Continued from Page 59)

whose high waistline and round neck tell the tale of long service, the model shown in D is a solution. Nothing new need be bought except the trimming, and you may have that. If the dress is pink, old blue velvet ribbon is effective; if the dress is black net or chiffon, use a strip of jet trimming or velvet of the same color as the dress, if no contrast is desired. To achieve the indispensable low-waistline effect, cut off the skirt at the top, piece the material on to the waist, bringing the fullness down to the new waistline, where it is sewed on to the skirt again. Cover up the lines of piecing with a strip of trimming around the old waistline and again where skirt and waist join. Run the trimming around the cut-out neck and down the sides of the waist panels in both front and back. The original French model used undulated velvet ribbon for the trimming, an effect accomplished by plaiting the ribbon and then tacking it down to the dress between the edges of the plaits.

A simple little evening dress that has seen better days will perk up and go gayly through another season if it is ministered to with new chiffon as in sketch H. The bodice may be lowered to meet the skirt by piecing under the belt, or a bodice of brocaded silk may be put in if the old one is soiled or split. The strips of chiffon are picoted and plaited and attached to the string belt, which is separate from the old dress and donned like an apron.

These plaited chiffon panels may fall to the bottom of the skirt or below it. If the dress is a plain silk one the bodice might be embroidered in running stitches in silver thread in blocks two inches square or in any other design. With silver embroidery the belt might be of silver ribbon.

Two old dresses may be joined together in a happy union if the ideas in sketches F and G are used. An old crepe silk dress of gray or chambray or henna color would be an ideal slip for F, if the overdress were dark blue, brown or black cloth. Again, it may match the overdress. The old cloth dress is slit up the back and front, brought down to a slightly long waistline and given a fancy belt. The panels of this overdress hang loose. The neck line is cut away again and the sleeves, which are a part of the slip, may be changed as in A or B.

A new frock like the model in G may be made of a tired old foulard dress and a serge dress or of two old silk dresses, if they are of harmonious colors. Either material may be used for the waist or the skirt. If the serge dress has a good waist and a shiny skirt, use the serge for the top of the dress and make the skirt of dozens of picoted silk scallops. Scallops are an excellent make-over idea, because they can be made of exceedingly small pieces. Put a few of the scallops in two rows around the sleeves, making them flare for the necessary wide effect.

Southern Clothes that are Harbingers of Summer

(Continued from Page 55)

No. 3416 is a smart frock for practically any figure. It is made of white silk crepe in the popular apron style with fullness in the blouse, a long waistline and effective cartridge plaits across the front at the top of the apron. The apron provides an easy method of trimming. Bands of contrasting color in crepe silk might be laid on the apron and across the sleeves. The pattern comes in sizes 16 years, and 36 to 42 inches.

An echo of basques and hoops is heard faintly in No. 3418, which has a straight plain blouse, a full skirt, and is made of spotted linen with intervals of white linen. The pattern comes in sizes 16 years, and 36 to 42 inches.

A tailored frock, not too severe, is No. 3421, which could be made in checked gingham with plain linen or cotton. The back and front panels of the skirt are applied and, like the body of the waist, might be of the plain color. The raw edges of the scallops are overlaid with a flat braid, matching the panels. The pattern comes in sizes 14 to 20.

A cape that will stand the weather is the soft wool, red-and-gray checked. The coat is Cossack style, the cape set on a yoke and forming the sleeves.

An ideal frock for ratine, and equally good for linen or gingham, is the little morning tailored model, No. 3415. It is piped with black. The simulated deep yoke is achieved by allowing the skirt to come slightly above the waistline under the narrow belt. The pattern comes in sizes 16 years, and 36 to 42 inches.

The fabric suggested for the frocks on pages 54 and 55 are the outstanding cotton and linen materials for next summer. In wools, soft cashmere, weaves and cloths of the serge family, supple gray cloth bordered or barred in color, crepey wools and homespuns will be best for general wear throughout both spring and summer.

Today's interpretation of a favorite old-fashioned dish

MANY a woman's complete dower—in the old days of good things to eat—was her ability to concoct flavorful, savory dishes for the delectation of her household. Nor was it a dower to be despised by one who had tasted of those homely delicacies!

A favorite that was almost a staple was the combination of dried beans simmered for hours with generous pieces of home-cured pork and flavored lightly with spices and salt and sugar. A stroke of culinary genius discovered that pork and beans were natural complements and gave to the world a delicious and popular dish.

Beech-Nut Pork and Beans have that old-time flavor

The skill which gave you Beech-Nut Bacon now makes it possible for you to enjoy this delicious old-fashioned dish, without all the fuss and trouble your grandmother went through.

For the Beech-Nut people—famous for the excellence of their foods—produce Pork and Beans which have that genuine old-time goodness.

To get the exact blending of natural flavors, which is the secret of old-fashioned cookery, the Beech-Nut Packing Company chooses first-grade, hand-picked beans and combines with them the right quantities of Beech-Nut cured pork and delicious tomato sauce. Unstinted time and money have been spent on perfecting Beech-Nut Pork and Beans so that they would take their place with the other famous "foods of finest flavor."

15 cents for a full pound puts them at everyone's disposal

Order some from your grocer and learn for yourself the delicious old-time flavor of Beech-Nut Pork and Beans. The price is 15 cents east of the Mississippi.

BEECH-NUT PACKING COMPANY
CANAJOHARIE, N. Y. Plants at Canajoharie and Rochester, N. Y.

BEECH-NUT "Foods of Finest Flavor"

Bacon
Peanut Butter
Pork and Beans
Tomato Catsup
Chili Sauce
Ginger Ale
Oscar's Sauce
Macaroni
Spaghetti
Cider Vinegar
Prepared Mustard
Jams, Jellies, Marmalades and Preserves
Confections
Mints
Chewing Gum

Beech-Nut ^{Pork} and Beans

When ice-sleighs had their day

In grandmother's memories of her girlhood days, there is a favored place for the ice-sleigh and the happy hours it made. There is a favored place, too, for COLUMBIA YARNS. For it was in grandmother's girlhood days that COLUMBIA YARNS made their debut—a debut that introduced to the womenfolk of America yarns of beautiful colorings and unusual quality. Half a century has elapsed since COLUMBIA YARNS first were sold. Times have changed and styles have changed, but the COLUMBIA reputation for beauty and quality has endured. It is, therefore, only natural that womenfolk of today place complete confidence in the yarns that are identified everywhere by the well known COLUMBIA label.

Use COLUMBIA VIGOR for fine brushed wool effects. Hats, scarfs and sweater trimmings knitted of this special yarn have a rich, fluffy, stylish appearance that is unsurpassed. It is made in all fashionable colors.

WM. H. HORSTMANN COMPANY Established 1876 PHILADELPHIA

In its reward, the art of knitting stands apart. . . . Unlike other arts, it offers neither laurels of fame nor commemoration in marble. But in their stead, it offers even greater recompense. It brings to every woman who knits the satisfaction and the happiness that are born only of useful purpose, useful effort and useful accomplishment. . . . In its reward, the art of knitting stands apart.

COLUMBIA YARNS

My Years on the Stage

(Continued from Page 13)

stage one night. In Love on Crutches there was a scene in the last act in which Lewis and I stood at the back of the stage, partly concealed from the audience. We were not supposed to be seen by the characters on the stage. Mrs. Gilbert and William Gilbert (he was no relation whatever) were playing a scene that was full of laughs before an American audience.

On this night before a German audience it was going very badly. Lewis whispered to me: "I'll bet you that Grandma gets the first laugh."

Before I could answer him I got the first laugh, for just then my dresser, who had followed me down from the dressing room, pulled up my coat at the neck. He had not been quite satisfied with the way the coat set and righted it in full view of the audience.

Our happy relations were somewhat strained in Berlin by the abrupt departure from the company of Edith Kingdon. Just before we left London she had been called upon with almost no notice to play Ada Rehan's part in A Night Off, as the latter was ill. She played the part very well. In Love on Crutches she had scored a great comedy success in both New York and London. When she left the company on account of a misunderstanding with Daly, Virginia Dreher was forced to play Marjorie Gwyn without sufficient rehearsal.

In Germany there was no entertaining for the company, but in London we were asked about a great deal and we met a great many of the people interested in the arts—the writers, both English and American, editors, painters and a great many persons of our own profession.

Of James McNeill Whistler we saw a great deal. One time at the house of an English authoress he showed me his book, The Gentle Art of Making Enemies, which I had not seen before. He was on the arm of the sofa on which I was sitting, and as I turned over the pages he would point out especially the things that seemed good to him. He had a boyish delight in showing me the roasts and the slaps.

Robert Browning was at lunch one Sunday at the house of George Boughton, the painter. Boughton was standing before the fireplace with a man who was partly bald and had whitish hair, white mustache and a white small beard—chin whiskers they are called in make-up.

How He Met Browning

BOUGHTON turned to his companion: "You know John Drew, don't you?"

The small man answered: "No, I do not; but I have had the pleasure of seeing Mr. Drew and Miss Rehan act in The Taming of the Shrew, and I am pleased to say how much I enjoyed it and how pleased I was with such talent and success."

I thought to myself: "He's going a bit strong."

I asked Boughton when I got a chance: "Who is this old chap?"

"Robert Browning," he told me somewhat impatiently.

I was puzzled at my own stupidity. It seemed so silly that I should not recognize the famous poet whose picture I had seen so many times.

Of Irving we saw a great deal during our London visits. On my last trip to London with the Daly company in the early nineties we did As You Like It. Irving had a box for the opening night, and after the performance he came behind the scenes and congratulated Ada Rehan upon her Rosalind.

He turned to me, patted me on both shoulders and said: "Drew, you got away with that wrestling scene wonderfully, but of course you don't want to play Orlando; no, no, no, no-o-o."

He emphasized this in a fashion that made it seem indicative of but the faintest praise, and left me in no doubt as to what he thought of my performance.

When we did The Taming of the Shrew in London, no one seemed more genuinely enthusiastic about the Katharine of Ada Rehan and my Petruchio than Henry Irving. He gave a most delightful supper for us in the Beefsteak Room of the Lyceum Theatre.

This had been the original quarters of the Beefsteak Club. Ellen Terry, Sarah Bernhardt, who was then playing in London, Damala, the Greek actor, Lord Ronald Gower, who has a bust of Shakspeare at Stratford, and John Tenniel, the cartoonist of Punch and the illustrator of Alice in Wonderland, were all at this supper.

Tennyson I met at his place in the country, and he talked to me of the play that he was then writing, The Foresters. We did this play later at Daly's Theatre; in fact, the part of Robin Hood in this was the last new character I played under the management of Augustin Daly. I was no longer a member of the Daly company when the play was performed by them in London. Arthur Bouchier took my part. The Foresters was never a great success. By reason of Arthur Sullivan's music and Daly's production, the play managed to run for a time in New York.

Swinburne and Hardy were at many of the dinners and suppers that we attended in London, and Hardy wrote a very charming rime address that Ada Rehan read at a benefit for the Actors' Dramatic Fund.

Paris Criticized Plays

MEREDITH I met once in the country. He was staying with a friend near where we were at Weybridge in Surrey, and we went over to see him.

Some of the other house guests danced in bare feet on the lawn.

I asked Meredith if he were not going to dance.

"I am for other than dancing measures," he said, quoting from As You Like It.

I sat on the porch with him in the bright moonlight. He talked of the dancers and he thought them rather silly, but his comments were not caustic and not nearly so sharp as his descriptions of his characters in his books.

One night at dinner I was rather taken aback by W. S. Gilbert. I told him that I had known, learned and loved his "Bab Ballads."

"Oh, they're juvenile indiscretions," he said in a rather incisive way which seemed to pooh-pooh my estimate of the work.

He surprised me still more when he told me that his best work was his serious plays, The Wicked World, and Charity. I had played in Charity in the seventies with the Fifth Avenue Company, and of the players only Fanny Davenport liked the play very much.

In 1886 when we played in Paris, both the English and American Ambassadors had boxes for the first performance of the Daly Company at the Théâtre du Vaudeville. Couquelin attended every performance, and the English and American residents were enthusiastic followers of our short season.

The plays for the three-day engagement of "La Troupe Américaine d'Augustin Daly du Daly's Théâtre, New York (États Unis)," were A Woman's Won't (one-act play), Love on Crutches, A Night Off, A Country Girl and Nancy and Company.

It must be remembered that this Paris engagement was less than twenty years after the Prussian war, and there was a good deal of bitterness about our plays from the German. It was argued, with some justification, that it was not consistent to license our plays and to forbid the giving of the operas of Wagner.

One critic wrote: "Mr. Daly's artists probably have much talent, but they deceive themselves and have confounded Paris with a village." Another said that Daly hired unknowns to translate "the low German repertoire" and then had the "effrontery" to put his own name on the work. M. Besson, of L'Événement, thought that the repertoire was "fit only for boarding schools," and M. Sarcey, the leading critic of the day, wrote that the plays might be seen by "any young girl." These opinions are interesting because some of the critics thought the plays too realistic, coarse and offensive.

Not all of the criticism was adverse and hostile. Some of the critics were sympathetic. M. de Blowitz, the correspondent of the London Times in Paris, wrote in

(Continued on Page 107)

LABLACHE

FACE POWDER

MA MERE—Ah, yet do I remember the delicate fragrance of her lightly powdered cheek!

The powder she used was wonderful to me. It was a part of her, and to this day it reminds me of her dainty beauty—her skin as smooth and velvety as a petal from a garden rose.

And now it is Lablache—"her powder"—that keeps my complexion as it kept hers. To ma Mere and to Lablache I give thanks for a beautiful skin.

SEND 10 cts. for a SAMPLE

Refuse Substitutes

They may be dangerous. Flesh, White, Pink or Cream, 65 cts. a box—druggists' or by mail. Over two million boxes sold annually.

BEN LEVY CO.

French Perfumers, Dept. 132

132 Kingston Street, Boston, Mass.

Gordon-Van Tine Ready-Cut Home No. 537

Five-room bungalow, bath. See catalog, page 35. Materials complete as specified.

$2071

200 Home Plans Sent FREE!

Buy at Wholesale Prices!

Gordon-Van Tine's guaranteed price covers all materials complete as specified. No extras. Homes planned by best architects. Highest quality material—wholesale prices. 200,000 customers all over United States. Many customers write we have saved them $500 to $2000.

Big Savings In Lumber And Labor Costs By Ready-Cut Method

By Ready-Cut method—all sawing, cutting and fitting by machinery in 4 big mills—you save in lumber and construction. No waste or mistakes. Specifications conform to all city building codes. Prompt shipment from nearest mill—Davenport, Iowa; St. Louis, Mo.; Chehalis, Wash.; Hattiesburg, Miss.

Book of 5000 Building Material Bargains

Lumber, screens, paint, roofing, etc., at wholesale prices. Write!

Gordon-Van Tine Co. 130 Case St. Davenport, Iowa

Send me Free Book: I expect to ☐ build; ☐ repair; as follows:

Write or Use Coupon!
200 Home Plans, photos, specifications, many convenience features. Ready-Cut Homes as low as $709.

Ready-Cut Garages $71 and up

Lumber ready-cut, bundled and marked, ready to nail together. Build it yourself. Save money.

Gordon-Van Tine Co.

ESTABLISHED 1889

Satisfaction Guaranteed or Money Back
130 Case Street Davenport, Iowa

Inquiries from outside the United States please send $1.00 to cover cost of book and mailing.

Name

Address

EATON'S HIGHLAND LINEN

The Correct Writing Paper

"I see by the paper that Marjorie has improved in her taste."

"By the paper? What paper?"

"Why, Eaton's Highland Linen, of course."

Your friends judge you, unconsciously but inevitably, by the taste you show in your stationery.

the standard of good form, is obtainable at all good stores at so moderate a price.

Inferior writing paper is a confession that you do not know or do not care. It is so easy to be correct in this when Eaton's Highland Linen, everywhere accepted as back to 50¢

a box
Everywhere

Miss Caroline De Lancey (Eaton, Crane & Pike Co., N. Y.) will answer any questions relating to stationery, correct forms for wedding and other invitations and visiting cards without obligation on your part.

"Correct Social Correspondence," a new and authoritative book by Caroline De Lancey, together with usable samples of Eaton's Highland Linen, will be sent on receipt of 50 cents.

EATON, CRANE & PIKE COMPANY New York-Pittsfield Mass.

Sponsors for correctness in Correspondence

My Years on the Stage

(Continued from Page 105)

correspondence to his paper that the failure of the Daly Company to win the praise of the critics in Paris was due to the fact that the French writers did not know English, and that those Frenchmen who understood the language appreciated the fine acting of the company in light comedy.

The second visit to Paris, two years later, was a far happier experience for the Daly Company. This time we gave three plays during an engagement that lasted six days: Nancy and Company, The Railroad of Love, and The Taming of the Shrew.

The critics devoted their attention to Shakspeare. A writer in Le Petit Journal exclaimed: "Pauvre Shakspeare! What crimes are committed in thy name, and how fortunate that thou hast been dead some time!" M. Sarcey found the comedy illogical. He could see no fun in one character hitting another with a leg of mutton. When I read this criticism to Daly he was amused and, though he knew no French, he at once called attention to Molière's Le Mariage Forcé, in which stuffed rocks and clubs are pried with great advantage on the classic French stage.

Many of the critics thought there was too much horse play; they were shocked when Katharine boxed Petruchio's ears. They found too much violence in the playing. Then, too, the play was coarse and flat and dull. Figaro, which discovered that I resembled Irving, said: "The attitudes, movements, walk, speech and action of these Americans are so different from what we are accustomed to see and hear that there would be neither justice nor profit in criticizing them. It is another race, another conception, another art."

Very different had been the reception given to The Taming of the Shrew when we gave it earlier that same summer in London. This was the first performance of a Shaksperian play given by an American company in Europe. The Times said that till this Daly production it seemed that this comedy was "fated to rank as the most despised of the poet's productions," and that hitherto the play had "received scant justice from the professional interpreters—so at least it would appear—in view of this splendid revival of the comedy, which, sumptuously mounted and acted with admirable spirit and point, keeps the house in a state of continuous merriment."

"How to Play Your Shakspeare"

I WAS going down to Sandown to see the Eclipse Stakes—that was the year that Bendigo won—and at Waterloo Station my companion bought a copy of Punch.

He opened it, laughed and handed the paper to me. "Look at that," he said.

It was a cartoon showing Mr. and Mrs. Kendal looking out of a box in a theater, and in the box on the opposite side were the Bancrofts. On the stage were Ada Rehan as Katharine and myself as Petruchio. We were depicted in the clothes worn in the scene in which Petruchio dresses fantastically. I was supposed to be saying to these representatives of the English stage who were seated in the boxes: "I guess we'll show you how to play your gosh-dinged Shakspeare."

In London I met some of the American artists and writers that I had not met in this country—Sargent, Henry James and Bret Harte. The first time that I met Bret Harte was the Fourth of July, 1888. He had been United States consul in Glasgow, and was at the time I met him living in London.

That summer there was a cyclorama in London that was very popular, called Niagara in London. It was the usual entertainment in the conventional round building that somewhat resembled the outside of Shakspeare's theater, the Globe. The management, being partly American and Canadian, gave a supper in the cyclorama building on the night of the Fourth. Bret Harte, Edward Phelps, who was then our minister to England, and many prominent Americans were there.

After the two national anthems were sung, the supper room opened and the people flocked in and found seats for themselves. Lewis and I were sitting next to an Englishman, who was evidently very hungry and very thirsty.

Mr. Phelps, the American minister, walked into the room and looked about, over the tables. He wore side whiskers and to a casual observer looked not unlike a maltre d'hôtel. The Englishman, not knowing who he was, mistook him for one of the waiters and asked him to bring him a bottle of mineral water. He pointed to a bottle near by that had been opened.

Phelps very good-naturedly took the bottle and put it down in front of the Englishman and started to walk away.

The Englishman was very irate because Phelps had not filled the glass. He reprimanded him and, as he did so, he stood up and called to the retreating figure: "What do you mean by this? And who are you?"

Phelps turned and answered: "My name is Phelps. I am the American minister at the Court of St. James."

Collier's "Mean" Trick

THE most brilliant entertainment given for us during our many stays in London was the supper which John Hare gave at the Garrick Club on June 9, 1888. It was a wonderful list of guests and contained almost everyone prominent in the arts—actors, authors, painters, managers—Millais, Henry James, Du Maurier, Ambassador Phelps and the Earls of Lathom, Londesborough and Cork and Orrery were all present.

For some reason known only to himself, Daly absented himself from this supper. It was believed that he was annoyed that Hare had not submitted to him the list of those members of the Daly Company who were to be asked. Irving was furious at Daly, and so was William Winter, who was one of Daly's closest friends.

That same summer of 1888 we were asked to play for a dramatic fund benefit at the Drury Lane Theater. We played the fourth act of The Taming of the Shrew—the scene in which Petruchio, trying to frighten and impress Katharine with his masterfulness, whacks his servants about the stage with his whip and a "property" leg of mutton. His servants were played by Lewis as Grumio, William Collier, Hamilton Revelle and Stephen Murphy, who afterwards took the name Stephen Grattan when he went to the Lyceum Theater in New York. Murphy had a pedantic fashion of speaking, and he took himself and his work very seriously.

In this fourth-act scene the servants are intensely surprised at Petruchio's behavior toward them, as they had known him always as a kindly master. When Petruchio and Katharine exit, the servant played by Stephen Murphy has to say: "Peter, didst ever see the like?" referring to Petruchio's extraordinary behavior.

Murphy was much impressed with the fact that he was about to utter something of the immortal bard in the famous Drury Lane Theater where Garrick, Macready and Kemble had played. At the rehearsal he said to Collier in an awed voice: "Collier, do you realize that I am to have the precious privilege of speaking a line of Shakspeare in this sacred lane?"

When, in the actual playing of the scene, the cue came for Murphy's great moment Collier came in quickly on the cue and spoke the line "Peter, didst ever see the like?" before the outraged Murphy had a chance to do so.

Collier sensed from Murphy's expression of disappointment and anger that there would be trouble. Indeed, as soon as the scene was over Murphy made a dash for Collier. Collier being more agile avoided the rush and was chased all over the stage behind the scenes by Murphy.

I demanded to know from these two fellows what caused the horrible commotion while Ada Rehan and I were playing the last scene. Murphy told me that Collier had deliberately tried to belittle him; that he had robbed him of his great opportunity to read a line of Shakspeare in Drury Lane and go down into theatrical history with the Keans, Kembles and Garricks.

(Continued in the February Home Journal)

"Onyx" Hosiery

Ankles of patrician slenderness look even trimmer in "Onyx Pointex."

Emery & Beers Company, Inc.
Wholesale Distributors—New York

Be Well!

Be What You Will to Be

YOU can if you will intelligently direct your efforts. If you have good health and a good figure, keep them; if you haven't, get them. You can have as good a Figure as any woman, if you will learn to Stand Correctly and develop the proper muscles to hold you in poise so that you stand so from habit.

If you are too large you can Reduce Your Weight
If you are too thin you can Build Up Your Flesh
You can build up thin necks, undeveloped busts, etc. You can Stand Correctly

Walk Properly
Breathe Correctly

You can get a good circulation and strength of all muscles of the vital organs, so that all sorts of ailments which depend upon pure blood and strength and position of vital organs disappear.

How do I know all this? I KNOW it because I have accomplished this for over 100,000 women, and what I have done for one woman I can do for YOU.

While I am giving you definite, detailed directions, which you follow in the privacy of your room, I am also writing you inspirational letters, holding your ideal before you until you accomplish what we set out to accomplish.

Realize that your health lies largely in your own hands and that you CAN reach your ideal in figure and poise.

From Pupils' Letters

"The other day I weighed 120 pounds. When I first wrote you I weighed 106. I was so thin and weak and nervous, and now I feel rested and like a new being. Every one tells me I look ten years younger."

"You have no idea how delighted I am. I have reduced 35 pounds in three months and every one says I look so much better. My nerves and heart are so much stronger."

"I have been lifted out of the low, nervous, depressed state I was in. Father says your course is worth $1,000 to me."

"Just think! I have not had a pill or cathartic since I began, and I used to take one every night."

If you could read the mail on my desk for one day, you wouldn't hesitate to begin at once.

Physicians are my best friends. Their wives and daughters are my pupils. American Medicine says: "Physicians certainly approve of the splendid work Susanna Crocroft is doing. Miss Crocroft is today probably more familiar with the physical needs of womanhood than any other person in America. The world is a much better place to live in because of the success Susanna Crocroft has had in showing her sisters how to live and take care of their bodies."

Sit down and write me TODAY. If I cannot help you, I'll tell you what will, and I will send you FREE my booklet containing many valuable hints to women. Write me now. Don't wait. You may forget it.

Susanna Crocroft

Dept. 36, 1819 Broadway, New York

Miss Crocroft is a nationally recognized authority on conditioning women at our training camps conditioned our men.

Susanna Crocroft

5-2

Digitized by Google

YES, INDEED,
YOU CANKill Those Moths!

"UNCLE SAM'S"

Experts have completed the testing of CEDAR CHESTS."Well, that is the best little piece of news I've heard in years!"

Cedar Chests

"have a pronounced killing effect upon young clothes-moth worms (larvae)."

"Of the larvae (moth worms) hatching within Cedar Chests from the 2074 eggs recorded—none were found alive one month from the date the eggs were placed in the chests."

"Practically all larvae (moth worms) hatching within the chests died within one to two weeks after hatching and a surprisingly large number died within two or three days"

"It is only the larva or worm that damages fabrics."

Cedar Chests

are no longer to be regarded as a luxury—beautiful and handy as they are—just as furniture—they are NOW known to be a vital necessity in every home.

The complete U. S. Gov't Report has been tastily reprinted under the title, "Moth Truths," and will be sent you promptly on request, free with our compliments. You will know what to do next. Cedar Chests are sold in all good stores everywhere. Ask your dealer if he is familiar with the new Gov't Report.

Send your name at once to

THE Cedar Chest Manufacturers of America

(Quality and Responsibility)

Room 601, 1414 South Wabash Ave., Chicago

Maternity

MATERNITY apparel with no maternity look. Pictured in a 76-page Style Book of latest fashions in Dresses, Coats, Skirts, Waists, Corsets and Underwear. Fashioned features provide ample expansion. Cover designing corsage creation. This Style Book sent you absolutely FREE. Write today. Write: Lane Bryant, 38 St. at Fifth, Dept. 51, New York.

STYLE
BOOK
FREE

Dialogs, Monologs, Vaudeville Acts, Musical Comedies, How-to-Sing Play and Reviews, Min- Make-up Gauds, Street Opening Chances, Darky Plays, Catalog Free. T. S. DENISON & CO., 623 So. Wabash, Dept. 89, CHICAGO

"Home-Making, as a Profession"

A 100-page 216-page handbook—FREE. Home-study of Domestic Science, training for well-paid positions and home efficiency. Am. School of Home Economics, 615 W. 69th St., Chicago, Ill.

The Undernourished Child

(Continued from Page 24)

in seeing that every school has a proper school lunch system. This is not a question which involves any great expenditure of money. A small gas or oil stove, with the few necessary cooking utensils, will cost very little, but will pay large dividends in increased health. A fireless cooker, also, may be used for this purpose. One hot dish a day should be provided for lunch. This may be a soup, a stew or some meat substitute, such as macaroni with cheese. This can be brought from home and heated at school or, by a proper system of cooperation with the mothers, arrangements may be made whereby one or two mothers would be responsible for the school lunch at least one day a week; in fact, with many mothers in the vicinity, it would mean that no mother need be on duty at the school more than one day a month. The child should always have hot cocoa or milk to drink at the lunch period. In addition fruit, bread and butter or nutritious sandwiches, with some sweet dish, such as jam, jelly or cake, are all that are needed.

In most of our cities we have school lunch systems that are fairly well carried out. There is one thing that must be remembered, however, and that is that the school lunch should always be in addition to all the food a child should receive at home, and should not take the place of a nutritious hot meal later in the day.

The teacher should remember that the child's backwardness may be due to sickness rather than stupidity. If this is the case he should never be pushed in his school work, but should have plenty of time for leisure and recreation and, above all, rest. Indeed, a rest period of one hour in the middle of the morning, followed by a glass of milk or a cup of cocoa, will often readjust the balance between normal vitality and lack of health. Fresh air in abundance is absolutely necessary in all classrooms, and the problem of ventilation should receive most careful attention.

In the home the mother unaided can do much. She must study the daily routine of her child's life. One reason why under-nourishment among the rich and well-to-do is equal to or even greater than among the poor is because there is very little difference between the child who has no breakfast because there is none and the child who refuses to eat any breakfast because of his capricious appetite, and who sits whining at the table, saying "I don't want any oatmeal," "I don't like eggs," and "I won't drink that cocoa."

Mealtimes should be at regular intervals. If the child will eat plain, wholesome food at mealtimes there is no reason why he should not have additional lunches in the mid-morning and midafternoon; but children who will not eat at mealtimes often have this habit firmly fixed by the fact that they know they can get what they want between meals. Nature demands food for the growing child, and if children have attractively prepared food set before them and will not eat, it is perfectly proper to see that they do not get any food until the next mealtime, when they should get a proper meal. Occasionally children may refuse food for two or three days, but if they are not urged, if no particular attention is paid to whether they are eating or not, and if the food is appropriate and attractively served, they will inevitably return to normal habits of eating.

There is nothing unusual or peculiar about the diet of a growing child. It should always include milk—at least a pint a day, and preferably one and a half pints—fresh vegetables in season and plenty of leafy vegetables, such as lettuce, spinach, Swiss chard and beet tops. Meat should be given not more often than once a day and chicken or fish may be substituted at least two

(Continued on Page 109)

HEIGHT AND WEIGHT TABLE FOR BOYS

The standard or normal weight for a boy is found where the horizontal column opposite his height crosses the vertical column under his age.* Illustration—The standard weight for a boy 57 inches high and 13 years old is 84 pounds.

HEIGHT INCHES	5 Yrs.	6 Yrs.	7 Yrs.	8 Yrs.	9 Yrs.	10 Yrs.	11 Yrs.	12 Yrs.	13 Yrs.	14 Yrs.	15 Yrs.	16 Yrs.	17 Yrs.	18 Yrs.
39	35	36	37
40	37	38	39
41	39	40	41
42	41	42	43	44
43	43	44	45	46
44	45	46	47	48	49
45	47	48	49	50	51
46	48	49	50	51	52	53
47	51	52	53	54	55	56	57
48	53	54	55	56	57	58	59
49	55	56	57	58	59	60	61	62
50	58	59	60	61	62	63	64	65	66
51	60	61	62	63	64	65	66	67	68	69
52	62	63	64	65	66	67	68	69	70	71	72
53	66	67	68	69	70	71	72	73	74	75	76	77
54	69	70	71	72	73	74	75	76	77	78	79	80	81
55	73	74	75	76	77	78	79	80	81	82	83	84	85	86
56	77	78	79	80	81	82	83	84	85	86	87	88	89	90
57	81	82	83	84	85	86	87	88	89	90	91	92	93	94
58	84	85	86	87	88	89	90	91	92	93	94	95	96	97
59	87	88	89	90	91	92	93	94	95	96	97	98	99	100
60	91	92	93	94	95	96	97	98	99	100	101	102	103	104
61	95	96	97	98	99	100	101	102	103	104	105	106	107	108
62	100	101	102	103	104	105	106	107	108	109	110	111	112	113
63	105	106	107	108	109	110	111	112	113	114	115	116	117	118
64	113	114	115	116	117	118	119	120	121	122	123	124	125	126
65	120	121	122	123	124	125	126	127	128	129	130	131	132	133
66	125	126	127	128	129	130	131	132	133	134	135	136	137	138
67	130	131	132	133	134	135	136	137	138	139	140	141	142	143
68	134	135	136	137	138	139	140	141	142	143	144	145	146	147
69	138	139	140	141	142	143	144	145	146	147	148	149	150	151
70	142	143	144	145	146	147	148	149	150	151	152	153	154	155
71	147	148	149	150	151	152	153	154	155	156	157	158	159	160
72	152	153	154	155	156	157	158	159	160	161	162	163	164	165
73	157	158	159	160	161	162	163	164	165	166	167	168	169	170
74	162	163	164	165	166	167	168	169	170	171	172	173	174	175
75	166	167	168	169	170	171	172	173	174	175	176	177	178	179
76	174	175	176	177	178	179	180	181	182	183	184	185	186	187

Children should be weighed and measured without shoes and in only the usual indoor clothes; boys should remove their coats.

* Note—The age is taken at the nearest birthday.

OAK FLOORS

(For Everlasting Economy)

Cost Less Than You Think

Improve With the Years

Why pay more for floors with fewer advantages?

Consider, first, the matchless beauty of Oak Flooring. How it improves with age and increases selling and renting values. How easy it is to keep clean and dustless. How much elegance and distinction it gives the simplest interior. And outlasts a century of use.

Give any dealer your room sizes. His figures will prove, nine times out of ten, that Oak costs less than the form of flooring you probably had in mind.

For Remodeling

A special thickness (3/4 of an inch) is made for laying over worn flooring, at small cost.

Write for FREE Booklets

In colors, on the uses of Oak Flooring. Or see the nearest dealer.

OAK FLOORING INCORPORATED
1053 Ashland Block, Chicago

Dennison's

CHILDREN'S PARTIES

—such fun to give but so hard to make a success—unless you charm the youngsters with the Dennison "Children's Party Goods." Fascinating novelties for the clever party—pretty invitations, place cards, decorations and "fixings." —The kiddies love it all and mothers are grateful. Ask your nearest dealer.

Write for "The Further Adventures of Jim, John and Jane"—the children will be delighted.

DENNISON
DEPT. O
Princeton, Mass.

What Next?

PLAN YOUR HOME NOW

Send for Stillwell Building Books with Economy Plans of new California Styles suitable for any climate. Patterns for construction and beauty.

"Representative Cal. Home"
50 Houses—7 to 10 Rooms
"The New Colonial"
50 Houses—6 to 10 Rooms
"West Coast Bungalow"
50 Houses—6 to 7 Rooms
"Little Bungalow"
75 Houses—4-5 Rooms

SPECIAL OFFER: Send $2.50 for any three of these books and get Garage Folder FREE

Money back if not satisfied

E. W. STILLWELL & CO., Architects, 747 Cal. Bldg., Los Angeles

Where there's a Baby

Many dainty baby things must be washed every day—also the mother's delicate fabrics, silk stockings, lingerie, gossamer blouses, etc., not to be trusted to the impersonal treatment of laundry.

Here's a quick, simple method—

THE Washerette

Any pearl washing machine operated by water power. Place it in bathroom tub, washbasin, kitchen sink. Attach tube to faucet—that's all. The Washerette washes thoroughly and quickly. The cost complete is only $13. Pay for itself in a month or two. Order direct or send for free booklet. The Bernard E. Fitzgibbon Co., 232-242 St. Paul St., Rochester, N. Y.

Pure Flavors -Without Alcohol

ZANOL Non-Alcoholic Food Flavors are put up in handy, collapsible tubes. Only a few drops are necessary to give a full, rich flavor to any dish. Their concentrated form makes them exceedingly economical. A tube costs less than a bottle and lasts about five times as long. You pay for flavor, not for alcohol. There are 26 delicious flavors.

ZANOL PRODUCTS

The ZANOL trade-mark identifies these famous Food Flavors, and 350 other Food Products and Household Specialties of top-notch quality. They are distributed only by our exclusive ZANOL Representatives, and are sold with a guarantee of absolute satisfaction.

We have good paying, permanent positions open in unoccupied territory for ambitious men and women to represent us. Excellent pay. No previous experience required. Write for full particulars. Address Dept. 2.

The AMERICAN PRODUCTS CO.
Zanol Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio

You Can Make at Home Parchment Shades and Lamps

Easy Interesting Profitable

Parchment Shades, Lamps, and Shields in artistic designs are the newest vogue. Save 5% usual price by getting our Shades and Lamps flat, designed, ready for coloring, full directions for making. Very simple—any one can do it. 200 shapes, sizes and designs shown in free catalog.

This quaint 8x12-inch Electric Lamp, flat, designed, ready to paint, complete. Gift Braid, 3 Tassels, Rhinized Base, Socket, Silk Cord and Plug. $2.95, postage 15c. Same design. Parchment Lantern for drop light. $2.05, postage 10c.

China Painters!

The latest of everything in china. We effect a great saving for you because we are America's largest white china importers selling direct to users.

Send for Free Catalog No. 50L
THAYER & CHANDLER, 913 West Van Buren St., CHICAGO

You can't go into a good grocery store without finding Wesson Oil there. Popularity means something. Things to eat aren't popular unless they taste good.

Dress Designing Lessons FREE

Women—Girls—18 or over, can easily learn Dress and Costume Designing during their spare moments in TEN WEEKS.

Dress and Costume Design—Frequently Earn $45 to $100 a Week

Many Start Part-time in Their Own Homes

Every woman who now does plain sewing should take up Designing.

Handreds Learn Millinery By Mail

Send me, AT ONCE, free sample lessons from the Home Study Course here checked:

☐ Dress Designing ☐ Millinery

Name _____
Address _____

The Undernourished Child

(Continued from Page 108)

days a week. Eggs are always valuable articles of diet and may be prepared in many forms. Bread and butter, with plain, wholesome desserts, will make up the proper diet for the child. Tea and coffee should not be allowed until after the child is at least sixteen years old.

The main points to be remembered are that the meals should be regular and on time, that the child should have plenty of time to eat and should be required to chew his food thoroughly, that he should not eat sweets between meals, but may have a limited amount after meals in place of dessert, and that there are certain things, such as rich pastries, fried foods and very hearty or indigestible foods, that have no place in the diet of a growing child. Every child has a normal desire for sweets, and these may be provided in the form of ice cream or candy for desserts. Occasional ice cream cones or ice cream soda is not harmful, provided the child does not refuse to eat regular meals as a consequence.

The routine of the child's life is of the utmost importance. Regular bedtime must be insisted upon, and the bedroom should be well ventilated. Sometimes a rest at home for two hours in the middle of the day is all that is necessary to correct an undernourished condition and to cause the child to gain in weight. School work may have to be adjusted. The undernourished child should not be pushed to overactivity. Normal, wholesome play is essential and should be out-of-doors whenever possible. Sometimes I think that the child in the family of limited resources has a great advantage over the child of the rich in respect to free play. As far as health and sheer enjoyment are concerned, the child who can get down into the dirt, make mud pies, wear old clothes and get thoroughly and happily dirty every day has an enormous advantage over the child whose form of amusement consists of automobile rides or carefully chaperoned walks in the parks.

If physical defects are found as a result of examination they should be corrected at once. I have seen many cases where undernourishment was the result solely of defective vision or bad teeth or the presence of adenoids or enlarged tonsils. As soon as the defects were corrected, the children were able to gain.

Finally, it cannot be stated too often that children are keenly and acutely sensitive to their environment. Instances are fairly common where the condition of extreme undernourishment in a child is simply the result of unhappy family life. Nagging, ill-temper, family disputes and the unrest that comes with clashing and diverse temperaments can occur in any family in any station in life. The pitiful part is that the child pays for all of this, for children of such families are always emotional, high-strung, nervous and undernourished. Sometimes the only thing necessary to readjust such a child's physical condition and overcome its undernourishment is to remove it entirely from the family environment. Such an indictment against family life should not be allowed to stand. The cure must come from the family readjusting its own abnormal conditions, so that the children may have a wholesome environment.

It is important to remember that every case of undernourishment has a distinct cause, and the cause is usually easy to find. I am convinced that if the parents and teachers of this country will once recognize the seriousness of this menace to our childhood and will make the necessary effort to bring our children back to their heritage of wholesome and decent living, there will no longer be any reason why the United States should stand below other civilized countries in the world in the extent of undernourishment among its children.

HEIGHT AND WEIGHT TABLE FOR GIRLS

The standard or normal weight for a girl is found where the horizontal column opposite her height crosses the vertical column under her age. Illustration—The standard weight for a girl 50 inches high and 9 years old is 58 pounds.

HEIGHT INCHES	5 Yrs.	6 Yrs.	7 Yrs.	8 Yrs.	9 Yrs.	10 Yrs.	11 Yrs.	12 Yrs.	13 Yrs.	14 Yrs.	15 Yrs.	16 Yrs.	17 Yrs.	18 Yrs.
39	34	35	36
40	36	37	38
41	38	39	40
42	40	41	42	43
43	42	43	44
44	44	45	46
45	46	47	48	49
46	48	49	50	51	52	53
47	49	50	51	52	53	54	55	56
48	51	52	53	54	55	56	57	58
49	53	54	55	56	57	58	59	60	61
50	55	56	57	58	59	60	61	62	63	64
51	57	58	59	60	61	62	63	64	65	66
52	59	60	61	62	63	64	65	66	67	68
53	61	62	63	64	65	66	67	68	69	70
54	63	64	65	66	67	68	69	70	71	72
55	65	66	67	68	69	70	71	72	73	74
56	67	68	69	70	71	72	73	74	75	76
57	69	70	71	72	73	74	75	76	77	78
58	71	72	73	74	75	76	77	78	79	80
59	73	74	75	76	77	78	79	80	81	82
60	75	76	77	78	79	80	81	82	83	84	85
61	77	78	79	80	81	82	83	84	85	86	87
62	79	80	81	82	83	84	85	86	87	88	89	90
63	81	82	83	84	85	86	87	88	89	90	91	92
64	83	84	85	86	87	88	89	90	91	92	93	94	95
65	85	86	87	88	89	90	91	92	93	94	95	96	97
66	87	88	89	90	91	92	93	94	95	96	97	98	99	100
67	89	90	91	92	93	94	95	96	97	98	99	100	101	102
68	91	92	93	94	95	96	97	98	99	100	101	102	103	104
69	93	94	95	96	97	98	99	100	101	102	103	104	105	106
70	95	96	97	98	99	100	101	102	103	104	105	106	107	108
71	97	98	99	100	101	102	103	104	105	106	107	108	109	110
72	99	100	101	102	103	104	105	106	107	108	109	110	111	112

Only scales with bar and weights should be purchased for school use. Spring scales with dial face are not very durable and are likely to get out of order soon. Measurements for height should be taken with the child standing with feet close together and close against the measuring rod, or for school use a measuring tape may be tacked against a wall and a book placed on the child's head, edgewise, to mark his height.

Tables prepared by Prof. Thomas D. Wood, Teachers' College.

Ask your best friend if you dare!

YOU may even get intimate enough with some friends of yours to swap the real truth about your income tax and about many other very personal things.

But how many people do you know well enough to enable you to get on the subject of Halitosis with them? Not very many, probably. Halitosis is the medical term meaning unpleasant breath.

As you know yourself, Halitosis is one of the least talked about human afflictions and at once one of the most commonly prevalent ailments.

Nine out of ten people suffer from Halitosis either now and then or chronically. Usually they are unconscious of it themselves.

Halitosis may come from smoking, drinking, eating. It may be due to a disordered stomach, bad teeth, lung trouble or some other organic disorder. If it's a chronic ailment, of course, then it is a symptom of a condition your doctor or dentist ought to look after.

But very often it is only temporary, and then you may overcome it by taking a very simple personal precaution that will mean ease of mind for you and comfort for your friends.

Listerine, for forty years the safe household antiseptic, is a wonderful combatant of Halitosis. Just use it regularly as a mouth wash and gargle. It will do the trick.

You probably now have Listerine in the house and know all about its many other uses as a safe antiseptic.

If you don't, just send us your name and address and fifteen cents and we shall be glad to forward you a generous sample of Listerine, together with a tube of Listerine Tooth Paste sufficient for ten days' brushings.

Address Lambert Pharmacal Company, 2131 Locust St., Saint Louis, Mo.

For Halitosis
use Listerine

All ready to serve you

Whenever you feel just a bit tired and don't want to cook, go to your Purity Cross shelf and select one of the many delightful dishes all-ready-to-serve.

Would you like Chicken à la King? All you have to do is to drop the Purity Cross tin into hot water, leave it there about 15 minutes, open it up. There it is, all ready to spread on your toast—and it is delicious!

And at less cost than if you had made it in your own kitchen.

That's what we mean by Chef service. Enjoy the variety that Purity Cross brings to your table. Enjoy the freedom from cooking. Enjoy the economy.

Have you our chef on your shelf?

- | | |
|-----------------------------------|--------------------|
| • Puddings—Fig, | • Chicken in Jelly |
| • Date, Plum, | • Vienna Sausage |
| • Chocolate Fudge | • Deviled Ham |
| • Welsh Rarebit | • Deviled Chicken |
| • Lobster Newburg | • Ox Tongue |
| • Chop Suey | • Lunch Tongue |
| • Chicken à la King | • Corned Beef Hash |
| • Creamed Spaghetti with Cheese | |
| • Deviled Ham with Chopped Olives | |

In handy tins—ready to serve.

At grocers' or delicatessens—your money back if you want it.

Or send us $2.50 for our Special Get Acquainted Assortment. Prepaid if you mention your dealer's name.

Purity Cross
MODEL KITCHEN ORANGE NEW JERSEY

67,000 Failures

EVERY year 67,000 school children fail through absence. And nearly half of the absences are due to trouble with teeth. Brushing in itself is not enough; attention to gum health is imperative. Ipana Tooth Paste is not only an efficient dentifrice but it is a gentle tonic to the gums as well.

IPANA TOOTH PASTE

Send 10c for a generous sample to Bristol-Myers Co., New York City.

IF ALL SALAD OILS were alike Wesson Oil could not have won its present reputation.

A Horseshoe for Luck

(Continued from Page 9)

We ain't hurtin' anything, are we? Just holdin' 'nitation in it, ain't we?"

Randolph scratched his head and looked about at the clutter of regalia and properties. "How you gonna get in with all this stuff?"

"Through the cellar window; that's how. It's already open; somebody left it open. All this stuff goes in the coffin. We'll take it all soon's it's dark. All you've got to do is to blindfold Albert an' bring him through the alleys. An' when you get inside this thing in the 'nitation, don't forget to groan an' rattle the tire chain. I'm gonna say, 'There's been double murder done this night.' Then you groan."

"Then the Gladiators that are standin' by the coffin say 'Sh-h-h-h!' all together. Then you groan again an' rattle the chain. Then we make Albert take the other chain off the coffin an' take off the lid. You rise up in your suit, point your finger at him an' say, 'There's the hand that's red with my blood.' Before we take the bandage off Albert's eyes we'll smear his hand with red ink."

RANDOLPH was very silent. He was thinking of many things.

"You know it's been a lot of breakin' in vacant houses an' stealin' 'lectric lights an' lead pipes an' things," he observed dimly.

"I ask you, who's gonna steal anything?" Kirk Newton had turned thirteen and was entering upon that transition stage wherein the dulcet tone of the youthful voice begins to quiver and croak with discordant "goss-lin's." Now, under sudden excitement, his voice broke ludicrously.

"I know we ain't," persisted Randolph, "but if we get caught, we're in for it. That house is on O'Donohue's beat, an' you know he's the meanest cop on the force."

Kirk threw his brush into the paint can and glared at Randolph. "Look here, Ranny, if you're scared, say so. Plenty of Gladiators would like to have your job."

That silenced the boy, but his soul was full of dire forebodings.

Patrolman Michael O'Donohue swung along his beat with athletic stride and silently on rubber heels. His back was straight, his keen blue eyes were restlessly alert. It mattered not to him that he had been assigned to this residence section, which was known to be the quietest sector in all the precinct; he followed the line of duty as alertly as though this were outpost duty in a riot zone. Suddenly he froze in his tracks.

Half a block ahead a car had driven to the curb and stopped. Instantly its lights snapped out. O'Donohue stepped into deeper shadows; his blue eyes twinkled as they watched a man's figure leave the car and with a bound disappear through a gate opening to spacious lawns.

FOR a full minute O'Donohue waited. Then noiselessly he ran to the car, looked in. It was empty. The patrolman whipped out note book and pencil. "Parking with lights out, bet. Lanier and Park, N. W." he jotted down. Then he looked at his watch. "8:45 P. M." he appended and then entered the license-tag number.

The patrolman was about to enter the grounds into which the man had disappeared when he turned, drew out his pocket flashlight and directed a circle of light into the tonneau. He chuckled aloud. Piled high on the floor was a comprehensive assortment of loot—a brass image that had adorned somebody's newel post, copper electric brackets, a coil of copper pipe, brass switch plates, a heavy bronze chandelier chain, bulbs, reflectors and a great copper dome.

"The nerve o' him!" muttered Michael O'Donohue, with the tang of admiration in his tone. "We'll stop your clock, me boy."

He threw up the engine hood, reached in and disconnected the wires from the spark plugs. Then on second thought he brought the butt of his heavy automatic smashing against the plug porcelain. He put down the hood.

"An' that's that," he chuckled.

Swiftly across the lawns he ran, halting behind a tree immediately before the big, vacant house. Not a sound. He tipped across the intervening space, peered until his eyes had adjusted their diaphragms to the gloom and had recorded the image of an open cellar casement. It was too simple! O'Donohue holstered his night stick, grasped the heavy automatic in his right hand and silently let himself over the window sill. Still not a sound.

He had taken two noiseless steps forward on the concrete floor when his sensitive ears caught the sound of metal rasping on metal. Stealthily he crept across the cellar, up the stairway leading to the kitchen. At the head of the steps he froze again.

TEN feet ahead a tiny circle of yellow light was focused on the wall, illuminating the base of an electric bracket, while in the light played a steel that pried to loosen the bracket from its anchorage. The patrolman could see the silhouetted head and shoulders of the unsuspecting thief.

"Hold as ye are!" O'Donohue's voice rang out with the confidence of authority unafraid.

Instantly the circle of light went out. There was a shuffling thump as the thief whirled and dropped to his knees. The next instant a yellow-blue flame leaped through the blackness with deafening report and Michael O'Donohue's eyes were filled with powdered plaster as the bullet smashed into the wall at his head. Blinded, his blood boiling, the patrolman loosed his great automatic in roaring volley. He dropped it, charged forward, powerful fingers searching the blackness for the grapple.

But they clutched at space. The thief had fled. O'Donohue heard him running madly down the hallway. And into the hallway, his burning eyes streaming water, dashed the enraged patrolman. Guided by sound alone he followed. The man ahead stumbled, then thundered up bare steps. O'Donohue grinned as he followed. He had driven his man to the second floor and it was only a question of moments when he would have him with his back to the wall.

Close behind the pursued, O'Donohue reached the head of the stairs and followed down another hallway. The next moment the patrolman halted with a mighty effort and stared with throbbing eyes at the silhouette of his quarry standing motionless in an open doorway. About the silhouette played a ghastly green light.

O'DONOHUE rubbed his eyes, took another step forward, swallowed in a suddenly dry throat. Then mechanically he snapped the steel about the thief's nerveless wrists. And just as mechanically, Michael O'Donohue crossed himself.

From the open doorway of a hall room captor and captive faced a ghastly sight. From a great urn rose a spectral green glow that seemed to flow and drift as it quivered low, then rose brightly. High up, close to the ceiling, did float phosphorescent busts of aged men in flowing beards, old ladies in knitted caps, as though they had been severed from their hips and futilely drifted for want of legs to stand on.

But upon the floor and directly before O'Donohue's staring eyes rested the prime terror. There it lay in the sickly green glow, an ebony casket, from within whose depths sounded the quivering cry of a soul in agony. And with this the hair-raising clank and jangle of chains.

Michael O'Donohue cleared his throat, crossed himself again. Calling upon every saint in audible prayer, he shouldered past the trembling, manacled thief, and with his heart threatening to burst tugged at the chains wrapped about that casket. With a whistling catch in his breath he wrested off the lid. It fell with fearful clatter. O'Donohue leaped back with a choking gulp.

Bolt upright rose from the casket's depth a figure. White-shrouded from the head, with horrible black caverns where eyes should have shone, with a whimpering, sobbing cry, the figure trembled and shook.

Michael O'Donohue reached forth, seized the shroud, jerked with all his might. It came off in a single piece. And Randolph Meredith stared in terror at "the meanest cop on the force," with a face as white as the shroud clutched in the patrolman's hand.

"Ah-ha," cried O'Donohue, "so this is what!"

He lifted the boy by the collar and stood him on his feet. Randolph's knees began to bruise themselves fearfully. From O'Donohue his terrified eyes shifted to the manacled criminal. But the patrolman was once more his own master and feverishly busy with practical things.

BOLDLY he seized the floating phosphorescent bust of an aged man and jerked. It came free in his hands. He was holding a box, inside of which burned a tallow candle to spectrally illumine the old chromo ingeniously fitted over one end of the black-painted box.

The patrolman broke the cords suspending the remaining illuminated chromos, extinguished their candles and then, in the green glow generated within an enormous flower pot, turned upon the quaking boy.

"An' what d'ye mean by this?" he demanded, clearing the corners of his eyes of the remaining particles of plaster.

"We—we were jes' hav-havin' a 'nitation of—of the Pur-Purple Gladiators," chattered Randolph. "We—we didn't take anything; we haven't hurt anything; we —"

"We!" shot the patrolman, darting quick eyes about the room. "Where's the rest o' your gang?"

Randolph nodded to an open window with sill close to the floor. O'Donohue stepped to it, looked out. It opened directly upon a porch roof, easy egress for any terrified boy.

"I—I was chained—up—up in the coffin. An—an' we were 'nitation' an' then somebody started shootin' downstairs an' they all got out an—an' left me in here."

The patrolman nodded grimly. "Come along, you two," he ordered. Then he remembered and turned back. "Boy, what's burnin' in that pot?"

"Jes'—a little alcohol on some—some salt, Mister O'Donohue."

The policeman extinguished the flame by covering the pot with one of the boxes he had snatched from midair. "Now come along," he called as his searchlight bored a brilliant beam through the Stygian blackness. "Boy, don't you try to run."

UNNECESSARY warning. The boy's legs scarce propelled him at a walk.

"I oughter get a life stretch for fallin' for that kid plant," whined the thief's voice as the trio descended the stairs.

"Ye'll get what's comin'," chuckled O'Donohue. "You nearly got it in the kitchen, me hearty. If me eyes hadn't been full o' plaster that coffin upstairs would a-come in handy to-night, I'm tellin' ye."

As they crossed the lawn Randolph brought up the rear. His heart was as heavy as his feet. Cold sweat ran down his back. His brain was too stunned to analyze the awful moment. But jail, trial, fine, home punishment—heaven only knew what else he had walked into this night. He had felt it, he had felt it! Oh, if Kirk had just listened to him!

To Randolph's amazement the patrolman led the way up the walk to a great house full of light, a block away from the scene of the tragedy. O'Donohue rang the bell.

"I'll be thankin' ye to let me speak in privet with your master," he said to the shrinking maid. Then he shoved

(Continued on Page 112)

© 1921,
N. Y. Co.

You can watch beautiful, fragrant loaves like this grow right up in your oven if you use Yeast Foam.

Save one-half of what it costs to buy your bread

Flour is also cheaper today

An important new discovery about Yeast Foam

People also eat Yeast Foam. You need vitamins; they create vitality—help you resist disease. Thousands are benefiting from the energy-making qualities of Yeast Foam, one of the richest sources of the remarkable element in food called vitamin.

Send for instructive booklet.
"Dry Yeast as an aid to Health"

Good homemade bread takes the place, too, of many more expensive but less nourishing foods.

And it tastes better. You know how every member of the family loves the flavor of the home baked loaf. Why not have more of it?

Magic Yeast — Yeast Foam — just the same except in name
Package of 5 cakes — at your grocer — 10¢

Northwestern Yeast Company, 1751 N. Ashland Ave., Chicago

Digitized by Google

Send for free booklet

To have a sweet, light dough in the morning set your sponge tonight with Yeast Foam.

Easy Feet Make Cheerfulness

Not nearly so hard to keep cheery at the day's thousand and one home duties if your feet are contented. Many a reputation for a happy disposition rests on the

Dr. Edison CUSHION SHOE

"The Easiest Shoe for Women"

To women who are on their feet a great deal, the soft cushion insoles of these shoes are a blessing. The foot rests on the velvety wool felt in perfect ease. Free blood circulation is promoted and pressure on sensitive foot nerves entirely relieved.

And the Dr. Edison Cushion Shoe is very attractive; the graceful arch gives it style. For outdoor or indoor wear it is equally desirable.

Write us today for the new Book of Styles and name of nearest dealer where you can try on a pair of Dr. Edison's.

UTZ & DUNN Co.

Makers of

"Style Shoes of Quality" for Women

156 Canal Street, Rochester, N. Y.

Every woman should keep a pair of Dr. Edison Cushion Shoes—particularly for long walking or standing.

Your Hands Will Not Chap

Nor will your skin acquire the slightest roughness when you use Frostilla regularly all through the Winter. After bathing your hands and face, also before and after going outdoors, apply Frostilla. You will note how soothing it is; how soft and smooth it keeps the skin.

Frostilla has many uses. Women find it ideal as a base for face powder. They are delighted with its delicate perfumery. Men use Frostilla after shaving. On sale everywhere. Price 35c. HOLMES FROSTILLA Co., Elmira, N. Y.

FRAGRANT Frostilla

A Horseshoe for Luck

(Continued from Page 110)

Randolph and the thief into the brilliant, gorgeous hallway.

The maid ran with swishing skirts. The thief stood with drooping head. O'Donohue looked about him with unconcealed interest. Randolph cringed against the wall.

A gentleman in dinner coat came hastily down the wide stairway and approached the group. Randolph's knees began to buckle under him as he realized now what it all meant. The meanest cop on the force had arrested and brought him face to face with the meanest man in town!

"Mister Waples," said O'Donohue, touching his helmet, "I'm thinkin' I've got the gentleman what's been liftin' the fixtures from your property o' late, sir. Anyhow, I got him in your house on th' next block, hard at work, an' with a car half full o' stuff in th' bargain."

HIS house! Randolph had violated the private property of Mr. Waples! The boy was close to fainting.

"Good!" exclaimed Mr. Waples. "Good enough, O'Donohue. And this boy?" He withered Randolph with his eyes. "Why, aren't you the boy who threw that horseshoe through my car window? Certainly you are—Randolph Meredith. What has he to do with this, O'Donohue?"

"Quite a bit, I'm thinkin', sir. An' would ye let me have a word with ye in privet, now?"

Mr. Waples nodded and turned. Randolph started to follow the manacled thief, whom O'Donohue pushed ahead of him.

"Stay right where ye are," ordered the patrolman. "Don't ye dare move."

Randolph stood as one nailed to the floor as the three disappeared down the hallway and the sound of O'Donohue's subdued voice came to his ears. Calamity of calamity! His house, and now his house again, right where she was likely to discover him in total disgrace.

In the briefest of intervals the three men reappeared and approached him. The sweat broke out afresh from the boy's forehead. It trickled into his eyes. Now for the station house!

"Mr. Waples wants to see you, boy," said O'Donohue, leading his prisoner to the door.

As the door shut behind the pair Mr. Waples beckoned to Randolph. "Come in here, Randolph," he said.

The miserable one followed him into the great library, gratefully collapsed into a deep leather chair, then waited for the worst.

"O'DONOHUE tells me that you and some of your friends have been using my property for conducting an initiation to-night."

The inquisitor was facing the boy from another chair.

"Ye-es, s-s-sir."

"Do you realize that constitutes a violation of the law?"

Randolph could only nod.

"As a matter of fact, all of you are technically guilty of housebreaking."

Randolph's breath died in his throat.

"At the same time," continued Mr. Waples, "O'Donohue tells me the thief could easily have escaped him from that second-story window if he hadn't been frightened by what he saw in that room."

"Ye-es, sir."

"Any other policeman might not have been honest enough to admit that. But O'Donohue is a very honest man and has given you credit indirectly for capturing a very troublesome thief."

Given him credit! O'Donohue? Why, wasn't he the meanest cop on —

"So then," concluded Mr. Waples, "we'll forget all about that trespassing provided it doesn't happen again. You might have set the place afire, you know. And, by the way, Randolph, I said something to your father about paying for that glass you broke with the horseshoe."

"Yes, sir. I've got to pay him back. I've got five dollars I'd been savin' for a baseball suit, an' I'm workin' to save the other five, an' —"

"Well," said Mr. Waples, "don't let that worry you. I'll phone your father in the morning that I'll take care of that bill."

THE meanest man in town had said it! The room began to tilt before the boy's eyes. Stupidly he turned his head at the sound of a footfall and a swish of petticoats. He was looking straight into the glorious laughing eyes of the girl with chestnut curls!

"Marion," said Mr. Waples, "this is Randolph Meredith, the boy who threw that horseshoe into our car. He's just helped patrolman O'Donohue corner and capture a thief in one of my houses."

In a split second Randolph's head had cleared. His chest shot out like a pouter pigeon's. He took her white outstretched hand. "Awful glad to meet you," he said. "I didn't go to throw that horseshoe."

"I told daddy that. And you helped a policeman to catch a thief! Good heavens!"

"Oh," said Randolph carelessly, "that wasn't much. He did shoot a few times, but that wasn't anything."

Mr. Waples turned his head and walked quickly from the room. Randolph stood twisting his white-and-blue skullcap. Marion was coloring gloriously as her blue eyes steadfastly refused to be held by his own.

"I—I dreamed about you the other night," he finally blurted. It seemed to him that his ears would burst with some sort of pounding in them.

"Oh, you didn't!"

"I did, too!"

"What did you dream?"

"That's tellin'."

"Please do?"

"Uh-huh; not now."

"When?"

"Sometime—soon maybe."

"I'm going to give a party next week. Will you come and tell me then?"

Randolph looked at her with youth's heritage lighting his face. "I sure will. Look here!" He drew from his pocket a folded bit of paper. Tenderly he opened it. She came closer, bent over to see the single strand of brown hair, bent over so closely that a chestnut ringlet brushed his cheek.

HE SWALLOWED semiaudibly. "You know what that is?" he said.

"It's a hair; it's your girl's hair."

"That's what it is all right. The day I threw that horseshoe it was rainin' an' sunshinin' at the same time. I picked up the first rock I saw. If you do that you'll find a hair the same color of the girl's you're gonna marry. It's a sure sign. Look here!"

Gently he took a chestnut curl between his fingers, held the talismanic single strand close for her to see it was the same rich chestnut brown.

She turned red, stepped back and looked at him with an expression that made his head reel.

"Well," he swallowed, "I've gotta go. You phone me, Marion, when the party's goin' to be."

She nodded, still with her blue eyes smiling ravishingly into his own.

He walked unsteadily to the door, turned, smiled back, then, as if in a dream, went into the night.

The Girl Who Stayed Home

By Eileen Sherwood

Illustration by Alice Seipp

"CORINNA, what are you going to study at college next year?" It was Irene, the "sensible twin," talking. Rather hard on Corinna, that adjective. Yet a few said it was because she happened to be contrasted, twin-like, with Irene.

"Oh, just the regular course," absently. "Madame's going to put those new lace rosettes on my dress."

"But students don't take regular courses nowadays," persisted wise Irene. "They specialize. I'm going to be a private secretary. Miss Crane said to study business law and economics—would you like that?"

"Of course, if I could have clothes like hers. Didn't she wear the stunningest suit Sunday? But she looked too tired to really enjoy it. No wonder—it's taken her ten years to climb to her present position."

"I don't suppose you'd like teaching?" doubtfully.

"Awfully low salaries, considering the years of preparation. And you get old and frumpy so soon. But Miss LeGrange sends home to Paris for clothes."

Irene shrugged exasperatedly.

"You might try trained nursing. The uniform is universally becoming. Or newspaper work—Kate Boyd of the Star has a good looking coat."

Corinna only laughed. On a day a dream comes true, one is not easily disturbed by trifles like careers and caustic young sisters.

There it was, spread out on her bed! Her heart's desire, a lovely graduating dress—her first really nice frock.

Irene, of course, had chosen an inexpensive ready-made one, the surplus to be applied on next winter's coat.

But even Irene exclaimed in admiration as the cloudy mass descending over Corinna's white shoulders, fell into lines of youth and beauty.

"And did I tell you?" Corinna's eyes shone. "Madame liked my idea of the lace rosettes and all! She said I have 'ze eye of ze arteest'—I should study. But when I asked her where and how, she just waved her hands. Said it took her years—she began as a little midinette in Paris. She told me the most entrancing tales, all about Worth and Paquin and the rest!"

"I believe you'd like to go right into her workrooms."

"I would," admitted Corinna. "But you know how dressmakers guard their secrets. They make apprentices pull bastings for months."

"Speaking of careers—" began Irene.

"If you don't look out," admonished Corinna, "you'll turn into a career—a prim stiff-collared one, with type-writer keys for fingers and a filing cabinet for brain."

"Corinna, I should think you'd be serious! You know it was surprising in Uncle Jonas to offer to send us at all, after mother offended him by marrying a poor minister, right after he'd sent her through normal! She's had a hard time—" Irene's voice trembled.

Corinna became suddenly grave. "Honestly, I don't know what to do. It's worrying me more than you think."

"That vocational expert said the things we did in our leisure hours furnished a clue. What do you like to talk about and see? What magazines do you like best?"

"Those with a good fashion department."

"Well, I give it up, unless you could be a buyer, like Mrs. Hildebrand."

"It would be lovely, buying pretty things for stores. But Mrs. Hildebrand says it's frightful scrambling for bargains. And it took her ten years to become a buyer."

"Molly Kane makes loads of money in her little Kandy Kraft Shop," suggested Irene.

"Oh,—a business!" Corinna's first signs of animation. "That's surely the quickest way to get a good income—Molly started that shop less than two years ago. And she's so independent. But—I've neither training nor capital," she sighed.

That evening Corinna mailed a letter. "To Uncle Jonas. Said I couldn't decide on a career; asked for advice."

"You didn't!" Irene was horrified. "He'll think you incapable—impracticable!"

The answer came with alarming promptness.

"My dear Niece:

I have always hoped some of the Brewster practicality would manifest itself in Nelly's family. I suggest that you stay at home a year in order to make up your mind.

Very truly,

Jonas Brewster."

Irene forbore to say "I told you so." She left, lonesomely, in September. In November, Corinna's letters suddenly brightened; at Christmas vacation she appeared almost happy. Her gift to Irene was a Georgette blouse, beautifully embroidered. And in the spring came a white linen middie suit, perfectly tailored.

Corinna's visit was a whirl of engagements.

Irene elected to stay for summer session, whereupon Corinna invited herself down for Commencement Week.

"Afraid you won't have a good time," wrote Irene, but she met the train eagerly.

Laughing students crowded the station, meeting the happy, well-dressed folks arriving.

"Corinna won't be fashionable, but she's prettier than most of them," thought Irene loyally.

A girl was descending, one of those girls at whom every one looks twice. It was partly the sheen of honey-colored waves and puffs beneath the smart little traveling hat, partly the "chic" of her softly blousing top coat of black silk jersey—but not a little the grace and poise which held one's eyes—that poise which comes from the consciousness of being perfectly dressed.

The girl turned—"Corinna!"

As they started toward Irene's boarding house, her eager questions yet unanswered, came a voice—

"Good morning, Miss Irene." Tommy Sullivan, popular fraternity man, calmly insinuated himself between the serene Corinna and the astonished Irene.

Hastening footsteps overtook them. Young Professor Bell, of all people! Glumly Tommy gave him faculty precedence with Corinna, but managed to whisper in her ear before they left the girls at Irene's door.

"Tell me—wherever did you get—" began Irene in her room, staring at Corinna's pretty taffeta frock.

"No time now. Mr. Sullivan is going to show me the campus. And the dance tonight, with a faculty escort! You're going, too!" Corinna hugged her ecstatically.

"Thanks! But my new ball costumes haven't come from Paris."

From her bag Corinna took a rosy armful. "With your dark skin you need vivid shades. Aren't these organdy roses sweet?"

Corinna, at the dance, in pale pink and silver, her cheeks flushing as softly as the chiffon of her gown, was a picture that set more than one masculine heart racing, and she was the center of attention.

Even quiet Irene sparkled in her rose-tinted organdy.

The remainder of Corinna's visit was a whirl of engagements. From the wonder bag came the most fetching afternoon toilette that ever wrought havoc on a campus. White chiffon paneled in white thread lace, over black taffeta and sashed with black maline, which ended in a huge heart-smashing bow, and a big white lace hat, too, wreathed with black maline poppies.

One for Irene, too. Black Georgette, banded in blue and lovely with embroidery of pomegranate red.

"Where—?" besought Irene, but the telephone summoned her sister. At last the train whisked her, smiling sphinx-like, away.

In August Irene came home. Alighting from the car, she glanced down the suburban business street.

"A new shop! What a pretty window!"

Others evidently shared Irene's enthusiasm, for few passers-by failed to stop before it.

The proprietor evidently understood the effectiveness of the one color-scheme. And this must be Sunshine Week!

Yellow blooms in a brass bowl against the gray silk curtains. A primrose organdy flaunting its multitudinous ruffles next a sports dress of orange linen. And a wee yellow chambray hobnobbing cheerfully with Patsy rompers of yellow and black checked gingham.

Two smiling girls came out, each carrying a box. "We'll have the prettiest dresses of all," said one happily.

A door was flung open, a dear familiar voice—

"Been watching for you!"

After a while, comfortably settled in an armchair by the gleaming little show case, Irene listened.

"I was so discouraged last fall," Corinna began, "I didn't know if Uncle would ever send me—I didn't know what to do. We all needed new things—clothing was still high. But materials were cheaper. If only I could sew!"

"Then I learned of a school—the Woman's Institute—which teaches women and girls right in their homes everything I wanted to know about dressmaking. It was so reasonable and I was wild to learn, so I began."

"And, do you know, in a month I was able to make that Georgette blouse for you? Several girls wanted one like it. Then I could soon make cunning things for children, and those bring such good prices. Then came Sally Jones' wedding in the spring, and not a dressmaker could she find. She begged me to try, and I wrote to the Institute for help."

"They gave me just the advice I needed and helped me plan the dresses. I copied Sally's wedding gown from the Fashion Service, an exclusive service issued by the Institute only to its students. It's simply full of lovely clothes and you learn just how to make them! I can remodel or design new things, and my dresses fit, because I create special patterns for each customer."

"Finally I started my shop. The Institute told me just how, you see. I'm doing well—cleared $40 last week and have an assistant engaged. I'm going to carry my own materials in stock. (Imagine little me with a credit rating! But the Institute told me how to get it.) And only last week a broker said he could get me $1000 for this shop any day. In a year it will double in value."

"Are you coming to college?" demanded Irene, finding voice at last. "Every man who met you wants to know."

"It's not practical enough for me. See, I've got a bank account and I keep books and everything! And I'm going to New York for the fashion shows next year."

"Does Uncle Jonas know?"

Corinna laughed. "He came for a visit—you should have seen his astonishment. Offered to lend me money—said it looked like a good investment to him—but I told him I didn't need it. He seemed dazed and kept repeating something about the Brewster blood."

What Corinna did, you can do.

More than 125,000 women and girls, in city, town and country, have proved that you can easily and quickly learn, through the Woman's Institute, in your own home, during spare time, to make stylish, becoming clothes and hats for yourself, your family, and others, at less than half their usual cost.

It makes no difference where you live, because all the instruction is carried on by mail. And it is no disadvantage if you are employed during the day or have household duties that occupy most of your time, because you can devote as much or as little time to the course as you desire and just whenever it is convenient.

The Institute's courses are practical, fascinating and complete. They begin with the very simplest stitches and seams, taking nothing for granted, and proceed by logical steps until you can design and completely make even the most elaborate coats and suits.

It costs you nothing to find out all about the Woman's Institute and what it can do for you. Just send a letter, post card, or the convenient coupon below and you will receive—without obligation—the full story of this great school that is bringing to women and girls all over the world the happiness of having dainty, becoming clothes, savings almost too good to be true, and the joy of being independent in a successful business.

TEAR OUT HERE WOMAN'S INSTITUTE Dept. 38-A, Scranton, Penna.

Without cost or obligation, please send me one of your booklets and tell me how I can learn the subject marked below:

- ☐ Home Dressmaking ☐ Millinery
☐ Professional Dressmaking ☐ Cooking

Name _____
(Please specify whether Mrs. or Miss)

Street _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

For a Healthier Today and Tomorrow

The wealth of the nation tomorrow hinges on the health of children today. Good health is the youth-right, no less than the birth-right, of every child.

Every mother realizes the health-importance of fruit in the daily fare. But does she realize how essential prunes are? Prunes—so doctors and dietitians will tell you—give your children something they can get in no other way.

Because they are the finest prunes California produces, Sunsweet Prunes are especially rich in fruit sugar. That means energy. They are rich in tonic iron. That means strength—greater resistance to disease. They are rich in other mineral and vitamin elements. That means better body tone, better body balance. And, too, these natural, juicy sweetmeats provide a laxative made in Nature's own pharmacy.

So many children like Sunsweet Prunes in so many ways that our Domestic Science Director has prepared a special recipe folder of infants' and children's dishes. This folder, together with the 1922 Sunsweet Recipe Packet, is yours for the asking. California Prune and Apricot Growers Inc., 190 Market St., San Jose, Cal. 10,800 grower-members.

SUNSWEEET
CALIFORNIA'S NATURE-FLAVORED Prunes

Every mother should know these good-for-children dishes

SUNSWEEET STEWED PRUNES MASHED [with or without cereal]: Wash and soak Sunsweet Prunes over night in warm water to cover. Cook under boiling point until fruit is tender. Sugar to taste, cool, drain, pit and rub through a coarse sieve. Serve plain or with cream. For cereal, use 1 tablespoon mashed prunes for each service, stirring into the cereal before serving or place on top of each bowl of mush. Add sugar, cream or whole milk. With buttered graham toast, milk or chocolate, this makes a wholesome, well-balanced breakfast for the children.

SUNSWEEET PRUNE JUICE: Wash Sunsweet Prunes, cover with warm water and soak over night. Heat slowly to simmering point; cook until tender. Do not boil; no sugar is required. Pour off juice and strain. Use the prunes for mashed prunes. For babies between six months and one year, give 1 teaspoon, gradually increasing according to age, using 1 tablespoon for children three years and over.

SUNSWEEET PRUNE CUSTARD [with chocolate sauce]: Take $\frac{1}{2}$ cup cooked Sunsweet Prunes drained, pitted and cut in quarters; scald 1 cup milk; beat 1 egg, add 2 tablespoons sugar; pour hot milk over egg mixture. Add prunes; pour into custard cups or small baking dish. Set in pan of hot water; bake in moderate oven until firm in center; cool and serve. Chocolate Sauce: beat $\frac{1}{2}$ cup prune juice; pour it over 1 level tablespoon ground chocolate or 1 teaspoon cocoa, add $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon butter and cook five minutes.

The Little Road

(Continued from Page 11)

Kent was busy among the tubes of paint and with the canvas that must be prepared. Miss Prudence watched him while he worked. It was very late when he stopped and saw her nodding over her book.

"Why," he said in whimsical surprise, "I want to paint that picture. I want to paint anything, just to paint."

She smiled at him. "Yes, Kent," she said; "do you think I would have let you paint my garden unless you had wanted to do it?"

Tired though he was, it took him a long time to go to sleep that night. The scent of the roses came through his window, and he could hear the steady hum of insects. He got up once and went to the window. He could see the little road, white in the moonlight. There was a mystery about it now. He wondered where it might end, where, if he only followed it long enough, it would take him. For it seemed to him that it had begun to turn now and to take him back, by some long and tortuous course, to all that he had fled from, to the life and the work that his failure had made him put behind him.

HE DID, indeed, want to paint again. But he was afraid too. To begin again, to be deceived again perhaps by the facility that had already betrayed him once! To feel his dead hopes stir again and rise and fill his ears with their clamor, dazzle him with their splendor, sweep him on once more to—disillusionment! But it was too late to draw back. He was committed now to this return to life and work; he must take up again, whether he would or not, the fight that he had lost.

He slept at last. And with the sunlight of the morning awakening him, he was up, awake all over all at once, tingling as though cold water had played upon him, eager, alive, exultant. He could scarcely wait for breakfast; he was at work before the dew was dry upon the petals of the roses. While the brilliant morning sunlight held he painted in a fury of desire. Every moment while he worked the picture that was spread out before him changed, as blossoms came to the end of their brief life and errant gusts of wind played here and there among them.

Hand and eye struck fire together. There was no order in his working, only a savage, exulting energy. He laughed and shook his head when Miss Faith came at midday to call him to dinner. Hours later, when long shadows lay across the lawn, he stood up, stepped stiffly back from his easel, stared at his work. His eyes grew narrow; he moved to see the canvas from another angle. A strange look that was touched by awe came into his eyes. For the man who had painted that picture had done things that had been beyond Kent Marshall's power, things he had not learned to do, things that he had envied in the ripe work of other men!

The picture was practically finished in that one day of frantic, blazing work. But for a week he was busy upon it, and in that time he was ruthless; not even Miss Prudence was allowed to see it. When he let the sisters see it at last, Miss Faith cried a little, very quietly.

BUT Miss Prudence stood still. "Thank you, Kent," she said at last.

Again that night he lay awake a long time and thought.

He had put into that picture things that owed their being to a white heat of inspiration, things he had done not knowing he was doing them. And if he was to attain the only stature that could content him now, he must be able to do such things at will. That meant work—steady, grinding work.

After he had slept, he awoke, not tingling this time, but steady in his determination, and once more he took to the little road.

His destination was fixed. He had found a spot a week or two before that had stirred every latent painter's instinct in him. He had followed a wood path that stole upward from the road to a hilltop. The prospect from that summit had challenged him on the instant. There was some trick of light and shadow, nothing more perhaps. But it was a trap for one like Kent that Nature herself had set. He knew that there was a way, must be a way, to fix upon a canvas that curious, baffling vision that, regarded for ten minutes, faded into a picture such as an amateur photographer might have hailed with delight. There was one picture. The portrait of Miss Prudence he was already planning. And there was work enough along the little road to fill his future.

It was very still upon the hilltop. Far away the Sound lay blue and misty, with the distant Long Island hills like clouds against the sky. Before him lay wide lawns; clusters of trees; houses, low and rambling; long barns; ribbons of white road. It was dull work he had first to do; he covered sheet after sheet of his pad with notes, some of line and mass, a few of color.

He had brought sandwiches with him, and milk.

The sun was leaning downward when he stopped. After his lunch he lay down and smoked a pipe, and then went back to work.

AN HOUR later an odd consciousness of being watched disturbed him. He looked up and saw a collie regarding him gravely as he sat a score of feet away. The dog was sable and white; his ruff was like snow; his tail like some great feather fan.

"Hello!" said Kent. "Where did you come from?"

The dog rose, approached him slowly, head up and with eyes fixed upon him. Kent waited, smiling. The dog came close, sat down, raised his right paw and held it out to Kent, who shook it gravely.

"I'm glad to meet you," he said formally. "My name's Marshall. And you? Oh, yes." He looked at the plate on the dog's collar. "'Robin,'" he read.

The great tail moved; the long head was thrust into his hand.

Kent caught his breath. "You beauty!" he said. "Going to stay awhile and watch me work? Good!"

Robin lay down, his eyes fixed upon Kent. And Kent, touched, happier than he had been for a long time in this new friendship, went back to work. He was beginning to get hold of that, to lose himself in his task. But soon he heard a whistle that came from the hillside below the crest, the lilting notes of Siegfried's horn call.

Robin stirred and rose, hesitated, looked at Kent, moved uncertainly and then stood still and barked sharply.

"Ro-o-ob-in!" It was a girl's voice, clear and sweet.

Again the dog barked. But he stood still, although he was called now in a voice grown peremptory. Torn between two desires Robin ran a little way toward his mistress, barked, and raced back to Kent.

Amused and touched Kent walked with him, the dog leaping ahead, until he saw the girl. She was young, tall, bareheaded, so that the sun gleamed in the burnt gold of her hair. She was clad in a short white skirt, a sweater of a dull green like the hue of parched grass.

She smiled at him and laughed as Robin turned from her and went back to Kent. "You can't know how amusing this is," she said. "He's such a frightfully exclusive dog! People are always being hurt because he won't make friends with them."

"We took to each other right away," said Kent. "I don't know how long he'd been watching me before I saw him. But he didn't come near me until I spoke to him, and then he came up and shook hands."

THEIR laughter was mingled in the stillness. Robin was a little annoyed with them. He was inclined to think they might be laughing at him, which could not be allowed, and he barked sharply. But they still laughed, and he realized that this was a situation that threatened to pass beyond control. He took decisive steps, therefore, raced off, and returned, carrying one of Kent's sketches.

"Robin!" The girl, shocked, concerned, rescued the sketch.

Kent reassured her swiftly. "That doesn't matter a bit," he said. "I'm just making notes and throwing them away." She was looking at the sketch. "Oh!" she said. "It's—you're taking it from the top of the hill?"

He nodded. "I know," she said. "It's so beautiful sometimes, when I first stand there looking out. And then—what is it that happens? It's just for a minute; then it's gone. I've tried to photograph it a hundred times, but it's never in the picture."

"That's just what I'm trying to find out," he said, surprised, eager in his discovery that she too had seen. "I think I've run it down. I could—but it would be just dry, technical stuff if I told you. And you've found the great thing for yourself. There's something your eyes see in the first flash, before they adjust themselves to some distortion, some refraction. That's what I've got to get into my picture, you see."

"I'm awfully glad you're going to do it. I wish more people painted here." She held out her hand to Kent. "Thank you for liking Robin. We're coming to see how the picture grows—if we may?"

"I hope you will. But it'll be a week or so before there'll be much for you to see, I'm afraid."

"I think we'll understand," she said. "Good-by."

He watched them go off down the hill, not by his path—that led to the little road—but away to the north and across the fields. And then he gathered his things.

HE CAME to know again, in the next week, how good a thing it was to reach the day's end so tired that sleep was a luxury beyond all price. This picture was a baffling thing. He made a slow beginning. Here could be no such furious, impetuous painting as had given him his triumph in the garden.

Robin and his mistress came on the fifth day, just when he was ruefully regarding a canvas newly scrubbed clean. He waved his hand at it disgustedly.

"That's the sort of painter I am!" he said. "Robin, old man, you picked a wrong 'un. Better not waste time with me if you want to be a patron of the arts."

"Did you ride a bicycle ever?" she asked. "Yes—thanks!" He grinned. "Did you use to fall off all the time too?"

"You're not discouraged at all, really," she said shrewdly. "You're quite pleased with yourself, I think."

"I suppose I am," he admitted. "You see, I thought it was thundering good—last night. And it really wasn't so rotten. Most people would have fallen for it. Only I'd been—well, cheating. I'd put in things we

(Continued on Page 116)

Corns

Lift Right Off

Drop a little "Freezone" on a touchy corn or callus for a few nights. Instantly it stops aching, then shortly you lift it right off. Doesn't hurt a bit.

You can lift off every hard corn, soft corn, corn between the toes, and the "hard-skin" calluses on bottom of feet. Just get a bottle of "Freezone" at any drug store, anywhere.

Edward Wesley and Co., Cincinnati, O.

What 400,000 Women Are Reading

Coming every week from the Nation's Capital into the homes in every state, county, town and locality in the Union, the Pathfinder is an eagerly awaited visitor. The Pathfinder is a cheerful illustrated weekly—an independent home paper that tells the story of the world's news in an interesting and understandable way. Now in its 29th year. This splendid National Journal supplies a long-felt need. If you want a paper in your home which is reliable and wholesome; if you would appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, strongly, briefly, entertainingly—here it is. Bright serial and short stories; unusual miscellany, humor, etc.; diverting and instructive matter for the youngsters. The Question Box answers YOUR questions and is a mine of information. Send 15 cents (introductory price) to show that you might like such a paper, and we will send the Pathfinder three months, 14 issues. The 15 cents does not repay us, but we are glad to invest in new friends. Address: The Pathfinder, 259 Langdon Sta., Washington, D. C.

Keith's $2.50 Offer

3 plan books, showing 100 designs of artistic bungalows, cottages, or two-story houses—in frame, stucco and brick—with floor plans and descriptions, and 8 months' subscription to Keith's Magazine, all for $2.50.

For over 20 years an authority on planning, building and decorating homes—25c a copy on newsstands. With its help and Keith's Plans you can get the most distinctive, comfortable and satisfactory home with greatest economy. 8 plan books (260 plans) and Keith's for 12 months—$4.50. Keith Corporation, 499 Abbey Bldg., Minneapolis, Minn.

Become a Nurse

BY training at home through our correspondence course. Twenty years of success—12,000 graduates earning $18 to $30 weekly. Age 19 to 60. The standard course of home training for nursing. Available for the woman who wants to become a nurse. Indispensable for the practical nurse. Entire course earned in a few weeks. Two months' trial. Nurses recruited if desirable. Send for catalog and specimen lesson page.

The Chautauqua School of Nursing
315 Main Street
Jamestown, N. Y.

Hotels Need Trained Women

Nation-wide demand for trained women; all departments, hotels, clubs, apartment houses; uncrowded field; fine living, quick advancement. Our methods endorsed by leading hotels everywhere. Write for FREE BOOK "Your Big Opportunity." LEAVE HOTEL TRAINING SCHOOL, Room 313, Washington, D. C.

WATER-MAID WAVERS

Produce a natural, beautiful ripple wave! Instantly straighten out hair a week or more, even in damp condition of when preparing. No brushing, twisting and breaking your hair. Ask your dealer or send $1.00 for set of 6 mailed with full directions. WATER-MAID WAVERS CO., 1111 W. 7th St., Council Bluffs, Iowa.

Large size cake 25c;
medium size 10c by the cake,
55c by the box of six.

CASHMERE BOUQUET SOAP
—luxurious, lasting, refined—the choice of three generations.

Sold at your neighborhood store.

COLGATE & CO. Est. 1806 New York

Many a Mother has found that nothing agrees like Nestlé's—

*because Nestlé's Baby Food is pure milk already modified and made easier for your baby to digest.
How the babies love Nestlé's!
And how they gain on it!*

This is little John Walker of Youngstown, Ohio, whose father sends in his smiling picture and says: "We started feeding him on Nestlé's Food at 2 months, when he weighed less than 9 pounds. At the present time (age 10 months) he weighs 29 pounds and is still gaining. We cannot speak too highly of Nestlé's Food."

Send the coupon and let us send you, absolutely free, enough Nestlé's for 12 feedings, and a book by specialists on how to care for your baby.

NESTLÉ'S MILK FOOD

NESTLÉ'S FOOD COMPANY, Inc.
Room 12, Nestlé Building, New York City
Please send me Free a Mother's Book and trial package, enough for 12 feedings.
Name _____ Address _____ City _____

The Little Road

(Continued from Page 115)

hadn't really seen, you and I. And this morning I saw that, and so I've felt all day like a man who cheats when he's playing solitaire, till I decided to start clean.

"You wouldn't have gone on cheating," she said. "Would he, Robin?"

"It was remembering you and that you were coming that made me—made me know I couldn't," he said. "I've cheated in my time; that's why I know the tricks so well. But I think perhaps I'm going to bring it off this time, thanks to you."

"I hope that's true," she said.

He was still standing on the hilltop, ten minutes later, when she crossed a field far below him. She turned and saw him and waved her hand.

It was ten days before she came again, and the leaping of his pulses when he heard Robin's barking startled him and even frightened him a little. He could have sworn that he had not missed her, that he had scarcely thought of her. But in that minute while he waited for her to come he knew that he had never really ceased to think of her.

"I was afraid you weren't coming," he said.

She passed him then and stood so that the picture was before her.

SHE was very still. At last "Oh!" she said. And again: "Oh!"

He had not known how much what she should think had meant.

"I—there isn't anything for me to say, is there?" she said. Her voice was not quite steady. "You know—how—how beautiful it is?"

"I think it's what we've seen, you and I."

She looked a long time at the picture. "You haven't signed it?"

"No," he said after so long a pause that she turned to look at him curiously.

"Am I being ignorant again?" The color was rising in her cheeks. "Are you so famous that I should recognize your work? I am ignorant about such things. All I know is that it is beautiful—and true."

"There is no reason why you should know my work. No one would." His voice was faintly bitter. But he was gay suddenly. "What do you do?" he asked her abruptly.

"I was thinking of that too," she said.

"I mean—I feel as if I knew you. And I've seen you three times, haven't I? Why—I'm like other girls, I think."

"You—you're about twenty, aren't you?" he asked.

"I'm not quite old enough to be flattered and not quite young enough to be angry," she said and laughed. "I'm twenty-three."

"Still, everything's ahead of you. And I—I've had my turn."

"Let's not know all about each other," she said; "just our first names. And let's just be glad when we meet—and a little sorry when we don't. Let's have no plans. I'm Margaret." She was a little flushed in her eagerness.

"My name is Kent," he said.

She called to Robin and gave him her hand again. "Good-by, Kent," she said.

ONCE more he stood and watched her pass out of sight. But now he knew that she took something with her that he had thought gone from his keeping long before and for all time.

He knew that he loved her, and that she could not love him. It was friendship she sought from him. Even at their first meeting, after they had made their compact, there was a change in her.

"I want to know so many things," she said. "I want to be able to talk about everything. I've tried to talk to dad, and he looks so worried and puts my shoulder and tells me not to worry. If I'm specially awful, he gives me an extra check. He simply can't understand that I'm grown up."

A brother might have filled the place he came to hold in her life. No brother of flesh and blood ever did, to be sure; but that was as close as Kent could come to defining their relation to each other.

Sometimes, with frank regret, she told him of things that would keep her from meeting him. People were coming sometimes; once she told him excitedly that she was going away for a week, and quite frankly she spoke of her anticipation of seeing again a man—a boy. Kent called him in his thoughts—whom she had met in the previous winter. She thought he was glad that she was going. He was rather proud of that.

He walked far on the little road the day after she had gone, passed resolutely the paths that they had explored together. The day was cool; it held the first breath of autumn. But he had no eyes for the beauty that lay along the road.

HE THOUGHT of the summer that lay behind him, and what he had to show for it: The picture of the garden; "her" picture of the view from their hilltop; a few studies; a sketch of her that was all alive and glowing with beauty; some notes of promise that he could work upon when winter came. He had gone far, farther than he had dared to hope he might in so short a time. All his old facility had come back to him; for most of the tricks Crocker had condemned he had substituted the simplest and the most difficult of all techniques—hard work and the telling of plain truths.

He might have been well pleased; but what he distrusted was the force that lay behind what he had done. For he recognized now only one reason for work, an urging of the spirit within a man, a vision crying out for revelation. That was what had moved him in his youth.

This summer it was for Miss Prudence that he had painted her garden. And it was for Margaret, it seemed to him, that he had worked since then. Every worthy thing he had to show for his summer's work she had inspired and made him do. It came to this: He had to know whether he could go on alone, with no support save the strength of his own spirit. He had to know if he could still work on, with no hope of Margaret's word of praise. He walked on until suddenly he came to the end of the little road, where it turned through a thicket of young trees and was lost in the great highway. He stood for a time, leaning on his stick, looking at the procession of swiftly passing motors. Not since that day in March had he seen such a sight. But he was no longer afraid; and after all, the little road had answered him and shown him what he must find when he followed it to its end. He was at peace as he walked homeward. He was at peace, even though he knew that he must not see Margaret again.

KENT worked hard and steadily and well in the cool days that came now, days crisp with the freshness of clean winds from north and west that brought the chill of distant snow and the fragrance of pines and cedars. He had an attic room for a studio, filled with a hard north light. There his notes and his sketches waited, holding all the beauty and the poetry and the romance his eyes had seen along the little road.

He followed it still, day after day, secure in the strength of his spirit, knowing that the temptation to seek Margaret would not be strong enough to conquer him. He made the road his companion in her stead. With it, as he worked, he talked. It was a good friend; silent when he was quiet; ready always to meet his mood, demanding nothing. But it knew, perhaps, that through him and through his work it was to be immortal, free to bestow upon those who had never trodden it its gifts of beauty and of peace.

Yet it was the little road that betrayed Kent at last, and brought to him a messenger from that world to which he was not yet ready to return. For one evening, as he neared the old house, he saw a man walking toward him and grew tense at the sight of Crocker's stocky form, his arrogant, closely trimmed beard.

"Hello, Kent," said Crocker and held out his hand.

"Hello," Kent stood still a moment, smiling. "I'm glad to see you."

"Are you? I—hang it! I made old Henry tell me where to find you. And I promised him a job if you made the club fire him. So don't —"

(Continued on Page 118)

*"The baby who would grow and thrive
Must learn to use his senses five—
To see the gleam of shining things
To hear the croon his mother sings
To smell and taste the food he eats
And feel the crispy cool of sheets...."*

Even baby discovers their greater comfort

Thousands of families, brought up to believe that linen was "the correct thing" for beds, have given it up and now use Wamsutta Percale—the finest of cottons.

For solid comfort you must have a sheet that is perfectly dry, smooth and unwrinkled.

Wamsutta Sheets stay crisp and dry in any weather, any climate.

Finely woven of the best American cotton, they keep their freshness and smooth "feel" for days. They do not wrinkle or muss easily. They even grow smoother with constant use and laundering.

Not only do they wear much longer and have a better appearance, but they cost only about half as much as linen.

Noted hotels, whose guests insist upon the greatest comfort, are using Wamsutta instead of linen.

Ask your merchant to tell you his opinion of Wamsutta products.

Wamsutta Mills make two other brands of sheets and pillow-cases, Strong Thread and New Bedford, costing less than the Percale, but each standard in its grade.

WAMSUTTA MILLS, New Bedford, Mass.

Founded 1846

RIDLEY WATTS & COMPANY, Selling Agents
44 Leonard Street, New York

Send 15 cents for Doll's Sheet

16 x 20 inches (torn size), made up of Wamsutta Percale, fully hemmed, just the right size for doll's bed. Address: Wamsutta Mills, New Bedford, Mass.

WAMSUTTA

Sheets and Pillow Cases

The finest of cottons

Wamsutta Mills also make Lustersheer, the new material for dainty frocks, Lingerie Nainsooks, Batistes, etc.

BUNGALOW DESIGN NO. 621

Designed for the Service Dept., American Face Brick Assn.

This airy, sunny cottage is one of the designs in our "Face Brick Bungalow and Small House Plans." The large porch, ample living and sleeping quarters, and the generous windows, assuring plenty of light and ventilation, combine to make this an exceptionally livable house.

Beautiful, Economical Face Brick Homes

THE joy and satisfaction of your new Face Brick house is only enhanced by the years. Time mellows its beauty, weather cannot mar it, and age does not undermine its strength. It will serve you a lifetime and be a heritage to your children. Costing but a little more than less beautiful and less enduring materials, it becomes in a few years, through savings in depreciation, repairs, painting, fuel costs and insurance rates, the most economical house you can build.

"The Story of Brick," an artistic booklet with numerous illustrations, discusses these matters in detail. It has much helpful information for all who intend to build. Sent free.

"Face Brick Bungalow and Small House Plans" are issued in four booklets, showing 3 to 4 room houses, 5-room houses, 6-room houses, and 7 to 8 room houses, in all sixty-four, each reversible with a different exterior design. These designs are unusual and distinctive, combined with convenient interiors and economical construction. The entire set for one dollar. Any one of the booklets, 25 cents, preferably in stamps. We have the complete working drawings, specifications and masonry quantity estimates at nominal prices.

You may want "The Home of Beauty," fifty designs, mostly two stories, representing a wide variety of architectural styles and floor plans. Sent for 50 cents in stamps. We also distribute complete working drawings, specifications and quantity estimates for these houses at nominal prices.

Address American Face Brick Association, 1125 Westminister Building, Chicago, Illinois.

As a mother, housekeeper and the wife of a busy physician, Mrs. Dunton (left) is tied close to home duties. Yet in a single month we have paid her $75.00 for spare-time work.

Aside from subscription work, all Mrs. Cunningham (right) has to do is the housework necessary for the mother of seven children! Already she has earned 500 subscription dollars!

Earn $1.50 an Hour

Representatives of The Ladies' Home Journal, The Saturday Evening Post and The Country Gentleman have a sure way of earning, easily and quickly, the extra money that they need. They have an ever-ready storehouse of profit on which they can draw for $10—$20—$30—even $50 a week extra.

Easy Spare Time Dollars

You have the same opportunity. We need, everywhere in the United States, capable women who have a few spare hours a week and who want more money. No previous experience is necessary—the profits begin with your first order. Our subscription work is easy, healthful and interesting. The commissions and bonus that we pay are liberal, and the total amount you can earn depends only on the time and effort you can put into the work. If you, like the women pictured here, want a good position, with steady, ever-increasing income,

Send TODAY the coupon below

Several years ago Mrs. George of Kansas (left) suddenly found herself a widow with two little girls to support. "The Curtis offer," she says, "solved the problem of what to do."

Mrs. Hare of Michigan (right) gets real satisfaction in selling such unequalled VALUE as each Curtis subscriber receives. She earns as much as $75.00 a month in spare time alone.

Cut me out

The Curtis Publishing Company,
399 Independence Square, Philadelphia, Pa.

Gentlemen:—I, too, have spare time. Please tell me how I may earn $1.50 an hour.

Name _____ Street _____

Town _____ State _____

The Little Road

(Continued from Page 116)

"I won't. I mean it. I'm glad you came."
"We've been pretty sick about you, Kent. And I, remembering the way I'd stoned you when that—I didn't know about the rest, of course."

"You were right. I knew that. Only I couldn't admit it."

They walked slowly toward the house.
"You've been working, of course," said Crocker.

"Yes; I'll show you what I've done."

So Crocker stayed for supper, and later they lighted their pipes and went to the attic. And even in the lamplight Crocker saw what was there to be seen. He had no words then, and in the morning he said only: "I must keep quiet, I suppose?"

"For a while yet," said Kent.

So Crocker went away, muttering, along the little road. He wanted to walk, for his figure's sake, he said. And he thought, perhaps, but could not have said, that he was walking along ground never to be quite ordinary again.

KENT was vaguely restless after that visit; it took him some days to settle down again into the routine of his work. There could be few more days left, he knew, of work outdoors; already there was frost in the morning and at night. And he was eager to make the most of what time was left to him. And so it was with an angry bitterness that he heard a motor horn one morning, as he finished some small task in the garden, and then another and still another. And when he went down to the gate he saw Miss Faith leaning on it, and looking out happily. Car after car was passing, in both directions; suddenly Kent understood. They must be using the little road as a detour; repairs were being made, he supposed, on the post road.

"How long!" he said with a gesture of despair. "What a descent of Goths and Vandals!"

"Why, Kent! I think it's kind of nice," said Miss Faith. "It's so quiet here, and lonely; and there's never time to get away. We've lived here so long. We lived in a town once, Kent, before uncle died and left us this house. I used to sit on the porch in the afternoon and watch the people passing. I declare I like to see the automobiles. I'd be afraid to ride in one. But I like to see them."

"Brutes!" he said. "They'll tear our little road to pieces. They'll fill the air with the reek of their gasoline and frighten all the little beasts and the birds away."

"For shame!" she said. "They only want to use our road for a few days until their own is ready for them. You wouldn't have us turn our backs on strangers, would you?"

"No," he said soberly after a moment. "You make me ashamed, Miss Faith. You make me think of a stranger the little road brought here once and of the welcome that he found."

He had not meant to follow the little road, since he could not have it to himself. But now he went on and smiled as he walked.

HIS destination was a spot just opposite the little path among the trees that had led him to the hilltop and Margaret. He had begun a sketch there the day before and had a little more to do to finish it. Quietly, heedless of those who passed, he set to work, and in a moment was as much alone as though the old solitude of the road had never been broken.

A sound of furious barking roused him. He stood up, amazed, incredulous, as something brown and white and soft and furry leaped upon him. He staggered, nearly fell indeed, before the frantic onslaught of Robin, clamorous in his delight at this recovery of his friend.

He heard the grinding of brakes. He saw a little car coming to a stop a hundred feet away. He saw Margaret turning to look at him. And he began to run toward her clumsily. His pad, forgotten, lay where it had fallen. She was still watching his coming. There was no color in her cheeks, no movement in her body.

He leaped upon the running board, took both her hands and held them. His eyes were hungry. "I—I thought you'd gone long since."

"I wanted to stay." Her voice was very low; it was the echo of his memory of it. "Kent—I've missed you so—I've wondered so—and worried."

"I—I couldn't come," he said, shame-faced. But then he lifted his head and met her eyes with his. "I was afraid I couldn't give you what you wanted from me, afraid I'd spoil our friendship. But, Margaret, I hope I'm ready now—to give you just my friendship, to take what you can give me of yourself."

"But, Kent"—she caught her breath, and he saw that tears stood in her eyes—"there is nothing of myself that I can give you now."

HE FREED her hands and drew away from her. "I understand," he said after a moment. "It's taken me so long a time to make ready that—someone else has taken all?"

"No, no!" she cried, and now her laughter broke in upon her tears. "Oh, Kent, how can I give you what you've had so long? Everything, my dear, everything I have to give."

Sheer wonder held him still, incredulous, distrustful of his very senses.

"I knew I loved you when you did not come," she said. "When I missed you and—longed for you."

Before all who passed he took her in his arms and held her so a moment. "And now," he cried, "you've come—so—along the little road! It's led me to all the beauty in the world!"

They sat and talked. There was so much for them to say. They had so many separate memories to share.

She laughed suddenly, and her cheeks were like twin roses as he looked at her. "There's something else," she said, in a voice so low that he bent close to hear. "I—my name is Margaret—Thayer."

His laughter pursued hers as it went echoing down the little road. "We didn't know that even of each other," he said. "Oh, Margaret, will you mind if your name must be Marshall soon—oh, very soon?"

"Kent Marshall!" she said. "Why, I used to know his work. But it was not like yours."

"No," he said, and his laughter was stilled. "That's true, thank heaven! Oh, Margaret, I've so much to show you. Can we go now?"

"Of course. Do you think I'd let you go again? Oh, Kent, to think that I can laugh at last about those awful weeks when you were gone!"

KENT called to Robin as Margaret bent to shift her gears, and he leaped in the car with them.

So at last he took her to the old house to which so often her spirit had gone with him. Miss Faith was by the gate, and when he would have told her it seemed that she knew. She had no cars for him, for Margaret was in her arms. Then they went, all three, into the house, and through it to the garden where Miss Prudence was.

When she saw them she caught her breath and tears started in her eyes. She went to Margaret and took her hands in both of hers. "My dear," she said, "I always knew that you would come."

"It was the little road that brought her to me, Miss Prudence. And now—I can tell you her name now, all her name."

"But I know it," Miss Prudence said and smiled. "You are Martin Thayer's daughter, my dear. You are very like him as he was when I knew him years ago."

"Why!" Margaret cried out in her astonishment. "My dad! Of course! You must be his Prudence; and I never thought when Kent was telling me of you and of Miss Faith. He's talked of you so often and wondered where you were. No one could tell him. And all this time, if he had only followed Kent's little road—"

Kent saw Miss Prudence's eyes then and turned away. He stood, looking out along the little road until presently Margaret came and stood beside him, and her hand stole into his, and his eyes turned from the road to her.

A Perfect Fit For Every Figure

*This is one of the six reasons why
Warner's Rust-Proof is the most popular Corset in America*

Two Warner's Rust-Proof Corsets, one for dress and one for ordinary wear, will last you through the entire year.

BE your figure slender, heavy or average; be it tall or short; be it large above the waist or small—there is a Warner's Rust-Proof model especially made to fit your particular figure and to improve its lines.

And when you examine the strong and yet flexible double boning in Warner's Rust-Proof, when you have seen the quality of its cloth and the sturdy stitching at points of strain, you will understand why a Warner's Rust-Proof continues to fit you as long as the corset lasts.

You can wash a Warner's Rust-Proof as often as you please and keep it always fresh and clean. There is no danger of breaking or tearing because it is absolutely guaranteed not to rust, break or tear. In all models where needed the Warner double skirt feature provides extra strength at the hips.

Warner's Rust-Proof is the most popular corset in America because it leads in the six essentials of corset satisfaction—style, fit, comfort, durability, flexibility and economy. Wear it and you will have no other.

Prices: $1.50, $2, $3 and up to $10.

*Also made in Canada by the Warner Brothers Co.
Montreal.*

★Remember!

Warner's Rust-Proof is the guaranteed corset.

Warner's Rust-Proof Corsets—

F. W. WOOLWORTH CO. 5 AND 10¢ STORE

Lorraine

TRADE MARK

Single and Double Mesh. HAIR NETS

ANY winter sport where the wind rushes through your hair will make you grateful for that second strand in Lorraine double mesh hair nets. You will like to wear them at social functions, too. No better net is made at any price. Lorraine Nets are 10c, owing to the tremendous buying power of the Woolworth stores.

Double mesh Lorraine Hair Nets—like single mesh ones—are extra large, and guaranteed to reach you in perfect condition. Today stop in at the nearest Woolworth store and buy a supply. Always keep some extra Lorraine Hair Nets in your top dressing table drawer.

Sold Exclusively at and Guaranteed by F. W. WOOLWORTH CO. Stores

Cap and Fringe
Extra Large—Enduring

What the Poets Send Us

DECORATION BY NAT LITTLE

All in All

By BLISS CARMAN

THE new moon hangs o'er the mountain crest,
The lilac blooms by the door,
The summer comes and the roses blow,
The glorious woods of autumn glow,
And love is more and more.

The seasons pass, the strong winds die,
The sunlight steals from the wall,
The glittering planets wheel and sink,
The tides return to the ocean's brink,
And love is all in all.

A Child's Epitaph

By ARTHUR GUITERMAN

ABOVE a low mound at the cedar tree's root
Is carved on a stone that is moldering dark,
"The Dove found no rest for the sole of her foot,
And returned unto Him in the Ark."

Motoring at Twilight

By RUTH LAMBERT JONES

ETERNITY before us,
Centuries behind—
The throb of measured motion,
The lift of rushing wind!

Out of the West the sunset,
Out of the East a star;
Vanished all pain and sorrow;
The world itself seems far!

Homesick

By STRICKLAND GILLILAN

I DREAM of a smile—and the smile is yours!
I turn the key in my dear dream's doors
To hold you there, yet you slip away,
And darkness visits my dream-born day.

I dream of lips—and the lips are yours!
I press those lips while my spirit soars
To the back of the planets. I wake, and lo!
You've gone to the place where lost dreams go.

I dream of a soul—and the soul is you!
The miles that part us you've traveled through
At the call of my own soul, starved and wan;
I wake, and the soul that is you is gone!

Sometime you'll come, as I dream each night
You have come to me; and my spirit light
Will lift its songs to the star-decked dome.
Your smile, your lips and your soul make Home!

Compensation

By FLORENCE HOWARD WOLCOTT

IF I HAD not been sick abed and known the sting of pain,
I would not know the splendid joy of being well again.

If you had never gone away, I'd miss the ecstasy
That our reunion always means when you come back to me.

His Farewell

By AMELIA JOSEPHINE BURR

I HAVE attempted all and lost all; now,
After your "No," what is there left to say?
And yet one promise I would ask of you
Before I go away.

Not for myself—for me it is too late.
I think my heart is broken . . . Yes, I know
Those words are shopworn. Disbelieve them, dear,
If you are happier so;

But promise this—that you will veil from men
That glowing heart of yours; it burns too clear.
Hold us away. How can we help but love you
When we can come so near?

I am not blaming you—not God, who made you,
Could change you, dearest—only try to be Less deadly kind, and spare another man
What you have brought to me.

Haven

By CONSTANCE G. ALEXANDER

NEST of the winging heart's desire,
Hive of the homing bee,
Haven of peace for the storm-tossed bark
Is thy dear love to me.

Out of the dark, in from the deep
I cry to thy heart to hear;
Though I am strong, to thy little hand
I cling and am reft of fear.

Gather me close in thine arms to-night;
On thy tranquil breast let me lie;
Mother so tender, mother so dear,
Home from the world am I.

The Windbell

By DANIEL HENDERSON

YOUR hands have hung a windbell where
The thirsting windows drink the air,
And when the curtains blow and crinkle,
I hear its tinkle, tinkle, tinkle!

Mine is a soul that dwells content
Within the clamorous Occident,
But when, by wandering breezes blown,
The windbell wafts its Orient tone,
Its song is as a bark which plies
Between blue seas and lilac skies;
And by this ship of sound I drift
To islands where chrysanthemums lift
In ranks of gold and purple plumes
To shelter silken, scented rooms
Whose crimson lamps at dusk shall dance
To light the traveler to romance.

But ah, it would not be Cathay
With you, my heart's red rose, away!
So into this enchanted court
Your lovely presence I transport!
And sweeter than the samisen,
Or tunes that geishas sing to men,
Or windbell's rune, or temple's gong,
Or nightingale's delirious song,
Are these our murmurs which attest
A love that knows not East or West!

The Guest

By THEODOSIA GARRISON

I ENTERTAIN my joy with all I may afford,
With fair, white linen and plenty on the board,
With glowing hearth and candlelight, with neighbor talk and song—
Oh, well-beloved guest of mine, may you stay long!

I entertain my joy in my heart's best room,
With posies on the windowsill and lights against the gloom;
I keep my windows shining, I make my garden gay—
Oh, well-beloved guest of mine, long may you stay!

I entertain my joy with all the care I know,
That she may love my house too much to turn and go,
For of all sad places the saddest one to-day
Is where joy stayed a little while—and yawned and went away.

Up the Hill

By MARY STEWART CUTTING

I "WILL to desire"—
I wish to will!
This is the only way
Up the hill.

The one foot forward
Keeps time, keeps time
To the tune of the will
For the upward climb.

I "will to desire"—
I wish to will!
There is no other road
Up the hill.

The air grows clearer,
The brain works fast.
I shall gain the summit
At last, at last!

No Vacuum

By GEORGE H. FREE

THERE is no vacuum. If from a cask
Is poured out wine, the air, intruding, fills
The void, and thus the cask is ever full,
For Nature tolerates no vacuum.

If from the heart the wine of kindness flows,
To cheer and bless a fainting fellow man,
The heart is nowise empty; love streams in
And fills it full. No vacuum is there.

This straightforward question struck Carley as singularly as if she had never considered such a possibility. It forced her to think of things she had buried.

"I don't believe I ever will," she answered thoughtfully.

"That is nonsense, Carley," he went on. "You'll have to marry. What else can you do? With all due respect to your feelings, that affair with Kilbourne is ended, and you're not the wishy-washy, heartbreak kind of girl."

"You can never tell what a woman will do," she said, somewhat coldly.

"Certainly not. That's why I refuse to take 'no.' Carley, be reasonable. You like me, respect me, do you not?"

"Why, of course I do."

"I'm only thirty-five, and I could give you all any sensible woman wants," he said. "We could make a real American home. Have you thought at all about that, Carley? Something is wrong to-day. Men are not marrying. Wives are not having children. Of all the friends I have, not one has a real American home. Why, it is a terrible fact. But, Carley, you are not a sentimentalist, nor a melancholiac. Nor are you a waster. You have fine qualities. You need something to do, someone to care for."

"Pray do not think me ungrateful, Elbert," she replied, "nor insensible to the truth of what you say. But my answer is no!"

WHEN Harrington had gone, Carley went to her room and, precisely as upon her return from Arizona, she faced her mirror skeptically and relentlessly. "I am such a liar that I'll do well to look at myself," she meditated. "Here I am again. Now! The world expects me to marry. But what do I expect?"

There was a raw, unhealed wound in Carley's heart. Seldom had she permitted herself to think about it, let alone to probe it with hard, materialistic queries. But custom was as inexorable as life. If she chose to live in the world she must conform to its customs. For a woman marriage was the aim and the end and the all of existence. Nevertheless, for Carley it could not be without love.

Before she had gone West she might have had many of the conventional, modern ideas about women and marriage. But, because out there in the wilds her love and perception had broadened, now her arraignment of herself and her sex was bigger, sterner, more exacting. The months she had been home seemed fuller than all the months of her life. She had tried to forget and enjoy; she had not succeeded; but she had looked with far-seeing eyes at her world. Glenn Kilbourne's tragic fate had opened her eyes. Either the world was all wrong or the people in it were.

But if that was an extravagant and erroneous supposition there certainly was proof positive that her own, small individual world was wrong. The women did not do any real work; they did not bear children; they lived on excitement and luxury. They had no ideals. How greatly were men to blame? Carley doubted her judgment here. But as men could not live without the smiles and comradeship and love of women, it was only natural that they should give the women what they wanted. Indeed, they had no choice. It was give or go without.

How much of real love entered into the marriages among her acquaintances? Before marriage Carley wanted a girl to be sweet, proud, aloof, with a heart of golden fire and not attainable except through love! It would be better that no children be born at all unless born of such beautiful love. Perhaps that was why so few children were born. Nature's balance and revenge! In Arizona Carley had learned something of the ruthlessness and inevitableness of Nature. She was finding out she had learned this with many other staggering facts.

"I LOVE Glenn still," she whispered passionately, with trembling lips, as she faced the tragic-eyed image of herself in the mirror. "I love him more—more. If I were honest I'd cry out the truth. It is terrible. I will always love him. How then could I marry any other man? I would be a lie, a cheat. If I could only forget him, only kill that love. Then I might love another man; and if I did love him, no matter what I had felt or done before, I would be worthy. I could feel worthy. I could give him just as much. But without such love I'd give only a husk, a body without soul."

Love then was the sacred and holy flame of life that sanctioned the begetting of children. Marriage might be a necessity of modern time, but it was not the vital issue. Carley's anguish revealed strange and hidden truths. In some inexplicable way Nature struck a terrible balance, revenged herself upon a people who had no children, or who brought into the world children not created by the divinity of love, unearned for, and therefore somehow doomed to carry on the blunders and burdens of life.

Carley realized how right and true it might be for her to throw herself away upon an inferior man, even a fool or a knave, if she loved him with that great and natural love of woman; likewise it dawned upon her how false and wrong and sinful it would be to marry the greatest or the richest or the noblest man unless she had that supreme love to give him, and knew it was reciprocated.

"What am I going to do with my life?" she asked bitterly and aghast. "I have been—I am a waster. I've lived for nothing but pleasure. I'm utterly useless. I do absolutely no good on earth." Thus she saw how Harrington's words rang true, how they had precipitated a crisis for which her unconscious brooding had long made preparation.

The Call of the Cañon

(Continued from Page 15)

"Why not give up ideals and be like the rest of my kind?" she soliloquized.

That was one of the things which seemed wrong with modern life. She thrust the thought from her with passionate scorn. If poor, broken, ruined Glenn Kilbourne could cling to an ideal and fight for it, could not she, who had all that the world esteemed worth while, be woman enough to do the same? The direction of her thought seemed to have changed. She had been ready for rebellion. Three months of the old life had shown her that for her it was empty, vain, farcical, without one redeeming feature. The naked truth was brutal, but it cut clean to wholesome consciousness. Such so-called social life as she had plunged into deliberately to forget her unhappiness had failed her utterly. If she had been shallow and frivolous it might have done otherwise. Stripped of all guise, her actions must have been construed by a penetrating and impartial judge as a mere parading of her decorated person before a number of males with the purpose of ultimate selection.

"I have to find some work," she muttered soberly.

At the moment she heard the postman's whistle outside; and a little later the servant brought up her mail. The first letter, large, soiled, thick, bore the postmark Flagstaff and her address in Glenn Kilbourne's writing.

Carley stared at it. Her heart gave a great leap. Her hand shook. She sat down suddenly, as if her strength was inadequate to uphold her.

"Glenn has written me," she whispered in slow, halting realization. "For what? Oh, why?"

THE other letters fell off her lap to lie unnoticed. This big, thick envelope fascinated her. It was one of the stamped envelopes she had seen in his cabin. It contained a letter that had been written on his rude table, before the open fire, in that little log cabin under the spreading pines of West Fork Cañon. Dared she read it? The shock to her heart passed; and with mounting swell, seemingly too full for her breast, it began to beat and throb a wild, sweet gladness through all her being. She tore the envelope apart and read:

Dear Carley: I'm sure glad for a good excuse to write you. Once in a blue moon I get a letter, and to-day Hutter brought me one from a soldier pard of mine who was with me in the Argonne. His name is Virgil Rust—queer name, don't you think?—and he's from Wisconsin. Just a rough-diamond sort of chap, but fairly well educated. He and I were in some pretty hot places, and it was he who pulled me out of a shell crater. I'd "gone west" sure then, if it hadn't been for Rust.

Well, he did all sorts of big things during the war. Was down several times with wounds. He liked to fight, and he was a holy terror. We all thought he'd get medals and promotion. But he didn't get either. These much-desired rewards did not always go where they were most deserved.

Rust is now lying in a hospital in Bedford Park. His letter is pretty blue. All he says about why he's there is that he's knocked out. But he wrote a heap about his girl. It seems he was in love with a girl in his home town—a pretty, big-eyed lass whose picture I've seen—and while he was overseas she married one of the fellows who got out of fighting. Evidently Rust is deeply hurt. He wrote: "I'd not care so, if she'd thrown me down to marry an old man or a boy who couldn't have gone to war."

You see, Carley, service men feel queer about that sort of thing. It's something we got over there, and none of us will ever outlive it. Now, the point of this is that I am asking you to go see Rust, and cheer him up, and do what you can for the poor devil. It's a good deal to ask of you, I know, especially as Rust saw your picture many a time and knows you were my girl. But you needn't tell him that we couldn't make a go of it.

And, as I am writing this to you, I see no reason why I shouldn't go on in behalf of myself.

The fact is, Carley, I miss writing to you more than I miss anything of my old life. I'll bet you have a trunkful of letters from me, unless you've destroyed them. I'm not going to say how I miss your letters. But I will say you write the most charming and fascinating letters of anyone I ever knew, quite aside from any sentiment. You knew, of course, that I had no other girl correspondent. Well, I got along fairly well before you came West, but I'd be an awful liar if I denied I didn't get lonely for you and your letters. It's different now that you've been to Oak Creek. I'm alone most of the time and I dream a lot, and I'm afraid I see you here in my cabin, and along the brook, and under the pines, and riding Calico—which you came to do well—and on my hopen fence, and—oh, everywhere! I don't want you to think I'm down in the mouth, for I'm not. I'll take my medicine. But, Carley, you spoiled me, and I miss hearing from you, and I don't see why it wouldn't be all right for you to send me a friendly letter occasionally.

I append what little news Oak Creek affords.

That blamed old bald eagle stole another of my pigs.

I am doing so well with my hog raising that Hutter wants to come in with me, giving me an interest in his sheep.

It is rumored someone has bought the Deep Lake section I wanted for a ranch. I don't know who. Hutter was rather non-committal.

Charley, the herder, had one of his queer spells the other day, and swore to me he had a letter from you. He told the lie with a sincere and placid eye, and even a smile of pride. Queer guy, that Charley! Flo and Lee Stanton had another quarrel, the worst yet, Lee tells me. Flo asked a friend out from Flag and threw her in Lee's way, so to speak, and when Lee retaliated by making love to the girl, Flo was enraged. Funny creatures, you girls! Flo rode with me from High Falls to West Fork and never showed the slightest sign of trouble. In fact, she was delightfully gay. She rode Calico and beat me in a race.

Adios, Carley. Won't you write me?

GLENN.

No sooner had Carley read the letter through to the end than she began it all over again, and on this second perusal she lingered over passages, only to reread them. She leaped up from the reading to cry out something that was unutterable. All the intervening weeks of shame and anguish and fury and strife and pathos, and the endless striving to forget were by the magic of a letter made as nothing but vain oblations.

"He loves me still!" she whispered, and pressed her breast with clenching hands and laughed in wild exultance and paced her room like a caged lioness. It was as if she had just awakened to the assurance she was beloved. That was the shibboleth, the cry by which she sounded the closed depths of her love and called to the stricken life of a woman's insatiate vanity.

Then she snatched up the letter, to scan it again, and suddenly grasping the import of Glenn's request, she hurried to the telephone to find the number of the hospital in Bedford Park. A nurse informed her that visitors were received at certain hours, and that any attention to disabled soldiers was most welcome.

CARLEY motored out to Bedford Park to find the hospital merely a long, one-story, frame structure, a barracks hastily thrown up for the care of invalided men of the service. The chauffeur said it had been used for that purpose during the training period of the Army, and later when injured soldiers began to arrive from France.

Presently Carley stood beside a bed and looked down upon a gaunt, haggard young man who lay propped up on pillows.

"Rust, a lady to see you," announced the nurse.

Carley had difficulty in introducing herself. Had Glenn ever looked like this? What a face! Its healed scar only emphasized furrows of pain that assuredly came from present wounds. He had unnaturally bright, dark eyes, and a flush of fever in his hollow cheeks.

Carley spent a poignant and depth-stirring hour at the bedside of Glenn's comrade. At last she learned from loyal lips the nature of Glenn Kilbourne's service to his country. How Carley clasped to her sore heart the praise of the man she loved, the simple proofs of his noble disregard of self!

Rust said little about his own service to country or to comrade. But Carley saw enough in his face. He had been like Glenn. By these two Carley grasped the glorious truth of the spirit and sacrifice of the legion of boys who had upheld American traditions. Their children and their children's children, as the years rolled by into the future, would hold their heads higher and prouder. Some things could never die in the hearts and the blood of a race. These boys, and the girls who had the supreme glory of being loved by them, must be the ones to revive the Americanism of their forefathers.

Nature and God would take care of the slackers, the cowards who cloaked their shame with bland excuses of home service, of disability and of dependence.

That night she wrote swiftly and feverishly page after page to Glenn, only to destroy them. She could not keep her heart out of her words, nor a hint of what was becoming a sleepless and eternal regret.

She wrote until a late hour, and at last composed a letter she knew did not ring true, so stilted and restrained was it in all passages save those concerning news of Glenn's comrade and of her own friends.

"I'll never, never write him again," she averred with still lips, and next moment could have laughed in mockery at the bitter truth.

IF SHE had ever had any courage, Glenn's letter had destroyed it. But had it not been a kind of selfish false courage, roused to hide her hurt, to save her own future? Courage should have a thought of others. Yet shamed or moment at the consciousness she would write Glenn again and again and exultant the next with the sweet imperiousness of clamoring love, she seemed to have climbed beyond the self that had striven to forget. She would remember an think, though she died of longing.

Carley, like a drowning woman, caught at straws. With a relief and joy to give up that endless nagging at her mind for months she had kept ceaselessly active, by association which were of no help to her, and which did not make her happy, in her determination to forget. Suddenly then she gave up to remembrance. She would cease trying to get over her love for Glenn, and think of him as much as memory dictated. This must constitute the only happiness she could have.

The change from strife to surrender was so novel and sweet that for days she felt renewed. It was augmented by her visits to the hospital in Bedford Park. Through her bountiful presence Virgil Rust and his comrades had many dull hours of pain and weariness alleviated and brightened. Interesting herself in the condition of the seriously disabled soldiers and the possibility of their future took time and work that Carley gave willingly and gladly. At first she endeavored to get acquaintances with means and leisure to help the boys, but these overtures met with such little success that she ceased wasting valuable time she could herself devote to their interests.

Thus several weeks passed swiftly by. Several soldiers who had been more seriously injured than Rust improved to the extent that they were discharged. But Rust

(Continued on Page 124)

KOTEX

Meets the most exacting needs

AT many girls' schools and colleges Kotex has been accepted as the most satisfactory article of its kind. Endorsement of Kotex by critical directing heads, responsible for the welfare of thousands of girls, warrants reflection. School girls, active in athletics, and usually required to participate in daily programs regardless, have found that Kotex completes their toilet essentials—guards against emergencies.

Kotex are hygienic, convenient, and so low in cost that they form a new sanitary habit. There is nothing to launder, as Kotex are disposed of instantly—easily. Directions for disposing are enclosed in every box.

Sold everywhere in up-to-date stores and shops that cater to women. Easy to buy. You avoid unwelcome counter conversation when you ask for them by name—"A box of Kotex, please."

Cellucotton Products Co.
208 S. La Salle St., Chicago

New York Office: 51 Chambers St.
Factories—Neenah, Wisconsin

Kotex cabinets are now being distributed in women's rest-rooms everywhere—hotels, office buildings, restaurants, theatres and other places—from which may be obtained one Kotex with two safety pins, in plain wrapper, for 10 cents.

Regular Size, 12 in box for 60c

Trial box of 12 mailed prepaid in plain wrapper for 65c.

Large Size, 6 in box for 45c

Trial box of 6 mailed prepaid in plain wrapper for 50c.

INEXPENSIVE, COMFORTABLE, HYGIENIC and SAFE — KOTEX

ARTAMO
READY-TO-EMBROIDER
CHILDREN'S DRESSES

place beautiful, stylish, rich-appearing garments within the "pocket-book" reach of every family.

A few pleasant minutes spent in embroidering the simple designs—and you have a smart dress with that distinctive touch which only hand-embroidery can give.

Every package contains the made-up garment, full, detailed instructions and more than enough D. M. C. cotton to complete the design. Every article guaranteed for fabric and workmanship.

Send for your copy of the new 1922 Spring Style Photographs

Apron No. 2046
Full front and back, with colored patches for applique embroidery.

75¢

At Your Art Needlework Store or Write to

G. REIS & Bro.
882 Broadway, N. Y.

Use This Chest FREE

Sent on Free Trial

A Famous Piedmont Red Cedar Chest, Your choice of many styles and designs sent on 15 days' free trial. A Piedmont product fast, useful and pleasing to look at, and durable. Needed in every home. Lasts for generations. The ideal wedding or birthday gift. Write today for free catalog with new reduced prices—postpaid free to you.

PIEDMONT RED CEDAR CHEST CO., Dept. 16, Statesville, N. C.

Pass for it—sell in what it saves. Direct from Factory to Home.

ART NEEDLEWORK Books

By SOPHIE T. LA CROIX

Instruct Beginners. New Ideas For Experts.

Number	Each	Number	Each
12 Patchwork Quilts, Etc.,	25c	9 Yokes, Corset Covers,	15c
17 Knitting,	10c	11 Tatting, Waives, Etc.,	15c
1 Old and New Designs,	15c	13 Towels, Slips, Sheets,	15c
2 Old and New Designs,	15c	14 Collars and Yokes,	15c
3 Bedspreads,	35c	15 Centerpieces,	15c
4 Tatting and Braids,	15c	16 Yokes and Baby Yokes,	15c
5 One Hundred Novelties,	15c	18 Old and New Designs,	15c
8 Old and New Designs,	15c	20 Headwork Bags, Etc.,	15c
10 Handkerchief Embroidery,	15c	Headwork Lounges,	$1.00

Or 17 Books, Value $3.97, for $4.00 C. O. D.

ST. LOUIS FANCYWORK CO., St. Louis, Mo.

Remarkable Value, No. 1154 Nainsook Slip or Dress with dainty pin tucks, French knots, bows, daisies and feather stitching. Neck and sleeves edged with narrow band, same material, thumbtucked and edged with lace. Infants 6 mos., 1 and 2 yrs.

DeZis Hand Made

INFANT WEAR

Low in price. Beautifully made by French needleworkers. Layettes (12 pieces) $15.00 up. On approval 1 reference furnished. Write for catalog.

DE LIS, Dept. F-1, New Orleans

$1.98

WESSON OIL—as fine
as a salad oil as you ever tasted!

AGENTS! A SALE IN EVERY HOME

"Oh How Lovely!"

Take orders for our beautiful Dress Goods, Silks, Wash Fabrics and General Yard Goods. Our agents get big business. Large stock of over 1000 hand-some fabric samples. Write today!

National Importing & Mfg. Co., Dept. 20X, 573 Broadway, N. Y.

Colson Wheel Chairs and Cripples' Tricycles Models for All Needs

The COLSON Co.
1105 Cedar St., Elyria, O.

Catalog Free

The Call of the Cañon

(Continued from Page 122)

gained little or nothing. The nurse and doctor both informed Carley that Rust brightened for her, but when she was gone he lapsed into somber indifference. He did not care whether he ate or not, nor whether he got well or died.

Carley knew that Rust's hurt was more than the loss of a leg, and she decided to talk earnestly to him and try to win him to hope and effort. He had come to have a sort of reverence for her. So, hiding her time, she at length found an opportunity to approach his bed while his comrades were asleep or out of hearing.

"Carley, I'm bitter," he said, "but I'm not rancorous and callous, like some of the boys. I know if you'd been my girl you'd have stuck to me."

"Yes, I would," replied Carley.

"THAT makes a difference," he said with a sad smile. "You see, we soldiers all had feelings. And in one thing we all felt alike. That was, we were going to fight for our homes and our women. I should say women first. No matter what we read or heard about standing by our allies, fighting for liberty or civilization, the truth was we all felt the same, even if we never breathed it. Glenn fought for you. I fought for Nell. We were not going to let the Huns treat you as they treated French and Belgian girls. And think! Nell was engaged to me, she loved me—and she—she married a slacker when I lay half dead on the battlefield!"

"She was not worth loving or fighting for," said Carley with agitation.

"Ah! Now you've said something," he declared. "If I can only hold to that truth! What does one girl amount to? I do not count. It is the sum that counts. We love America, our homes, our women. Carley, I've had comfort and strength come to me through you. Glenn will have his reward in your love. Somehow I seem to share it—a little. Poor Glenn! He got his too. Why, Carley, that guy wouldn't let you do what he could do for you. He was cut to pieces—"

"Please, Rust, don't say any more; I am unstrung," she pleaded.

"Why not? It's due you to know how splendid Glenn was. I tell you, Carley, all the boys here love you for the way you've stuck to Glenn. Some of them knew him, and I've told the rest. We thought he'd never pull through. But he has, and we know how you helped. Going West to see him! He didn't write it to me, but I know. I'm wise. I'm happy for him, the lucky dog! Next time you go West—"

"Hush!" cried Carley. She could endure no more. She could no longer be a lie.

"You're white; you're shaking," exclaimed Rust in concern. "Oh, I—what did I say? Forgive me!"

"Rust, I am no more worth loving and fighting for than your Nell."

"What?" he ejaculated.

"I have not told you the truth," she said swiftly. "I have let you believe a lie. I shall never marry Glenn. I broke my engagement to him."

Slowly Rust sank back upon the pillow, his large, luminous eyes piercingly fixed upon her, as if he would read her soul.

"I WENT West—yes," continued Carley. "But it was selfishly. I wanted Glenn to come back here. He had suffered as you have. He nearly died. But he fought—he fought—and after a long, slow, horrible struggle he began to mend. He worked. He went to raising hogs. He lived alone. He worked harder and harder. The West and his work saved him, body and soul. He had learned to love both the West and his work. I did not blame him. But I could not live out there."

"He needed me. But I was too little, too selfish. I could not marry him. I gave him up. I left—him—alone."

Then Carley shrank under the arrowy lightnings of scorn in this ruined soldier's eyes.

"And there's another man," he said, "a clean, straight, unscarred fellow who wouldn't fight."

"Oh, no; I—I swear there's not," whispered Carley.

"You, too," he replied thickly. Then slowly he turned that worn, dark face to the wall. His frail breast heaved. And his lean hand made her a slight gesture of dismissal, significant and imperious.

Carley fled. She could scarcely see to find the car. All her internal being seemed convulsed, and a deadly faintness made her sick and cold.

X

CARLEY'S edifice of hopes, dreams, aspirations and struggles fell in ruins about her. It had been built upon the sands. It had no ideal for foundation. It had to fall.

Something inevitable had forced her confession to Rust. Dissimulation had been a habit of her mind; it was more a habit of her class than sincerity. But she had reached a point in her mental strife where she could not stand before Rust and let him believe she was noble and faithful when she knew she was neither. Would not the next step in this painful metamorphosis of her character be a fierce and passionate repudiation of herself and all she represented?

She went home and locked herself in her room, deaf to telephone and servants. There she gave up to her shame. Scorned, despised, dismissed by that poor, crippled, flame-spirited Virgil Rust! He had revered her, and the truth had earned his hate. Would she ever forget his look, incredulous, shocked, bitter and blazing with unutterable contempt?

Carley Burch was only another Nell, a jilt, a mocker of the manhood of soldiers! Would she ever cease to shudder at the memory of Rust's slight movement of hand? Go! Get out of my sight! Leave me to my agony as you left Glenn Kilbourne alone to fight his. Men such as I am do not want the smile of your face, the touch of your hand. We gave for womanhood. Pass on to lesser men who loved the fleshpots and who would buy your charms.

So Carley interpreted that slight gesture, and writhed in her abasement.

Rust threw an illuminating light upon her desertion of Glenn. She had betrayed him. She had left him alone. Dwarfed and stunted was her narrow soul! To a noble man who had given all for her she had returned nothing. Stone for bread! Betrayal for love! Cowardice for courage! False were the standards of her life.

The hours of contending passions gave birth to vague, slow-forming revolt.

SHE became haunted by memory pictures and sounds and smells of Oak Creek Cañon. As from afar she saw the great, sculptured rent in the earth, green and red and brown, with its shining, flashing ribbons of waterfalls and streams. The mighty pines stood up magnificent and stately. The walls loomed high, shadowed under the shelves, gleaming in the sunlight, and they seemed dreaming, waiting, watching. For what? For her return to their serene fastnesses, to the little gray log cabin? The thought stormed Carley's soul.

Vivid and intense shone the images before her shut eyes. She saw the winding forest floor, green with grass and fern, colorful with flower and rock. A thousand aisles, glades, nooks and caverns called to her to come. Nature was every woman's mother. The populated city was a delusion. Disease and death and corruption stalked in the shadows of the streets. But her cañon promised hard work, playful hours, dreaming idleness, beauty, health, fragrance, loneliness, peace, wisdom, love, children and long life. In the hateful, shut-in isolation of her room Carley stretched forth her arms as if to embrace the vision. Pale, close walls, gleaming, placid stretches of brook, churning amber-and-white rapids, mossy banks and pine-matted ledges, the towers and turrets and ramparts where the eagles wheeled—she saw them all as beloved images lost to her save in anguished memory.

SHE heard the murmur of flowing water, soft, low, now loud, and again lulling, hollow and eager, tinkling over rocks, bellowing into the deep pools, washing with silky seep of wind-swept waves the hanging willows. Shrill and piercing and far aloft pealed the scream of the eagle. And she seemed to listen to a mocking bird while he mocked her with his melody of many birds. The bees hummed, the wind moaned, the leaves rustled, the waterfall murmured. Then came the rare, sharp note of a cañon swift, most mysterious of birds, significant of the heights.

A breath of fragrance seemed to blow with her shifting senses. The dry, pungent cañon smells returned to her—smells of fresh-cut timber, of wood smoke, of the cabin fire with its steaming pots, of flowers and earth, and of the wet stones, of the redolent pines and cedars.

And suddenly, clearly, amazingly Carley beheld in her mind's sight the hard features, the bold eyes, the slight smile of Haze Ruff's coarse face. His repellent visage confounded the sweetness of her senses. She had forgotten him. But now thought of him returned. And with the memory flashed a revelation of his meaning in her life. He had appeared merely a clown, a ruffian, an animal with man's shape and intelligence. But he was the embodiment of the raw, crude violence of the West. He was the eyes of the natural primitive man, believing what he saw.

He had seen in Carley Burch the paraded charm, the unashamed and serene front, the woman seeking man. Haze Ruff had been neither vile nor base nor unnatural. It had been her subjection to the decadence of feminine dress that had been unnatural. But Ruff had found her a lie. She invited what she did not want. And his scorn had been commensurate with the falsehood of her. So might any man have been justified in his insult to her, in his rejection of her.

HAZE RUFF had found her unfit for his idea of dalliance. Virgil Rust had found her false to the ideals of womanhood for which he had sacrificed all but life itself. What then had Glenn Kilbourne found her? He possessed the greatness of noble love. He had loved her before the dark and changeable tide of war had come between them. How had he judged her? That last sight of him standing alone, leaning with head bowed, a solitary figure trenchant with suggestion of tragic resignation and strength, returned to flay Carley. He had loved, trusted and hoped. She saw now what his hope had been—that she would have instilled into her blood the subtle, red and revivifying essence of life in the open, the strength of the wives of earlier years, an emanation from cañon, desert, mountain, forest, of health, of spirit, of forward-gazing, natural love, of the mysterious, saving instinct he had got out of the West.

And she had been too little, too steeped in the indulgence of luxurious life, too slight natured and pale blooded! And suddenly there pierced into the black storm of Carley's mind a blazing, white-streaked thought: she had left Glenn to the Western

(Continued on Page 127)

20 MULE TEAM BORAX

POTS PANS and KITCHEN
WARE

20 Mule Team Hauling Borax
Out of Death Valley

Pots and pans, and sinks and cupboards need 20 Mule Team Borax for real cleaning. It dissolves the dirt thoroughly and hygienically, it can't scratch or mar, it's a solvent. Add a tablespoonful (or more if the water is hard) of 20 Mule Team Borax to your dish pan—it will cut grease, remove all traces of dirt and leave dishes hygienically clean. Borax is the universal cleanser for everything in the house—a water softener for washing clothes, it prevents shrinking and won't fade colors. And it's good for the hands. A solution of Borax is a solution of the servant problem. 20 Mule Team Borax is in all clean kitchens—is it in yours? At ALL Grocers'.

NATURE'S GREATEST CLEANSER

EIGHT satisfying breakfasts from ONE package of AUNT JEMIMA

THAT'S the economy news for this weather—Eight satisfying, wholesome breakfasts from one package of ready-mixed Aunt Jemima Pancake Flour. Eight platesful of piping hot pancakes—rich, fluffy, golden-brown, perfect pancakes! So easy, too: you need add nothing but water; or for pancakes of greater richness, add a little sweet milk.

Home-made cakes cost many times as much, and they're such a bother. And only from the flour in the Aunt Jemima packages can everyone make the real Aunt Jemima Pancakes with that genuine old-time Southern flavor.

Phone your grocer now for a package of the famous Aunt Jemima Pancake Flour. And tell him to send along a package of Aunt Jemima Buckwheat Flour too; it makes just as easily, just as inexpensively, those fine old-fashioned buckwheat cakes.

Aunt Jemima Rag Dolls

With any package of Aunt Jemima Pancake or Aunt Jemima Buckwheat Flour, you will receive instructions (printed on the top or on slip enclosed) telling just how to get the jolly Aunt Jemima Rag Dolls.

"I'm in town, Honey!"

AUNT JEMIMA PANCAKE FLOUR

Copyright, 1931, by Aunt Jemima Mills Co., St. Joseph, Mo.

Digitized by Google

The Call of the Cañon

(Continued from Page 124)

girl, Flo Hutter. Humiliated, and abased in her own sight, Carley fell prey to a fury of jealousy.

She went back to the old life. But it was with a bitter, restless, critical spirit, conscious of the fact that she could derive neither forgetfulness nor pleasure from it, nor see any release from the habit of years.

One afternoon, late in the fall, she motored out to a Long Island club, where some of her most intimate friends were playing golf. Carley did not play. Aimlessly she walked around the grounds. The air held a promise of early winter. She thought that she would go south before the cold came. Always trying to escape anything rigorous, hard, painful or disagreeable! Later she returned to the clubhouse to find her party assembled on an inclosed porch, chatting and partaking of refreshment.

MORRISON was there. He had not taken kindly to her late habit of denying herself to him. During a lull in the idle conversation he addressed her pointedly. "Well, Carley, how's your Arizona hog raiser?" he queried, with a little gleam in his usually lusterless eyes.

"I have not heard lately," she replied coldly.

The assembled company suddenly quieted with a portent inimical to their leisurely content of the moment. Carley felt them all looking at her, and underneath the exterior she preserved with extreme difficulty there burned so fierce an anger that she seemed to have swelling veins of fire.

"Queer how Kilbourne went into raising hogs," observed Morrison. "Such a low-down sort of work, you know."

"He had no choice," replied Carley. "Glenn didn't have a father who made millions out of the war. He had to work. And I must differ with you about its being low-down. No honest work is that. It is idleness that is low-down."

"But so foolish of Glenn when he might have married money," rejoined Morrison sarcastically.

"The honor of soldiers is beyond your ken, Mr. Morrison."

HE FLUSHED darkly and bit his lip. "You women make a man sick with this rot about soldiers," he said, the gleam in his eye growing ugly. "A uniform goes to a woman's head no matter what's inside it. I don't see where your vaunted honor of soldiers comes in, considering how they accepted the let-down of women during and after the war."

"How could you see when you stayed comfortably at home?" retorted Carley.

"All I could see was women falling into soldiers' arms," he said sullenly.

"Certainly. Could an American girl desire any greater happiness or opportunity to prove her gratitude?" flashed Carley with proud uplift of head.

"It didn't look like gratitude to me," returned Morrison.

"Well, it was gratitude," declared Carley ringingly. "If the women of America did throw themselves at soldiers it was not because of the moral lapse of the day. It was woman's instinct to save the race. Always in every war women have sacrificed themselves to the future. Not vile, but noble! You insult both soldiers and women, Mr. Morrison. I wonder—did any American girls throw themselves at you?"

Morrison turned a dead white, and his mouth twisted to a distorted checking of speech disagreeable to see.

"No, you were a slacker," went on Carley with scathing, cold scorn. "You let the other men go fight for American girls. Do you imagine one of them will ever marry you? All your life, Morrison, you will be a marked man, outside the pale of friendship with real American men and the respect of real American girls."

Morrison leaped up, almost knocking the table over, and he glared at Carley as he gathered up his hat and cane.

She turned her back upon him. From that moment he ceased to exist for Carley. She never spoke to him again.

NEXT day Carley called upon her dearest friend, whom she had not seen for some time.

"Carley dear, you don't look well," said Eleanor after greetings had been exchanged.

"Oh, what does it matter how I look?" queried Carley impatiently.

"My dear, you puzzle me these days. You've changed. I'm sorry. I'm afraid you're unhappy."

"Eleanor, I'm no better than you," said Carley with disdain. "I'm as useless and idle. But I'm beginning to see myself, and you, and all this worthless crowd of ours. We're no good. But you're married, Eleanor. You're settled in life. You ought to do something. I'm single and at loose ends."

Oh, I'm in revolt. Think, Eleanor, just think: your husband works hard to keep you in this expensive apartment. You have a car. He dresses you in silks and satins. You wear diamonds. You eat your breakfast in bed. You loiter around in a pink dressing gown all morning. You dress for lunch or tea. You ride or golf or otherwise waste your time dancing till you come home to dress for dinner. You let other men make love to you. Oh, don't get angry. You do. And so goes the round of your life. What good on earth are you anyway? You're just a—a gratification to the senses of your husband. And at that you don't see much of him."

"CARLEY, how you rave!" exclaimed her friend. "What has got into you lately? Why, everybody tells me you're—you're queer. The way you insulted Morrison—how unlike you, Carley!"

"I'm glad I found the courage to do it. What do you think, Eleanor?"

"Oh, I despise him. But you can't say the things you feel."

"You'd be bigger and truer if you did. Some day I'll break out and flay you all."

"But, Carley, you're my friend, and you're just exactly like we are—or you were."

"Of course I'm your friend. I've always loved you. Eleanor," went on Carley earnestly. "I'm as deep in this—this terrible, stagnant muck as you, or anyone. But I'm no longer blind. There's something terribly wrong with all of us women, and it's not what Morrison hinted."

"Carley, the only thing that's wrong with you is that you jilted poor Glenn—and are breaking your heart over him still."

"Don't; don't!" cried Carley, shrinking as if struck. "Heaven knows that is true. But there's more wrong with me than a blighted love affair."

"Yes, you mean the modern feminine unrest?"

"Eleanor, I positively hate that phrase, 'modern feminine unrest.' It smacks of ultra—ultra—oh! I don't know what. That phrase ought to be translated by a Western acquaintance of mine, one Haze Ruff. I'd not like to hurt your sensitive feelings with what he'd say. But this unrest means speed-mad, excitement-mad, fad-mad, dress-mad, or I should say sordid-mad, culture-mad, and heaven only knows what else. The women of our set are idle, luxurious, selfish, pleasure-craving, lazy, useless, work and children shirking, absolutely no good."

(Continued on Page 128)

Pretty window drapings deserve these better curtain rods

The Kirsch flat construction combines sagless strength with artistic grace. You'll admire the neat—smooth hang of your curtains. Curved ends permit draping clear to casing, excluding side glare.

Kirsch CURTAIN RODS

Flat in Shape—No Sag, Rust, Tarnish

Finished beautifully in velvet brass or white. Come single, double or triple; fit any window; secure any effect. Extension style or cut-to-fit. Sold by better dealers everywhere.

Kirsch Shade Roller Hood conceals the shade roller end, and bracket, giving a finished appearance.

FREE BOOK For PLANNING Window Drapings
Pictures attractive windows for every room of the house and suggests materials, color schemes and other practical information; gladly mailed on request.

KIRSCH MFG. CO. 11 Prospect Ave.
Sturgis, Mich., U.S.A.
Kirsch Mfg. Co. of Canada, Ltd., 350 Tecumseh St., Woodstock, Ont.

Remember to ask for Kirsch

The Original Flat Curtain Rod

Your Garden

Of each dollar you pay at the market for vegetables, only about 30 cents goes to the producer. The other 70 cents is eaten up by distribution costs and middlemen's services.

With your own garden there is no complicated and expensive machinery to bring the vegetables to your table.

Have a garden this year—not only for economy's sake, but for health and satisfaction. Vegetables, sun-ripened on your own plants and vines and gathered only a few minutes before cooking, are vastly more delicious and wholesome than the best you can buy.

But the quality of your seeds is vitally important to your garden's success. You should plant none but the best. Henderson's seeds are tested. Every packet has the quality ensured by our seventy-six years of experience in seed raising and testing.

"Everything for the Garden"

Our annual Catalogue is now ready. It is really a book of 186 pages, illustrated with sixteen color plates and over a thousand half tones direct from photographs. It is a library of everything worth while for either farm or garden.

Special Offer of Tested Seeds

We have made up a Henderson Collection, consisting of one packet each of the following six great specialties:

Ponderosa Tomato	Henderson's Brilliant Mixture
Big Boston Lettuce	Poppies
White Tipped Scarlet Radish	Spencer Mammoth Waved
Henderson's Invincible Asters	Sweet Peas

To demonstrate the superiority of Henderson's Tested Seeds, we make the following unusual offer: Mail us 10c and we will send you the Catalogue, together with this remarkable "Henderson's Specialty Collection," enclosed in a coupon envelope which, when emptied and returned, will be acceptable as 25c cash payment on any order for seeds amounting to one dollar or more. Fill in the coupon now, and mail it today.

PETER HENDERSON & CO.
35-37 CORTLANDT STREET NEW YORK CITY

I enclose ten cents for Catalogue, "Everything for the Garden," and Henderson Specialty Collection as advertised.

The Decorative Value of TILES

The proper material for the expression of decorative ideas in any part of the home is TILE.

Tiles serve in the desired way in the library, sun room, hall, vestibule and for the fireplace.

They are doubly valuable in service and attractiveness in the kitchen, bath room and laundry.

Write for our Home Suggestion Book

THE ASSOCIATED TILE MANUFACTURERS
1280 Seventh Ave., Beaver Falls, Pa.

Your Baby

Should be a healthy, happy growing baby if it has loving care, proper food and comfortable hygienic clothing.

NON-NETTLE WHITE FLANNELS

Are the softest, smoothest and least irritating flannels made and are sold only by us. "Non-Nettle" stamped every half yard on selvage except silk wares.

Send for Free Sample Case containing samples of Flannels, Antiseptic Diapers, Rubber Sheeting, complete lines of Baby White Goods, Dimities, Long Cloth, etc. Also illustrated catalog showing 50 styles of White Embroidered Flannels, Infants' Outfits, Separate Garments, Rubber Goods, Baby Baskets and hundreds of necessary articles for expectant mothers and the baby, and valuable information on care of the baby. For 25 cents we will add a complete set of seventeen Modern Paper Patterns for baby's first wardrobe that would cost $1.70 if bought separately. Write at once or save this advertisement.

THE LAMSON BROS. CO., 345 Summit St., Toledo, O.
Established in 1885. Known around the globe

Serves a Double Purpose

J-O Roach-Rat Paste Kills Rats and Mice: Also Kills Roaches and Water Bugs. When Rats and Mice eat it, they run for fresh air and water. They die outside the house—not inside. Used in all parts of the world; the standard for 47 years. J-O is a clean white paste; absolutely safe—and very convenient.

In the fourteenth century, one-half the people of England died as a result of the Bubonic Plague—spread by rats.

SEND 25c in stamps or coin and name of your nearest drug store—and we will send you prepaid a full-sized can of "J-O" Roach-Rat Paste. Instructive booklet sent free upon request.

JOHN OPITZ, Inc.
Manufacturing Chemists
Established 1874
Blissville,
Long Island City, N. Y.

Now Only $10.85

Save fuel, food and time—quit standing over hot cook stoves. Take advantage of this low direct-to-you price on a Rapid Fireless COOKER

Aluminum lined—absolute Wear-Ever. Aluminum glaze. Roasts, bakes, fries, steaks, stews. Blister grade color on market. Write today. Ask for Free Home Science Book. Wm. Campbell Co., Dept. 13, Detroit, Mich.

Wedding Engraved Invitations or Announcements Moderate Prices Write for free samples. 50 Engraved Wedding Cards $1.00. Royal Engraving Co., 8144 Walnut St., Phila., Pa.

The Call of the Cañon

(Continued from Page 127)

"Well, if we are who's to blame?" rejoined Eleanor spiritedly. "Now, Carley Burch, you listen to me: I think the twentieth-century girl in America is the most wonderful female creation of all the ages of the universe. I admit it. That is why we are a prey to the evils attending greatness. Listen: Here is a crying sin—a cynical paradox. Take this twentieth-century girl, this American girl who is the finest creation of the ages, a young and healthy girl, the most perfect type of culture possible to the freest and greatest city on earth, New York—she holds absolutely an unreal, untrue position in the scheme of existence. Surrounded by parents, relatives, friends, suitors, and instructive schools of every kind, colleges, institutions, is she really happy, is she really living?"

"ELEANOR," interrupted Carley earnestly, "she is not. And I've been trying to tell you why."

"My dear, let me get a word in, will you?" complained Eleanor. "You don't know it all. There are as many different points of view as there are people. Well, if this girl happened to have a new frock and a new beau to show it to she'd say 'I'm the happiest girl in the world.' But she is nothing of the kind. Only she doesn't know that. She approaches marriage, or for that matter a more matured life, having had too much taken care of, knowing too much. Her masculine satellites, father, brothers, uncles, friends, lovers, all utterly spoil her. Mind you, I mean girls like us, of the middle class. We are spoiled. This girl marries and life goes on smoothly. Her husband makes it too easy for her. She is an ornament or a toy, to be kept in a luxurious cage. To soil her pretty hands would be disgraceful. Even if she can't afford a maid, the modern devices of science make the care of her four-room apartment a farce. Electric dishwasher, clothes washer, vacuum cleaner, and the near-by delicatessen and the caterer simply rob a young wife of her housewifely heritage. If she has a baby, which happens occasionally, Carley, in spite of your assertion, it very soon goes to the kindergarten. Then what does she find to do with hours and hours? If she is not married, what on earth can she find to do?"

"She can work," replied Carley bluntly.

"OH, YES, she can, but she doesn't," went on Eleanor. "You don't work. I never did. We both hated the idea. You're calling spades spades, Carley, but you seem to be propounding a morbid, impractical thesis. Well, our young American girl or bride goes in for being rushed or she goes in for fads, the ultra things you mentioned. New York City gets all the great artists, lecturers, and surely the great fakers. The New York women support them. The men laugh, but they furnish the money. They take the women to the theaters, but they avoid the reception to a Polish princess, a lecture by an Indian magician and mystic, or a benefit luncheon for a Home for Friendless Cats. The truth is most of our young girls or brides have a wonderful enthusiasm worthy of a better cause. What is to become of their surplus energy, the bottled-lightning spirit so characteristic of modern girls? Where is the outlet for intense feelings? What use can they make of education or of gifts? None whatsoever, that's all. I'm not taking into consideration the new-woman species, the faddist or the reformer. I mean normal girls like you and me. Just think, Carley: A girl's every wish, every need is almost instantly satisfied without the slightest effort on her part to obtain it. If a woman craves to achieve something outside of the arts, you know, something universal and helpful which will make men acknowledge her worth, if not equality, where is the opportunity?"

"Opportunities should be made," replied Carley.

"There are a million sides to this question of the modern young woman, the moral phyloxera of the day. I'm for her!"

"HOW about the extreme of style in dress for this remarkably-to-be-pitied American girl you champion so eloquently?" queried Carley sarcastically.

"Obscene!" exclaimed Eleanor with frank disgust.

"You admit it?"

"To my shame I do."

"Why do women wear extreme clothes? Why do you and I wear thin silk stockings, skirts to our knees, gowns without sleeves or bodices?"

"We're slaves to fashion," replied Eleanor. "That's the popular excuse."

"Bah!" exclaimed Carley.

Eleanor laughed in spite of being half nettled. "Are you going to stop wearing what all the other women wear and be looked at askance? Are you going to be dowdy and frumpy and old-fashioned?"

"No. But I'll never wear anything again that can be called obscene. I want to be able to say why I wear a dress. You haven't answered my question yet. Why do you wear what you frankly admit is disgusting?"

"I DON'T know, Carley," replied Eleanor helplessly. "We must dress to make other women jealous and to attract men, to be a sensation. Perhaps the word 'disgust' is not what I mean. A woman will be shocking in her obsession to attract, but hardly more than that if she knows it."

"All right, Eleanor, we understand each other, even if we do not agree," said Carley. "You leave the future of women to chance, to life, to materialism, not to their own conscious efforts. I want to leave it to free will and idealism."

"Carley, you are getting a little beyond me," declared Eleanor dubiously.

"What are you going to do? It all comes home to each individual woman—her attitude toward life."

"I'll drift along with the current, Carley, and be a good sport," replied Eleanor.

"You don't care about the women and children of the future? You'll not deny yourself now nor think and work and suffer a little in the interest of future humanity?"

"How you put things, Carley!" exclaimed Eleanor wearily. "Of course I care—when you make me think of such things. But what have I to do with the lives of people in the years to come?"

"Everything. America for Americans! While you dawdle the lifeblood is being sucked out of our great nation. It is a man's job to fight: it is a woman's to save. I think you've made your choice, though you don't realize it. I'm praying that I'll rise to mine."

(Concluded in the February Home Journal)

Do You Need Money?

DO you need money? Are you interested in pleasant, dignified work, right in your own neighborhood, that offers you from $5.00 to $50.00 extra each month for a few spare hours each week? Would you like to join our staff of women representatives of The Ladies' Home Journal who already earn, as a body, more than a quarter of a million dollars annually? We have prepared a little book that tells all about this ideal spare-hour work for women. It is called and presents the whole story of our plan for making your spare hours pay. Its illustrated pages are filled with records of the accomplishments of other women in this work, and with descriptions of the splendid opportunity open to you TODAY.

The Way to An Independent Income

It is FREE to You
Send for your copy NOW!

The Ladies' Home Journal
400 Independence Square, Phila., Pa.

Direct from mill

Make this sweater for $2.00

—You can make this new striped slip-on for $2.00 with Peace Dale Yarn. Send for free sample card of yarns and get directions free also.

Wonderful quality

Peace Dale Yarns are the finest all-wool worsted yarns—strong, soft, easy to knit with. Peace Dale prices are much cheaper than any yarns anywhere near the same quality. Old New England firm. Satisfaction guaranteed.

Free samples and directions

Send today for 90 free yarn samples—8 different sizes and weights—36 beautiful colors. Peace Dale Mills, Dept. 464, 75 Madison Ave., N. Y.

Peace Dale Knitting Yarns

STOUT WOMEN

This Fashion Book FREE

DRESS as stylishly as your slender sisters, by buying through the STOUTWEAR FASHION BOOK. In daily use by thousands of fashionable stout women throughout the country. New York and Paris styles at lowest prices. Sizes 30 1/2 to 36 1/2. Coats, Wraps, Fur Coats, Gowns, Beautifully illustrated and clearly described. Send today for your FREE Copy of the STOUTWEAR FASHION BOOK.

STOUTWEAR SHOP, Inc.
Dept. H, 42 W. 34th St., New York

YOU CAN

establish a good business of your own by taking the agency for our line of Aprons and Piece Goods. Easily sold. Good profits. Experience unnecessary. Samples free. Exclusive territory. Write now, DELMAR CO., 1478 Williamsbridge Road, New York

STUDY NURSING FINE POSITIONS SECURED
Write PHILADELPHIA SCHOOL FOR NURSES
2223 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

FURS

One ad is small. Our discount is big. Write for descriptive and latest list. We buy from trappers, market furs and sell direct to you. The fur is of the best, the saving is considerable. Write HERMAN REEL CO., 462 S. Michigan Ave., CHICAGO, ILL.

Wedding

Invitations, Announcements, Etc. 100 in script lettering, including two sets of envelopes, $1.50. 100 Wedding Cards, $1.00. Write for samples. L. OTT ENGRAVING CO., 1029 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

MAULE'S SEEDS

ONCE GROWN
ALWAYS GROWN

SEED
BOOK
SENT

FREE

Write To-day

Wm. Henry Maule, Inc.
2181 Arch St., Phila., Pa.

BUIST'S SEEDS

PRODUCE QUICK & POSITIVE RESULTS

BUIST'S 1922 GARDEN GUIDE and Catalogue—now ready. Contains valuable information for the vegetable and flower garden. Send for a FREE copy today. BUIST'S RECORD—Growing and supplying seeds of the highest grade since 1828. If you have a garden you should have this book; it tells you what to plant and how to cultivate.

Free Flower Seeds with Orders of 50 Cents and Over
ROBERT BUIST COMPANY
Dept. A. Philadelphia, Pa.

Kunder's New Gladiolus Catalog

for 1922 describes nearly 400 Kunder originations in Ruffled, Plain Petaled and Primulinus types. 29 Gladioli are shown in colors and many others are illustrated from photographs. Complete cultural information is given, with special directions for growing show flowers. Send for this beautiful catalog today—FREE.

A. E. KUNDER
The Originator of the Ruffled Gladiolus
Box 8, Coates, Ind., U. S. A.

WAGNER FLOWERS

FREE CATALOG
to Garden Lovers

Gives complete list of Wagner Roses, Hardy Flowers, Bulbs, Shrubs, Trees and Evergreens. Tells you how to make your home surroundings beautiful. Explains the mail service Landscape Department. Write today for catalog 275
Wagner Park Nurseries
Box 15, Sidney, Ohio
Nurserymen & Landscape Gardeners - Florists

All Your Garden Needs

There is ample variety of carefully selected seeds, plants, trees and ornamentals in the S. & H. catalog to plant every foot of your grounds exactly as you would like it. It gives you the help of our 68 years' experience.

Write—tonight—there's a catalog ready to mail to you.

THE STORRS-HARRISON Co.

Nurserymen and Seedsmen
Box 165 Painesville, Ohio

You Can Change the World

(Continued from Page 23)

will be fully occupied as before with the daily duties of the family life and that what they can do in addition to what they have done before is but a little here and there as moments of leisure may be snatched from their all too busy lives. But there are those who may make great use of the new-found opportunities.

What will women do with their new obligation? This question is a veritable challenge to idle women wherever they may be found and whatever may be their estate. It is they only who can fully justify this new duty of womankind.

In the country we have the Home Bureau, a national organization, supported co-operatively by Federal funds and by local contributions, with a district agent or leader in every county, as far as organized, and these organizations run into the hundreds. The business of these bureaus is home improvement, ranging from such homely problems as how to get rid of the stop water where the public has not yet installed a sanitary sewer, up to that of providing healthy entertainment for the young. The problems discussed and determined by these bureaus are vital and their solution is highly profitable, not only to the members but to the community as well. Let us imitate this example and turn some of these unprofitable gatherings of unemployed people into home-improvement associations or other organizations for improving the life and conditions of those who live and labor in their own immediate neighborhoods.

It is in the city and the town that time hangs heavy on the hands. It is in the city too and the town that some of the most difficult of all our social and political problems have arisen. This is the challenge to the ladies of leisure of whatever estate, and herein lies a considerable share at least of their responsibilities. What have they done to stop the dumping of ashes into the side streets? What have they done to enjoin habits of tidiness on young and old and protect the neighborhoods from unsightly rubbish of every sort and description?

What have they done to break up the gang of boy thieves that is beginning to operate in their neighborhood?

What have they done to stop stealing in the schools? What have they done to control the movie shows that are demoralizing a good portion of the youth of their own communities faster than the schools and the churches combined can build it up?

No Job for the Dilettante

WHAT have they done for playgrounds, drinking fountains and comfort stations, and what have they done toward assisting to their feet again the small army of perfectly good people who every year and every month go down a peg or two in the battle of life and need only a temporary prop to hold them up, possibly only the weight of a finger to turn the scales in their favor?

This is the class of questions that need the attention of somebody aside from the constituted "authorities" who exist, not to devise new betterments but to execute plans already established. And these are the people to do this necessary service. They have the leisure which few people can command, and they should be in a position to study with deliberation the questions that need solution. Moreover, they need no new organization. The "set" is already "organized." The difficulty is that it is organized for nothing in particular beyond self-gratification, in which respect it closely resembles the boys gangs that so easily run into evil. The need is well defined, the people have the time, and even the "set" is organized. Everything is ready for achievement. Will the machinery function?

We have long needed in American political life a group of capable, high-minded citizens who could and would give time and thought to public affairs with no reference to office holding or other personal advancement. This is no job for the dilettante. The service demands the best brains, clearest thinking, most disinterested activity of all the forms of public service which our advancing civilization requires.

Until a leisure class of real Americans is built up our political machinery will be operated mainly by professional officeholders; not only that, but public policies, indeed our very ideals, will be largely shaped by those who conduct campaigns and who exalt or smother public questions according to their bearing upon elections.

There are thousands of good wives and mothers who emerge from busy lives with leisure upon their hands only because their children are become men and women. These constitute an asset the like of which the public has never before enjoyed. They want nothing in the way of office for themselves, for they are home people, but they have healthy views of public questions and time enough to work out safe and progressive public policies.

A New Force in Public Affairs

WE ALREADY have much fruit from this kind of public service. It would be too much to credit the great cause of temperance exclusively to any one group or class; for men as well as women, and women of all conceivable conditions, both married and single, contributed to the great result of making the nation clear-headed and straight-footed.

But after all it was the mothers of men that laid emphasis upon all that was said and done, and it was they who spoke and acted most effectively, for to them the issue of temperance or drunkenness was one affecting their own flesh and blood.

It will be equally true in other matters, upon which the world is somewhat divided and which are likely to raise ugly questions in political campaigns.

For example, every woman, certainly every mother, wants a League of Nations, or some other international body powerful enough to stop war.

It will be the women, the mothers mainly, who will yet insist that destructive conflicts shall cease.

It will be the women of the mother class who will, as the years go by, pull the scales from many an eye whose vision has been obscured by circumstances near at hand, and it will be they who will first realize all that America and civil liberty may really mean.

What is true at points like temperance and peace will be true of many another issue. Women's vote, therefore, will not merely double that of the men. A new force has come into public affairs, and that force is the unerring insight and the fearless energy of motherhood, which will more and more demand that wholesome public issues shall not be sacrificed upon the altar of practical politics or even of secret diplomacy.

Finally, and upon general principles, if civilization is to advance much further it will be only by the expenditure in public service of an amount of time and a kind of ability that exist only among the favored people whose time is not all demanded by the daily routine of their own lives and that of an occupation whereby they provide their own support and that of those dependent upon them. Herein lies at once the opportunity and the responsibility that attach to leisure and to the people who possess it.

This Wonder Book of Seeds FREE!

Send for Salzer's Wonder Book of Seeds—sent free on request. Hundreds of illustrations, many of them in color. 134 pages and every page an inspiration. Salzer Seeds are sold on a money-back guarantee.

All Salzer Seeds are tested in our great Cliffwood farms, where a famous European specialist and a corps of many experts verify and test all seeds sold.

Write for this book today—sent FREE.

10 Packages
Finest Seeds 25c

To introduce our seeds we will send you a collection of either flower or vegetable seeds (10 packages in each assortment) for only 25c. Just enclose stamps and send us your name and address when writing for catalog.

John A. Salzer Seed Co.

Dept. 10

La Crosse, Wis.

Established 1844

SOW SALZER'S SEEDS

DINGEE ROSES

On Own Roots

For grown rose bushes, on own roots, for every one anywhere. Plant any time. Old favorites and new and rare sorts, the cream of the world's productions. "Dingee Roses" known as the best for 25 years. Safe delivery guaranteed anywhere in U. S. Write for a copy of our "New Guide to Rose Culture" for 1922. It's FREE.

Illustrate wonderful "Dingee Roses" in natural colors. It's more than a catalog—it's the lifetime experience of the oldest and leading Rose Growers in America. A practical work on rose and flower culture for the amateur. Offers 500 varieties. Roses and other plants, bulbs and seeds and tells how to grow them. Edition Limited. Established 1810. 70 Greenhouse.

THE DINGEE & CONARD CO., Box 124, West Grove, Pa.

VICK'S GARDEN & FLORAL GUIDE for 1922

IT'S FREE A WORTH WHILE BOOK WRITE TODAY

For vegetable growers and all lovers of flowers. Lists the old stand-bys, tells of many new varieties. Valuable instructions on planting and care. Get the benefit of the experience of the oldest catalog seed house and largest growers of flowers in America. For 75 years the leading authority on vegetable, flower and farm seeds, plants, bulbs, and fruits. 12 greenhouses. 500 acres.

Vick Quality Seeds Grow the Best Crops the Earth Produces

This book, the best we have issued, is absolutely free. Send for your copy today before you forget. A postcard is sufficient.

JAMES VICK'S SONS, 1 Stone St.

Rochester, N.Y. The Flower City

Carter-Thorburn Introductions

NEW HYBRID ESCHSCHOLTZIA

—Contains many new shades of color not previously seen in Poppies. Fresh-colored, pale rose, brilliant scarlet, slate and smoke colors.

EVERBLOOMING HOLLYHOCK—Blooms from seed first year. July till late autumn. Profusely branching, filled with large double flowers, great variety of colors.

DOUBLE GODDESS, DOUBLE PINK—Very handsome. Send 10c and ask for Novelty Collection No. 102 and illustrated catalog of flowers and vegetable seeds, or send for the catalog alone. Mailed free.

CARTER SEEDS, Inc., 53 Barclay St., N. Y. City (Consolidated with J. M. Thorburn & Co.)

Canadian Branch, 133 King St. E., Toronto, Ont.

Trees-Plants-Seeds

Everything for the fruit grower, farmer or suburban home. High grade stock, low direct from growers prices. Our free catalog is a mine of planting information. Address

WOODLAWN NURSERIES

880 Garwood Avenue Rochester, N. Y.

Exclusive sale of the Ohio Beauty Apple

ROSES of NEW CASTLE

is the title of a beautiful book on the culture of roses and other plants, gives expert experience of a lifetime. It's free. Exquisitely illustrated in natural colors; offers and tells how to grow these famous plants. Write for copy today.

HELLER SEEDS CO., Box 155, New Castle, Ind.

Money in Poultry

Start small, grow big, get winter eggs, keep healthy flocks, raise prize winners. Our stock pays best, low prices on leading varieties. But Free Book tells how.

Crescent Poultry Co., Box 2, Des Moines, Iowa

High School Course in 2 Years

You can complete this simplified High School Course at home inside of two years. Minimal requirements, entrance, courses and the leading professors. This and thirty other practical courses are described in our Free Bulletin. Send for it TODAY.

AMERICAN SCHOOL

Dept. H-153 Drexel Ave. & 58th St., CHICAGO

Read Hanes Guarantee!

We guarantee Hanes Underwear absolutely—every thread, stitch and button. We guarantee to return your money or give you a new pair if any seam breaks.

Hanes Big Features

- 1 Hanes Tailored Collarette won't gap or roll.
- 2 Staunch, Elastic Shoulders made with service-doubling lap seam.
- 3 Hanes Closed Crotch is cut to stay closed.

You Can't Afford to Overlook these Staunch Hanes Unions for Boys

There have been tremendous reductions in Hanes prices.

Take advantage of them—now. Give your youngster the protection given by the heavy Hanes Elastic Knit Boys' Union Suit that holds its staunch body through wash and wear. Hanes Union Suits for Boys are an outstanding example of real economy.

Made in two weights—medium and extra heavy. Also knee length and short sleeves. Every feature and every stitch guaranteed. Buy now at the lowest prices in years. If your dealer can't supply you write us.

Hanes for Men—Full of value just like the boys' union suits. Every garment guaranteed. Heavyweight union suits and shirts and drawers and mediumweight, silk-trimmed union suits.

P. H. HANES KNITTING COMPANY
Winston-Salem, N. C.

Next summer you'll want him to wear Hanes Mainsook Union Suits!

Sizes 2 to 16 years.
Two to 4 year sizes
have drop seat.

"In just ten minutes I earned a dollar"

MISS HERA PIERCE of Arkansas is still a beginner with us—yet she easily earns several extra dollars every week as a subscription representative of The Ladies' Home Journal, The Saturday Evening Post and The Country Gentleman. And she has laid the foundations of an interesting, permanent business that some day may pay her $75.00 or $80.00 a week—just as it now does Mrs. Nellie McCall of Minnesota.

Why Not You Too?

Through our cash offer women in all parts of the United States find easy liberal profits for their spare hours or generous, adequate return for all their time. No experience is required to be successful from the start. We provide free training by mail. The coupon below will bring all details about this unusually attractive opportunity, without placing you under any sort of obligation.

SEND THIS COUPON TODAY—

The Curtis Publishing Company, 398 Independence Square, Philadelphia, Penna.
Gentlemen: I'd like to know more about that position described in the January Journal. Please understand that I assume no obligation in making this inquiry.

Name _____
Street or R. F. D. _____
Town _____ State _____

Where to Get the Money to Build a Home

(Continued from Page 32)

four per cent. Second-mortgage commissions may run as high as fifteen or even thirty per cent. The legal rate of interest is fixed in each state, but, especially in the case of second mortgages, is apt to be respected in form only.

Building and loan associations are special corporations created for the express purpose of financing home building in the easiest possible way. They operate under special legal restrictions and are not primarily money-making institutions. In effect they are organizations of people who combine their savings and their credit to help one another become home owners. They are allowed to lend more on real estate than the regular banks and are equipped to give special service to home builders.

With a regular mortgage loan you pay the interest only once or twice a year and retire the principal in fairly large installments. Under the building-and-loan plan you make regular monthly payments corresponding to rent. The amount of these monthly installments is figured out so that you are paying your interest and reducing the principal at the same time and so as to have everything paid off in about ten to twelve years.

Sometimes the home can be financed through what is called a "contract for deed." This is similar to a mortgage in that it secures a loan on real estate, but it differs from a mortgage in that the original owner holds the deed to the property.

The "Land Contract" Plan

IT OFTEN happens that a real-estate man owns a number of building sites and in order to get the lots moving will help finance home building. The home builder has almost enough cash to buy his lot, but lacks cash and credit to build. Suppose the lot is priced at $3000 and the home builder has only $2500 cash. He wants to put up a $6000 house. The bank will advance no more than $4500 and, money being "tight," is not anxious to advance anything to a new customer. But the real-estate man is an old customer whom the bank will accommodate with the loan. The bank lends the real-estate man $4500 on a first mortgage. That leaves $2000 more to be raised—$500 to cover the balance due on the lot and $1500 to cover the difference between what the bank will advance and the sum needed to build the house.

The real-estate man indorses the builder's note for the $2000 and the bank or building-supply firms advance cash or materials for the building, the real-estate man, of course, making himself personally liable for both mortgage and note, but not to an extent greater than the current value of the property. To protect himself the real-estate man has the home builder sign a contract for deed, or "land contract."

The house now is built and the home owner begins to pay out with regular installments of interest and principal figured to retire the whole loan in about ten years. The owner makes his payments to the real-estate man who applies the cash to the note or the mortgage as he sees fit. When the note has been taken up and the balance on the lot has been paid, the real-estate man has gotten his money out and may release the owner from the contract and transfer the mortgage to him, leaving the owner to settle the mortgage with the bank in due season.

Remember the Extra Expenses

NEAR some of the larger cities some real-estate firms have made a business of offering to sell a lot and "build to suit the owner" under terms which require a minimum of cash down, payments being made by monthly installments on the contract. In order to protect themselves against shiftless families, forfeited contracts and empty houses, and to insure the interest on their investments, the installments on homes bought under this plan are usually high and the purchaser, when he finally succeeds in paying out, may discover that he has paid considerably more than should have been necessary for a house which was poorly built. The record of any such firm should be very carefully checked before you sign its contracts.

Having canvassed every available source of building credit, you may find it impracticable to build until more cash has been saved up. How much cash should you have before contemplating building? The answer is: Enough so that you can pay off your obligations without too great an effort. Professional lenders usually require that the borrower already have at least one-fourth of the total required, and that is probably the minimum for safety. This is equivalent to saying that the home builder should own his lot and have at least some cash in addition.

It must be remembered that the home owner becomes subject to various expenses that he did not have to meet as a renter. There are taxes and insurance, repairs and assessments that add up to considerable sums and that cannot be escaped. These items are in addition to interest on the borrowed money. The principal of the loan must also be reduced and finally paid off.

EDITOR'S NOTE—Mr. Lovejoy's second article, in the February Home Journal, will consider selecting the site and the plans.

The Complete Furnishing of the Little House

(Continued from Page 29)

on putty, a shadow design of the softest gray on an invisibly striped background of putty and ivory, a quarter-inch stripe of tan or putty on ecru or cream.

Grass cloths, stippled oatmeals, rather large shadow designs in putty, tan or gray, printed on linen-finished paper—these are the papers that accomplish results. Ceilings are flat in tone, covered with plain, dull-finished papers; or those called flat ceiling papers but showing a pale self-toned conventional design that would hardly be noticed. Or one can paint a ceiling ivory or cream. It should always be remembered that ceilings should never be darker than the walls, and preferably should be a few tones lighter.

Water tint may be put on plastered walls by an amateur if directions are carefully followed.

Oil paint is one of the handsomest of finishes, and is put directly on the plaster if this is perfect enough. Otherwise a fine canvas covering is used; this, when further embellished with molding and the whole painted the chosen tone, furnishes one of the handsomest known wall treatments. Wooden paneling is so expensive that paneling of canvas and molding is largely taking its place, with much the same effect; this method may be used to wainscot a room as well as to cover the upper walls above a wooden wainscoting, and proves of much interest in the dining room. Canvas is forty-eight inches wide, and if put on by a professional it might be painted by an amateur, thus saving considerable expense.

It is in the dining room that there is the chance—the one in a hundred—for a figured wall. But do not imagine florid peonies and grapes spilling over the whole surface. If all the other backgrounds in the house are quite neutral and pale and of practically the same tone, you may wainscot your dining room with paneled canvas to a height of four or five feet, depending upon the entire height of your wall, painting this wainscot to match the pale woodwork. Above this you may run a paper of stunning design and color, preferably with its background the tone of the wainscot or of the other wall tones in adjoining rooms. In this decoratively figured upper wall you have used up your thrills, and your curtains must be unfigured and of a plain blending color, no matter how gay.

Why Martex Towels
Do Wear Longer

Left: Magnified underweave of Martex Towel. A firm, close-knit fabric that wears well and costs least in the long run.

Right: Equally magnified underweave of a "cheap" Turkish towel. Note the loose, coarse, weak weave. Such towels wear out fast and are not economical at any price.

Millions Reach for Martex

EVERY HOUR of every day, in homes, clubs and America's greatest hotels, millions of hands reach for Martex Turkish Towels. Why is Martex the largest selling branded Turkish Towel in America?

Because Martex Towels do wear longer and dry faster. The dense, soft Martex terry long withstands both use and abuse. Because Martex Towels are incomparably attractive in design. Because they are as luxurious as they are economical.

Martex is the standard of excellence in Turkish Towels. Ask your favorite department store for Martex Towels, Bath Mats and Wash Cloths. New patterns in white or color now are ready. Each genuine Martex product bears the famous Martex label shown below.

Have you seen the new Martex "Duplex" (Patented) Towel? The surface on one side is smooth, the other side ribbed for friction. Pleases both men and women. Ask to see one.

W. H. & A. E. MARGERISON & CO., Philadelphia

Martex
REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.
TURKISH TOWELS

She Had Him

THE wife of one man with the traditional failing—forgetting to mail letters—has cured him.

The mail is delivered at their home before the breakfast hour, which is comparatively late.

One morning she said to her husband: "Did you have any mail this morning, dear?"

"Only a circular," he answered.

"H'm," said the wife. "By the way, did you mail the letters I gave you yesterday?"

"Sure I did," was the righteously indignant reply.

"Well," answered wife with an eloquent smile, "it's funny then, you had no letters this morning, because one of those I gave you to mail yesterday was addressed to you—just as a sort of key."

Right for the Future

"JOHN," said the wife, "you'll have to take that ball away from baby; he hit sister on the head with it."

"Yes, dear," answered the husband; "but you should have seen the curve the little cuss had on it."

Why She Was Puzzled

HE GLANCED over the top of the evening paper at his wife for ten years where she sat at her escritoire, gazing with a puzzled air at the note she had just written. "What's the trouble, my dear?" he asked.

"I'm trying to think what name to sign to this letter," she answered with a blank stare at him. "I remember my name before I was married; but I can't recall what my name is now."

What We Read

FOR SALE: A Piano: good condition, property of lady leaving New York in elegant walnut case.

A good way to leave New York!

A lady, living privately, will take a gentleman for breakfast and dinner.

Some appetite the lady has!

Families supplied by the quart or gallon. Certainly by wholesale!

He met a gentleman with one eye named Walker.

Wonder what the name of the other eye is!

Single gentlemen furnished with rooms: one or two gentlemen, also, with wives.

A most convenient boarding house!

Neither Did He

ONCE, while chatting with Senator Shirley, of Maine, Bill Nye, the humorist, remarked that he had been born at Shirley in the senator's state and that he supposed the town had been named for one of the senator's ancestors.

"I didn't know," the senator replied, "that there was such a town in Maine as Shirley."

"I didn't know it either," Nye said innocently, "until I was born there."

One Woman's Way

WHEN all the scheme of things is wrong, When skies are gray, When friends are false and fortune frowns As fortune may,

I do not curse my wretched fate Nor moan nor cry;

I hie me to my kitchenette

And bake a pie!

If now and then I seem to tire

Of wedded bliss,

I do not seek divorce nor yet

A soul mate's kiss;

Ah, no, my cure for ennui is Safer than that;

I find a nifty little shop

And buy a hat!

—MAUD KENNEDY WADDOCK.

The Ladies' Home Journal Circulation for January More Than 1,900,000

Sounded Like Another Relative

FIVE-YEAR-OLD Ethel was accompanying her mother in a tour of family visits through the West and had learned to show a proper interest in the names of the relatives they were about to see. One afternoon on the train she overheard her mother telling another passenger that they were going to Seattle.

Immediately Ethel inquired politely: "Mamma, who is Attle?"

The Selfish Cow

"AND does your cow give you milk?" asked the kind neighbor of little Mary. "No!" the little tot replied indignantly. "Uncle Fred just has to take it away from her!"

Christened Already

LITTLE MARY, eight years old, had received a very handsome boy doll for Christmas—so handsome, in fact, that a good-enough name could not be decided upon.

One day while Mary was subjecting the new doll to rigid inspection, she discovered "Pat. June 12, 1913," on the back of its neck. Whereupon Mary ran to her mother, excitedly exclaiming: "Mamma, mamma, here we've been wondering what we should call him, and if his name isn't Pat!"

Just a Little Wrong

A CERTAIN chemist advertised a patent concoction labeled: "No more colds! No more coughs! Price fifty cents."

A man who bought the mixture came back in three days to complain that he had drunk it all, but was no better.

"Drunk it all!" gasped the chemist. "Why, man, that was an india-rubber solution to put on the soles of your boots."

The Force of Example

"OH, MAMMA," little Margaret exclaimed in an awed tone on returning from a visit to a spinster aunt noted for the prim neatness with which she kept her house. "I saw a fly in Aunt Maria's house. But," she added thoughtfully, as if half justifying its presence, "it was washing itself."

"O Irony Austere"

AN OLD soldier who fought at Gettysburg says that during the thickest of the fight he was impressed by a sign posted on a tree reading: "No shooting on these premises under penalty of the law."

He Was So Surprised

A MAN with only one arm had just stepped from a railroad train when an inquisitive woman on the platform walked up to him and remarked: "I beg your pardon, sir, but I see you have lost your arm."

The man glanced down in a surprised manner and replied: "Hanged if I haven't!"

First Regular Ferryman in America

CORNELIS DIRCKSEN is claimed to have been the first regular ferryman in America. He was the proprietor of the "Old Ferry" between Long Island and New Amsterdam in 1642. His boat plied between the foot of Peck Slip in New York and where Fulton Street now begins.

The Puzzled Critic

A MUSICAL critic was once asked by a girl for an opinion on her voice. After hearing two verses of a song he stopped her. "Tell me," he said, "are you very fond of music?"

"Oh, yes, immensely," she replied in a voice brimming over with enthusiasm.

The critic raised his eyebrows, looked intensely puzzled, and answered: "That's very curious."

Mary Lisbeth's Puzzle

MY NAME is Mary Lisbeth Lee, Dear Office Dog, but Grandpa Blair. Who knows my name well as can be, Will sometimes call me Ida Clare.

Like when I told him: If we're dust, As folks say, I guessed our eyes Were made of sawdust. And he just Said "Ida Clare!" and laughed so wide.

And when I told him 'twasn't right, He laughed again and stroked my hair And never 'splained it, as he might— Just said again "Well, Ida Clare!"

But when I'm Mary Lisbeth Lee, Please, Office Dog, how can it be?

—AGNES E. VOLENTINE.

Table of Contents

	Page		Page
Editorial	22	NEEDLEWORK (Cont.)
FICTION		French Lingerie With Directions for Making—Ruth Sill	66
The Gift of the Probable Places—Eleanor Halliwell Abbott	5	Some Smart Summer Sweaters Will be Ribbazine—Elsa Krawiec	98
The Vanishing Girl—Phyllis Duganne	6	Little Things to Give a Touch of Style	101
A Horseshoe for Luck—William Harper Dean	8	HOUSEHOLD
The Little Road—William Almon Wolf	10	The Complete Furnishing of the Little House—Ethel Carpenter	29
The Call of the Cañon: Part III—Zane Grey	14	Where to Get the Money to Build a Home—P. S. Lovejoy	32
Vandemark's Folly: Part V—Herbert Quick	18	Housing the Foodstuffs—M. H. Carter	86
SPECIAL ARTICLES		Thirty-Cent Meat Dishes for a Family of Four—Caroline B. King	89
Illiterate America—Charles A. Selden	3	Easy Soups for Busy-Day Dinners—Mary D. Warren	91
My Years on the Stage: Part IV—John Drew	12	Out of the Frying Pan—Marie Jacques	96
Human Nature in the Bible—William Lyon Phelps	16	FOR CHILDREN
A Persian Wedding—Maude Radford Warren	21	The Dutch Twins and the Storks—Lucy Fitch Perkins	34, 36
You Can Change the World—Eugene Davenport	23	ART FEATURES
The Undernourished Child—S. Josephine Baker, M.D.	24	"When I Consider Thy Heavens"—W. L. Taylor	17
The Jazz Path of Degradation—John R. McMahon	26	A Persian Wedding—H. J. Soule	20
FASHIONS		POEMS
Southern Clothes that are Harbingers of Summer	54	What the Poets Send Us—Bliss Carman, Arthur Guiterman, Ruth Lambert Jones, Strickland Gillilan, Florence Howard Wolcott, Amelia Josephine Burr, Constance G. Alexander, Daniel Henderson, Theodosia Garrison, Mary Stewart Cutting, George H. Free	121
Paris Points the Way to January Bargains—Mary Brush Williams	56	MISCELLANEOUS
Old Clothes and Make-Over Magic: The Clothes We Like to Wear from Eight to Fourteen	59	Helpful Ladies' Home Journal Books	85
And Now the Costume Blouse	62	How Alice Smith Herself Paid those Worrying Bills—Manager of The Girls' Club	95
NEEDLEWORK		The Office Dog	132
Old-Time Patchwork and Appliqued Quilts	31

A Special Word to Subscribers

WHEN you receive notice that your subscription has expired renew it at once, using the blank inclosed in your final copy. Please sign your name exactly as it appears on your present address label.

A request for change of address must reach us at least 5 weeks before the date of the issue with which it is to take effect. Duplicate copies cannot be sent to replace those undelivered through failure to send this advance notice. Be sure to give your old address as well as the new one.

Should your subscription expire with this issue of the HOME JOURNAL, your renewal should be sent promptly to insure receipt of the February issue before it is "sold out." We cannot begin subscriptions with back numbers. Subscribers should always use Postal or Express money orders or Bank drafts in remitting. All Rural Free Delivery carriers can supply Postal money orders.

Our Advertising Branch Offices

[For advertising business only. Subscriptions not received.]
PHILADELPHIA: Independence Square
NEW YORK: 156 Madison Avenue
BOSTON: Merchants' National Bank Building
CHICAGO: Home Insurance Building
SAN FRANCISCO: First National Bank Building

Now You Can Buy It in Colors

It is made in

Pink	Rose
Helio	Cadet
Biscuit	Tan
Pearl	Linen
Reseda	Ciel
Copen	Brown

Now for the first time you can buy Indian Head in colors, and in colors guaranteed fast. By "fast colors" we mean colors that will hold bright and true through seasons of sun, sea air, dampness, and washing.

We guarantee: If any garment made of Indian Head fails to give proper service because of the fading or running of Indian Head colors, we will make good the total cost of the garment.

Fifty-nine cents a yard is the price of guaranteed fast-color Indian Head, 36 inches wide—a value that you will appreciate more fully after months of wear. If your store does not carry Indian Head in fast colors, write us giving your dealer's name. We will see that you are supplied.

"The Girl Who Loved Pink" tells the story of colored Indian Head and has a sample of the material. It also shows the complete color range. It is sent free upon request.

Amory, Browne & Co., Department 234, Box 1206, Boston, Mass.

Nashua Blankets

Parkhill Fine Gingham

Lancaster Kalburnie Gingham

Gilbrae Gingham

Copyright, Amory, Browne & Co., Boston and New York

INDIAN HEAD CLOTH
 Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.
Always on the Selvage

Cleanliness brings Good Cheer

A Merry Christmas
and
A Happy New Year
yours
"Old Dutch"

THE PRICE of the HOME JOURNAL

PUBLISHED once a month. 15 cents the copy from all newsdealers. By subscription: To the United States and Possessions, Cuba and Mexico, $1.50 the year. Remit by U. S. money order, express money order, check, or by draft payable in U. S. funds.

To Canada, by subscription, $2.00 the year. Single copies, 20 cents—Canadian or U. S. funds.

To Foreign Countries in the Postal Union, by subscription, postpaid, $3.00 the year, remittance to be by draft payable in U. S. funds.

The Ladies' HOME JOURNAL

THE FAMILY MAGAZINE OF AMERICA

Incorporating The Home Journal. Registered in the United States Patent Office and in Foreign Countries

PUBLISHED ON THE FIRST DAY OF EACH MONTH BY

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY

INDEPENDENCE SQUARE
PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA

CYRUS H. K. CURTIS

PRESIDENT

C. H. LUDINGTON

TREASURER

PHILIP S. COLLINS

GENERAL BUSINESS MANAGER

WALTER D. FULLER

SECRETARY

WILLIAM BOYD

ADVERTISING DIRECTOR

BARTON W. CURRIE, Editor

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LORING A. SCHULER WALTER H. DOWER
MARTHA E. DODSON

Copyright, 1922 (trade-mark registered), by The Curtis Publishing Company, in the United States and Great Britain. London Offices, 6, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W. C. All rights reserved. Entered as second-class matter May 6, 1911, at the Post Office at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, under Act of March 3, 1879. Additional entry as second-class matter at Columbus, Ohio, at Decatur, Illinois, at Chicago, Illinois, and at Indianapolis, Indiana.

Illustrations by
F. C. Yohn

NEVER WAS HE WITH THEM, SAVE FOR THAT HEAVENLY SPACE AFTER DINNER IN THE GREAT SALON, FULL OF FIRELIGHT AND CANDLELIGHT AND FALLING ROSE LEAVES AND MUSIC

She had kept the most potent of her charms in reserve, like a true daughter of Eve. Fair's extravagant prettiness might steel the skeptical, leading them to argue that so ornamental a head must necessarily be empty; and that no one could look that way long without becoming unbearably vain, spoiled and capricious. But if she spoke just once, if she said any three indifferent words at random, the veriest skeptic was lost and undone forever.

She could sing a little—small, candle-lit songs about love, and absurdly stirring things that had marched down through the centuries, and haunting bits of lullabies; she had a trick of chanting them under her breath, as though it were to herself that she was singing.

BUT when she spoke—ah, then the lucky one who listened knew that any coloratura that ever lived might well shed tears of bitter envy. For the voice that Fair Carter used for such homely purposes as wishing lucky mortals good day and good night and good speed was compact of sheer magic. It was honey and velvet and moonlight and laughter and mystery; and for all its enchantment it was as clear and honest and simple as a nice little boy's. It did remarkable things to the English language. Fair would have widened her eyes in cool disdain at the idea of indulging in such far-advertised Southern tricks as "you-all" and "Ah raickon" and "honey lamb," but she certainly managed to linger over vowels and elude consonants in a way that did not even remotely suggest the frozen North. It reduced English to such a satisfactory state of submission that she experimented only half-heartedly with any other language. A Chinaman would have understood her when she said "Please"; a Polynesian would have thrilled responsive to her "Thank you."

Therefore she had gone serenely on her way during those two terrible and thrilling years in France, those two terrible and bitter years in Germany, ignoring entirely the fact that the Teutons had a language of their own and acquiring just enough of the Gallic tongue to enable her to indulge in the gay and hybrid banter of her beloved doughboys, a swift patter consisting largely of "Ah, oui," "Ça me fait rien" and "Pas compris." It had served her purpose admirably for a good four years, but it had proved a broken reed during the last four weeks. The de Lautrecs were capable of speaking almost any kind of French; Monsieur le Vicomte leaned toward a nice mixture of Bossuet and Anatole France; Madame, his very ancient and regal mother, to Marivaux, with sprightly touches of Voltaire; Laure and listening to drums." And it had wrung tribute from her father—her father who had been all her family and all her world, and who had adored her even more than the young man from Richmond. "She's the bravest of all the fighting Carters, is my Fair, and never quite so brave as when she's frightened. Panic-arms her with really desperate valor."

Philip the Gay

By FRANCES NOYES HART

F AIRFAX CARTER sat up very straight in the great carved walnut bed and plaintively inspected the breakfast tray which the red-cheeked Norman maiden had just deposited beside her. Those eternal little hard rolls, the black bowl of coffee, beneath whose steaming fragrance lurked the treacherous chicory, the jug of hot, thin milk, the small brown jar of pale honey—she bestowed a rebellious scowl on the entire collection. She felt suddenly, frantically homesick for a bubbling percolator, for thick yellow cream and feathery biscuits, for chilled crimson berries with powdered mounds of sugar.

Marie Leontine, briskly oblivious, was coaxing the very small fire in the very large chimney into dancing animation. "V'la!" she announced triumphantly with all the hearty deference that is the common gift of the French servant. "A fine morning, p'tite dame!"

"Oui," conceded the "small lady" grudgingly.

SHE shivered apprehensively as Marie Leontine shoved the copper water jug closer to the flames and trotted smiling from the room. Ugh! How in the world could any nation hope to keep clean and warm with three sticks of wood and four teaspoonfuls of water? She remembered another country, a bright and blessed country, where water rushed hot and joyous from glittering faucets into great shining tubs, where warmed and fleecy towels hung waiting to fold you hospitably close. She shivered again forlornly, scanning the stretch of distance across the cold, bare floor to the hook where the meager crash towel hung limp and forbidding. "La douce France!" Ha! She pulled the tray toward her, still scowling.

Even when she scowled Fair Carter was a great deal more distracting looking than any one young woman has a right to be. She was very small, absurdly small, sitting bolt upright in the great, dark bed, but she had enough charms to equip any six ladies of ordinary size and aspirations. There was the ruffled glory of her shining hair, warmer than gold, brighter than bronze, and her rain-colored eyes and the small, warm, gallant mouth and the elfin tilt to her brows. There was that look about her, eager and reckless and adventurous, that made your heart contract when you remembered what life did to the eager and reckless and adventurous. It had made a great many hearts contract. It had made one despairing young adorer from Richmond say: "Fair always looks as though she were carrying a flag—and Diane to René Bazin when they were being supervised and Gyp when they weren't; Philippe le Gai to a racy and thrilling idiom, at once virile and graceful, as old as the Chanson de Roland, as new as Sacha Guitry's latest comedy. But after several courteous and tense attempts to exchange amenities with Laure's "little American" they had abandoned the tongue of their fathers and devoted their earnest attention to mastering the English language.

It was easy enough for Philippe and Laure, of course. They already knew a great deal more about English literature than Fair had dreamed existed, even though they tripped over the spoken word; but the other members of the family labored sternly and industriously while their small guest surveyed their efforts with indulgent amusement. It seemed quite natural and reasonable to Fairfax Carter that they should continue to do so indefinitely; they wanted to talk to her, didn't they? Well, then! They were getting on quite well, too, she reflected benevolently, bestowing a sudden and enchanting smile on one of the dark carved figures on the bedposts.

The figure stared back at her so unresponsively that she suddenly ceased to smile.

Her eye wandered to the traveling clock ticking competently away on the desk, and rested there for an electrified second.

"Mercy!" she murmured, appalled, and was out of the bed and across the room with all the swift grace of a kitten.

HALF past nine, and the de Chartreuil boys were to ride over for a game of croquet-golf at ten! Her toes curled rebelliously at the contact of the cold flags, but she ignored them stoically, pouncing on the copper jug and whirling across the room like a small, bright tempest. What a divine day! Chanted her heart, suddenly exultant, as she splashed the water recklessly and tumbled into her clothes. It was wonderful to feel almost well again, to feel weariness slipping from her like a worn-out garment. The sun came flooding in through the deep windows, gilding the lovely, faded hangings, gilding the lovely, vivid head; she could hear horses' hoofs beneath her window, and she flung it wide, leaning far out.

"Bon jour, Monsieur Raoul; bon jour, Monsieur André. Oh, Laure, are you down already?"

"Already? This hour, small lazy one. Quick now, or we leave thee."

"No, no," wailed Fair. "I'll be there; I'm almost there now, truly. Save the red mallet for me, angel darling; it's the only one I can hit with. Don't let her go, Monsieur André."

"Never and never, mademoiselle. We are your slaves."

She knotted her shoe laces with frantic fingers, snatched up the brown tam from the table and raced down the corridor between the swaying tapestries like a small wild thing. But halfway down she halted abruptly. Behind one of the great doors someone was singing, gay and ringing and reckless, a gallant thing that set her heart flying:

*Monsieur Charette a dit à ces messieurs,
Monsieur Charette a dit —*

Philippe le Gai was singing the old Vendée marching song that he had translated for her the day before.

For a moment she wavered, and then, thrusting her hands deep in her pockets, she took a long breath.

"Morning, Monsieur Philippe," she challenged clearly.

THE song broke off, and Fair could see him, for all the closed doors—could see his shining black head and the beautiful dark young face with its recklessly friendly smile and its curiously unfriendly eyes, gray and quiet.

The blithe voice rang out again: "And a most good morning to Mistress Fairy Carter. Where is she going with those quick feet?"

"She's going to play croquet-golf with Laure and Diane and the de Chartreuil. It's such a heavenly beautiful day. You—you aren't coming?"

"But never of this life!" laughed the voice. "How old you think we in here are, hein? Seven? Eight? We have twenty-nine years and thirty-nine gray hairs; we don't play with foolish children. Only fairies can do that. You be careful of the ball going by old Daudin's farm, see; there's a sacred traitor of a ditch just over the hill; hit him hard and good; that ball, and maybe you clear it. Maybe you don't too. It is one animal of a ditch." The light, strong laughter swept through the door, and Fair swayed to it as though it were a hand that pulled her.

Then she turned away with a gallant little lift to her head. "Thanks, a lot; I'll be careful. See you this afternoon."

But the light feet finished their journey down the gray corridor and the worn flight of stone steps in an ominously sedate fashion. No, it was no use—it was no use at all. She suddenly felt frantically discouraged and baffled; she who a few minutes before had been a candle, brave and warm and shining, only to have a careless breath blow out the light, leaving nothing but a cold little white stick with a dead black wick for a heart. It was horribly unfair, and someone should most certainly pay for it—someone who was sitting blithe and callous and safe behind those heavy doors, heavy doors of oak and heavier ones of cool indifference.

She drew a quivering breath and straightened tensely as though she had heard far off a bugle sing. Oh, how dared he, how dared he be indifferent? He who idled all his life away, paying no tribute to the world save laughter; a useless, black-haired, arrogant young good-for-nothing! How dared he be indifferent to beauty and riches and grace and wit and kindness when they lingered at his side, tremulous and expectant? It was worse than cruel to be indifferent to the personification of all these attributes; it was sheer, crass, intolerable stupidity. She made a sudden violent gesture. That dream was ended; she was through. She would tell them to-night that her visit was over, that to-morrow she must be on her way to Paris—and America.

But at the thought of America her feet faltered to a halt as though she were reluctant to go one step nearer to that enchanted country. Dear and beloved, oh, America, but empty now and strange since dad had gone! How could she go back to that great house with its white pillars and echoing halls? How could she face its cold and silent beauty without his arms about her? No, no, she couldn't; she was afraid—she was afraid of loneliness. While she had had her work, while she had had those thousands of brown young faces lifted to her in comradeship and worship and mirth, she had fought off the nightmare of his going. No one had known except Laure—Laure, who had loved "the little American" from the first day that she had come laughing and tiptoeing down the long room with contraband chocolates for Laure's bitter, dying poilus; Laure, who had held her in her tired young arms all the terrible night after the cable came; Laure, who had wept when a tearless and frozen Fair had set off for Germany with her division; Laure, who had come all the way to Coblenz to bring her back to Normandy when she had literally dropped in her tracks two years later. Dear Laure, who had healed and tended this small alien—she would be loath to let her go.

FAIR'S lip quivered; she felt suddenly too small and solitary to face a world that could play such hideous tricks. It was bad enough and thrice incredible to have rendered Laure's brother impervious to her every enchantment; but it was sheer, wanton cruelty to have made him utterly unworthy of any lady's straying fancy. And alas, alas, how fancy strayed! The bravest of all the fighting Carters was badly frightened; the whole thing savored of black magic. She, who had flouted and flaunted every masculine heart that had been laid at her feet since she had put on slippers, to have fallen victim to a laugh and a careless word!

Why, she barely knew him, he held so lightly aloof, courteous and smiling and blithely indifferent; it was hatefully obvious that he preferred his own society to any that

(Continued on Page 126)

SHE HESITATED; AND THEN SHE SWUNG RECKLESSLY ACROSS THE SUN-WARMED FLAGS, HER CHIN TILTED AT A SIMPLY OUTRAGEOUS ANGLE

How to Lose Fat

The Story of New York City's Fat-Reduction Squad of Fifty Women

By ROYAL S. COPELAND, M. D.

Commissioner of Health, New York City

NATIONAL interest has been aroused by New York City's Fat-Reduction Contest, participated in by fifty women and held under the auspices of the Metropolitan Department of Health. A very large number of letters have come to me from all parts of the country in regard to this contest and especially requests for the details of reduction. Unable to answer all these inquiries personally, I am glad to take this opportunity of making a general answer to the public at large or at least to the five millions of the public who read this magazine.

There is no greater affliction that can come to a woman than inordinate fatness. I have always believed this. It was impressed upon me more than ever the other day when a brief newspaper notice, published in the morning, brought 500 fat women to my office at the Department of Health.

A short time before this visitation a city newspaper asked me if I was willing to have a part in a weight-reduction contest between two groups, one of fat men and the other of fat women. It was proposed that the newspaper should take the men and that I should assume charge of the women. I agreed, provided the affair should redound to the benefit of a public health exposition which the New York City Department of Health and the American Public Health Association were to hold in the metropolis in November, 1921. The beginning of the contest was so arranged as to make the last week of the fat reduction correspond with the week of the exposition.

The original plan for the contest provided for twenty-five men and twenty-five women, but there was such clamoring for admission into the reduction class that we decided to make the number fifty in each group instead. The fifty women assigned me were subject to a few desertions during the four weeks that the contest lasted. Some of these desertions were consequent on failure to obey rules, others on dislike of the effort involved and, happily, in one or two cases to early achievement of desired reduction. Of the thirty-nine women who persisted to the bitter end, the record is most gratifying. Their aggregate weight at the start was 8130 pounds, or an average of 208 pounds each. At the end of the third week their collective loss was 506 pounds, or an average of 13 pounds apiece. The total loss or shrinkage of waistline amounted to no less than 4½ yards. A couple of days later the total loss in weight was 551 pounds, or an average of 14 pounds for each individual. The average individual weight of 208 pounds had been brought down to an average of 194 pounds. For the entire period the average weekly loss for each person was about 4 pounds, or 4 pounds in one month. There is nothing sensational in such a reduction nor does it spell the utmost desired in many cases. But it is an excellent rate of progress, accomplished as it was with perfect safety to health and with a minimum of discomfort and of effort. All these women at the end of the test looked better and felt better. It was easy for them to continue the regimen of the contest by themselves and to bring down their weight still further.

Why Folks Get Fat

WHAT is fatness? Sometimes it is one thing and again it is something else. When inordinate fatness appears in childhood or in very early youth, it is likely due to some disturbance, perhaps of the ductless glands, of which the thyroid is an example. In other words, it is a pathological condition. It is an evidence of some abnormal state of the body. On the other hand, fatness which comes on after the age of twenty, and particularly after the age of thirty, is due to wrong habits of eating and lack of proper exercise. Take, for example, the 500 women who appeared at my office—almost every one admitted a fondness for candy and, as I came to know the fifty women who entered the class more intimately, I found that almost without exception they were large eaters.

Fatness results when the body receives fat-producing elements in larger quantity than necessary for actual needs and where the surplus is deposited in the form of adipose tissue. We determine fatness by taking certain things into account, as weight, size of the bones and the age of the person. It is expected under normal conditions that the woman of fifty will weigh more than the girl of twenty-one who has reached her growth. But when there appear accumulations of fat in certain parts of the body, out of proportion to the general deposit of fat, we recognize that the condition of obesity exists.

Where the tissues are uniformly distributed, the bones hidden from sight, no undue thickness of the upper arm and hips, or accumulation of fat over the abdomen or chest, we speak of the person as being large and not fat. In general, the life-insurance companies and those interested in physical welfare have established certain standards of height and weight, and within limits these standards must be accepted as reliable. But, of course, individual peculiarities must be taken into consideration. A variation of ten pounds, either way from the standard, would indicate fatness or thinness.

The danger of fatness is that the vital organs, like the heart, liver and kidneys, have normal muscular or other tissue replaced by fat, a tissue which is not capable of functioning in a normal way. When fat replaces muscular tissue in the heart, that organ is flabby, lacks its capacity to act as a powerful pump, and among other consequences the individual suffers from poor circulation. In the kidney, fat may act in such a way as to interfere with the proper excretion of waste. Within the abdominal cavity there may be such an accumulation of fat about the intestines as to interfere with their proper functions. Any organ which has its normal tissue replaced by fat is incapable of acting in a proper way. There is a general lowering of efficiency and an absence of feeling brisk and vigorous.

There is an increasing percentage of fleshy persons in our cities. As I have observed New York women, I think it is safe to assume that twenty to twenty-five per cent of them are overweight. This statement I make of New York is perhaps true of all American cities. I believe that as a general rule the people in the country and rural districts take more exercise than they do in the city. I do not believe the percentage of obese persons is so great in these districts. The percentage of fat men in the city compared with overweight women is smaller, probably ten to fifteen per cent. This is because men are more active. Men are engaged in occupations demanding greater activity, and they walk more or less to and from their business.

One great factor in obesity is the almost universal presence of constipation. The result of delayed intestinal action is absorption of material which might better be drawn off by the body. Most persons suffer from constipation. There is fermentation of the waste material. Bloating follows. The abdominal walls lose their elasticity by reason of this excessive bloating. As a result the waistline is materially increased and the abdomen becomes pendulous and heavy. In our recent contest one woman took off six inches of waistline before she lost a pound of weight. The conclusion in her case was that the excessive bloating had much to do with the increase in her circumference.

The ease with which fat is removed depends upon the age of the person. The younger one begins to attempt reduction the more successful will be the result. We had much greater success in general with the women between twenty and thirty than we had with those past thirty, yet the two women who led in reduction happened to be over thirty.

There is a tendency in many cases after marriage and child-bearing to put on flesh. This may be in part physiologically normal; but, on the other hand, it is more often due to the fact that the life of the mother becomes more sedentary after child-bearing than before. It is well for a young mother to be on guard against lack of exercise. Before the birth of the baby exercise is of the greatest importance. Let no prospective mother fear to go about her usual affairs. She will have an easier time in her delivery and will be better prepared to care for her child afterward. Likewise when she is well enough to resume her activities, she should make it a particular point of having daily exercise.

Exercise Plus Perspiration

FROM the age of thirty to forty-five it is not so easy to reduce, but it can be done by special effort. After forty-five it is extremely difficult and in many cases unwise to attempt reduction by exercise. No one should attempt the strenuous exercises necessary to rapid reduction without making sure that the heart and other organs are in normal condition, and after the age of forty-five such unaccustomed exercises are likely to do harm rather than good.

There are just two ways to take off fat: One is by systematic dieting—that is, by adopting a system of daily eating which will exclude from the dietary those articles of food which carry the fat-producing elements; the other course necessary to remove fat, and preferably followed in conjunction with a suitable diet, is the production of honest sweat. There is no solvent in the world for fat except perspiration. It is a common thing for a woman to say "I walked ten blocks to-day." When you come to inquire into it you find she has sauntered along, looking into the windows of stores. That sort of exercise will not take off fat. The exercise necessary for this purpose is the kind that will open the pores and cause extreme perspiration to run from the body.

Then, too, it is not perspiration alone which is necessary. It must be perspiration as a result of physical activity. Getting into a Turkish bath or electric-light cabinet, even though it is followed by a flow of perspiration, will not cause reduction. It may cause partial loss of weight, but it is like taking a cathartic. Its action is confined only to the skin and superficial areas of the body. It does not reach all the structures of the body.

Our squad of fifty women were examined and weighed at the start. They were provided daily with a menu for three meals embodying non-fattening items. They were exercised one hour daily in a gymnasium at Madison Square Garden. The women, attired in knickerbockers and sweaters, were put through a brisk course of setting-up exercises, movements with dumb-bells, throwing the medicine ball, a little track work, and so on. There was also a weekly hike in Central Park. Many volunteer reducers fell into line on these occasions and followed the hikers. There were also numbers of women who independently emulated the class example by taking brisk walks in the various city parks.

Indeed, the nonofficial class of reducers in the metropolitan area, who followed the published rules of diet and to

(Continued on Page 163)

FOR HALF AN HOUR SHE HAD BEEN PREPARING HERSELF FOR THIS ENTRY, SPURRING HERSELF ON UNTIL HER EYES WERE INDIGNANT AND HER MOUTH TWITCHED EXCITEDLY

The Amateur Rebel

By
PHYLLIS DUGANNE

Illustrations by
Edward L. Chase

SUZETTE PENDLETON admitted that there was no excuse for her conduct; she must have been born a rebel. From the day of her birth she had had everything a girl might desire. Mr. and Mrs. Pendleton had always been pointed out as the happiest couple in Hendon; Zette was an only child, and never was there a suspicion of friction or discontent in the family. The house where she had been born and brought up was one of the most attractive about New York; photographs, interior and exterior, bits of garden, even the view from the tennis court, were reproduced time after time in the Sunday supplements, in the ultra-smart City and Country magazine. Richard Pendleton, her father, was a pleasant appearing man, a good lawyer, a devoted husband and father. Elinor Pendleton brought to the household a love for beautiful things, a passion for literature and art, an indomitable energy. She was president of the Hendon Women's Club, secretary to the Literary Society—and rare was the genius, male or female, who could resist her charming notes, begging his or her presence at the clubhouse for an intimate discussion of life and letters.

Their attitude toward Zette had always been one of gentle guidance, of tender amusement. Never since she could remember had she been punished undeservedly, never had anything unfair been demanded of her.

Her mother and father had bought the Hendon house when they were first married: in those days Richard Pendleton was starting his practice and there was only a "tidy little bank account"—how Zette resented that phrase!—to his name. Elinor had budgeted it wisely: the account swelled, and the square old house shot forth brick terraces and gardens, pergolas and piazzas, at an appalling rate. By the time Zette was fourteen years old Elinor had begun on colonial pressed glass, etchings, and rare Japanese prints.

AS A CHILD Zette had been baffled by her home and her parents. They were really much nicer to her than any other parents she had ever seen; they were tolerant, affectionate, untroublesome. Never did her father spank her; never did Elinor Pendleton fly into a rage and scold noisily. And she was dissatisfied, incredibly, passionately dissatisfied. To her mother's gentle disapproval she preferred of all Hendon families the O'Ryan's, who lived in a dirty, rambling house through which the drunken Jim O'Ryan used to stumble amid the shrieks of laughing children, and where Mrs. O'Ryan used to stand, arms at hips, and pour forth a stream of invective at her numerous progeny and their friends. Her scolding ended, she would gather them to her warm, grease-spotted bosom and feed them doughnuts, forbidden to Zette at home and more enjoyed than anything in the world at that period of her life.

It was not until her seventeenth birthday that Zette found an excuse for openly defying her parents. The day began smoothly; at the breakfast table she received her presents, listened attentively to the speeches that she would have liked to call sermons, but could not, with fairness. Then Marian Burdock stopped at the house with a greeting for Zette and news of herself, and Zette disgraced the holiday with a violent outburst against her friend, her parents, and Hendon in general, and slammed the door of the house upon her anger.

A few weeks before, Ada Langley, wearied from a particularly exhausting New York season—she had been playing The Laughing Lady that year, and the Bobby Wadsworth scandal had barely subsided—had taken a small house in Hendon. She had come to the town for a complete rest, and the good people of Hendon aided and abetted her to that end. Only occasionally as she rode about the town in her green-blue car was she bothered with the exertion of returning a bow; she was not sure that the doorbell of her cottage was in order until one week-end the New York train carried two young actresses in addition to its daily load of Hendonites.

She was wandering down the old mill road, a rather ordinary looking person without her makeup, her famed red hair looped beneath a flopping leg-horn hat, when she first saw Zette. She was attracted at first by the mop of red hair that crowned the slim figure of a girl, hair as thick and lustrous as her own had been, long before she knew what her henna was a breakfast food or a South African animal. As she came nearer to the girl, she saw first a pair of indignant eyes blazing in a tanned, oval face, a discontented red mouth. The girl was too absorbed to notice her until they were only a few feet apart.

"Nothing," said Miss Langley then, in a decided tone, "is as bad as that."

Zette looked up quickly and flushed.

"Really it isn't," the actress continued, smiling at the girl's confusion. "If he can make you as furious as that he's either no good or else you should save your energy for future use."

"It isn't a he, though," Zette answered. They had stopped walking and were standing facing each other in the sun-shine. "It's Marian Burdock."

"Marian Burdock," Miss Langley repeated thoughtfully. She sat down on the grass; Zette's eyes widened at the easy way in which she sank to the ground.

"Tell me about it."

ZETTE looked about excitedly before she sat down. For a moment she stared, her lips parted, at the older woman. "Incredible that I'm—well, over forty, isn't it?" Miss Langley asked amiably. "If you think you oughtn't to sit here with me, don't. I know what Hendon thinks of me, and if you're afraid—but I'm in rather a sociable mood to-day and —"

"Oh, I do want to stay," Zette protested. "I think it's perfectly horrid the way people have treated you." She waited for Miss Langley's gratitude, pleasantly conscious of her broadness and lack of conventionality.

"Do you?" She was not beautiful, but Zette could not seem to move her eyes from the face beneath the flopping hat. "If you really want to know how I feel, I simply don't care."

Zette gasped. "I hate 'em too," she said finally. "That's what I'm so mad about to-day. It's Marian Burdock."

"Tell me your name and then tell me about Marian."

"Suzette Pendleton. Marian's lots older than I; she's twenty-two. I've always been terribly crazy about her ever since I can remember. She was so different from all the rest. I guess that was why we were such good friends."

"You're different too?" Miss Langley asked.

"Oh, yes! Marian sings perfectly gloriously, Miss Langley. She was in concert work for a while, and then she had a part in The Mikado in New York." She paused to pluck a handful of grass resentfully.

"And now she's fallen in love?"

"NO," SAID Zette, "she's going to be married." She laughed, too, the deep, childish sound of her voice following a moment after Ada Langley's clear soprano. "Of course she's in love with him—I don't see how she could be, though, after being on the stage—Bruce Martin; he's the real-estate man who's building all those bungalows out by East Hendon. And she's never going on the stage again, not ever going to sing except at things here in Hendon. He doesn't want her to."

"And what do you think about it?"

"I think it's awful. To give up a career like that. When she told us this morning I got terribly mad, and mother said I was horrid. I think she expected me to congratulate Marian."

Miss Langley smiled. "I suppose you'd never do anything like that?"

"Of course I wouldn't. And I'm not talented like Marian. I think I could be a painter or a poet, and I'm pretty good at amateur theatricals; but I never had a real gift like hers." She looked up at the actress modestly.

Miss Langley was looking down at her hands, slim, white hands with a faint tracing of freckles on the backs. "But you're not going to marry a real-estate man?" she asked, without looking up.

"I'm not going to marry—ever!" said Zette. "I feel as if I'd been married all my life. Everyone in Hendon is married—and not even unhappily married. Mother and father are so happy that sometimes I almost scream."

"Heavens!" said Ada Langley. "Still, I suppose it is pretty uncomfortable not to fit in. My mother and father hated each other, but it's all the same."

"Didn't your people understand you either?" asked Zette eagerly.

"That was the whole trouble; I'm afraid they did." She laughed and stretched out her bare, freckled arms lazily. "Let me give you a little piece of advice, Suzette Pendleton. Don't go around trying to be understood. Be honest, now; would you really like anyone to understand you?"

Zette lifted bewildered eyes.

"Really?"

"Why—I hadn't thought about it that way. I suppose it would be rather awful. I mean if they knew all the terrible things —"

"Exactly." Miss Langley nodded emphatically. "Or if they knew there weren't any terrible things, that would be worst of all, wouldn't it?"

ZETTE'S head was whirling when she arrived at home. Throughout dinner she watched her parents critically. Miss Langley had hit it exactly; that was why the Pendletons were so dull; she always understood them. With Ada Langley she had to puzzle, to reconstruct all her ideas of conversation before she was even partly sure of what the lady meant. But there was no misunderstanding her mother's well-clipped words, her father's slow speech. She felt a great pity for her mother, an intense envy of Ada Langley. The cuts and snubs of Hendon seemed well worth having.

"I met Miss Langley to-day," she remarked casually, eating the frosting from a third slice of her birthday cake. "Ada Langley."

Her mother and father exchanged glances. "Met her?" Elinor Pendleton asked. "How?"

"Oh, there are other ways of meeting people besides being introduced at Hendon tea parties," her daughter answered, with a great feeling of superiority. "We just talked to each other."

"Did you like her?"

"More than anyone I've met in my life," answered Zette. "She's so different and—I hope I'll be just like her when I grow up."

The excitement started then. For two weeks her parents wasted the old Pendleton methods on an absent daughter; they fitted over the nursery into a living room for her; they bought the ragtime records, that had been so long forbidden, for the talking machine; and while they planned all manner of delightful, wholesome amusements, Zette sat at the feet of Ada Langley and watched and listened.

FINALLY, of course, came the direct command; it was almost the first time in Zette's life that her parents had faced her with a thou-shalt-not.

"I'm sorry," she answered them perfunctorily, "but I like Miss Langley. I've always been bored stiff with everyone I've known, and now I've found someone who interests me. I won't stop seeing her."

She thought of her first conversation with Ada Langley and knew that her parents did not understand the actress, did not know that there were no terrible things. But she did not explain to them; she let them have their excitement. Richard Pendleton made some remark about more drastic measures, but they were never needed. A week later Miss Langley left Hendon; as she leaned out the window of the

New York train she waved to a slender, weeping girl with a mop of red hair.

"Good-by," her lips formed, lips grown suddenly red.

Zette gazed at her adoringly; she was a little in awe of Ada Langley now as she appeared to the world in her smart Parisian traveling dress, her little hat, her umbrella of purple silk. Yet she had sat beside the actress's dressing table and watched the transformation, watched the brown freckles disappear beneath cold cream and powder, watched the long hair glow a deeper red when the henna coverlet was removed.

She went home slowly, sat dreamily by the window until her father returned.

"Father, a girl is legally of age when she's eighteen, isn't she?" she asked him.

"Practically, yes. Planning to get married, Zette?" He was most affable, now that Ada Langley had been removed from the horizon.

"No," Zette answered, smiling significantly. "No, father; I think I'm planning to get divorced."

With which ominous statement she left him, as she hoped, stunned.

WHEN she awoke, quite early in the morning, the day was for a moment like any other day. She yawned and raised herself on one elbow; between the posts of her bed she could see her reflection in an oval mirror. She sat upright at the first glimpse and leaned forward. Gray eyes, wide apart, with dark lashes—they could be darker, if Elinor Pendleton was not so horrified at the sight of a silver-cased black pencil pasted with an imposing mauve label. A small straight nose, mouth rather too short and full, a chin that was not long, but that seemed to her immense in comparison with the slight space between her nose and upper lip. Her hair was lovely; she shook it back, held it up to the sunshine. Then, as she became fully awake, she leaped out of bed and pranced to the calendar on her desk to make sure that she was not mistaken.

June third!

She curled up in the chintz-covered armchair and looked out at the summer hills. As she tried to recall the last year she could find no milestone in its unruffled monotony of days except her seventeenth birthday. But as she thought of the year that was beginning, the year that was about to be heralded with an explosion of her own making, she shivered with excitement. Throughout the day she hoarded her secret, until after dinner she was silent. And at eight o'clock, into the Utopian peace, the conscious perfection of the home that shone in her parents' eyes, Zette flung her bomb.

Mr. Pendleton was sitting in his comfortable chair by the window; the shaded light was at exactly the proper angle, and he was reading with a look of utter contentment on his placid face. Elinor Pendleton leaned over her spinet desk, her brows drawn together ever so faintly, a half smile about her lips, as she wrote one of her famed letters on the Literary Society note paper. Zette came to the doorway and stood there a moment before she entered the room.

FOR half an hour she had been preparing herself for this entry, spurring herself on until her eyes were indignant and her mouth twitched excitedly. She pressed one grimy hand, grimy because she had just dragged her trunk down from the attic, against her breast; then with a sharp intake of breath she flung back her head. That defiant toss sent her hair tumbling about her shoulders in a rain of hairpins.

Mrs. Pendleton looked up mildly. "Why, Zette," she said gently. "Hadn't you better do your hair? We expect Mr. Evans to call this evening."

"I DON'T KNOW WHETHER I LIKE HAVING YOU IN LOVE WITH ME, IF YOU'RE GOING TO START RESTRICTING MY FRIENDS. IT'S TOO MUCH LIKE GOING HOME TO MY PARENTS"

(Continued on Page 149)

AN ORANGE gold quality in the late afternoon sunlight suggested autumn, although it was only August. Overhead, the sky was a deep, unbelievable, unbroken blue. Beneath, the countryside, tops of forest, then mountain pastures, then tops of forest again, shimmered and shone in that bath of profusely golden but slightly hard sunshine which burned and stung, yet, curiously, was not really warming. A distant cowbell tinkled with uncanny clearness on some far hillside. Nearer, a cricket, seeming to know that the days for his sort of work were numbered, ventured early from under a stone and set up a half-hearted chirping.

Almost a mile away, on the crest of a knoll, a man, driving two white horses, was plowing for winter rye, back and forth, back and forth, relentlessly turning a field of green turf into an ever-widening expanse of brown mold, each dark furrow glistening momentarily as it left the plow. One could see him pause at the end of the field and catch at the reins hung over his neck. The horses, as if in surprise, would jerk their noses high in the air. Then, seconds later, would come the plowman's faint, musical "Whey!"

Alice Paraday, coming out of a belt of fir woods onto the brown, dry grass of an upland pasture, was conscious, the instant she gained the broad sunlight, of the presaged change in the season and conscious of it with a twinge of regret, almost of resentment. The atmosphere had been that of full, hot summer when she had entered the woods only three hours before.

She paused and looked down the hillside as if something ominous had occurred, as indeed it had. For days she had been subtly conscious of signs that this moment was coming, but blindly had tried to ignore them. For a week now there had been a blowzy maturity in the vagrant timothy stalks by the roadsides, goldenrod, blackberries and sumac showing themselves with a greater and greater insistence along the stone walls and the pasture fences.

TEN years before, the first signs of autumn had meant to Alice Paraday what they had meant to all of her friends, and meant to most of them still—the end of a holiday, the inflexible date on which the freedom of the mountains must be exchanged for the duller confinement of city streets; but autumn had no longer such threats for her. For years Alice Paraday had reveled in the most luxurious freedom that any woman can ever know, that absolute liberty of action combined with utter lack of responsibility which is enjoyed by the only daughter of a wealthy, tolerant widower—in her case an amiable, unexacting old colonel of a man with an absorbing, satisfying little routine of his own. This year, or any other year, she could stay in the mountains as long as she chose. She could seek variety and color in Europe. She could follow the summer to the South. To one of her means and position, New York in itself was always brilliant and exciting, yet Alice Paraday had never lost her school-girl dread of the autumn. Every year at its first approach she still felt that same twinge, not of sadness exactly but of the faint, vaguely disturbing melancholy which can be only expressed by one word—tristesse.

For Alice Paraday herself was approaching life's season of sumac and goldenrod—full summer still, but with hints of a grimmer season at hand. She was not yet forty. She was thirty-seven, to be exact, but even at thirty-seven she was near enough to frank middle-age to feel its hints edging

Sumac and Goldenrod

By PHILIP CURTISS

Illustrations by H. J. Moraw toward her from time to time with insolent prematureness, just as to-day she felt the approach of autumn when it seemed one should be able to claim indefinite weeks more of summer.

With the ease of being on old and familiar country, Alice descended the hillside pasture, winding her way among patches of fennel and clumps of juniper bushes, occasionally slowing to cautiousness on the slopes of dry, slippery grass, then hastening almost into a run in the little hollows until at the foot of the slope she came to a zigzag rail fence and a country road.

To the left the road led over the uplands for half a mile, then down a steep pitch to her father's house; but at the sight of the homely, familiar, deep sandy ruts Alice felt a sudden distaste for everything which even suggested her routine and ordered home life. Instead, she felt a sudden intense necessity for tearing away in the other direction, for pushing deliberately into the deeper woods and to wilder pastures, as if there were something in nature to-day that she must face down and get over, for once and for all. Thus she turned and walked with a sort of defiant briskness to the right where the road soon became little more than two tracks in the grass, then passed through the belt of forest over a velvet carpet of soft pine needles, and finally brought out on the shores of a reedy and secluded little lake.

UNABLE TO ENDURE ANY LONGER HER OWN RIDICULOUS PRETENSE SHE SLIPPED ON A CAPE AND WENT OUT TO THE EAST PIAZZA. IT WAS HERE THAT SHE MEANT TO RECEIVE MANWARING WHEN HE CAME

But this afternoon vicious and obstinate tramping brought little relief to Alice Paraday. The harder she walked and the farther she walked to escape it, the closer she found her depression clinging to her shoulder. That orange gold quality in the sunlight, that hint of sumac and goldenrod, had given the tint to her day.

WHEN life for so many human beings presents an incessant fight for the merest existence, when wave after wave of misfortune sweeps with apparent vindictiveness over certain individuals, families, and even whole nations, there would seem to be nothing for which to pity Alice Paraday. She had always been strangely immune to real troubles. She was one of those persons whose lives and fortunes seem, in defiance of all the usual laws, to be reinforced and invulnerable.

Nothing ever seemed to affect the Paradays—nor wars, nor pestilence, nor panics—all alike seemed to pass them by. The routine of the big house at the foot of the hill had not changed an atom since Alice could remember—a new coat of paint, a new garden trellis, a new stone wall whenever it was needed, regardless of whether it cost more or less than it had the last time. It was needed and it was obtained. That was all there was to it; no hubbub, no calculation.

The Paradays as a race even seemed to have none of the usual powers to annoy themselves. It might almost have been said that they preferred not to be too dear to one another, each respecting a sort of family distaste for uproar and sentimentality. Alice herself had never married, really because no man had ever shown any special promise of making life any pleasanter for her than it was already. Of course she had never reached that view of it in her own mind, but that was what it really amounted to.

There had always been men, some of them fine men, who had wanted to marry her. Some of them had asked her. Most of them had been frightened away by her complete invulnerability. There were men who wanted to marry her still. There were not as many, of course, and they did not express themselves with the same violent ardor, but they were still hovering in the background none the less.

An ideal life hers had seemed fifteen years before. Considering the fact that her isolation was her own choice, it seemed to-day just as ideal; but in the life of Alice Paraday a curious law was displaying itself. Although she had always stood aside from the genuine currents of human existence, although she had seemed to have no connection at all with events and causes which mark the rise and fall in the lives of most men and women, which bring them sadness or happiness, elevation or depression, yet she had never actually found herself free from those laws and causes, from those elevations and depressions which were the common lot of her day and her age. She was like some detached little pool, far inland, affected by tidewater.

AS HER generation passed through its regular seasons of lightness or somberness, she herself, although wholly detached, seemed to pass, in a pale, less vital way, through the same emotions. Standing aside from her generation, she nevertheless could not cease to be a part of her generation. She had never experienced the thrill of the battle of life, but yet she had never escaped its echoes and tremors.

The road which Alice was following came out at the lake on the shores of a little cove. It was narrow and reedy, bordered with cat-tails and iris, clogged with patches of ee-grass and odd snags of driftwood—trunks of trees from which all vestige of bark had long disappeared, trunks which were worn to a gray white in color and lifted jagged knuckles of branches into the air. In that cove the water was always black and still as a mirror. A sand bar at the mouth and the patches of eel grass kept it immune from the little wavelets and ripples which, on breezier days, made the main body of the little lake as dancing and happy as might be. A few scattered lily pads, very coarse and very dark green, hovered just off from the shores, but no one ever saw blossoms among them.

At the very end of the cove, where the water backed up against the narrowing shores, a faint fringe of dirty, motionless foam always lingered. In it the broken-off bow of some old, abandoned fishing boat lay stranded, the boards worn as smooth and white as the driftwood.

FOR twenty years Alice had known the lake intimately and during those twenty years that same fragment of boat had been there in exactly the same position, even the rusted iron ring on the bow-thwart unturned by an idle hand.

In a happier mood the cove would have seemed inexpressibly dreary; but to-day Alice Paraday found it strangely consoling. There was about it a melancholy, decadent beauty that she found exquisite, although at the same time it seemed impelling her almost to tears. She realized with something like alarm how often other things had, of late, aroused in her that same sense of exquisite sadness—tea roses, for instance, and odd bits of garden wall, the old steel engravings in her father's library and, just the other day, a crude, fallen sundial on an old Civil War estate from which even the house had long disappeared.

In moods like that in which Alice Paraday was allowing herself to indulge—baths of self-pity they might unfairly be called—time, like everything else, becomes dulled and loses proportion. Although it had seemed an indefinite interval, it had been only a minute that she had been standing over the cove, watching its black and mirrorlike surface, when she saw that she was not there alone. Under a tree, on the one bit of healthy turf which the shore afforded, a young man in tweed knickerbockers was sitting, his knees hugged tight to his chin, his hands clasped around his ankles, his eyes fixed as mournfully as hers had been on the water before him.

The young man was entirely unconscious of her presence, and for a moment Alice watched him with a grim, almost malicious amusement. No matter how much we may treasure our own moods and postures, the same moods and postures in others always seemed slightly ridiculous and there could be no question that the black, still surface of the drear little cove was affecting the young man under the tree as it had affected Alice. Possibly he had sought it out under much the same impulse.

IT WOULD have been difficult now for Alice to have escaped unseen, and, indeed, she had no inclination to do so. Although they never admit it, both women and men who, like Alice Paraday, have formed the habit of taking long walks in solitude, are always alert for the single other figure in the landscape, and in her present mood Alice Paraday was near enough to self-realization to admit, at least, that she was cheered rather than annoyed at this chance encounter. She stood for a moment watching the figure under the tree, then continued casually along the path on the shore, partly because she had been going that way, anyway, partly because that interminable silence must be broken sooner or later.

At her first step the young man glanced around, looked again quickly, then leaped to his feet. Alice knew him perfectly well. At least she knew him as one of two or three men of his age whom she had been meeting casually at the larger dinner dances all summer—big, blond, criminally handsome youths, all more or less alike and all either undergraduates or in that last free summer which lay between college and business life. Half a dozen of his kind had been tumbling all over town since the last of June, converting the docile runabouts of their debutante hostesses into racing cars, introducing new and peculiarly inane steps at the country-club dances and winning the biweekly tennis tournaments with calm and condescending regularity. She had an impression that this particular youth had been quite a tremendous person at either Yale or Princeton—captain of the crew, or it might have been of the football team. At any rate, she knew that he was visiting either the Pembers or the Montgomerys and that his name was either Blackford or Manwaring.

A welcoming, boyish smile broke over his face as he straightened and clicked his heels in the attitude which the war had made the fashionable mannerism for his particular college generation. "Good afternoon, Miss Paraday," he greeted her and apparently with real enthusiasm.

His huge tweed figure was blocking the path entirely, and Alice could do nothing but halt, even had she had any inclination to do otherwise, but she was obliged to answer his greeting with a smile and a word which betrayed its own indefiniteness.

The undergraduate hero saw it and laughed. "This is not a case of highway robbery," he explained. "I danced with you Monday night at the club, but I know that you haven't the slightest idea who I am."

"Nonsense!" answered Alice. "I remember you perfectly." She took a long shot. "You are Mr. Blackford."

An expression of actual pain flashed over the young man's face. "No," he replied. "My name is Manwaring."

His expression had not been lost on Alice. "Have I said something dreadful?" she demanded.

"Oh, no, indeed," he defended hollowly; "Blackford is a corking chap."

From his tone Alice knew that, in reality, Blackford must be a peculiarly miserable article. Now that she thought of it she did remember that she had been hearing, absently, all summer, that one of the Pembers' guests had been voted by all of the debutantes, except one or two who "fell for" his English accent and his family connections in New York City, to be the most insufferable ass who had ever come to the Berkshires; but, until this moment, she had not had even the interest to remember whether it was Blackford or Manwaring.

HEAVENS, but she must be getting ancient! To go through a whole gay summer confusing the simpering ass of the season with the adored and heroic captain of the—was it Yale or Princeton?—crew. And was it crew or football, captain or stroke? She resolved not to make any more such horrible blunders, but the necessity brought her to an awkward silence to which young Manwaring could only reply with a hesitation equally awkward.

"Were you," he began at last, with a vague and hesitant shyness which was singularly attractive in his great bulk, "going somewhere or other?"

Alice laughed outright. "No," she replied, "I was not going anywhere. I was simply walking to get over a vicious set of the blues and to get away from everybody and everything. I hate the whole world to-day."

She fully expected that he would reply with the usual banal suggestion that, in such case, he himself would get out of her horizon; but to her surprise he did nothing of the kind. Instead he replied with a laugh as spontaneous as her own.

"Bully!" he answered. "That's just the way I was feeling myself. That's why I came here. Can't we be miserable together?"

But almost as quickly he seemed to be alarmed by his own burst of naturalness and fled back into the tentative, deferential attitude which seemed to be his usual manner.

"Please don't let me butt in," he pleaded. "If you want to be alone I don't want to bore you."

"Oh, goodness, no!" replied Alice. The boy's shy manner was fascinating when coupled with his tremendous frame, but it was with a sort of contempt for herself that Alice realized that she was preparing to make every endeavor to keep this casual meeting from coming to an end. "After all," she continued, "it was I who intruded. You were here first."

THE boy positively fell over himself to forestall her. "Oh, no, please stay," he begged. He followed his plea with a humorous grimace. "I had just decided that I should make a rotten hermit. I get awfully sick of people at times, but yet I get awfully lonely without them. Do you ever feel that way?"

"A great many times," replied Alice. "This afternoon, for instance. So I shall try to be very quiet and speak in hushed and religious tones."

"Oh, I didn't mean that!" protested the boy.

Alice's tone again became sensible. "I know you didn't," she said, and at the same moment there crept back over her another of those waves of self-contempt which had assailed her two or three times in those two or three minutes.

It was a curious feeling, to find herself suddenly back ten years—or fifteen—going through all the preliminary steps of a standardized college days' summer flirtation. It was at least

"FORGIVE ME," HE BEGGED. "THIS HAS BEEN HORRIBLE FOR YOU. AND IT MUST BE HOURS PAST YOUR DINNERTIME"

(Continued on Page 40)

I HAVE seen the improbable turn true too often not to have it disturb me. Suppose these memoirs still exist when the French royalist plot of 1799 and my father's peculiar rôle in it are forgotten. I cannot help but remember it is a restless land across the water. It was my Uncle Jason who was with me when I learned of my father's return to America. For the moment my uncle seemed to have forgotten the affairs of his countinghouse and the inventory of goods from France which a clerk had placed before him. "So he is here," said my Uncle Jason. "And you will see him, Henry?" "Yes," I replied. "She asked me to."

"Your mother—she had asked you?" He sighed. "After all," he went on gently, "he is your father. I am sorry, almost, that he and I have quarreled, for in many ways he was a remarkable man who might have gone far, except for his failing. Do not be too hard on him, Henry," he said as I departed.

It was ten years since I had seen my father. We had lived then in a great house with lawns that ran down to the river where our ships pulled at their moorings. My father and I had left the house together, I for school, and my father—I have never learned where he went. It was a morning early in autumn now when I was to see him again.

THE wind was fresh off the sea, making the pounding of the surf on the beach seem very near as I urged my horse from the neat, quiet streets of the town up the rutted lane that led to the Shelton house. The shrubbery my grandfather had brought from England was more wild and disordered than when I had seen it last. The weeds had choked the formal garden that once grew before the front door. And the house—I had often pictured that house in my memory, with its great arched doorway, its small-paned windows and its gambrel roof. Once it had seemed to me a massive and majestic structure. Now those ten years had made it shrink to a lonely, crumbling building that overlooked the harbor mouth.

I knew I was being watched, yet I saw nothing until I was nearly at our door. From the overgrown lilacs that flanked the granite-stone doorstep something was glinting in the sun, and then I saw a face peering at me from between the twigs, a face of light mahogany with thick lips. It was Brutus, my father's half-caste negro-Indian servant.

Saturnine as ever, he glided out into the path in front of me, thrusting something back into the sash around his waist, moved towards me and took my horse's head. His teeth shone when I spoke to him, but he said never a word in return to my greeting. Nevertheless, he was glad to see me. He grasped my shoulder as I dismounted and shook me gently from side to side. And then I noticed for the first time the livid welt of a cut across his cheek.

"What do you mean, hiding in those bushes?" I asked him roughly.

"AH, MADEMOISELLE," HE SAID SWIFTLY IN THE FRENCH TONGUE, "STAY WHERE YOU ARE A MOMENT. FOR AS YOU STAND THERE IN THE SHADOWS YOU EPITOMIZE THE WHOLE HOUSE OF BLANZY, ITS GRACE, ITS PRIDE, ITS BEAUTY"

"Always must see who is coming," said Brutus. "Monsieur may not want to see who is coming, you understand?"

"No," I said, "I don't understand."

"Then you go home—now," he said. "Monsieur very angry. Something happen, you understand?"

"He is in the house?" I asked. Brutus nodded. "Then take this horse," I said, and swung open the front door.

A DRAFT eddied through the broad old hallway as I stepped over the threshold, and there was a smell of wood smoke that told me the chimneys were still cold from disuse. The long, brown rows of books still lined the walls of the morning room. The long mahogany table in the center was still littered with maps and papers. There were the same rusted muskets and small swords in the rack by the fireplace, and in front of the fire in a high-backed armchair my father was sitting.

I paused. Somehow I had pictured a different meeting and a different man. He must surely have heard my step, but he never so much as raised his head. He still rested, leaning indolently back, watching the flames dance up the chimney. He was dressed in gray-satin small clothes that went well with his slender figure. His wig was fresh powdered and his throat and wrists were framed in spotless lace.

I MUST have stood for twenty seconds watching him before he turned and faced me. He knew as well as I there was no reason why I should be glad to see him. Yet he showed never a trace of uncertainty. His lips were drawn in the same supercilious upward curve that gave him the expression I most often remembered. "So you are here," he remarked; "and why did you come? I told you in my letter there was no need unless you wished."

"I think, sir," I answered, "I came from a sense of curiosity." Almost as soon as I had spoken I was sorry, for some sixth sense told me I had hurt him.

With a lithe, effortless grace he rose from his chair and faced me with a smile half amused, half tolerant. "I should have known you would be frank," he said. "Your letter, my son, refusing to accept my remittances should have taught me as much. Perhaps it would interest you to know why I have returned to these rather rigorous and uncongenial surroundings. Can you believe it? It is largely on your account that I consented to revisit these familiar scenes."

"No," I said, "I cannot, sir, since you ask me." My father shrugged his shoulders. "Far be it from me to overstrain your credulity, my son," he observed blandly. "Let us admit then there was also some slight factor of expediency. It happened that I was in a French port, and that while there I should think of you. And what should be there also but the Eclipse, ready to sail for home. Quite

The Unspeakable Gentleman

By

J. P. MARQUAND

Illustrations by Arthur I. Keller

suddenly I determined to sail her back. "I, too, was curious, my son; curious to know whether you were a man like me or one of whom I might have reason to be proud."

His last words drifted gently away, and in their wake followed an awkward silence. The vines were beating against the window panes behind me. But it was no sound, only some instinct that made me whirl suddenly around to look behind me.

There was Brutus, not two feet from my back, with my father's cloak over his right arm, and my father's sword in his great fist.

"Do not disturb yourself, Brutus," said my father. "We are both gentlemen, more or less, and will not come to blows. My cloak, Brutus. I am sorry, my son, that we must wait till later in the day to exchange ideas. Even here in America affairs seem to follow me. Will you content yourself till evening?" When his dark cloak was adjusted to his shoulders he tapped his sword hilt. "Brutus," he said slowly, "I shall take my pistols also."

"Your pistols!" I echoed. "You have forgotten you are back in America."

HE FAVORED me with a serene, incurious glance. "On the contrary," he said, "I am just beginning to remember." And so without further words he left me.

I followed him through our rear doorway, out onto the crumbling bricks of our terrace, and watched him walk down the path with its border of elm trees to his warehouses, where a half dozen men had already started work.

The river was dark blue under a cloudless sky. The sunlight was playing in restless sparkles where the wind ruffled the water. Out near the channel I could see the Eclipse riding at anchor, her decks littered with bales and gear, and the Sun Maid and the Sea Tern, trim and neat and down deep in the water as though ready to put to sea.

From the terrace where I was standing I could see the other wharves along the water front, and the church spires and roofs of the town reared among the trees that lined the busy streets. Toward the sand dunes the marshes stretched away in russet gold into the autumn haze. I looked at the Eclipse again. Some freak of wind and tide was making her twist at her anchor, and for a moment the sun struck clean on her broadside. A gaping hole between decks had connected two of her ports in a jagged rent.

It was not surprising. My father's ships were often fired on at sea. Nor was it strange that Brutus had a half-healed scar on his cheek. But why had my father gone armed to his own wharf?

II

I RODE through the town that afternoon. We were proud of it; the houses were elegant and substantial, the streets broad and even, the walks paved with brick. There was not a finer tavern than ours to the north of Boston; I recall that afternoon that they were building a new L to it. Tradespeople were busy about their shops. Coaches newly painted and drawn by well-matched horses rolled by me.

I thought I could ride by as a stranger might. But I was mistaken. It seemed to me that there was no one too busy to stop and look, to turn and whisper a word to someone else. They had learned already that I was my father's son. I could feel a hot flame of anger burning my cheeks, the old, stinging passion of resentment I had felt so often when my father's name was mentioned. They knew me. Their look alone told that, but never a nod or smile of greeting marked my return.

I found Ned Aiken, as I knew I should with the Eclipse in harbor, seated on his doorstep by the river road as though he had always been planted in that very place. He took his pipe from his mouth and gazed at me steadily, like some steer stopped from grazing. Then his face relaxed into a grim smile. "You've changed since last I saw you," he said; "changed remarkable. Why, right now I thought you might be someone else."

Had Brutus also been laboring under the same delusion? I seated myself beside him. "You mistook me for someone?" I asked.

"YES," said Mr. Aiken. "You've been shootin' up, you have, since I set eyes on you." Then he gave way to a hoarse chuckle. "Why, boy, we've all been doing some shootin'—you, your dad, and me too—since we seen you last; you shootin', me shootin', he shootin'."

"You weren't shooting at anybody?" I asked with casual innocence. "And why shouldn't we be, I want to know?" he demanded; but his tongue showed no signs of slipping, his glance had resumed its old stolid watchfulness. "But we wasn't shootin' at anybody; not at anybody, just at selected folks, folks who didn't mind their own business." He had lapsed into a good-natured, reminiscent mood and seemed to have forgotten that I was there. "I wish it had been on deck," he remarked, "instead of a place with gold chairs, and gold on the ceiling, and cloth on the walls, and candles in gold sticks, and the floor like a sheet of ice. I'd sooner slip on blood than on a floor like that. I wonder why those frog eaters don't make their houses snug and decent instead of big as a church."

"Well, you see," I started to say, "in France —"

Mr. Aiken dropped his pipe. "Who said anything about France?" he demanded.

"And did you not?" I asked. "Surely you were speaking just now about a château, the scene of some pleasant adventure. Pray don't let me interrupt you."

A bead of perspiration rolled down Mr. Aiken's brow, and he sat silent for a minute. "What am I here ashore and sober for?" he asked finally. "So I won't talk, that's why; and I won't talk, so there's the end of it."

THE PICTURE HAD CHANGED. MR. LAWTON WAS LEANING ACROSS THE TABLE, LEVELING A PISTOL AT MY FATHER'S HEAD

He sat watching me, and the gap between us seemed to widen. Presently I rose and left him.

The dusk was beginning to gather when I rode home, the heavy, purple dusk of autumn, full of the crisp smell of dead leaves and the low-hanging wood smoke from the chimneys.

My father was reading beside a briskly burning fire. Closing his book on his forefinger, he waved me to a chair beside him. "My son," he said, "they mix better than you think, Voltaire and gunpowder. I learned it long ago—a little difference of opinion and the pages of the great philosopher —" He raised his arm and glanced at it critically. "Words well placed—is it not wonderful, their steady effect, the deadly accuracy which their logic seems to impart to the hand and eye? A man can be dangerous indeed with twenty pages of Voltaire behind him." He took a pinch of snuff and leaned forward to tap me gently on the knee. "I have read all the works of Voltaire, Henry; read them many times."

Unbidden, a picture of him came before me in a room with gilt chairs and candelabra whose glass pendants sparkled in the mild yellow light, with a smell of powder mingling strangely with the scent of flowers.

"But why," he concluded, "should I be more explicit than Mr. Aiken? To fear nothing, say nothing"; and he waved his hand.

"Why, indeed, be more explicit?" I rejoined. "Your sudden interest is quite enough to leave me overcome, sir, when, after years of neglect, you see to it that I ride out safely of an afternoon."

HE TAPPED his snuffbox thoughtfully. "Coincidence again, Henry; that is all. How was I to know you would be outside Ned Aiken's house while I was within?"

"And how should I know that paternal care would prompt you to remain within while I was without?"

For a second it seemed to me that my father was going to laugh. Then Brutus appeared in the doorway.

"My son," my father said as I followed him to supper, "positively you improve upon acquaintance."

I had remembered him as a man who disliked talk. I had often seen him sit for hours without a word, looking at nothing in particular with expressionless serenity. But this evening the day's activities appeared to have made his social instincts vividly assertive. As we sat at a small round table beside the dining-room fireplace he launched into a cheerful discourse, glancing blandly about the great room with its dingy wainscot only half lighted by the candles on the table.

I noticed at once what many had been at pains to mention to me before—that my father was not a temperate man. He soon had finished a bottle, only to gesture Brutus to uncork a second. And all the while he regaled me with anecdotes of the gaming table and the vices of a dozen seaports. Politely detached, he discoursed of love and murder, gambling and chicanery, drawing on the seemingly exhaustless background of his own experience for illustration.

He seemed to have known the worst men from all the ends of the earth.

He seemed to have been in every discreditable undertaking that came to his notice.

"SOME men talk of fortune at cards, good luck or bad," he remarked, "but as for me, I can tell how the luck will run by—but doubtless mutual friends have already hinted to you of my propensities at cards—and other things?"

Was it the gentle inflection of the question or his intent glance that made me feel, as I had felt before that day, that I was face to face with an alert antagonist? "Your card playing is still remembered, sir," I told him. "I heard of it two months back."

"Indeed!" was his comment. "Another proof of the veracity of my man of business. Two months ago, at a certain little gathering, someone whose name I have yet to discover informed you of certain bad habits I had contracted in games of chance. Am I mistaken in believing you made some apt retort?"

"Sir," I said, "I told him he lied."

"Ha! And am I right in recalling that you allowed yourself the liberty of punctuating that comment?"

"You have been well informed, sir," I answered. "I struck him in the face."

HE WAVED a hand to me in a pleasant gesture of acknowledgment. "Doubtless your impulsive action led to the conventional result?"

"Excuse me, sir," I retorted, "if I say the result was more natural than your action upon a greater provocation."

"Has it ever occurred to you, my son, that perhaps my self-control was greater also? But go on with our adventure."

"As you will, sir," I said. "We all make our mistakes."

He raised his eyebrows. "Our mistakes? Was I not right in believing you had a competent instructor? Surely you have agility and courage? Why a mistake, my son?"

"The mistake," I replied, "was in believing he told an untruth."

"Indeed?" said my father. "Do you not consider your mistake quite inexcusable in view of the other things you have doubtless heard? Surely there is more about me. Surely you have heard—the rest?"

"Yes," I said, "I have heard it."

"So," he exclaimed cheerfully, "my reputation still continues. And did the same young man—I presume he was young—enlighten you about this, the most fatal parental weakness?"

"No," I said, "I learned of it later."

He raised his hand and began gently stroking his coat lapel, his fingers quickly crossing it in a vain search for some imaginary wrinkle. "And might I ask who told you?" he inquired.

"Your brother-in-law," I replied; "my uncle Jason."

"Heavens!" cried my father, "but I grow careless." He was looking ruefully at his lapel. Somehow the threads had given way, and there was a rent in the gray satin. "Another coat ruined," he observed. "One coat torn in the brambles, and one with a knife, and now—but your uncle was quite right in telling you. Indeed, I should have done the same myself."

"I told him I did not believe it," I ventured; but the appeal in my voice passed him quite unnoticed.

"Indeed?" he said. "Brutus, put an extra blanket on my bed; I fancy the night air is biting."

I pushed back my chair. "And now," I said, "you will excuse me if I take my leave." I rose and stood before him with no particular effort to hide my anger and contempt.

But apparently I had ceased to be of interest. He was sitting just as I had first seen him that morning, staring into the embers of the fire.

Stepping across the room I had placed my hand on the latch, when I heard a stealthy footstep behind me. Brutus was at my elbow. I turned to see my father facing me, his whole body poised and alert as though ready to spring through the space that separated us.

"No doubt," he said, "you are leaving this house because you cannot bear to stay under the same roof with a man of my stamp and accomplishments. Come, is that the reason?"

"Only partly," I answered. "What right have I to be particular, now that I have found out my inheritance? Why should I pick my company? I am leaving to apologize to the man I fought with because he called you a cheat—and to my uncle for doubting his word."

MY FATHER'S fist came down on the table with a crash. "Then, by heaven," he shouted, "you'll not take a single step until you've learned two things! Stand where you are and listen. Shun my example. Shudder at the life I have led. Call me dissolute. Say that in every way I'm unfit to be your father. I will agree with you. Let us only set two limits, and do not call them virtues. They are necessities in the life I lead, nothing more. They —"

The sound of the knocker on the front door broke into my father's speech. He shrugged his shoulders and settled himself back in his chair.

"My son," he sighed, "allow me to point out the misfortune of being a man of affairs. Brutus, the two gentlemen about whom I was speaking—show them in at once."

"Where are you, Shelton?" came a sharp, authoritative voice from the hallway. "Confound this dark passage!"

A moment later two gentlemen entered. The taller, with out bothering to remove his hat, strode over to my father's chair. The other stood undecided near the threshold. Without rising, my father gave first one and then the other the impartial, casual glance of the disinterested observer.

"This," he remarked politely, "comes near being unexpected. I had heard you had come to town, but I fear your visitation finds me singularly unprepared to do the duties of a host. You found the passage dark? Ah, Lawton, if it will be dark still where you are going."

"That's enough, Shelton," interrupted the first gentleman. "He didn't come here to hear you talk."

MY FATHER waved his hand negligently. "The same forful character," observed gently the same bland candor. My father this is Mr. Lawton, an old—he will pardon if I do not add a valued acquaintance."

For a moment Mr. Lawton's pale eyes looked sharply into mine and I bowed him ironical. "Mr. Lawton, I have met before," I said. "Indeed?"

our friend in

(Continued on Page 96)

AND THEN, FOR AN INSTANT, MY FATHER'S ICY PLACIDITY LEFT HIM. HIS LIPS LEAPT BACK FROM HIS TEETH. HIS SMALL SWORD MADE AN ARC OF LIGHT THROUGH THE YARD OF SPACE THAT PARTED THEM. "SO YOU WILL HAVE IT, WILL YOU? TAKE IT, THEN," HE ROARED

Bannertail

The Story of a Gray Squirrel

By ERNEST THOMPSON SETON

Decorations by Charles Livingston Bull did, the old cat would surely get, kill and eat the orphan squirrel.

Then he yielded to a sudden impulse and said "Here it is; eat it now." He dropped the little stranger into the nest beside the kitten.

The cat turned toward it, smelled it suspiciously once or twice, then licked its back, picked it up in her mouth and tucked it under her arm, where half an hour later the boy found it taking its dinner alongside its new-found foster brother, while the motherly old cat leaned back with chin in air and half-closed eyes, purring the happy contented purr of mother pride. The future of the foundling was assured.

Little Graycoat developed much faster than his kitten foster brother. The spirit of play was rampant in him; he would scramble up his mother's leg a score of times a day, clinging on with teeth, arms and claws, then mount her back and frisk along to climb her upright tail; and when his weight was too much, down the tail would droop, and he would go merrily sliding off the tip to rush to her legs and climb and toboggan off again. The kitten never learned the trick. But it seemed to amuse the cat almost as much as it did the squirrel, and she showed an amazing partiality for the lively, long-tailed foundling. So did others of importance, men and women folk of the farmhouse, and neighbors, too; and the frisky Graycoat grew up amid experiences foreign to his tastes, and of a kind unknown to his race.

The kitten, too, grew strong, and in midsummer was carried off to a distant farmhouse to be "their cat."

Now the squirrel was over half grown, and his tail was broadening out into a great banner of buff with silver tips. His life was with the old cat; his food was partly from her dish. But many things there were to eat that delighted him and that pleased her not. There was corn in the barn and chicken feed in the yard and fruit in the garden. Well fed and protected, he grew big and handsome, bigger and handsomer than his wild brothers, so the house folk said; but of that he knew nothing; he had never seen his own people. The memory of his mother had faded out. So far as he knew, he was only a bushy-tailed cat. But inside was an inheritance of instincts as well as of blood and bone that would surely take control and send him herding, if they happened near, with those and those alone of the rippling silver tails.

IN THE hunting moon it came, just when the corn begins to turn, and in the dawn, when Bannertail Graycoat was yielding to the thrill that comes with action, youth and life in dewtime.

There was a growing, murmuring sound, then smoke from the barn, like that he had seen from the red mystery in the cookhouse. But this grew very fast, and men came running; horses, frantically plunging, hurried out; and other living things and doings that he did not understand.

Then, when the sun was high, a blackened, smoking pile there was where once stood the dear old barn; and a new strange feeling over all. The old cat disappeared. A few days more and the house folk, too, were gone. The place was deserted, himself a wildwood roving squirrel, quite alone, without a trace of squirrel training such as example of the old ones gives, unequipped, unaccompanied, unprepared for the life fight, except that he had a perfect body, and in his soul enthroned the many deep and dominating instincts of his race.

The break was made complete by the red horror and the going of the man people. Fences and buildings are good for some things; but the tall timber of the distant wooded hill was calling to him and, though he came back many a time to the garden while there yet was fruit and to the field

IT WAS a rugged old tree, standing sturdy and big among the slender second growth. The woodmen had spared it because it was too gnarled and difficult for them to handle. But the woodpecker, and the host of wood folk that look to the woodpecker for lodgings, had marked and used it for many years. Its every cranny and bore hole was inhabited by some quaint elfin of the woods; the biggest hollow of all, just below the first limb, had done duty for two families of the flickers who first made it, and now was the homing hole of a mother gray squirrel.

She appeared to have no mate; at least none was seen. No doubt the outlaw gunners could have told a tale, had they cared to admit that they went gunning in springtime; and now the widow was doing the best she could by her family in the big gnarled tree. All went well for a while; then one day, in haste maybe, she broke an old rule in squirreldom—that is, she climbed her nesting tree openly, instead of going up its neighbor, and then crossing to the top by way of the overhead branches.

The farm boy who saw it gave a little yelp of savage triumph; his cave-man nature broke out. Clubs and stones were lying near, the whirling end of a stick picked off the other squirrel as she tried to escape with a little one in her mouth.

Had he killed two dangerous enemies, the boy could not have yelled louder. Then up the tree he climbed to find in the nest two living young ones. With these in his pocket he descended. When on the ground he found that one was dead, crushed in the climbing down.

Thus, only one little squirrel was left alive, only one of the family that he had seen, the harmless mother and two helpless, harmless little ones dead in his hands.

Why? What good did it do him to destroy all this beautiful wild life? He did not know. He did not think of it at all. He had yielded only to the wild ancestral instinct to kill when came a chance to kill wild creatures; for we must remember that when that instinct was implanted, wild animals were either terrible enemies or food that must be got at any price.

The excitement over, the boy looked at the helpless quivering thing in his hand, and a surge of remorse came on him. He could not feed it; it must die of hunger. He wished that he knew of some other nest into which he might put it. He drifted back to the barn. The mew of a young kitten caught his ear. He went to the manger. Here was the old cat with the one kitten that had been left her of her brood two days back. Remembrance of many field mice, chipmunks and some squirrels killed by that old green-eyed mistress struck a painful note. Yes! No matter what he

(Continued on Page 157)

SANDY WAS PLEASANTLY FRIENDLY—IT WAS ONLY WITH YOUNG MEN TO BE CONSIDERED AS POSSIBLE SUITORS THAT SHE WAS STIFF AND BRUSQUE

THIS is a story about a woman, told by a woman, for other women. The average man would not understand it, nor believe it if he did. But every woman who can still remember how she felt back in the days before she had ever had a sweetheart, will know that it is true, this story of Sandy, and Philip Morrow—and Webb Collins.

Sandy was in love with Webb Collins in spite of the fact that she had known him all her life. Sometimes she believed she had been in love with him all her life—that there never had been a time when she had not been hiding this secret. It had had to be a secret, of course, because Webb was not in the least in love with Sandy.

The other girls of Dawson used to speculate occasionally on the fact that Sandy had never had a real sweetheart. Sandy was nineteen and most of the others had been pairing and re-pairing ever since they were twelve.

"Sandy isn't bad looking," they would declare, "in spite of her hair."

"She'd look better," one more critical would suggest, "if she stood straighter. She's so tall it's conspicuous the way she stoops a little."

"Sandy Miller never has cared anything about boys or men," a third would settle the question. "That is the real trouble. Her brother used to bring his friends home specially for Sandy and she would go to bed right after dinner to get out of seeing them. Her mother never can get her to go to the dancing club with Keith." Keith was Sandy's brother.

"She doesn't care anything about her clothes, either—she'll go around all day in that old gray sweater. It's a shame, because she could get herself up to look all right if she really tried—except, of course, her hair."

"Sandy's a peach, though." Somebody always finished this sort of discussion with some such remark.

IF SANDY had cried when she had been a little girl and the boys had teased her with "Carrots" and "Bricktop," if now she had blushed and been silent and dropped her eyes bashfully, the other girls might have realized that she was shy and proud. But because in B-Third days she had laughed the loudest of anybody when Webb Collins would wet his finger and hold it near her hair with a hissing "Sssst!" to indicate intense heat, because now she went scornfully to bed in the very teeth of proffered callers, nobody guessed the truth.

At twelve or so, when the other little girls of Dawson had begun to take to ruffles and little boys and beg to have their skirts down and their hair up, Sandy was still a red-headed, freckle-faced, leggy little tomboy. One by one the other little girls fell away from her earnest invitations to "C'mon out and play 'Run, sheep, run!'" in favor of dancing class, fudge parties, giggling experiments with beaus. So Sandy was left to play with the younger boys, who hootingly echoed her contempt for this new game of pairing off.

This had lasted for a year. Then, late one Saturday afternoon, something mysterious had happened to Sandy.

She was coming down Main Street with three of her young cohorts. They had been playing throw-the-bye in Sammy Witherspoon's yard. Sandy was hoarse from prolonged shouting "Bye's out!" her gingham dress had ripped at the hem and sagged rakishly at one side, her hands were dirty and her straight red hair straggled down over her nose too clean, freckled face. The first tang of autumn was in the air, Sandy was hungry and thirsty and tired and well at peace with the world.

"Hi, Sandy, take a look!" Tommy Owens jeered.

Sandy obediently looked down the street. Coming toward her were Webb Collins and Maisie Waterman. Webb was wearing his first long trousers and had seemed to change instantly to a young man. Under Maisie's coat Sandy could see the bottom of her dark blue knife-pleated satin skirt. Under Maisie's drooping black hat a few soft golden curling tendrils blew against her plump, pretty, pink-and-white face. Maisie ignored the three boys.

"Hello, Sandy," she said. But her tone, while polite, was distant, restrained.

"Hey, get onto his father's pants!"

"Look at Webby all dressed up like a horse and buggy!"

"Aw, Webby—going with a girl—going with a girl!"

Sandy's three cohorts rose shrilly to the attack. Then it was that the mysterious change came to Sandy. A moment before, the jeering shouts of her young companions would have seemed wit in its highest form. Suddenly she was ashamed of them, ashamed of herself. She looked down at her dirty hands, the ripped hem in her skirt. She felt herself growing hot under the freckles, tears of embarrassment came smartingly to her eyes.

THE very next Saturday, in a white dress, her freckled face scrubbed clean and shining, her hair brushed slickly back, Sandy began dancing school. Then it was that her real humiliation began. All the other girls already knew how to dance; they had been learning while Sandy had been playing prisoner's base with their little brothers. They obeyed the teacher languidly when she called for a long line of the girls to learn the steps, and followed her instructions with the amused tolerance of pupils who realize that their teacher can show them nothing that they do not already know.

Sandy went at it conscientiously and did very well while she was in the line. But when the teacher broke the line and said, "Boys, choose partners," no boy chose Sandy.

At first this fact caused Sandy no embarrassment; there were not quite boys enough to go around, that was all this meant. But as she sat down on one of the stiff little chairs along the wall to look on and watched the prim, accordion-pleated or ruffy girls dance past, each with a boy in long trousers, the inexplicable sense of mortification came creeping back. She did not understand why, but she felt with the first flash of some strange feminine instinct that there was something disgraceful about not being chosen.

Sandy played the game then exactly as she had when the little boys had called her "Fiery" and "Redtop." She pretended that she did not care. It was harder, though, to pretend this sitting all alone on one side of the dancing-class room. She bent over to fix the button on her slipper; she became much engrossed with the machine carving on the chair next her. And she wished earnestly, bitterly, that she had never come to dancing class.

Suddenly Webb Collins came in, late. He glanced at the little groups of girls across the hall, supported at least by the strength of numbers, then at Sandy, alone, forlorn, on the long line of chairs.

"May I have the pleasure?" he mumbled in the approved dancing-school phrase.

Crimsoning under her freckles, Sandy rose. She knew that Webb had asked her because he had felt sorry for her—that was the crowning thorn of her humiliation that Webb should have found her in it, for almost overnight, in the most mysterious way in the world, Webb had become the one person before whom Sandy longed to shine.

AFTER that one terrible afternoon, declaring scornfully that dancing class was just for "sissies," Sandy had persuaded her mother to send her to gymnasium instead. In the interest of wands and dumbbells and wild gymnasium games, she tried to put dancing class and all it stood for out of her mind. But try as she would, she could not escape the feeling that, as a girl, she had been tried and found wanting. And that Webb Collins knew it.

From that time on Sandy's social position in Dawson had been established. In a large city social position is always subject to change; the shifting of sets, the continual meeting of new people keep it from becoming constant. In a town the size of Dawson a girl's position may be established when she is fourteen and remain practically unchanged until she is forty.

That was what seemed likely to happen to Sandy. She was "the homely little, red-headed, freckle-faced Miller girl," she could not dance and she did not like boys. The public opinion had been adopted during the few months just after she had retreated from dancing class, and it remained unchanged year after year. Sandy learned to dance—by mother at last persuaded her to take private lessons—her freckles faded practically away, she grew fast and slimly, that she was no longer even little. If she had not stooped slightly in a vain attempt to conceal her tallness, in a completely new set Sandy might even have passed for good looking. But Dawson had had her pegged too long.

So Sandy, shy, sensitive, proud, tried to live up to the most monstrous deceit of all, in the town's opinion. She pretended that she did not like boys. When Keith, prodded by his worried mother, would bring young men home to dinner, Sandy, feeling shamedly that they must see through her mother's subtlety as clearly as she did, would plead a headache—Sandy was as healthy as an English sparrow—and go to bed.

Sometimes Webb was one of these. At such times Sandy's scornful indifference was most pronounced of all. Once or twice he had extended some invitation to her. Sandy had not been quite equal to refusing these, but she hid her self-conscious eagerness under a manner more casual, more boyishly bluff than her own brother's.

"I wonder if Webb and Maisie Waterman are engaged; he's there a lot," Leona Chadwick once suggested.

"I shouldn't wonder," Sandy answered carelessly—so carelessly that Leona, concluding that the subject had not proved interesting, changed it.

But Sandy felt as though the whole world had suddenly become gay and dazzling when Maisie announced her engagement to a man she had met in New York. Sandy was consciously silent when the other girls discussed the popular topic, and she sternly told herself that it made no difference to her whether Webb Collins was engaged or not. This was a sensible stand to take, for of course it was quite true. Beyond the most casual friendliness, Webb never thought of Sandy Miller at all.

This was the way things stood when Sandy was nineteen. And, barring a miracle, they might have stayed right there till she was ninety, an ancient spinster, to give a penny or a peppermint to Webb's great-grandchildren. But a miracle happened. That spring Sandy met Philip Morrow.

HE HAD come from New York to be his brother's best man at Maisie's wedding. Sandy was not to be in the wedding party. Mrs. Waterman had suggested having her for maid of honor or at least one of the six bridesmaids.

"She's one of your best friends, and has been ever since you were two years old," Maisie's mother urged.

But Maisie had decided against it. "Oh, there'll be parties and dances and everything," she objected, "and it would be awfully awkward to have a girl who couldn't look out for herself in the way of partners, and so on. I've got enough on my hands being the bride. I can't take on a wallflower, even if it's Sandy Miller. Besides, she'd probably put rehearsal to play golf with her father or show up at the bridal dinner in that old gray sweater."

If Sandy's feelings were hurt, nobody knew it. She initiated three towels for Maisie's hope chest and offered to find trailing arbutus to use on the boxes of wedding cake. Two weeks before the important day she drove the family car out into the back country to her favorite wildflower hunting ground. She wanted to make sure that there could be plenty of the arbutus to gather when the time came. She was driving home, bareheaded in the early spring sunshine, when she first saw Philip Morrow.

He was walking along Schoolkill Road, carrying a heavy traveling bag, and hailed Sandy's car to ask if this was the way to Dawson.

"Yes," said Sandy, noticing a hot, tired face and heavy bag. "Can't I give you a lift? I'm going right there."

"You can, and earn my undying gratitude," he said, putting his bag in the tonneau and climbing up on the front seat beside Sandy.

Sandy was pleasantly friendly; it was only with young men to be considered as possible suitors that she was stiff and brusque. This distinguished-looking man was a stranger, doubtless married, evidently over thirty. Sandy could be natural with him.

YOU got off the train at Dawson Junction, thinking it was the same as Dawson and that the town must be on the other side of the track, didn't it?" she asked.

"I did, even the thinking," said the stranger. "You're clairvoyant."

Sandy laughed. "Not at all. I'm experienced. You're not the first weary traveler I've picked up. People are always stopping off at the Junction by mistake. There isn't even a blackboard to rent there, so the stranded just have to set out their foot."

They drove along for a few minutes in silence. The stranger made some polite remark about the country; the great patches of snow still in the sheltered hollows.

"Isn't it funny," Sandy answered, "how it still looks almost like winter and yet just smelling the air you can tell it's really spring?"

The man did not answer, and after a moment Sandy glanced over at him. It was a quick side glance and it caught him unawares. He was looking at her. He looked away hastily, making some conventional reply. But Sandy's brief glimpse had been enough. She had seen the stranger's look.

It was a look that every woman recognizes, even when, like Sandy, she sees it for the first time. It was interested, admiring, respectful. But there was something more than respect, more even than interest and admiration. In the stranger's look, veiled a bit by convention and courtesy but still vivid in his eyes, was the ancient challenge. It was a look as old as the Garden of Eden. It was the look a young man gives to a young woman.

Almost imperceptibly, quite unconsciously, Sandy slowed the car the merest trifle. It was as though the sweetness of the woods, the fragrance of the damp arbutus, the warmth of the new spring were suddenly flowing in her very veins.

All the rest of the way they talked the merest commonplace, too unimportant to repeat. But floating above the prosaic sentences was excitement, new, romantic, like some high, sweet overtone.

As they drove into Dawson's Main Street, Sandy asked: "Where can I take you?"

"If it isn't out of your way," said the man, "I'm going to Mr. Herbert Waterman's."

"Oh, for the wedding?"

He nodded. Sandy, smiling with a challenge of mock consternation, a coquettish, audacious challenge, said:

"Oh, dear! You aren't the bridegroom, are you?"

"No such luck," said the stranger. "I'm Willis Morrow's brother. I've come to give away the groom."

Sandy smiled, delivered him at Maisie's door, and drove away without having told the stranger her name, drove away in a giddy tingle of strange new exhilaration. Yesterday, the memory of having said "Oh, dear! You aren't the bridegroom?" would have haunted her with shamed remorse. Even hidden under jest, she would have felt that it was brazen. But then, yesterday she would not have said it at all. She could not understand how she had dared to-day. But she had, and, strangely, it troubled her not a whit.

Two of Maisie's bridesmaids were with the bride-to-be when the bridegroom's brother arrived. As soon as the ordinary courtesies of making acquaintance would permit, Morrow inquired the identity of the "beautiful young lady" who had picked him up along the Schoolkill Road. Neither Maisie nor either of her guests had seen the car arrive.

"What does she look like?" Clarine Bennett demanded.

Morrow hesitated. "She is very striking-looking," he said. "She has the most beautiful hair I have ever seen." Now, Morrow was older than any of Maisie's set, he was distinguished-looking, and he was from New York. Considering these things and knowing Dawson, it is easy to appreciate the weight Dawson would attach to his approval.

"What color is her hair?" Betty Anderson asked.

AGAIN the newcomer hesitated. "I imagine," he admitted, "that technically it would be called red."

"Red!" exclaimed Betty and Clarine together. There was a pause. "Did you say she was striking-looking?"

Morrow said that he did.

"It couldn't be Sandy Miller, could it?" the bride-to-be suggested skeptically.

"She's the only red-haired girl I know who drives a car," said Betty.

"It would hardly be Sandy," Clarine decided.

But by the next evening everybody in gossipy little Dawson knew that it was Sandy. Morrow was formally introduced to her at the big reception Judge Minor and his wife gave for the bride. Some of the young people were staying afterward to dance and Sandy and Keith had been invited.

"You don't want to stay, do you, Sandy?" her mother asked from force of habit. Sandy never did wish to.

She colored a little. "Oh, I might stay for a dance or two," she said lightly.

She danced the first with Keith while Morrow dutifully danced with Maisie. Then he asked Sandy for the next. She had known he would.

"How many others may I have?" he demanded as the music stopped.

"One," said Sandy. "If you want the next. I'm going home after that."

"Oh, I say!"

"Must!" said Sandy with smiling firmness.

At the close of the next dance they paused at the end of the room farthest from the musicians.

"When can I see you again?" Morrow asked.

In his slightly lowered voice was the same quality that had been in his glance the afternoon before. Sandy met his eyes a moment, then looked away across the room. There was something provocative about that look of Sandy's. It couldn't have been done better if it had been practiced for years on one young man after another.

"Are you to be at Mrs. Squire's dinner to-morrow night?" the man persisted.

Sandy shook her head. "That is just for the bridal party," she said.

"Or at the affair out at the club the next night?"

"That is just for the party too."

"Then how am I going to see you?"

SANDY smiled up at him. "I live in the big gray-stone house just beyond the Episcopal church," she said. "If you really want to see me you'll find a way."

Two of Dawson's gossipy old ladies, who had come upstairs to watch the young folks dance, had seen this little byplay.

"If I hadn't known it was Sandy Miller," one said to the

HE WAS STANDING JUST AS SHE HAD LEFT HIM, STARING AFTER HER

(Continued on Page 36)

SITTING ON HIS HAUNCHES AND LIFTING HIS POINTED NOSE TO THE SUMMER SKY, HE GAVE VENT TO A SERIES OF LONG-DRAWN WOLF HOWLS, HORRIBLE TO HEAR

Illustrations by Frank Stick

LONG shadows were stretching lazily athwart the lawn from the gnarled, old, giant trees. Over the whole drowsing world brooded the solemn hush of late summer afternoon. An amber light hung in the sleepy air, touching with gold the fire-blue lake, the circle of lovingly protecting green hills and the emerald slope which billowed up from the water edge to the red-roofed, gray house in its setting of ancient oaks.

On the bare flooring, in the coolest corner of the veranda, two collies lay sprawled. They were fast asleep—which means that they were ready to come back to complete wakefulness at the first untoward sound. For dogs do not awaken as do humans, with manifold yawn and grunt and blinking and a tensing of flaccid muscles and an effort to collect their drugged senses. At one instant dogs are dead asleep; at the next they are broad awake, with every faculty alert.

OF THE two slumbrous collies, one was slenderly graceful of outline, gold and white of hue. She was Lady, an imperious and temperamental wisp of thoroughbred caninity. The second dog had been crowded out of the shadiest spot of the veranda by his mate, so that a part of his burnished mahogany coat was under the direct glare of the afternoon sun. Shimmering orange tints blazed back the reflection of the torrid light. He was Sunnybank Lad, eighty-pound collie, tawny and powerful, with absurdly tiny white forepaws and with a soul looking out from his deepset dark eyes.

For years, now, Lad had ruled at the place, giving worshipfully adoring service to his two gods, the mistress and the master—especially to the mistress—loftily aloof toward mankind in general and protectingly gentle to the little people, such as the smaller collies, the cats, the pigeons, the peacocks and the rest. Fierce foe was he to tramp or other unlicensed intruder on the twenty-five acre lakeside domain which was his to guard and to love. Chum and housemate he was to his two human gods—a dog, alone of all worshippers, having the privilege of looking on the face of his gods and of communing with them without the medium of priest or of prayer.

Lady, only, of the place's bevy of little people, refused from earliest puppyhood to acknowledge Lad's benevolent rulership. She bossed and teased and pestered him unmercifully. And Lad not only let her do all this, but he actually reveled in it. She was his mate. More, she was his idol. This idolizing of one mate, by the way, is far less uncommon among dogs than we mere humans realize.

THE summer afternoon hush was split by the whirring chug of a motor car that turned in from the highroad, two hundred yards beyond the house, and started down through the oak grove along the winding driveway. Immediately, Lady was not only awake but on her feet and in motion. A furry gold-white whirlwind, she flashed off the veranda and tore at top speed up the hill to meet the coming car.

No, it was not the mistress and the master whose approach stirred the fiery little collie to lightning activity. Lad knew the purr of the place's car and he could distinguish it from any other, as far as his sensitive ears could catch its sound. But to Lady all cars were alike and all were signals for wild excitement. Like too many other collies, she had a mania for rushing at any motor vehicle and whizzing along beside it, perilously close to its fast-moving wheels, barking and screaming hysterically and bounding upward at its polished sides.

Nor had punishment and scolding cured her of the trait. She was an addict at car-chasing. She was wholly incurable. There are such dogs. Soon or late, most of them pay high for the habit.

In his early days Lad also had dashed after motors. But a single sharp lecture from the master had taught him that this was one of the direst breaches of the place's simple law. And thenceforth—though he might tremble with eagerness—he stood statue-still when an automobile spun temptingly past him. More; he had cured pup after pup at the place of car-chasing. But Lady he could not cure, though he never gave up the useless attempt.

Down the drive came a delivery truck, driven fast and with none too great skill. Before it had covered half the distance between gate and house, Lady was alongside.

The front wheels grazed her shoulder fur as, deftly, she slipped from in front of the vehicle and sprang up at its tonneau. With a ceaseless fanfare of barks, delirious in her excitement, she circled the car, springing, dodging, wheeling.

The delivery boy checked speed and shouted futile warnings to the insane collie. As he slowed down a bit on the steep grade, Lady hurled herself in front of the machine as though taunting it for cowardice in abating its hot pace on her account.

Again and again had she run, head on, at advancing cars; and it seemed to delight her when such cars slackened speed or swerved in order not to kill her.

Now, as she whizzed backward, her vibrant muzzle a bare six inches from the shiny buffer, one of her flying feet slipped in a mud rut. Her balance gone, she tumbled. A collie down is a collie up, in less than a second. But there was still less than a second's space between the overturned Lady and the car's front wheels.

THE boy slammed on the emergency brake. Through his mind ran the formless thought of his fate at the hands of his employer when he should return to the store with tidings that he had run over and killed a good customer's costly collie, and on the customer's own grounds.

In that single breathless instant a huge mahogany-and-snow shape flashed forward into the path of the machine. Lad, following his mate, had tried to shoulder her aside and to herd her too far back from the drive for any possible return to the danger zone until the car should have passed. More than once, at other times, had he done this. But to-day she had eluded his mighty shoulder and had flung herself back to the assault.

As she fell, she rolled over twice from her own momentum. And each revolution left her directly in front of the skidding wheels. One of them had actually touched her squirming spine, when white teeth gripped her by the scruff of the neck. Those teeth could crush a mutton bone as a child cracks a peanut. But on Lady to-day their power was exerted only to the extent of lifting her, in one swift wrench, clear of the ground and high in air. The mischievous collie flew through space like a lithe mass of golden fluff and came to earth in a heap at the edge of the drive, well clear of the menacing wheels.

WITH Lad it fared otherwise. The great dog had braced himself with all his might for the muscle-wrenching heave. Wherefore he had no chance to spring clear in time to avoid the car. This no doubt he had realized when he sprang to his adored mate's rescue, for Lad's brain was uncanny in its cleverness. That same cleverness, more likely than mere chance, now came to his own aid. The left front wheel struck him and struck him fair. It hit his massive shoulder, dislocating the joint and knocking the eighty-pound dog prone to earth, his ruff within an inch of the wheel. There was no time to gather his feet under him or to coerce the dislocated shoulder into doing its share toward lifting him in a sideways spring that should carry him out of the machine's way. There was but one thing Lad could do, and he did it.

His body in a compact bunch, he rolled midway between the wheels; making the single revolution at a speed the eye could scarce follow, a speed which jerked him from under

(Continued on Page 46)

How We Neglect Our Schools

By CHARLES A. SELDEN

Illustration by Thomas Fogarty

PRESIDENT HARDING impressively declared in a speech at William and Mary College that the United States is facing an educational crisis.

"I wish," he added, "that there might be driven home to the whole American people the conviction of needed concern for our educational necessities."

No such conviction has been driven home yet to the whole American people. It is because in so many parts of the country we have been indifferent about schools and education that there are millions of adult citizens in the nation to-day who can neither read nor write, and many, many more millions who do not have enough interest in such meager education as they may possess to use it for their own benefit or for that of their communities. It is due to this apathy of the ignorant or slightly educated many and to the indifference and lack of conviction of the more fortunate few, far more than to lack of money, that we have so many schools in the United States hardly worthy of the name, so many buildings unsanitary and unsafe, so many teachers who are unfit, so many children who leave school before their training is fairly begun, so few who ever reach high school.

These evil conditions, in which President Harding now finds what he calls a crisis, have long existed. They have measured the extent of our chief national hypocrisy ever since we began to boast to the world of our public-school system as an adequate thing, reaching all the people.

To a comparatively few of them it does not reach at all.

To a comparatively few it is a splendid, almost perfect thing.

To the many it is a mediocre thing, lacking in both quantity and quality. And for these many there is little or nothing in their public-school education that has carrying power beyond school days and that gives them incentive or inspiration to go on with the education of themselves through life.

The United States Government's Educational Commissioner at Washington finds from the official reports and statistics that we are a "sixth-grade nation," meaning that the period at which most of the children of the United States stop going to school is at the end of the sixth year in grammar school—generally a poor grammar school with an untrained teacher. There are two years of the elementary school which these children do not get at all, and high school is unknown to them. It is not likely that after leaving school many of this majority of American children ever take the slightest interest in learning for themselves and by themselves that they might have got in the seventh grade or any grade beyond. On the contrary, they enter into bookless lives of arrested mental development. That is the summing up of the crisis to which President Harding calls attention.

The Menace

NO TALK about the tens of thousands of boys and girls in colleges and universities, about the thousands of free libraries and the flood of books from the presses of many publishers, is no complete answer, because in appraising ourselves educationally a nation it is necessary to consider averages and dead levels and to put the case in terms of millions of children, not thousands.

Small groups of men and women in backward communities, especially in the South, are beginning to ask for surveys and diagnoses of their school conditions as a preliminary to bettering them. But these groups are very small and they have to pull against a tremendous load of indifference, which has grown in neighborhoods that have had nothing for generations to "excite ambition for education," as Abraham Lincoln once said of the community in which he spent his own boyhood.

Three hundred thousand men and women scattered through all the states are enrolled in the Parent-Teacher Associations, and many of them are doing splendid work in building public opinion.

But three hundred thousand constitute a very small group in a population of more than one hundred millions. And these associations do not yet exist in the regions which most need help.

Several years ago ex-Governor Manning, of South Carolina, Clark Howell, of Georgia, Governor Parker, of Louisiana, and other enlightened leaders of the South told me of their crusade to restore the country economically by bringing about a diversification of crops for the purpose of temporarily decreasing the areas devoted to cotton as the only sure way of ridding the plantations of the boll weevil. They were optimistic about it, but last year the boll weevil caused more ruin than ever before. The hope of the leaders for early results is balked by the apathy of the people and their inertia. They prefer taking another chance with loss of crops and economic ruin to exerting themselves to the point of trying something different. Ignorance seems far less of a danger to the uneducated whites and blacks than the weevil. But when I asked Governor McRae, of Arkansas, which he considered the greater menace to the people of his state, the cotton-field pest or illiteracy, he replied without the slightest hesitation, "Illiteracy!"

The members of the Arkansas State School Board talk hopefully of the awakening of an educational consciousness among the people of their state.

Teachers have joined in the crusade and many of them are voluntarily taking training courses at their own expense and on their own time, not primarily that they may receive larger salaries, but that they may render better service as educators.

The town of Conway in Arkansas offers the best evidence in support of the state-school authorities' hope that the public is beginning to wake up. But it required a sensationally bad situation to bring forth that evidence. Last year Conway found itself without any provision whatever for public-school education. Not enough taxation had been provided for by the town officials to pay salaries to teachers or to meet the other expenses of keeping schools open. The community was indifferent. But when it came time for the children to go to school and there were no schools for them to go to, the people became ashamed.

So, unofficially and as volunteers, they set out to remedy a bad situation. They improvised a scheme of self-imposed taxation by getting the local storekeepers to add a 10 per cent charge to all their sales of groceries, dry goods and other household commodities, with the understanding that the extra amounts collected should be turned into a general fund for the payment of teachers. The plan succeeded.

Every man, for example, who bought a ten-cent cigar paid eleven cents for it, and perhaps got added satisfaction from his smoke in the thought that he was contributing a penny to the cause of education.

Neglected, if Free

PERHAPS there is something in the case of Conway which is relevant to the criticism that the public-school system throughout the United States suffers from having too much emphasis put on the fact that it is free. It is free, practically, to the hundreds of thousands of children in rural districts whose parents are so poor that they pay no taxes. And probably not one in a thousand of those who do pay taxes does it with any realization of the fact that he or she is contributing something to keep the schools open. Therefore so far as any deliberate, conscious social effort on the part of the people is involved, public-school education is free. It is something for nothing and seems to be meeting the fate that usually comes to anything that can be had for nothing.

To many homes of the United States the school is something to send children to as soon as possible after they are able to walk and become a nuisance about the house, a place in which the responsibilities of an overworked mother may be shoved off on an underpaid teacher. In these same homes the school is also regarded as a place to take children out of as soon as they are old enough to work, not old enough to work in the eyes of the attendance laws, but old enough in the opinion of uneducated parents.

EVERY MAN WHO BOUGHT A TEN-CENT CIGAR PAID ELEVEN CENTS FOR IT, AND PERHAPS GOT ADDED SATISFACTION FROM HIS SMOKE IN THE THOUGHT THAT HE WAS CONTRIBUTING A PENNY TO THE CAUSE OF EDUCATION

(Continued on Page 50)

Digitized by Google

WE SWELTERED AND ALMOST SUFFOCATED. ROWENA BURIED HER FACE IN HER SHAWL AND SWAYED AS IF FALLING.

Vandemark's Folly

By HERBERT QUICK

Illustrations by N. C. Wyeth

XV

THE collapse of mind and body which I underwent in deciding the question either of marrying Rowena Fewkes and keeping; unstained and pure the great love of my life, or of refusing her pitiful plea and passing by on the other side, leaving her desolate and forlorn, is a thing to which I hate to confess; for it was a weakness. I was weak as a child as she clasped me in her arms in gratitude when I told her I would do as she wanted me to; I would have fallen again if she had not held me up.

"What's the matter, Jacob?" she asked, in sudden fright at my strange behavior.

"I don't know," I gasped. "I wish I could lay down."

She was mystified. She helped me up the hill and into the house, telling me all the time how she meant to live so as to repay me for all I had promised to do for her. She was stronger than I then. The house was dark, and she lighted the lamp; but when she came to me, lying on the bed, she gave a great scream.

"Jake, Jake!" she cried. "What's the matter? Are you dying, my darling?"

"Who, me dying?" I said, not quite understanding her.

"No—I'm all right. I'll be all right, Rowena!"

She was holding her hands up in the light. They were stained crimson where she had pressed them to my bosom.

"What's the matter of your hands?" I asked, though I was getting drowsy, as if I had been long broken of my sleep.

"It's blood, Jacob! You've hurt yourself!"

I DREW my hand across my mouth, and it came away stained red. She gave a cry of horror, but did not lose her presence of mind. She sponged the blood from my clothes, wiping my mouth every little while, until there was no more blood coming from it. Presently I dropped off to sleep with my hand in hers. She awoke me after a while and gave me some warm milk. As I was drowsing off again she spoke very gently to me.

"Can you understand what I'm saying?" she asked; and I nodded a yes. "Do you love her like that?" she asked.

"Yes," I said, "I love her like that."

Presently she lifted my hand to her lips and kissed it. She was quite calm now, as if new light had come to her in the darkness. I thought it was my consent that had quieted her spirits, but I did not understand her.

"I can't let you do it, Jacob," said she finally. "It's too much to ask. . . . I've thought of another way, my dear. . . . Don't think of me or my troubles any more. . . . I'll be all right. . . . You go on loving her an' bein' true to her. . . . and if God is good as they say, He'll make you happy with her sometime. Do you understand, Jacob?"

"Yes," I said, "but what will you —"

"Never mind about me," said she soothingly. "I've thought of another way out. You go to sleep now and don't think of me or my troubles any more."

I lay looking at her for a while, wondering how she could suddenly be so quiet after her agitation of the day. After a while the scene swam before my eyes, and I went off into the refreshing sleep of a tired boy.

The sun was up when I awoke. Rowena was gone. I went out and found that she had saddled her horse and departed sometime in the night. Afterward I found out that it was in the gray of the morning.

She had watched by my bedside all night and had left only after it was plain that I was breathing naturally and that my spasm had passed.

She had come into my life that day like a tornado, but had left it much as it had been before, except that I wondered what was to become of her. I was comforted by the thought that she had "thought of another way." And it was a long time before the nobility of her action was plain to me; but when I realized it, I never forgot it. I had offered her all I had when she begged for it; she had taken it, and then restored it, as the dying soldier gave the draught of water to his comrade, saying, "Thy necessity is greater than mine."

Once or twice I made an effort to tell Magnus Thorkelson about this as we worked at our after-harvest haying together that week, but it was a hard thing to do. Perhaps it would not be a secret much longer; but as yet it was Rowena's secret, not mine. I knew, too, that Magnus had been haunting Rowena for two years; that he had been making visits to Bluegrass Manor often when she was there without taking me into his confidence. It would be a shock to him to learn of her present and coming trouble; and, strange as it may seem, I began to put it back into the dark places in my mind as if it had not happened. Even when it came to mind I tried to comfort myself with the thought that Rowena had said that she had thought of another way out.

WE HAD frost early that year—a hard white frost some time about the tenth of September. Neither Magnus nor I had any sound corn, though our wheat, oats and barley were heavy and fine; and we had oceans of hay. The frost killed the grass early, and early in October we had a heavy rain followed by another freeze, and then a long, calm, warm Indian summer. The prairie was covered with a dense mat of dry grass, which rustled in the wind but furnished no feed for our stock. It was a splendid fall for plowing, and I began to feel hope return to me as I followed my plow round and round the lands I laid off and watched the black ribbon of new plowing widen and widen as day advanced toward night.

My cattle strayed off in the latter part of October. I got uneasy about them on the twentieth and went hunting them on one of Magnus Thorkelson's horses. I expected to get back before night, but when I struck the trail of the stock it took me away back into the region in the north part of the township back of Vandemark's Folly.

There was a still, dry, west wind blowing, and a blue haze in the air. As the afternoon advanced the sun grew red, as if looked at through smoked glass, burning like a great coal of fire or a broad disk of red-hot iron. There was a scent of burning grass in the air when I found my herd over on Section Eight. The cattle seemed to be uneasy, and when I started them toward home they walked fast, snuffing the air and giving once in a while an uneasy, anxious, falsetto bellow; and once in a while they would break into a trot as they drew nearer to the places they knew.

The smell of smoke grew stronger and I knew there was a prairie fire burning to the westward. The sun was a deep red now, and once in a while almost disappeared in clouds of vaporous smoke, which rolled higher and higher into the sky. Prairie chickens, plover and curlew, with once in a while a bittern, went hurriedly along to the eastward, and several wolves crossed our path, trotting along and paying no attention to me or the cows, but stopping from time to time and looking back as if pursued from the west.

They were pursued. They were fleeing from the great prairie fire of 1859, which swept Monterey County from side to side and never stopped until it struck the river over in the next county. I felt a little uneasy as I hiked my cattle down into the marsh on my own land and saw them picking their way across it toward my grove, which showed proudly a mile away across the flat. I had plowed firebreaks about my buildings and stacks and burned off between the strips of plowing, but I felt that I ought to be at home. So I rode on at a good trot to make my circuit of the marsh to the west. The cattle could get through, but a horse with a man on his back might easily get mired in Vandemark's Folly anywhere along there.

AS I TOPPED the hill to get back to the high ground I saw great clouds of smoke pouring into the valley at the west opening into the big flat, and the country to the south was hidden by the smoke, except where, away off the southwest, in the changing of the wind I could see the line of fire as it came over the high ground west of the old Bill Trickey farm.

It was a broad belt of red flame, from which there crept along the ground a great blanket of smoke, black at first, and then turning to blue as it rose and thinned. I began hurrying, for it began to look as if the fire would reach the head of the slew before I could, and thus cut me off. I felt in my pocket for matches; for in case of need the only way to fight fire was with fire.

Within five minutes, as I looked off to the northwest, I saw a woman walking calmly toward the marsh. She was a long way off and much nearer the fire than I was. I looked for the wagon to which she might belong, but saw none; and it took only one more glance at her to show me that she was in mortal danger. For she was walking along slowly and laboriously like a person carrying a heavy burden. The smoke was getting so thick that it hid her from time to time, and I felt, even at my distance from the fire, an occasional hot blast on my cheek—a startling proof of the rapid march of the great oncoming army of flames.

I KICKED my heels into the horse's flanks and pushed him to a gallop. I must reach her soon or she would be lost, for it was plain that she was paying no attention to her danger. I went down into a hollow, pounded up the opposite hill, and over on the next rise of ground I saw her. She was standing still now, with her face turned to the fire; then she walked deliberately toward it. I urged my horse to a faster gait, swung my hat and yelled at her, but she seemed not to hear. The smoke swept down upon her, and when I next could see she was stooped with her shawl drawn around her head; or was she on her knees? Then she rose and, turning from the fire, ran as fast as she could until I wheeled my horse across her path, jumped to the ground and stopped her with my arm about her waist. I looked at her and saw that it was Rowena Fewkes.

"Rowena!" I shouted. "What you doin' here? Don't you know you'll get burnt up?"

"I couldn't go any closer," she said, as if excusing herself. "Would it hurt much? I got scared, Jake. Oh, don't let me burn!"

There was no chance to make the circuit of the slew now, even if I had not been hampered with her. I told her to do as she was told and not bother me. Then I gave her the horse to hold and sternly ordered her not to let loose of him no matter what he did. I gathered a little armful of dry grass and lighted it with a match to the leeward of us. It spread fast, though I lighted it where the grass was thin, so as to avoid a hot fire; but on the side toward the wind, where the blaze was feeble, I carefully whipped it out with my slouch hat. In a minute or so I had a line two or three rods long of little blazes, each a circle of fire burning more and more fiercely on the leeward side and more feebly on the side where the blaze was fanned away from its fuel. This side of each circle I whipped out with my hat, some of them with difficulty. Soon we had a fierce fire raging, leaving in front of us a growing area of black ashes.

We were now between two fires. The great conflagration from which we were trying to protect ourselves came on from the west like a roaring tornado, its ashes falling all about us, its hot breath beginning to scorch us, its snapping and crackling now reaching the ear along with its roar. On the east was the fire of my own kindling, growing in speed, racing off to the east away from us, leaving behind it our haven of refuge, a tract swept clean of food for the flames, but hot and smoking and as yet all too small for safety, for the heat and smoke might kill where the flames could not reach. Between the two fires was the fast narrowing strip of dry grass from which we must soon move. Our safety lay in following one fire to escape the other.

The main army of the flames coming on from the west, with its power of suction fanned itself to a faster pace than our new line could attain, and the heat increased, both from the racing line of fire to the west and from the slower-moving back fire to the east. We sweltered and almost suffocated. Rowena buried her face in her shawl and swayed as if falling. I took her by the arm and, leading the excited horse, we moved over into our zone of safety. She was trembling like a leaf.

I WAS anxious for a few minutes for fear I had not started my back fire soon enough, but the fear soon passed. The fire came on with a swelling roar. We followed our own fire so close as to be almost blistered by it, coughing, gasping, covering our mouths and nostrils in such a heat and smother that I could scarcely support Rowena and keep my footing.

Then suddenly the heat and smoke grew less; I looked around and saw that the fire had reached our burnt area, and the line was cut for lack of fuel. It divided as a wave is split by a rock and went in two great moving fountains of flame down the line of our back fire, and swept on, leaving us scorched, blackened, red of eye and sore of lips, but safe. We turned and made for the open country behind the lines. Then for the first time I looked at Rowena.

I had been surprised at the way in which she had kept her prettiness and gay actions when I had last seen her, considering her troubles. I was shocked at the change in her now. The poor girl seemed to have given up all attempt to care for her looks. All her rosy bloom was gone. Her cheeks were pale and puffy, even though emaciated. Her limbs looked thin through her disordered and torn clothes. She wore a dark-colored hood over her snarled hair, in which there was chaff mixed with the tangles as if she had been sleeping in straw. She was black with smoke and ashes. Her skirts were dragged as if with repeated soaking with dew and rain. Her shoes were worn through and her bare toes stuck out of openings in her stockings. She had a beggarly appearance that, coupled with her look of dejection and misery, went to my heart.

THEY TRAMPLED OVER ME AS THEY DROVE OUR MEN OFF THE FIELD

I could not talk with her. I could only give her directions and lend her aid. I tried putting her on the horse behind me, but he would not carry double; so I put her in the saddle and walked by or ahead of the horse over the blackened and ashy prairie, lit up by the red glare of the fire and dotted here and there with little smokes which marked where there were coals. She said nothing, but two or three times she gave a distressful little moan as if she were in pain.

WHEN we reached the end of the slew we turned south and crossed the creek just above the pond. As we splashed through Rowena looked out over it and asked, "What water is that?"

"Plum Pudd'n Pond," I told her.

"Is it deep?" she asked.

"Pretty deep in the middle."

"Over your head?"

"Oh, yes!"

"I reckoned it was," said she. "I was huntin' fur it when you found me."

"That was after you saw the fire," I said.

"No," said she. "It was before."

In my slow way I pondered on why she had been hunting water over her head, and sooner than is apt to be the case with me I understood. The despair in her face as she turned and looked at the shining water told me. She had refused to accept my offer to be her protector because she saw how it hurt me; but she was now ready to balance the books—if it ever does that—by taking shelter in the depths of the pool! And this all for the pleasure of that smiling scoundrel!

We got to my house and I helped her in. I told her to wait while I went to look at the fire to see whether my stacks were in danger and to put out and feed the horse. Then I went back and found her sitting where I had left her; and as I went in I heard again that little moan of pain.

THE house was as light as day, as the light from the fire shone against the western wall. I got some supper, and after saying that she couldn't eat, Rowena ate ravenously. She had gone away from Bluegrass Manor, whipped forth by Mrs. Mobley's abuse, days and days before, living on what she had carried with her until it was gone, drinking from the brooks and runs of the prairie, and then starving on rose haws and sleeping in stacks until I had found her looking for the pool. If people could only have known! Presently she moaned again, and I made her lie down on the bed.

"What will you do with me, Jacob?" she asked.

"We'll think about that in the morning," said I.

"Maybe you can bury me in the morning," she said after a while. "Oh, Jake, I'm scared, I'm scared. My trouble is comin' on! Oh, what shall I do?"

I went out and sat on the stoop and thought about this. Finally I went back to her side. "Rowena," I said, "I'm goin' out to do something that has to be done. Will you stay here and not move out of this room till I come back?"

"I'll have to," she said.

So I went out and saddled the fresh horse and started through that fiery night for Monterey Center. The fire had burned clear past the town, and when I got there I saw what was left of one or two barns or houses which had caught fire from the prairie still blazing in heaps of embers. The village had had a narrow escape from the rain of sparks from the fire which had swept to the very edges of the little cluster of dwellings. I rode to Doctor Bliven's drug store, climbed the outside stairway which led to his living room above and knocked. Mrs. Bliven came to the door. I explained that I wanted the doctor at once to come out to my farm.

"He's not here," said she. "He is dressing some burns from the fire, but he must be nearly through. I'll go after him."

The time seemed long before he came, but I suppose he came at once. "Who's sick, Jake?" he asked.

"A girl," I said. "A woman."

"At your house?" asked he. "Who is it?"

"It's Rowena Fewkes," said I.

TWO OR THREE TIMES ONE OF THE MARES FELL IN THE DRIFTS, AND NOTHING BUT THE COURAGE BRED INTO THEM IN THE BLUE-GRASS FIELDS OF KENTUCKY SAVED US FROM STALLING OUT IN THAT FEARFUL MOVING FLOOD OF SNOW

"I thought they had gone to Colorado," said the doctor. "They said they were leaving her behind," said Mrs. Bliven. "They said — Do you say she's at your house?"

"No one," said I. "She's alone. Hurry, doctor; she needs you bad."

Mrs. Bliven ran upstairs and came down in a few seconds with the doctor's instruments and medicine case. She was wearing her bonnet and cloak. She came up to me, put her hand on my arm and spoke. "Jake," said she, "are you and Rowena married?"

"Us married!" I exclaimed. "Why, no!"

"This is bad business," said she. "I am surprised. And there's no woman out there with the poor little thing?"

"No," I said; "as soon as I could I started for the doctor because I thought he was needed first. But she needs a woman—a woman that won't look down on her. I wish—I wish I knew where there was one!"

"Jake," said she, "you've done the fair thing by me, and I'll stand by you and by her. And when I do the fair thing, see that you do the same. I'm not the one to throw the first stone, and I won't. I'm going with you, doctor."

"What for?" said he.

"Just for the ride," she said. "I'll tell you more as we go."

They outstripped me on the return trip, for my horse was winded, and I felt that there was no place for me in what was going on at the farm.

"It's a boy!" said Doctor Bliven as I came to the house.

"The mother ain't in very good shape. Seems exhausted—exhausted. She'll pull through though—she'll pull through. My wife's going to stay a day or so. I'll take her back next time I come out."

"You must tend to her, doc," said I. "I'll guarantee you your pay."

VERY well, Jake. Of course you would—of course, of course," said he. "But between you and me there wouldn't be any trouble about pay. Old friends, you know; old friends. Favors in the past. You've done things for me—my wife too. Be out to-morrow. Ought to have a woman here when I go. Can get you a mover's wife's sister—widow—experienced with her own. Want her? Bring her out for you—bring her out to-morrow, eh?"

I told him to bring the widow out and was greatly relieved. I went to Magnus' cabin that night to sleep—he was away doing some work—leaving Mrs. Bliven with Rowena. I hoped I might not have to see Rowena before she went away; but on the third day the widow came to me and, standing afar off, as if I was infected with something malignant, told me that Mrs. Vandemark wanted to see me.

"She ain't Mrs. Vandemark," I corrected. "Her name is Rowena Fewkes."

"I make it a habit," said the widow, whose name was Mrs. Williams, "to speak in the present tense."

Whatever she may have meant was a problem to me; but I went in. Rowena lay in my bed, and beside her was a little bundle wrapped in a blanket made of one of my flannel sheets.

"What are you goin' to do with me, Jake?" she asked again, looking up at me pleadingly.

"I'm goin' to keep you here till you're able to do for yourself," I said. "Time enough to think of that after a while."

BUT as I lay in Magnus' bed that night I could see no way out for her. She could get work, I knew, for there was always work for a woman in our pioneer houses. The hired girl who went from place to place could find employment most of the time; but the baby would be an incumbrance. I could not foresee how the thing would work out and lay awake pondering on it until after midnight. I had hardly fallen asleep, it seemed to me, when the door was opened and in came Magnus. He had finished his job and come back.

"You bare, Yake?" he said, in his quiet and unmoved way. "I'm glad. Your house bare burn up in fire?"

I told him the startling news, and as the story of poor Rowena slowly made its way into his mind I was astonished at its effect on him; for he has always been to me a man who would be calm in a tornado and who would meet shipwreck or earthquake without a tremor. But now he trembled. He turned pale. He raged up and down the little room with his

(Continued on Page 137)

ELSIE DE WOLFE AS THE WAITING MAID, JOHN DREW AS THE COUNT, IN "A MARRIAGE OF CONVENIENCE"

"CHRISTOPHER, JR.," ONE OF THE SUCCESSES IN WHICH MAUDE ADAMS AND JOHN DREW PLAYED TOGETHER

My Years on the Stage

By JOHN DREW

MY EARLY impression of Maude Adams, before it was finally decided that she was to be my leading woman in my first play as a star under the management of Charles Frohman, was that she looked too frail. I had been accustomed to play with Ada Rehan, who was so much bigger and stronger. Stronger she was, as was evidenced by the blow on the jaw that as Katharine she gave me in The Taming of the Shrew. In the scene, in the acting version, where Petruchio says:

*Were it the forefoot of an angry bear,
I'd shake it off; but, as it's Kate's I kiss it,*

Katharine gives him a sound, ringing blow. There was a time when it was not considered good art actually to hit a person on the stage instead of making as if to hit; but there was no make-believe about this stage blow. It was indeed real; in fact, it seems to me now as I look back that the blow that Katharine used to give Petruchio might have given the redoubtable heavyweight, Dempsey, a jolt.

Small wonder then that Maude Adams in her girlish slightness seemed to me too fragile for a leading woman. As a matter of fact she was never ill and never away from rehearsals in the years she played with me.

It was Mrs. Drew, my wife, who first suggested that Maude Adams become my leading woman. Maude Adams had been on the stage almost from childhood. Her mother played leading woman in the stock company at the Salt Lake Theater. The family name was Kiskaden. Maude, herself, had appeared when quite young in Hoyt's play, A Midnight Bell. After that she left the stage to go to school.

As Nell, the consumptive factory girl, in an American adaptation of Ludwig Fulda's play, The Lost Paradise, she had made a hit. I saw her first, however, as Evangeline Bender in a farce which William Gillette had adapted from the French, called All the Comforts of Home. In this Forbes Robertson's brother, Ian, played an old, deaf fellow. The two things that I remember about the play are the delicate charm of Maude Adams and the fact that all the other characters yelled at Ian Robertson.

When I was in San Francisco Maude Adams, who was playing at another theater, came to the Baldwin Hotel to meet me. This appointment was the first time that I had seen her off the stage. I saw at once her alertness and her intelligence, and that she had a most expressive face.

Meets Charles Frohman

[WAS still playing at Daly's theater when I first met Charles Frohman. He then had the Twenty-third Street Theater, now Proctor's, and had produced Bronson Howard's famous drama of the Civil War, Shenandoah, which had so much to do with the founding of his theatrical fortune.

In the men's café at Delmonico's, then at Broadway and Twenty-sixth Street, I often saw a little round man that I thought was Alfred Klein, the brother of Charles Klein, the author of The Music

Master and The Lion and the Mouse. Alfred Klein was one of three brothers connected with the theater.

He played with Gillette in The Professor, and some years afterwards he was the little jailer with DeWolf Hopper in Wang.

Anson Pond, the writer of a play called Her Atone-ment, protested to me one day: "Why, that's not Klein. That is Charles Frohman, the coming theatrical manager."

At that time I was not much interested in other theatrical managers. Ada Rehan, Lewis and the rest of us at Daly's felt that these newer managers were intruders. Daly never thought what happened outside of his theater was of any importance, and this spirit of his prejudiced us.

One fine Sunday Fritz Williams and I rode out to Claremont. Seated at a table near us was Frank Sanger and the man I had mistaken for Alfred Klein. I had known Frank Sanger in Philadelphia. He had been one of the players, though not a conspicuous one, in the stock company at the Chestnut Street Theater. He became night clerk in the Hotel La Pierre one summer. Later he got into theatrical management and made a great deal of money out of Charles Hoyt's play, A Bunch of Keys. With Hayman he built the Empire Theater for Charles Frohman.

At this meeting at Claremont, Sanger and Frohman joined us. Sanger turned the conversation, in a rather diplomatic fashion, to the possibilities of my changing managements. I do not mean to imply that this conversation was exactly prearranged.

Sanger said: "John is wedded to Daly as a manager."

"I don't know about that," I answered.

"You're not thinking of changing, are you?" he asked.

"No," I told him; "but I'm not bound as a serf."

One Sunday evening Henry Miller took me to Frohman's apartment in the Hoffman House to play cards. Miller and I met Frohman and Anson Pond, who was a great friend of his, in the lobby of the hotel. We played poker for a while, and I felt, as subsequent events developed, that I had been allowed to win and had not won through my own cleverness or prowess with the cards. I do not know whether I was right about this, but I do know that Frohman was a very good card player, as was Pond. We had a very elaborate "terrapi-nish" supper and went back to card playing.

Accepts Frohman's Offer

CONVERSATIONS with Sanger, which were usually predicated upon the supposition of what I should do if I left Daly, and occasional meetings with Frohman went on for some time. Finally an offer came through Frank Bennett, who was manager of the old Arlington Hotel in Washington.

Frank Bennett, who was the son-in-law of my godmother, Mrs. D. P. Bowers, had been an actor for a time in the Daly company, but he became discouraged and gave up the stage. Fortunately for him he had the keenness of perception, given to very few people who act, to realize that there was no future for him. On one of our trips with the Daly company to Washington he met Roeselle, proprietor of the Arlington Hotel, who offered him a job. From this he rose to be manager.

"Why don't you get out of your engagement with Daly, John?" Bennett asked me on one occasion. I suppose my manner seemed receptive to him, for he went on: "Frohman is the coming man."

Frohman apparently had calculated that I had a drawing power, and in this had faith, for a most generous offer was made to me by Bennett. I authorized him to make a suggestion or two to Frohman and the thing was accomplished.

IN "ROSEMARY" MAUDE ADAMS AND JOHN DREW MADE ONE OF THEIR BIGGEST HITS. THEY ARE SHOWN HERE WITH ARTHUR BYRON

(Continued on Page 119)

"I'VE COME TO WISH YOU AND FLO ALL THE HAPPINESS IN THE WORLD, AND TO SAY WE MUST BE FRIENDS"

X (Continued)

ARLEY had a visitor one morning earlier than the usual or conventional time for calls.

"He wouldn't give a name," said the maid. "He wears soldier clothes, ma'am, and he's pale and walks with a cane."

"Tell him I'll be right down." Her hands trembled while she hurriedly dressed. Could this caller be Virgil Rust? She hoped so, but she doubted.

As she entered the reception room a tall young man in worn khaki rose to meet her. At first glance she could not name him, though she recognized the pale face and light blue eyes, direct and steady.

"Good morning, Miss Burch," he said. "I hope you'll excuse so early a call. You remember me, don't you? I'm George Burton, who had the bunk next to Rust's."

"Surely I remember you, Mr. Burton, and I'm glad to see you," replied Carley, shaking hands with him. "Please sit down. Your being here must mean you're discharged from the hospital."

"Yes, I was discharged all right," he said.

"Which means you're well again. That is fine. I'm very glad."

"I was put out to make room for a fellow in bad shape. I'm still shaky and weak," he replied. "But I'm glad to go. I've pulled through pretty well, and it'll not be long until I'm strong again. It was the 'flu' that kept me down."

"You must be careful. May I ask where you're going and what you expect to do?"

"Yes, that's what I came to tell you," he replied frankly. "I wondered if you would help me a little. I'm from Illinois, and my people aren't so badly off; but I don't want to go back to my home town down and out, you know. Besides, the winters are cold there. The doctor advises me to go to a little milder climate. You see, I was gassed, and got the 'flu' afterward. But I know I'll be all right if I'm careful. I've always had a leaning toward agriculture, and I want to go to Kansas, Southern Kansas. I want to travel around till I find a place I like, and there I'll get a job. Not too hard a job at first; that's why I'll need a little money. I know what to do. I want to lose myself in the wheat country and forget the—the war. I'll not be afraid of work, presently. Now, Miss Burch, you've been so kind, I'm going to ask you to lend me a little money. I'll pay it back. I can't promise just when. But some day. Will you?"

"Assuredly I will," she replied heartily. "I'm happy to help you. How much will you need for immediate use? Five hundred dollars?"

"Oh, no, not so much as that," he replied. "Just railroad fare home, and then to Kansas, and to pay board while I get well, you know, and look around."

"We'll make it five hundred anyway," she replied. "Excuse me a moment," and, rising, she went toward the library. She wrote the check and, returning, gave it to him.

"You're very good," he said rather low.

"Not at all," replied Carley. "You have no idea how much it means to me to be permitted to help you. Will you leave New York at once?"

"Indeed I shall. It's an awful place. Two years ago when I came here with my company I thought it was grand. But I guess I lost something over there. I want to be where it's quiet, where I won't see many people."

"I think I understand," returned Carley. "Then I suppose you're in a hurry to get home? Of course you have a girl who's waiting for you?"

"No; I'm sorry to say I haven't," he replied simply. "I was glad I didn't have to leave a sweetheart behind when I went to France. But it wouldn't be so bad to have one to go back to—now."

"Don't worry, soldier boy," exclaimed Carley. "You can take your choice presently. You have the open sesame to every American girl's heart."

"And what is that?" he asked with a blush.

"Your service to your country," she said, changing from gayness to gravity.

The Call of the Cañon

By ZANE GREY

Author of The Man of the Forest, Wildfire, Riders of the Purple Sage, Etc.

Illustrations by H. R. Ballinger

"Well," he said with a singular bluntness, "considering I didn't get any medals or bonuses, I'd like to draw a nice girl."

"You will," replied Carley, and made haste to change the subject. "By the way, did you meet Glenn Kilbourne in France?"

"Not that I remember," rejoined Burton, rising stiffly with the aid of his cane. "I must go, Miss Burch. Really I can't thank you enough. And I'll never forget it."

"Will you write me how you are getting along?" asked Carley, offering her hand.

"Yes." Carley moved with him out into the hall and to the door. There was a question she wanted to ask, but found it strangely difficult of utterance. At the door Burton fixed a rather penetrating gaze upon her.

"You didn't ask me about Rust," he said.

"No, I—I didn't think of him—until now, in fact," returned Carley.

"Of course then you couldn't have heard about him. I was wondering."

"I have heard nothing."

"It was Rust who told me to come to you," said Burton. "We were talking one day, and he—well, he thought you were true-blue. He said he knew you'd trust me and lend me money. I couldn't have asked you but for him."

"True-blue! He believed that? I'm glad. Has he spoken of me to you since I was last at the hospital?"

"Hardly," replied Burton, with the straight, strange glance on her again.

Carley met this glance, and suddenly a coldness seemed to envelop her. It did not seem to come from within her though her heart almost stopped beating. Burton had not changed; the warmth, the gratitude still lingered about him. But the light of his eyes! Carley had seen it in Glenn's, in Rust's—a strange, questioning, far-off light, infinitely aloof and unutterably sad. Then there came a lift of her head that released a pang.

She whispered with dread, with a tremor, with an instinct of calamity: "How about Rust?"

"He's dead."

THE winter came, with its bleak sea winds and cold rain and blizzards of snow. Carley did not go south. She read and brooded, and gradually avoided all save those true friends who tolerated her. She went to the theater a good deal, showing preference for the drama of strife, and she did not go anywhere for amusement. Distraction and amusement seemed to be dead for her. But she could become absorbed in any argument on the good or evil of the present day.

Socialism reached into her mind to be rejected. She had never understood it clearly, but it seemed to her a state of mind where dissatisfied men and women wanted to share what harder working or more clever people possessed. There were a few who had too much of the world's goods and many who had too little. A readjustment of such inequality at injustice must come, but Carley did not see that remedy in socialism.

She devoured books on the war with a morbid curiosity and hope that she would find some illuminating truth as to the uselessness of sacrificing young men in the glory at prime of their lives. To her war appeared a matter of human nature rather than politics. Hate really was a effect of war. Though she granted every argument for war she flung against them one ringing, passionate truth—agony of mangled soldiers and agony of women and children. There was no justification for offensive war. It was monstrous and hideous. If Nature and evolution proved the absolute need of strife, war, blood and death in the progress of animal and man toward perfection, then it would be better to abandon this Christless code and let the race of man die out.

But earnest study and seeking did not cure Carley any more than did the ceaseless rush to forget. Everything she undertook seemed false. How terribly had her sincere interest in the disabled veterans of the war stung her! Everything forced upon her an incomprehensible falseness of life.

All through these weeks she longed for a letter from Glenn. But it did not come. Had he finally roused to the sweetness and worth and love of Flo Hutter? Carley knew absolutely through both intelligence and intuition that Glenn Kilbourne would never love Flo. Yet such was her intensity and stress at times, especially in the darkness of waking hours, that jealousy overcame her and insidiously worked its havoc.

One day she received a note from an old schoolmate, a girl who had married out of Carley's set, and had in consequence been ostracized. She was living on Long Island at a little country place named Wading River. Her husband was an electrician and an inventor in a modest way. He worked hard, commuting to Astoria. They had a cottage in the country and preferred to stay there, even though winter made it hard for him and lonely for her. A baby boy had just come to them. Would not Carley run down to see the youngster?

That was a strong and trenchant call. Carley went. She found indeed a country village, and on the outskirts of it a little cottage that must have been pretty in summer, when the green was on vines and trees. Her old schoolmate was rosy, plump, bright-eyed and happy. She saw in Carley no change, a fact that somehow rebounded sweetly on Carley's consciousness. Elsie prattled of herself and her husband and how they had saved for this little home, and then of the baby.

WHEN Carley saw the dark-eyed, pink-toed, curling-fisted baby she understood Elsie's happiness and reveled in it. When she felt the soft, warm, living little body in her arms, against her breast, then she seemed shot through and through with some incalculable and mysterious strength. What were the trivial, sordid and selfish feelings that kept her in tumult compared with this welling and wonderful emotion? Had she the secret in her arms? Babies and Carley had never got along well together in those rare meetings that were scarcely the result of chance. But Elsie's baby nestled to her breast and cooed to her and clung to her finger. When at length the child was laid in his crib, it seemed to Carley that the fragrance and the soul of him remained with her.

"A real American boy."

"You can just bet he is," replied Elsie. "Carley, you ought to see his dad."

"I'd like to meet him," said Carley thoughtfully. "Elsie, was he in the service?"

"Yes. He was on one of the avy transports that took munitions to France. Think of me, carrying this baby, with my husband on a boat full of explosives and with German submarines roaming the ocean. Oh, it was dreadful."

"But he came back, and now all's well with you," said Carley with a smile of earnestness. "I'm very glad, Elsie."

"Yes; but I shudder when I think of possible future war. I'm going to raise boys, and girls, too, I hope, and the thought of war is torturing."

"Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. Raise the family, Elsie, and trust to that nameless something which aids us hope."

CARLEY found her train somewhat late, and she took advantage of the delay to walk out to the wooded badlands above the Sound.

It was a raw March day with a steely sun going down in a pale gray sky. Patches of snow lingered in sheltered bushy places. This bit of badland had a floor of soft sand that dragged at Carley's feet. There were sere and brown leaves still fluttering on the scrub oaks. At length Carley came to the edge of the bluff, with the gray expanse of sea beneath her and a long, wandering shore line, ragged with wreckage and driftwood. The surge of water rolled in—a long, low, white creeping line that roared softly on the beach and dragged the pebbles screaming back. There was neither boat nor living creature in sight.

Carley felt the scene ease a clutching hand within her breast. Here were loneliness and solitude vastly different from that of Oak Creek Cañon, yet they held the same intangible power to soothe. The swish of the Sound, the moan of the wind in the evergreens, were voices that called to her in an unknown tongue. How many more miles of lonely land than of peopled cities! Then the sea—how vast! And over that the illimitable and infinite sky, and beyond to the endless realms of space.

IT HELPED her somehow to see and hear and feel the eternal presence of Nature. In communion with Nature the significance of life might be realized. She remembered Glenn quoting: "We are too much in the world. Getting and spending, we lay waste our powers." What were our powers? What did God intend men to do with hands and bodies and gifts and souls? She gazed back over the bleak land and then out across the broad arm of the sea. Only the smallest part of the surface of the unsubmerged earth knew the populous abodes of man. And the lonely sea, inhospitable to stable homes, was thrice the area of the land. Were men intended then to congregate in few places, to squabble and to bicker and breed the discontents that lead to injustice, hatred and war? What a mystery it all was! But Nature was neither false nor little, however cruel she might be. Her message seemed to be—Live with me!

Once again Carley fell under the fury of her fiery ordeal. Wavering now, restless and sleepless, given to violent starts and slow spells of apathy, she was wearing to defeat.

That spring day, one year from the day she had left New York for Arizona, she wished to spend alone. But her thoughts grew unbearable. She summed up the endless year. Could she live another like it? Something must break within her. She went out. The air was warm and balmy, carrying that nameless current which causes the mild madness, spring fever. In the park the greening of the grass, the opening of buds, the singing of birds, the gladness of children, the light on the water, the warm sun—all seemed to reproach her. Carley fled from the park to the home of Beatrice Lovell; and there through the irony of fate she encountered those of her acquaintances with whom she had least patience. They forced her to think too keenly of herself. They appeared care free while she was miserable.

Over teacups there was waging gossip and argument and criticism. When Carley came in with Beatrice, there was a sudden hush and then a murmur.

"Hello, Carley. Now say it to our faces," called out Gerald Conners, a fair, handsome young woman of thirty, exquisitely gowned in the latest mode, whose delicately tinted face was not the natural one of health.

"Say what, Gerald?" asked Carley. "I certainly would not say anything behind your backs that I wouldn't repeat here."

"Eleanor has been telling us how you simply burned us up."

"We did have an argument. And I'm not sure I said all I wanted to."

"Say the rest here," drawled a lazy, mellow voice. "For heaven's sake, stir us up. If I could get a thrill out of anything, I'd bless it."

"Carley, go on the stage," said another.

"Girls, do you know that you actually have not one sensible idea in your heads?" retorted Carley. "Sensible? I should hope not. Who wants to be sensible?" Gerald clinked her teacup against a saucer. "Listen," she called. "I wasn't teasing Carley. I am good and sore. She goes around knocking everybody and saying New York backs Sodom off the boards. I want her to come out with it right here."

"I DARE say I've talked too much," returned Carley. "It's been a rather hard winter for me. Perhaps indeed I've tried the patience of my friends."

"See here, Carley," said Gerald deliberately, "just because you've had life turn to bitter ashes in your mouth you've no right to poison it for us. We all find it pretty sweet. You're an unsatisfied woman and, if you don't marry somebody, you'll end by being a reformer or a fanatic."

"I'd rather end that way than live in a shell."

"I declare, you make me see red, Carley," flashed Gerald angrily. "No wonder Morrison says what he does. He says Glenn Kilbourne jilted you for some Western girl. If that's true it's rather petty of you to vent your spleen on us."

Carley felt the gathering of a mighty, resistless force. But Gerald Conners was nothing to her except the target for a thunderbolt.

"I have no spleen," she replied with a dignity of passion. "I have only pity. I was as blind as you. If heartbreak tore the scales from my eyes perhaps that is well for me. For I see something terribly wrong in myself, in you, in all of us, in the life of to-day."

"You keep your pity to yourself. You need it," answered Gerald with heat. "There's nothing wrong with me nor my friends nor life in good old New York."

(Continued on Page 168)

CARLEY BURST IN UPON HER AUNT. "LOOK AT ME, AUNT MARY," SHE CRIED, RADIANT AND EXULTANT. "I'M GOING BACK WEST!"

THERE were terrible adventures in the wilderness; for there was treason in high places, and it was punished in spectacular style. The sons of Aaron, Nadab and Abihu—so eloquently mentioned by Browning in One Word More—together with their father and Moses and seventy elders, went up the mountain and saw the glory of God.

And they saw the God of Israel: and there was under his feet as it were a paved work of a sapphire stone, and as it were the body of heaven in his clearness.

Yet later Nadab and Abihu, who had seen the King in His beauty, offered up strange fire near Sinai, and instantly perished. So quickly forgotten then and now is the Divine Revelation; forgotten by those especially chosen to receive it.

Miriam, the prophetess, sister of Moses and Aaron, may perhaps be pardoned for family jealousy when Moses married a black girl, an Ethiopian; but her method of revenge was strange, and the punishment accurately fitted the crime. Together with Aaron she started a sedition and was smitten with leprosy; as much as to say, If you think you are better than your sister-in-law because you are white, you shall be even whiter by contrast, white as snow. The leprosy was removed at the entreaty of Moses, but it gave Miriam something to think about.

Korah, a Levite, with two hundred and fifty princes, men of renown, started an open rebellion against Moses. The latter felt this defection in the priest tribe, and he said sharply: "Ye take too much upon you, ye sons of Levi." The next day, in the presence of the whole congregation, Moses called upon the people to keep away from Korah and his friends; there was an instant and dramatic separation, as if Korah had some horrible and contagious disease.

And it came to pass, as he had made an end of speaking all these words, that the ground clave asunder that was under them:

And the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them up, and their houses, and all the men that appertained unto Korah, and all their goods.

They, and all that appertained to them, went down alive into the pit, and the earth closed upon them; and they perished from among the congregation.

And all Israel that were round about them fled at the cry of them: for they said, Lest the earth swallow us up also.

The shrieks of the sinking rebels must have rung in the people's ears for many days; yet they were soon ready to rebel and to worship other gods, which is the way of all flesh. The famous story of Balaam and his ass would seem to indicate that in spiritual insight a donkey may have more intelligence than a man.

Israel's Progress Marked by Wars

THERE were also frightful plagues, one of which carried off fourteen thousand and seven hundred; there was the scene of the serpent in the wilderness. Yet these wonders made no permanent impression, for the children of Israel, like those of other nations, were more interested in their stomachs than in their souls. Moses needed all his meekness, all his self-control to deal with them.

Spies were sent out into the Promised Land, and with the exception of two stout-hearted men, Joshua and Caleb, they brought back an evil report. They said:

It is a land that eateth up the inhabitants thereof; and all the people that we saw in it are men of a great stature.

And there we saw the giants, the sons of Anak, which come of the giants: and we were in our own sight as grasshoppers, and so we were in their sight.

The time came, however, to advance; and from now on the history of Israel is like the history of other countries, a succession of wars. The progress of the world has been made through bloodshed, wholesale slaughter, with innumerable and unspeakable individual cruelties. The triumphs of Israel are no exception; they came at the expense of their antagonists and through their own losses. Children were brutally murdered, and captive women became the spoil of the Chosen People. The Promised Land was won—a land flowing with milk before the Israelites appeared, when the milk turned to rivers of blood. War was then what it always has been; crops and property were destroyed, babies butchered, greed and sensuality were unrestrained. The soldiers of Israel were "thorough," and carried out the policy of extermination amid the braying of trumpets and psalms of thanksgiving. So far back as we can trace events since Eden, man has lived under a curse.

Human Nature in the Bible

Famous Fighters in Canaan

By WILLIAM LYON PHELPS

Decorations by F. Sands Brunner

As Moses was a statesman, Joshua was a soldier. His predominant qualities were strength and courage. He was an invader by divine right. Still on the east of Jordan, he sent out two spies to enter the first important city near the other bank, the city of Jericho. They went into the house of Rahab, a harlot; women of this profession were known in the beginning of history, for mention is made of them in the book of Genesis. Rahab hid the two men on the roof of her house, and covered them with the stalks of flax; when the king of Jericho inquired for them she put the messengers on a false scent. Rahab had heard the story of the drying up of the Red Sea and the conquests of the men of Israel; she believed in them with all her heart; she knew that the doom of Jericho was at hand. She begged for the life of her family, was told to mark the window of her house with a bit of red, and keep everybody indoors; then the house and the inmates would be spared. Such marking of friendly houses was common in the recent war.

Her house was on the town wall, and she let the spies down from the outside window by a cord; they escaped to the mountain, hid there three days and returned in safety.

Thus Rahab acquired immortality; she is mentioned with respect in the Letter to the Hebrews and in the Letter of James. She has frequently appeared in imaginative literature. In our time women of her profession are often idealized and made the heroines of fiction and drama. There are writers who seem to have a sentimental admiration for people of this class.

No Mercy for Enemies

THE children of Israel passed through the river of Jordan, following the ark of the Lord. The method was slightly different from that in which they had crossed the Red Sea. There they passed between two walls of water; here on one side the water was amassed in a heap, and on the other it ran off entirely and disappeared. Perhaps the only person who was not surprised by the event was Rahab; she remembered the story of the Red Sea and knew that for the Israelites a stretch of water was no obstacle.

Shortly after they had arrived in safety on the Canaan side, a curious thing happened; the fall of manna ceased and has never been seen since. They were now to have a table prepared for them in the presence of their enemies.

Joshua had a vision of a strange captain who came to meet him, which is not surprising, as many in the recent war saw plainly similar apparitions.

The gates of Jericho were closed. Six days in succession the Hebrew men at arms walked once entirely around the town, preceded by seven priests carrying in silence trumpets of ram's horns, and followed by the ark of the Lord, which in turn had a rear-guard. As the inhabitants looked from the walls at the grim and silent host they must have felt extremely nervous. On the seventh day the invaders circumvented the city seven times—presumably at the double-quick—and then the priests blew a tremendous blast, the army gave one mighty shout, and down went the walls. With the exception of Rahab and her family, every living thing in the city was slain by the Israelites, and Jericho wiped off the map of Canaan.

The soldiers were told to take no booty for themselves, but one man, Achan, found his avarice stronger than his fear of the mighty God; he hid valuables in his tent. Then came a terrifying casting of lots. The twelve tribes were drawn, and Judah was taken. What a relief for the others, and what consternation in the heart of Achan! The families of Judah were drawn, and the Zarahites were taken; man by man they were drawn, and Zabdi was taken; his household was drawn, and his grandson Achan was taken.

And Joshua said unto Achan, My son, give, I pray thee, glory to the Lord God of Israel, and make confession unto him; and tell me now what thou hast done; hide it not from me.

Achan confessed. He and his entire family were stoned and then burned. A great heap of stones was raised over him to commemorate his sin and its punishment.

The Canaanites did not yield up their fair land without a struggle; they were brave in battle, like soldiers everywhere, and they fought desperately; but they had no more chance than Hector against Achilles. Their hour had struck. The familiar military tactics appear, strategy and ambush; and there were traitors who espoused the Hebrew cause, some of whom were kept indefinitely as hewers of wood and drawers of water. The sun stood still over Gibeon, stood still in the midst of the heaven, and set only with the fortunes of the town. Then comes a touch worthy of Marlowe's Tamburlaine. Five kings had hid in a cave; when they were brought out Joshua called forward his captains and told them to put their feet on the necks of the kings. After this indignity the five were slain and hanged on five trees, which had never borne such royal fruit before.

So the invaders went on their way, houghing horses, destroying armed hosts, butchering women and children and burning cities; the pillar of fire and the pillar of smoke were now of their own making and marked their progress continually. Finally the land was divided up and perforce submitted to the peace of victory.

A Famous Woman Judge

HERE and there the Canaanites made those bloodless conquests that subdued nations win of their conquerors; some of the Israelites adopted the gods of their foes and others made marriages with the daughters of the land. So it has ever been.

The time came for Joshua to die. He made an impressive farewell speech, full of warnings against transgression, full of promises to the faithful, and he said: "Behold, this day I am going the way of all the earth." The brave old warrior who, like Cromwell, carried the law in one hand and the sword in the other, made a covenant with his people and submitted to death with a calm and steadfast mind.

After the death of Joshua the people became corrupted by following the religion of their enemies; fighting began again and the steady succession of victories came to an end. Eglon, the king of the Moabites, got the upper hand and held Israel in subjection eighteen years. This led to the first political assassination recorded in the Bible. King Eglon was a very fat man, "and he was sitting in a summer parlour, which he had for himself alone." A revolutionist named Ehud entered, saying that he had a message from God. As the heavy monarch got up out of his chair Ehud pushed a dagger into the nearest part of his anatomy, which stood out conspicuously; the fat closed over the handle and Eglon fell. Ehud left the room quietly, closing and locking the door after him; the king's attendants, thinking he did not wish to be disturbed, left him alone long enough for Ehud to make good his escape and rouse his people. The Moabites were thoroughly beaten, and there came eighty years of peace.

The Israelites attempted some loose form of general government, under Judges, who are first mentioned in the second chapter of the book. It is interesting to note that women seem to have had full political equality, for one of the most famous judges was Deborah, who was a

(Continued on Page 55)

"LO, CHILDREN ARE AN HERITAGE OF THE LORD; HAPPY IS THE MAN THAT BATH HIS QUIVER FULL OF THEM."—Psalms cxviii: 3-5

Children are an Heritage of the Lord—From the Painting by W. L. Taylor

The Ladies' HOME JOURNAL

BARTON W. CURRIE, Editor

Editorial

Twain

WHY is it that in America woman stands higher in the esteem of man than in almost any other country on earth? To what circumstances or conditions do we accredit the fact that her estate among us is so different from that enjoyed by her sisters of the Old World as commonly to excite remark and not infrequently inspire amazement on the part of our foreign friends and visitors? It cannot be explained upon any assumption that on this side of the water woman has obtained some sort of special advantage over her masculine mate. That assumption would be instantly repudiated by both men and women; besides, the relationship in question savors of equality and comradeship rather than the assumption of supremacy on the one hand or deference to superiority on the other.

Nor can the position which is accorded to the American woman be considered as due to excessive courtesy on the part of the man, because the American is not particularly famous for the graces and suavities of extreme politeness.

No, indeed. This new relation between men and women rests upon something basic. It is not sentiment or emotion merely, though it is respectful and tender. It is not temporary, but abiding. It is not directed to favored individuals only; it is general. It is not put on as a garment, but it is constitutional and inheres in the very fiber of what we like to call Americanism.

In trying to account for the origin of this distinctive New World development, something may be said about the leveling effect of mutual responsibilities under the ballot, directing common attention to great public questions, and much may be accredited to the essential advantages of woman in a democracy as compared to the older order of society. Much can be said about the advantages that have followed the general admission of women to institutions of higher learning, and much more can be said about the effects of intimate association, not only in coeducation from the grades up to and through college but on into business and almost every conceivable form of social, civic and political activity.

But there is a factor, often overlooked and oftener yet forgotten, which has exerted a mighty influence upon American character, and at no point more than in the fundamental relations between men and women. That factor lay in the lives and experiences of our pioneer ancestors as they carved a nation out of the wilderness. Unique if not entirely new in the world, it is here that we shall find the principal explanation of whatever is distinctive in the standing of womankind in the eyes of American men.

America's early development was different in many respects from that of any known part of the Old World, and in none more distinctively than in those conditions that bear upon the relations between men and women.

All the older countries were acquired and reacquired by conquest. An army of men overran a continent or part of a continent and divided the spoils of war—lands, livestock and even men and women—between the conquerors. Under the feudal system the vassals went with the estate, whether acquired by conquest or by purchase. War was the chief occupation of ambitious men. The soldier was exalted to the first rank, and all others, men and women alike, accepted an inferior status in society. Lord and lady they were, to be sure, but the lady was the property of her lord rather than his companion, as witness the facility and the informality with which even the best of men changed favorites.

From the days of the tribe forward it was the man as hunter and warrior that occupied the prominent place in public esteem, and nothing happened to greatly disturb this relation until the sailing of the Pilgrims in their quest for liberty, which culminated in a New World built on virgin soil in almost every sense of the term.

It was different here in every way. America was not conquered by an advancing army of professional warriors. It was developed by the gradual infiltration of immigrants to a wild and almost uninhabited country. Men and women suffered together the privations of the open sea, and they lived and died together upon the land. Those who survived buried their dead together and took up again, side by side, the terrible task of fighting off starvation and sickness in a new and strange and forbidding land.

Foot by foot and almost inch by inch they together subdued the forest. Year by year they fought frost and famine. Without warning they fought the red man, worst of all. The wife ran bullets while the husband stood at the loophole, and when he fell it was she who caught up the gun and defended her home and little ones while life was left. The woman could do and she did do anything and everything that a man could do in gaining a foothold of liberty on a new continent, and it was thus she entered into her birthright.

Children born of such parents married and moved on farther and ever farther into the unbroken wilderness. The young husband and his wife, with ax and dog and gun, literally walked a day's journey or a month's beyond the farthest settlement, "took up" a homestead of "wild land" and, while the young wife watched for prowling savages, the man brought down the giant trees and opened a clearing that crops might be grown as bread for him and his.

One Man Beside One Woman

THIS was the way America was developed. The unit of conquest was not a conquering army with banners; it was one man beside one woman, and there was nothing that either could not do. They both could chop and burn. They both could shoot. They both could sew and harvest. They both could cook. They wrought together in health and nursed each other in illness. They twain, working alone in the world together, became literally one flesh and one spirit.

Loving and working and suffering and succeeding side by side, year after year as age crept slowly on, they grew very close together, this man and this woman, and their children, raised in this atmosphere of mutual labor, love and sacrifice, drank in with their mother's milk and breathed in the very atmosphere of the rugged home a veneration and respect for womankind, first as personified in the mother and afterward in the wife, such as were never known before within the space of recorded history.

So was born the American's attitude toward womankind. He does not consider her as his inferior to be held in servitude, nor yet as a plaything to be petted and spoiled. He does not so much regard woman as his superior, for he can think of nothing except motherhood in which his own sense of manhood does not drive him to equal her. Upon the altar of motherhood, however, he lays his heart and his full measure of adoration. In all other matters he regards his wife as his companion—companion in the necessary labors of the family, and companion in the successes of life as she is also in its hardships and its failures.

Such was the soil and such were the conditions that produced that new thing in the world that we call the place of the American woman. Her great-great-grandmother won it for her more than did all modern influences combined. It is a precious possession that we cannot afford to lose, even though the conditions that developed it have long since passed away never to return.

The American man believes that his mother and his wife and his daughter, together with his neighbor's wife and daughter, are possessed of the same stern but gentle stuff that made his female ancestors the greatest women that the world had up to that time produced. This is the great reason why American women occupy to-day the place they hold in the esteem of men.

What are We Doing With Our Children

The Old-Fashioned Mother and the New-Fashioned Daughter

By BEATRICE BARMBY

MOTHER! The most thrilling thing. You'll never guess!" Julia burst into my room while I was making the bed, my hands mechanically effective, my mind occupied with plans for the usual busy day of the modern woman who runs a house with inefficient help, plays golf and bridge, is an energetic worker in community service, has many friends and a growing daughter. "When I called for Milly to go to school she wasn't there. She's run away to be married—just left a note; Mrs. Carlow's all fussed up."

"Milly! But she's a mere child, not out of high —"

"Isn't it exciting? And won't Katherine be wild, for she was crazy about George?"

"Not George Langdon!"

Julia nodded her head violently.

My poor Anne Carlow! No wonder she was "fussed up," for there was not a mother of us who did not dislike and distrust this erratic, unstable youth of eighteen, an only son with unlimited pocket money, the manners of a tired man of the world and the intelligence of a spoiled child of twelve; not one of us who would not have forbidden our sons and daughters speaking to him if we had had the courage! But his father was the richest man in our neighborhood, which, by the way, is composed of average families, neither very rich nor very poor, and is within easy commuting distance of the city where our husbands have their businesses. Mrs. Langdon was the leader of our social affairs while George was "the fashion" with the younger set.

"How miserable Anne will be! How could Milly leave her alone, when she had everything; not a wish unfulfilled?"

"Why, mother, you might think she was dead! I guess Milly can take care of herself; and she'll have a wonderful time while it lasts."

Not a Steady Husband

I LOOKED at my pretty daughter with her bright eyes and excited manner, with her bobbed hair standing out from her head in a curly mass, her sweater belted where her hips should have been. Her figure was thin, immature, childish enough, but in some subtle way she suggested a sophistication which we were once wont to associate with the seamy side of life. Memory made me wince, memory of my dreams over her baby body in which I had seen her growing to the ideal womanhood my own mother represented, hoping that my Julia might be as morally courageous, as loyal, as unselfish, as patient, as cheerful.

"While it lasts!" Julia evidently didn't expect anything permanent. "But what about afterwards?"

She shrugged her shoulders. "Oh, I don't suppose Milly is worrying about that. I shouldn't fancy George as a steady husband, but she can always get rid of him. And just think, mother, they've taken the new auto his father's just given him, and they're going to Palm Beach, and Milly didn't take a rag; so she'll have to get a whole new outfit."

As Julia rattled on in her nervous, excited voice the intangible sense of bewilderment which had lately been present on her account crystallized into a sudden, clear, chill sense of failure. Was this the result of my dreams? "And suppose there is a child. Don't any of you think of a thing beyond a new sensation, a good time? Don't you take any responsibility, any —" Anger choked my voice.

Julia stood there with that maddening touch of tolerance with which the modern child regards its parents. "Well, she doesn't need to have any children, and in any case it will be all right. It wouldn't be a bad thing to be the grandson or granddaughter of old George Langdon; there'll be oodles of money. Good-by; I must go and tell the girls." And Julia left me.

Fussy and Old-Fashioned

PREVIOUSLY, when this sense of disappointment had touched the edges of my busy life, I had consoled myself with the thought that Julia, if not admittedly exactly like my ideal, was by no means the most reckless or selfish of the young people I knew; that I was doing all a busy mother could do, keeping house efficiently, seeing that clothes were dainty, eyes and teeth examined, lessons not neglected; further, that the trend towards instability and selfishness in modern youth was but a temporary result of the abnormality of war.

Now I began to ask myself some frank questions: Had my interests become so widely scattered that Julia had suffered—oh, not materially, but in the lack of time and perseverance necessary for the training of her character? Had I, in spite of belief in the value of discipline and the example my mother had set in my own training, gradually grown slack, falling into line with the general trend of indulgence? Had I lost the old sense of home making and child training, the instinct for instilling into my child's love that touch of awe, devotion and respect which I had for my mother? Awe, respect—can't you hear Julia and your sons and daughters giggle?

During the next two weeks I kept my mind firmly fixed on these questions, watched the apparent indifference of a few women to anything but their own amusement and comfort, gathered the confessions of many another mother I knew, bewildered by her lack of control over her children, hurt by their lack of devotion to her. I saw Anne Carlow's face grow paler. Another episode drove the truth still further home.

For the eloping couple returned, and though there was much killing of the fatted calf there was no sign of repentance. I heard George laughingly apologize that they hadn't been able to give a wedding feast and boast that the celebration he had in view should make up for it—an automobile party to a football game the following Saturday, and a dinner and dance at the Langdon home. From Julia's hectic list of names, I supposed that all the "favored" children of the neighborhood were invited.

"Is Mrs. Langdon going to the game with you?" I asked Julia.

"I should say not; but Milly'll be there, and she's married."

"Milly!" I echoed. Milly as a chaperon!

"Oh, mother," Julia burst in petulantly, "don't be so fussy and old-fashioned!"

Weakly I said nothing more, consoling myself with the thought that they'd be home before dinner, that Mrs. Langdon would then be hostess, and that I would call for Julia on my way home from a card party.

There was, however, no sign of the usual blaze of light which George demanded. Instead I was met by Mr. Langdon with the disquieting information that his wife had been taken suddenly and rather seriously ill just before lunch, but that the doctor had pronounced that she had taken the right turn about an hour ago.

"Where are the children?" I asked.

"Oh, they'll be all right! George is going to take them to the Palace for dinner and a dance as he couldn't have them here."

"How fortunate that his mother's illness didn't cause any interference with his plans," I said in bitter irony.

"Oh, well," Mr. Langdon shrugged his shoulders, "we're only young once, you know!"

"That's the tragedy of it; our children are never young; they're sophisticated, satiated, bored before they are out of their teens."

All Happy Except the Bride

JULIA had gone, knowing how I should disapprove; that was the thing which stung as I waited. It was almost midnight when an automobile arrived at the door with tremendous hilarity. George had apparently been driving with one arm, his other being buried behind the girl next to him, who was in turn crushed the tighter by another couple also on the front seat. Julia struggled out of a similar mêlée in the rear, and they were off again.

"Eight of us in the back," said she with flushed cheeks and bright eyes. "Johnny's machine broke down. Gee, but I'll never choose Billy for a seat again, he's got such knobby knees!"

"Julia! Whatever kind of a party have you been to?"

She giggled. "Regular petting party, I'd say. We were all happy except Milly, who was mad at George; so he got even by being extra nice to Katherine, made her sit by him coming home; and Mary, who was peeved because she only had that kid Brian Souter —"

"Mary was there too!" Mary had lost her mother only two months before. "Julia, you're cheapening yourself; you knew Mrs. Langdon

(Continued on Page 45)

Ask these Questions in Selecting a Home Site

Selecting the Site and the Plans

By P. S. LOVEJOY

Inquiries about the houses shown should be addressed to the Architectural Department, The Ladies' Home Journal

The type of house illustrated by the upper picture is becoming very popular, but frequently the high-pitched roof and the gables spoil the interior effect of the upper rooms. In this house, however, plans of which are shown at the left of the page, there is only a difference of six inches in the height of the ceilings, those on the first floor being eight feet six inches and on the second floor eight feet. The storage space above is unfinished. The approximate cost is about $7000, including a hot-air furnace, first-class plumbing and a hardwood floor in the living-room.

WHATEVER else it may turn out to be, the home that you build is an investment. To be a thoroughly good investment it should turn out to be not only satisfactory to the family that lives in it but a property that for many years will constantly increase in value. And as increase in value of improved real estate is usually due to rise in the values of the land rather than the buildings, the quality of the home as an investment is largely dependent upon the skill with which the land is selected.

Especially in the case of new homes built on borrowed money, it is important to make sure that the building site is well selected and that the building is well adjusted to the site. So having determined the approximate limit of cost that can be considered, the next decision must be as to the general locality in which one is to buy and build. Shall it be on the east or the west side? On the heights or more downtown? Will it be a regular city lot or something in the suburbs or out in the country?

Usually we want to live close to our friends, but with the automobile, that can often be managed with less regard to actual distance than used to be the case. Because of this, a rapid shifting of real-estate values is going on in almost every community.

In most families there are certain fixed combinations that must be provided for. Must the head of the house be at his desk at a given time every working day? Then dependable transportation will be a limiting factor in locating the new home site. Are the children going to school? A good school that can be reached without dangerous street crossings should be near. Is the family very fond of tennis or swimming? Then courts or beach should be near by. All such limiting items having been checked over, the choice of building sites is narrowed down again.

Unneighborly neighbors are among the least satisfactory of home surroundings. What of the neighbors? And what of their children and phonographs and evening habits? Will they prove pleasant to live among? What of the future of the block or subdivision or ward? Will it attract more and more of your sort of people? These are mighty important questions.

For each locality which seems to offer promising building sites, consider everything you can think of that may affect the livability or the salability of such a home as you have in mind.

SECOND FLOOR

FIRST FLOOR

ARCHITECT, WILLIAM F. BERRY, JR.

THE ARCHITECTS: SMALL HOUSE DESIGN BUREAU

The lower picture illustrates a Dutch Colonial house of frame construction and brick foundation. The charm of the Colonial house is irresistible, there seeming to cling about it the old-time hospitality of the early settlers. This house is quite small, but the six rooms and bath are arranged so that no space is wasted—one way of reducing building costs. Standard lengths and stock materials were used in this little house. The approximate cost is about $8000. Plans, material bill and professional counsel may be had from the architects for a nominal fee.

where there are no building restrictions. The coming of factories may bring a host of workmen who choke the streets and the street cars twice a day. The sudden increase in street traffic will bring in store buildings and commercial garages.

Noises are among the most common of nuisances and are of endless sorts. The view from the lots on top of the boulevard hill may be splendid—and people with automobiles may think so, too, and five hundred of them may come driving up every fine evening, with their mufflers cut out on account of the grade. Evenings on Elm Place may be beautifully quiet—but only because they do not start to switch freight cars in the First Street yards until three A.M. Evenings and nights near Washington and Maple avenues may be very pleasant, but at eight, ten, twelve, one, three and four o'clock there may be bedlam from the children over at the Lincoln school. A curve in the street-car tracks may develop frantic shrieks and squeals at ten-minute intervals night and day.

Smells may be tremendous nuisances, and though they are usually suppressed by the authorities they are sometimes quite beyond control, as in the case of rivers and lakes during late summer.

If one settles in a rapidly developing neighborhood early enough to get the full benefit of increasing real-estate values, one must expect to live for some years in the midst of pounding and yelling and heavy traffic and torn-up roads, as other people come in and build in turn.

Unpleasant sights and views are to be avoided in the general neighborhood. No one likes to travel squalid streets in getting downtown or to be compelled to view the neighbor's wash on the line. How long will it be before those old barns are moved? When will those corner lots become something other than dumps and thistle patches?

(Continued on Page 162)

A Disappointment

THE names of the forty-five prize winners in the house-plan contest cannot be announced until March. "I find that my eyes will not stand more than nine hours' daily work examining contest plans and letters," writes the Contest Editor, "and the flood of plans that came right at the last won't let me finish in time for a February announcement. I simply will not do it hastily: the selection of prize winners is too important. However, I shall have all the prize plans in shape, ready for publication in the March issue—and that is, after all, the important point."

So we'll all have to be patient another month.

The first consideration is safety—actual physical safety and then the safety of the investment. Is there possibility of flood damage? Would a big fire in the direction of the prevailing wind be apt to sweep the whole district? Are there good local fire and police arrangements? Are the streets well lighted and are passers-by frequent? What about the water supply? Is it safe for domestic use and is there plenty in case of fire? What about drainage, sewage disposal and standing water? Are there fly-breeding stables or mosquito-breeding swamps near by? Is the street traffic fast and heavy and dangerous?

Present conditions are important—the future still more so. Are there apt to be changes before long? If so, are the changes sure to be for the better? And how soon are the changes to be expected and who says so?

The livability of a home site is largely dependent upon the absence of nuisances. In addition to those mentioned there is crowding. Unexpected crowding may develop through the opening of a new street-car line or highway or the sudden increase in the desirability of a neighborhood

SECOND FLOOR

FIRST FLOOR

Tender luscious little peas
Make this soup so sure to please.
Even better, you'll agree,
Eaten as a Cream of Pea.

Such delicious pea soup!

Of course pea soup is a favorite of yours—it's one of the most popular dishes all over the world. But taste Campbell's! It will give you a new idea of how good pea soup can be! Every smooth, creamy spoonful will delight you with its fresh flavor and rich nourishment.

Campbell's Pea Soup

has the fragrance of a new spring day—welcome as its sunshine and its fresh green tints. Sugar-sweet peas, rich country milk, golden creamery butter are blended and daintily spiced to make as fine a pea soup as ever graced your table. All the family will like it!

21 kinds

12 cents a can

The next time you are hostess

You will be proud of your Cream of Pea Soup made with Campbell's. It is the simplest and easiest of dishes to prepare, yet a luxury every woman will love. Read on the can the brief directions for making it. Daintier still in bouillon cups topped with whipped cream.

Campbell's SOUPS

LOOK FOR THE RED AND WHITE LABEL

WHEN Judge Bumble took charge of the Bumbleton Banner he announced in his very first issue that he would submit to no dictation in any sense of the word, but he soon found that it was difficult to live up to this high ideal.

"Did Mrs. Larkspur get you over the phone?" Mrs. Bumble asked him one afternoon when he came home with a bundle of newspapers under his arm.

Judge Bumble told his wife that Mrs. Larkspur had talked to him and then he went about his work.

"Did she want you to say some more about Laura?" Mrs. Bumble asked, and the editor told her that Laura had been granted a certificate and that she would teach the Blockhouse school.

"Well, did she say that it was a second-grade certificate and that there are not more than six or eight pupils who attend that school?" asked Mrs. Bumble. The editor thought it was unnecessary to mention those details, but Mrs. Bumble thought it important.

"If I were running a newspaper," she said, "I wouldn't be afraid to tell the truth. I am sure I don't care anything about Mrs. Larkspur one way or the other, although she did treat me meanly at the bazaar, but if I were in your place I wouldn't allow her to use me to advertise Laura. I pity the children that Laura will teach."

Judge Bumble wrote furiously for an hour or more and, as he was rather proud of what he had written, he made no objection when Mrs. Bumble took up the news items he had prepared for the Banner and began reading them.

"Won't you ever tire of telling the people about Dollie Buttercup and her reading?" Mrs. Bumble asked. "It was great entertainment, I must say. She has recited that Baron's Last Banquet no less than a dozen times that I know of, and I am sure that nobody cares to hear it except Mrs. Buttercup."

"The family has an idea that some young man will hear Dollie recite and fall desperately in love with her on the spot; but if I were a young man I would want a wife who could do something besides recite that tragic piece. The baron ought to be thankful that he is dead and out of the way so he won't have to listen to her."

"My, what a beautiful description you have of the decorations at Mabel's party! It must have been a regular flower show, but I would like to know what you get for saying so much about it. Mabel doesn't care a thing in the world for you, and you always have a big write-up of everything she does."

"Of course this causes her to think that you blame me for the trouble she and I had, when you know well enough that it was her fault. I know that people must laugh when they see what you have to say about her. Most people know that she is nothing, absolutely nothing."

"And so Arthur and Ora will visit points in the East on their honeymoon trip, will they? I wouldn't have stopped at that if I had been you. I would have said that they were going to Europe. The fact is that they are going to Parker's Ford, where he has an aunt who runs a boarding house. I wish you would change this and put it that they are going to Parker's Ford. I don't care anything about it, only I don't want Ora's mother to think she is putting it over the people."

"Well, you did mention that Mrs. Applecrab is going to visit her mother, didn't you? You have devoted two whole lines to it. Don't you think you ought to leave it out and use the space for something about Laura Larkspur? Don't you think that two lines is entirely too much to devote to one of my friends?"

At the dinner table Mrs. Bumble had something to remind her of her husband's spineless policy of failing to reward her friends and punish her enemies in the columns of the Banner.

"Here is some of the wedding cake. Mrs. Pepper sent it. I suppose she expects you to pay for it by writing an extra column about the wedding. I wish you would say that the cake is soggy."

NO MATTER how much a husband has achieved in any other line he would rather have his wife brag of his cooking than anything else. Recently, when Mrs. Jason was sick, Mr. Jason was unable to get help in the home, so he had to do the cooking. At dinner-time he brought in some toast and tea for Mrs. Jason, and she declared that it was the most wonderful toast she had ever tasted. She also inquired how he had made the tea and he went to great pains to tell her. When it was almost time for the next meal she heard him in the kitchen scraping toast, but when he brought it she didn't notice that he had let it burn. She said it was better even than the first he brought her, and the tea was so good that she

Bumbleton Folks

By CLAUDE CALLAN

Illustration by Thomas Fogarty

asked for a second cup. She told women who called that Mr. Jason had always said he couldn't cook, but that he had fixed her nice meals since she had been sick. After eating a third meal of toast and tea, Mrs. Jason was so strong that she was able to bake a potato and poach an egg for herself.

MR. TRUNDLE has learned what to say when his wife asks him which of a number of women he considers the prettiest. A few months ago she showed him the pictures of three prominent beauties and asked his opinion about them. He glanced at the pictures and said he believed the one on the right was the best looking. "Do you really think she is good-looking?" his wife asked. "I think she has a mean look." Several times during the day she brought up the subject, and each time she found some new point to criticize. She said the woman's features were too large, that she had squinty eyes and a sort of coarse, ignorant look about her. Later, just to give Mr. Trundle another chance she showed him several more pictures in a magazine. He pointed to the one he thought the prettiest, and Mrs. Trundle was greatly surprised. "Well, I never thought you would pick her," Mrs. Trundle said. "She has a bold, brazen look about her that I don't like at all. And she is so large. By the time she is as old as I am she will be miserable. There are some types of women who look all right when they are young and then get to be downright ugly before they are thirty, and she is just exactly that type. I can't see a thing in the world to that one and I can't understand why you would select her from all those." That evening Mrs. Trundle told her husband she had taken another look at that picture in an effort to see what it was he admired, but that she had failed to find one good feature. The experience gained in these two beauty contests taught Mr. Trundle something, and last week when Mrs. Trundle showed him the pictures of the three brides-to-be and asked him to tell her which one he considered the prettiest, he said he didn't think there was a pretty one in the bunch. "Well, I don't either, for that matter," said Mrs. Trundle; "but they all are right nice looking, and they will make better wives than some of the beauties."

HE BROUGHT IN SOME TOAST AND TEA FOR MRS. JASON, AND SHE DECLARED THAT IT WAS THE MOST WONDERFUL TOAST SHE HAD EVER TASTED

Major Dough is building a new home, much finer than his old one, so the next school catalogue will have a different picture of the "Typical Bumbleton Residence."

When there has been a fire in town, most people decide that it was from some such cause as a defective flue, but the volunteer detectives find shavings at a place where the blaze was first seen.

TOM JIMPSON was the most timid young man in Bumbleton, and when he was twenty-five years old he had never gone with a girl. In spite of this he was anxious to marry, and he hit upon a plan to trap one of the young women of the town. Tom owned a lot in a good part of town, and he decided to build a house that all the girls would admire. His idea was to make one of them fall in love with the house and in that way use it to gain a wife. When the building was finished Tom saw a great many people admire it, but no girl proposed to him and he found himself no braver than he had been before. But finally his sister-in-law, Mrs. Henry Jimpson, sent for her sister to spend the summer with her. Mrs. Henry Jimpson said that the sister, Minnie, and Tom were kin folks, and Tom accepted this as true. Thinking of the girl as a sort of sister-in-law, Tom Jimpson was able to talk to her and ever to take her to church. Minnie called him Cousin Tom and, because of the fact that he was a relative, she didn't hesitate to ask him to take her wherever she wanted to go. For two months not one word passed between Tom and Minnie that might have been called making love to each other. In fact, Minnie frequently wore a house dress in Tom's presence and said it made no difference because they were kin folks. One day when Minnie was not at home, Mrs. Henry Jimpson said to Tom: "Minnie thinks your house is pretty."

For the first time Tom realized that Minnie was not his relative, and he boldly said to his sister-in-law: "Well, it isn't any prettier than she is." That evening Minnie told Tom that he was a flatterer because he had compared her beauty with that of the house, and in a short time they were married and living in the new home. Tom didn't say much about his scheme, but he wore a smile on his face which showed that he was conscious of how he had shrewdly married things and caught a wife in his trap.

FOR several months Dollie Buttercup has been saying that she isn't understood. She doesn't explain just what it means, but evidently she feels that she has ability, ambition and temperament that cannot be grasped by the ordinary mortal. She has not developed any talent, but she likes to disregard the customs of the common herd. For one thing it worries her to have her parents find fault with anything she does. When she returns home two hours after the time her mother told her to come she can't endure being reproved. She says she isn't understood. She so thoroughly dislikes such things as washing dishes and mending clothes that she knows it was intended that she should have servants wait on her. Mr. Buttercup realizes that he doesn't understand his daughter, but he sympathizes with her. Occasionally he loses his temper and talks cross.

Dollie because of something she has done, but he sees by her actions that she is a child who cannot stand being scolded, and he immediately tries to make up with her by apologizing for his harsh words. But Mrs. Buttercup is different. She is a woman with a lot of good, hard sense, and on a recent occasion when Dollie declared she had never been understood Mr. Buttercup said to her: "Now, here, young lady. I have heard enough of that. I have lived in the house with you for eighteen years and I think that I know you pretty well. As for your wanting to run around, the time and keep out of work, that isn't anything about you to understand."

Dear Mr. Currie:-

What a keen observer of our little human foibles is your Claude Callan, with his "Bumbleton Folks." And how he hits us off, just when we are least suspecting! It's a clever pen which can amuse and yet stab one "broad awake," every now and then. I'm truly grateful to him for both results of certain of his pungent paragraphs, and would like to send him that message.

Most sincerely yours,

Frederic S. Richmond

Miss Violet Heming, who posed for this study of her lovely hands, says: "Cutex provides the busy woman with a quick, easy and delightful way of keeping her own nails always in perfect condition."

Just wipe away the ugly dead cuticle—

NEVER use a manicure scissors on the cuticle. All the best authorities on the care of the nails say that this is what causes hangnails, and the ragged, frowsy condition of the nail rims that makes any hand look ugly and unkept.

This thin fold of scarf-skin about the base of the nail is like the selvage edge of a piece of cloth. When it is cut or torn, the whole nail rim gradually ravel out—just as cloth ravel when the selvage is cut.

You can take off the hard dry edges of dry skin that collect about the base of the nail quickly, easily, harmlessly with Cutex Cuticle Remover. Just work gently about the nail base with an orange stick dipped in the liquid, rinse and, when drying, push the cuticle gently downwards. The ugly, dead cuticle will simply wipe away.

Then examine your nail rims! See how smooth, even, thin and transparent the cuticle is now. And not a bit of the sore-ness that cutting the cuticle always left behind.

Get rid of your manicure scissors; you will never need them again. Once you have begun to use Cutex regularly you will have no more hangnails and the entire cuticle will always be firm and even.

Two new polishes— just perfected

Cutex now offers you the very latest and finest development of two highly popular forms of nail polish—Powder Polish and Liquid Polish. Both are the result of years of experiment in the greatest laboratory for manicure preparations in the world.

They are put forth now because, at last, they meet every requirement for these two forms of polish. Cutex Powder Polish will give you the highest, most lasting lustre obtainable in the shortest possible time and with the least buffing.

Cutex Liquid Polish goes on with an absolutely uniform smoothness, dries instantly, and leaves a lustre that keeps its even brilliance for at least a week. Used as a finishing touch, it will make a manicure last twice as long.

Many people like to have all the manicuring necessities together in one of the convenient Cutex Sets. They come in three sizes: at 60c, $1.50 and $3.00. Or each article separately at 35c. At all drug and department stores in the United States and Canada and at chemist shops in England.

New Introductory Set— now only 15c

Send today for the new Introductory Set containing samples of Cutex Cuticle Remover, Cuticle Comfort, the new Liquid Polish and the new Powder Polish, with orange stick and emery board. Address Northam Warren, 114 West 17th St., New York. Or if you live in Canada, Dept. 102, 200 Mountain St., Montreal.

MAIL THIS COUPON WITH 15c TODAY

Northam Warren,
Dept. 102, 114 West 17th Street,
New York City.

Name _____

Street _____

City and State _____

The Mexican Twins Celebrate San Ramon's Day

Fold-A-Way Dolls
Designed by Jessie Louise Taylor

DIRECTIONS FOR MAKING FOLD-A-WAY DOLLS

Mount dolls on old magazine cover or letterhead. When thoroughly dry cut out all around dark outline and cut into lines on bases to make the locks, also cut slits in body into which the dress tubes fit. Fold over directly on the dotted lines at the top of the head and the dotted lines at the feet, but in opposite directions as shown on the little figures. Bring bases together and slide locks from one side into the slits on the opposite side. Doll will then stand alone. The clothes need not be mounted, but will last longer if mounted on a light paper before cutting out. Cut into the slits and fold directly on the dotted lines. The hat should be tipped with points on the inside, just below the slit only. The shawl should be tipped with piece around the inside edge of back part; the right side should be folded along straight line and passed through slit in dress over right arm.

JESSIE LOUISE TAYLOR

PEOPLE will always want to see such Paramount Pictures as the screen versions of the world's greatest novels, immortal short stories and picked stage plays, as well as original photoplays constructed by the world's greatest dramatists.

Such pictures set a standard for the whole industry.

No wonder they daily fill the seats of more than 11,200 theatres!

For your own sake don't ever miss a Paramount Picture at your theatre.

2

PARAMOUNT PICTURES

listed in order of release

January 1, 1922 to March 1, 1922

Ask your theatre manager when he will show them

Betty Compson in
"The Little Minister"
by James M. Barrie.
A Penrhyn Stanlaw Production.

A William De Mille Production
"Miss Lulu Bett"
with Lois Wilson, Milton Sills, Theodore Roberts and Helen Ferguson.
From the novel and play by Zona Gale.

Wallace Reid in "Rent Free."
By Isola Forrester and Mann Page.

"Back Pay," by Fannie Hurst.
Directed by Frank Borzage.
A Cosmopolitan Production.

Cecil B. De Mille's Production
"Fool's Paradise."
Suggested by Leonard Merrick's story
"The Laurels and the Lady."

Thomas Meighan in
"A Prince There Was."
From George M. Cohan's play and the novel "Enchanted Hearts"
by Darragh Aldrich.

Agnes Ayres in
"The Lane That Had no Turning"
by Sir Gilbert Parker.

"Boomerang Bill"
with Lionel Barrymore.
By Jack Boyle.
A Cosmopolitan Production.

John S. Robertson's Production
"Love's Boomerang" with Ann Forrest
From the novel "Perpetua" by
Dian Clayton Calthrop.

A George Fitzmaurice Production
"Three Live Ghosts" with
Anna Q. Nilsson and Norman Kerry.

"One Glorious Day" with
Will Rogers and Lila Lee.
By Walter Woods and O. B. Barringer.

Betty Compson in
"The Law and the Woman."
Adapted from the Clyde Fitch play
"The Woman in the Case."
A Penrhyn Stanlaw Production.

George Melford's Production
"Moran of the Lady Letty" with Dorothy Dalton.
From the story by Frank Norris.

Marion Davies in
"The Bride's Play" by Donn Byrne.
Supervised by Cosmopolitan Productions.

Ethel Clayton in "Her Own Money."
Adapted from the play by Mark Swan.

ADOLPH ZUKOR PRESENTS ELSIE FERGUSON AND WALLACE REID

IN "FOREVER"

A George Fitzmaurice Production

Based on the novel by George Du Maurier and the play by John Nathan Raphael

"PETER IBBETSON"

Photoplay by Ouida Bergere

A Paramount Picture

SUCH a magic spell as this love-play casts never fell upon you before from the screen!

Elsie Ferguson's name alone ensures you a fascinating time. Wallace Reid's name alone is the key to a thrilling show—

—but together!—as the fond immortal lovers in Du Maurier's fine story "Peter Ibbetson," they are the equal of Romeo and Juliet, aching for each other's presence, lost in the tide of a divine love!

The picture abounds with adventure and excitement.

In one part there's foul play at a prize-fight in the dreadful Limehouse section of London, and Wallace Reid hops over the ropes and puts up a fight that ends with a knock-out in the most vigorous tradition of the sport.

A voluptuous Spanish dancer sets her mantilla for him but he resists the lure and remains true to Elsie Ferguson.

Wallace Reid murders the slanderer who fouls his dead mother's pure name, and the deed thrills one as an almost justifiable act!

The love scenes swoon with beauty. The whole direction is perfect screen art, and the congratulations of the entire world are due to Paramount's producing staff.

"Forever" is another perfect example of everything that Paramount stands for in the field of great entertainment.

There is a saying "See Naples and die."

See "Forever" and live!

Ask your Theatre Manager when he will show it.

What the New York Newspapers Said

World: Here is a master-work of the photo drama, one of the three best pictures from an artistic standpoint yet made in America, if not the very best.

Times: Even if you are a hard-shell the picture will probably get you.

American: Pictures like this... rarely seen on the screen... extremely interesting and worth while.

Sun: A screen triumph. A great love story.

Other newspapers: Sets a new standard for American films. Rises to great heights. Tense and unforgettable.

Paramount Pictures

If it's a Paramount Picture it's the best show in town

Winter days invite your KODAK

Autographic Kodaks at your Dealer's

Eastman Kodak Company

Rochester, N.Y.

The Kodak City

The Mexican Twins Celebrate San Ramon's Day

The story of the Mexican Twins who are shown in colored cut-out dolls on page 32. Next month—the French Twins.

By LUCY FITCH PERKINS

IN A SUNNY corner of the great plantation of Señor Fernandez, in Mexico, there stands a little gray adobe house covered with a thatch of yellow straw. In this house live the twins, Tonio and Tita. Tonio is the boy and Tita is the girl, and they are eight years old. Of course their mother, Doña Teresa, and their father, Pancho, live in the little house, too, as well as Tonio's dog, whose name is Jasmin. Beside the hut there is a fig tree that bears the most delicious figs.

Every night the red rooster, the five hens and the turkey go to roost in its branches, and every day its green boughs make a pleasant shade across the doorway.

Very early one summer morning the red rooster crowed so long and loud that he woke not only the turkey and the five hens but the twins, their father and mother and Jasmin. The moment she opened her eyes Doña Teresa opened her mouth, too, and began to talk.

"Upon my soul," she cried, crossing herself, "it's a lucky thing the red rooster keeps track of the time or we should all be late. Come, my pigeons, we must not lie abed after cockcrow on San Ramon's Day."

As they all slept in their clothes no time had to be lost in dressing, and Pancho rolled off his mat at once and was out of doors, with Jasmin at his heels. The twins sat up and rubbed their eyes.

"Oh, little mother, is it really the fiesta of San Ramon? And may I take the little white hen all myself?" cried Tita.

"You may take the little white hen if you can catch her," Doña Teresa answered. "Indeed we must take all the animals, or at the very least one of each kind to stand for all the others. The turkey must be caught, the goat brought in from the field so I can milk her. Tonto—that was what they called the donkey—is waiting in the shed to be made ready, not to speak of the cat and the dog."

WHILE she talked Doña Teresa rolled up the sleeping mats, raked the ashes out of the queer little stove and lighted a fire, and by the time the twins had washed their faces their breakfast of tortillas was ready.

The moment the last crumb was gone and Pancho had ridden away on his horse Doña Teresa said: "Go now, my Tonio, and make Tonto beautiful! His coat is rough and full of burs, and he will make a poor figure unless you give him a good brushing. Only be careful of his hind legs. You know Tonto is sometimes very wild with his hind legs. It's strange to me that his front ones should be so much more tame, but it seems to be the nature of the poor beast."

Tonio went to Tonto's shed, led him out and tied him to a tree. Then he brushed his coat, took out the burs, braided the end of his tail and even made a wreath of green leaves and hung it on his left ear. Meanwhile Tita swept the ground under the fig tree, sprinkled it with water and washed the few dishes they had used. When she had finished this task her mother, who had been grinding corn for more tortillas, said to her:

"Now, my pigeon, see if you can catch the red rooster and the turkey. The rooster crows so sweetly I shall miss him when he is put in the pot, but he is not long for this world. He has no usefulness at all but to wake us in the morning. But the little white hen is the useful one. She has already laid three eggs. As for the turkey, it will be no grief to me when he is put on to oil, what with his gobbling um morning until night."

THE red rooster, the hen and the turkey were all under round in the little arch of garden behind the house, and when Tita came at, rattling corn in a dish, they swarmed about her feet, pecking at one another and watching greedily at each other as it fell.

"You all need better manners," Tita said to them; you behave like the pigs." She set the dish down on the ground and when they all leaped to get their heads into it once she seized the legs of the red rooster with one hand and those of the little white hen with the other, and before they could guess what in the world was happening to them she had them safely in the house and tied them to the legs of the table.

TONIO HAD PRACTICED LASSOING BUSHES AND CHICKENS AND EVEN TITA HERSELF

When Tita went back for the turkey she found him eating the very last kernels of corn out of the dish. He had driven all the hens away and was having a very nice time by himself. Tita made a grab for his legs, but he was too quick for her. He flew up into the fig tree. Tita looked up at him anxiously. "Come down now, that's a good old gobbler!" she said. "Mother says your temper is so bad you must surely go to the fiesta, and how can I take you if you won't come down?"

"Gobble," said the turkey. Tita was in despair. She threw a stick at him, but he only flew to the roof, walked up the thatch with his toes turned in and sat down on the ridge pole.

JUST then Tita looked down the river path and there was Tonio coming with the goat! At least he was trying to, but the goat didn't seem to care any more about the fiesta than the turkey did. She was standing with her forefeet braced, pulling back with all her might, while Tonio pulled forward on the lasso that was looped over her horns.

Tonio was very angry. He called to Tita: "Come and help me with this goat! She has acted like this all the way from the pasture."

Tita ran down the path and got behind the goat. She pushed and Tonio pulled, and by and by they got her as far as the fig tree. They tied her to a branch, and while Doña Teresa milked her the twins went after the turkey again.

Ever since he could remember Tonio had practiced lassoing bushes and stumps and pigs and chickens and even Tita herself, and no turkey could get the better of him. Suddenly the loop dropped over the turkey and tightened round his legs. If he hadn't had wings the turkey would certainly have tumbled off the roof. As it was, he flopped down, and Tita took him into the cabin and tied him to the third leg of the table. There he made himself very disagreeable to the little white hen, gobbled angrily at the red rooster and even pecked at Tita herself when she came near.

"There!" sighed Doña Teresa, when the turkey was safely tied. "At last we have them all together. Now we will make them all gay."

She went to the chest that held all their precious things and took out three rolls of tissue paper. "Look!" said she, holding them up for the twins to see. "These are all Mexican animals, so I thought it would be nice for them to wear the Mexican colors. Come, my angels, and I will show you how to make wreaths and streamers and fringes and flowers for them to wear. Our creatures must not shame us by looking shabby and dull in the procession. They shall be as gay as the best of them."

For a long time the three worked, and when they had made decorations for all the animals Doña Teresa brought out another surprise. It was some gilt paint and a brush. She let Tonio gild the goat's horns and hoofs, and Tita gilded the legs and feet of the little white hen.

WHILE she was doing it the red rooster stuck his bill into the dish and swallowed two great bites of gold paint. Doña Teresa saw him do it.

"If he isn't trying to gild himself on the inside!" she cried. "Did you ever see such sinful pride?"

And then she made him swallow a large piece of red pepper because she was afraid the paint would disagree with him. The red rooster seemed sad for a long time after that, but whether it was because of the paint or the pepper, or because he was so awfully dressed up, I cannot say. His bill was gilded because he had dipped it in the paint, so they gilded his legs to match; then they tied a white tissue paper wreath with long streamers around his neck.

They tied a red one on the little hen and tried to decorate the turkey, too, but he pecked at them so savagely that Doña Teresa was obliged to tie up his head in a rag.

At last a gong sounded from the big house. The gong was the signal for the procession to start, and the moment they heard it all the people living in the little cabins on the plantation began getting their animals together to drive them toward the place of the fiesta.

Doña Teresa untied the turkey's legs and took him in her arms. Though his head was still tied in the cloth he gobbled like everything.

TITA took the little white hen on one arm and her kitten on the other, and Tonio carried the rooster and rode the donkey, with Jasmin following behind. They were all ready to start when Doña Teresa cried out: "Upon my soul! We nearly forgot the goat!"

She hurried back to the fig tree and untied the goat with one hand, because she was still carrying the turkey in the other arm. When the goat felt herself free she gave a great jump and nearly jerked the rope out of Doña Teresa's hand; then she went galloping toward the gate so fast that poor Doña Teresa was all out of breath keeping up with her.

"Bless my soul, but that goat goes gayly!" she panted.

Already there were crowds of people going by. It was a wonderful procession. There were horses and cows, all gayly decorated with garlands and colored streamers. There were donkeys and pigs and guinea fowls and cats and dogs and birds in cages, and so many other creatures that it looked like the animals going into Noah's ark.

When they reached the large corrals back of the big house the twins could see Pancho dashing about on his horse after stray cows, while other cowboys rounded up the calves and put them in a corral by themselves. The bulls were already safely shut up in another pen and all the space about was filled with people and horses and donkeys and sheep and goats and dogs and cats and fowls of all kinds, all dressed in such gay colors and making such a medley of sounds that the Fourth of July, firecrackers and all, would have seemed like Sunday afternoon beside the celebration of San Ramon's Day in Mexico. There they waited and waited for a long time until the priest came out of his house and walked about among them, chanting a prayer.

OF COURSE the people behaved very well, but the turkey gobbled crossly, Jasmin barked and the cat stuck up her tail and arched her back in a most emphatic way. And Tonto, who should have known better, stuck his nose up in the air and let out a loud "hee-haw."

Only the red rooster, the little white hen, the goat and the twins behaved as if they had any bringing up at all.

After the blessing the people rose from their knees and drove the creatures back to their houses and to the fields. Pancho came riding along and took Tita and the white hen up on the horse's back with him. Tonio rode Tonto and carried the rooster. Tita had to put the cat down when she got up on the horse, and when Tonio's dog saw her he barked and she ran just as fast as she could to the cabin and got up on the roof out of his reach. Doña Teresa came panting along with the goat.

When she reached the gate to their own yard she set the turkey down and untied his head. Tonio let the rooster go and Tita set the little white hen free, and all three ran up to Tonto's shed, as if they were afraid of being caught again.

Pancho led Tonto and his horse down to the river for a drink and Tonio got the goat back to pasture by holding a carrot just out of her reach all the way.

When people get up so very early in the morning they need two breakfasts; so while Tonio and Pancho were gone Tita and her mother hurried to prepare the second one. They made fresh tortillas and heated up the beans and chili sauce, and when Tonio and his father came back they all sat down together on the stones under the fig tree to eat and talk over the events of the day.

"It was indeed a great fiesta," sighed Doña Teresa, as she dipped her tortilla in the chili sauce and took her first bite. "And indeed our creatures were as handsome as any, though their manners were not the best." Then as the red rooster stepped boldly in front of her, his eyes fixed on the beans in her dish, she added, "And thanks be, the red rooster is none the worse for the paint he swallowed. He will wake us again in the morning with his pretty crow."

WHEN TITA CAME OUT, RATTLING CORN IN A DISH, THEY SWARMED ABOUT HER FEET

TITA TOOK THE LITTLE WHITE HEN ON ONE ARM AND HER KITTEN ON THE OTHER, AND TONIO CARRIED THE ROOSTER AND RODE THE DONKEY

other, "I should have said that that girl was flirting with that young man!"

Now comes the part of Sandy Miller's story that the average man will not understand. The surface of it, though, will be clear and simple if he has ever known a town like Dawson.

The mere surface phase of the affair was enough to shake Dawson from station to suburb. Maisie Waterman's wedding was the one date about which the town's social calendar revolved. Her guests, her parties filled the Dawson Daily Eagle; Philip Morrow, older, distinguished-looking, New Yorker, was by far her most interesting guest. And all Dawson knew that he had fallen suddenly in love with Sandy Miller. He did not try to conceal the truth, and if he had Dawson would have guessed it just the same. You probably know Dawson.

The old women said Morrow was too old for Sandy, the young women wondered respectfully how Sandy had done it. As for the young men of Dawson, for the first time since they used to play throw-the-bye with her in Short's back yard, they noticed Sandy. The dalliers among them felt chagrined; it was like having a stranger discover oil on an old farm that a native might have bought for two hundred dollars. They felt piqued that they had overlooked home talent.

They just did what anyone who knows anything about the sheeplike propensities of young men would have expected them to do. They began to see charms in Sandy that they had never seen before. Her hair they suddenly declared they had always thought beautiful; her slim height graceful, distinctive. The fact that Sandy Miller had never cared about boys and men was no longer deemed an unfortunate peculiarity. It served only to make her seem suddenly exclusive, unattainable, exquisite, in a way that a Dawson girl who had been going from beau to beau since she was twelve could never be.

THIS change, of course, was in Dawson, not in Sandy, and is something a mere man can grasp. What he probably would not understand is the change that came to Sandy herself. For there was a real change that began, like the breaking of ice in the spring, the very moment that Sandy caught Morrow watching her in the car on Schoolkill Road.

She had not analyzed the amazing thrill of self-confidence, of happiness, that had tingled over her then. And during the week that followed, while all Dawson, more familiar with the signs, was saying that the stranger had fallen in love with "the red-headed Miller girl," Sandy herself would not have used such definite terms. One would have thought she had not been watching other girls' affairs since she was fourteen, so amazingly, bewilderingly new was her own to her. The blind, unrecognized, unadmitted instinct that had made the other Dawson girls beg to have their skirts down and their hair up five years or more ago was just coming to Sandy now.

It had its surface signs, this blind new instinct. She suddenly wanted clothes—Sandy, who had laughed at finery and worn her old gray sweater morning, noon and night.

Just a week before the wedding the maid of honor developed a belated huge one-sided case of mumps. She might recover in time. On the other hand, at the critical moment, she might begin to swell on the other side. Very humbly, Maisie begged Sandy to take her place. Sandy good-naturedly consented. A new lilac dress was rushed through. Sandy was at once included in all the wedding gayeties.

During a wait for some others of the party one of the afternoons, she and Morrow had glanced through an art magazine he had brought. There was a full-page colored reproduction of a painting, a slim, glowing woman with a flame of hair like Sandy's. Sandy read aloud the quotation beneath the painting:

"... dim are moon and stars above you; Gloriana, how you shine!"

"Gloriana!" the man repeated. "That should have been your name. 'Sandy!'" He flung the nickname aside contemptuously. "'Sandy'—what a name for a shining-haired goddess!"

Sandy had laughed at this, but not the old brusque mocking laugh she would have given a month ago. A month ago such a remark, in the very unlikely event of her having heard such a one, would have embarrassed her. She would have been afraid she was being made the butt of a joke and, as in the old "Bricktop" days, she would have laughed first and loudest of all, to protect herself. But there was no need for protection now, her laugh could be soft, sweet, feminine. Absurd as his phrase had been—and Sandy's reason told her it must be absurd—there was no mistaking the frank admiration in Morrow's eyes. Absurd or not, Sandy knew that he believed it.

"A SHINING-HAIRED goddess!" Knowing that she looked like that to him, no wonder Sandy ceased stooping to conceal her height; no wonder she discarded the brown nets she had worn in an embarrassed attempt to dull her hair; no wonder as she went from bridal tea to dance she carried her slim height as though it were a crown and fairly flaunted her shining hair.

These were the surface signs, but the real change in Sandy struck deeper than clothes or carriage—it was a change of the very spirit.

The glimpse of herself in a lover's eyes is to a girl what sunshine is to a flower. She may be the tightest, greenest, hardest little bud in the world, but in its warmth she blossoms out. That was what was happening unconsciously to Sandy. Where she had been brusque, bluff, with Morrow she dared be gentle and merry. And feminine! All the sweetness, the coquetry, the tenderness that Sandy had kept crushed in the tight, green, hard bud came out now in a sudden bloom of womanhood.

His Gift

(Continued from Page 15)

"I'll bet you anything that New York man proposes to Sandy Miller before he goes home!" This was Dawson's speculation on the whirlwind courtship.

Sandy herself did not look ahead, even so far as this, any more than she was looking back to the lonely, repressed old days when she had been "the homely, red-headed, freckle-faced little Miller girl." The flaming present was enough. She woke wide-eyed every morning to the sweet excitement of knowing she was loved. The fun of having somebody eager to wait on her—independent Sandy who had always done her own fetching and carrying like a boy—the thrill of being called Glory, of knowing that her every mood was fascinating, that her very careless silences seemed mysterious! Oh, any woman who can look back to the first time anybody was in love with her can understand this glorious preoccupation!

Dawson, as frequently, was right. Morrow did propose to Sandy before he went back, after two golden weeks, the evening after Maisie's wedding.

If he had asked her the night before—who knows?

BUT Webb had returned just in time for the wedding. Sandy, not expecting him, not, in fact, thinking of him at all, had come down the solemn, ribbon-roped aisle, her arms full of white roses, her lilac dress like a sunset cloud about her, and, glancing up, had looked into Webb's homely, friendly, familiar face.

From that very moment Sandy forgot Philip Morrow. Love, as has been frequently observed before, is queer. Morrow was handsome, distinguished-looking, having all the charm of the stranger, and very much in love with her. Webb was homely, anything but distinguished-looking, as familiar as her own back door, and had never thought of Sandy except as "Keith Miller's sister." And yet, a glimpse of Webb across the hushed, waiting church, and Sandy forgot the man who was standing beside her, the man who had made two weeks all golden, the man who had wrought the miracle.

During the reception that followed, Sandy was conscious only of Webb. Automatically she greeted guests, served queer, strong desire to glance back. Now, during all of Sandy's restrained life, she had never looked back over her shoulder at a man. She had never wanted to. But so the wanting to was insistent, tugging. And just as she was going out the door she yielded. She looked back over her shoulder at Webb.

He was standing just as she had left him, staring after her. As he caught her eye, he smiled a little sheepishly and looked hastily away.

It was during this next dance that Philip Morrow asked her to marry him. He had drawn her away from the other dancers into the quiet library where Maisie's wedding presents covered shelves and tables.

For a few moments Sandy scarcely heeded his words, a mind still back in the ballroom with Webb. Then suddenly she realized what he was saying.

She stopped him then, a gentle hand on his sleeve in quiet compunction. "Please don't, Philip," she begged. "I'm terribly sorry—but I can't."

"You mean you don't—don't think of me in the same way I do of you?"

"I'm terribly sorry," Sandy repeated.

THE man was silent for several minutes, crushing one of her pale roses between his fingers. "You don't—don't think you might feel differently—ever? There's somebody else?"

"In a way—yes," she said, still thinking of a homely familiar face.

Sandy looked up then and saw his face. There were queer tears in his eyes. Instantly she forgot about Webb, forgot everything else in a sudden passion of regret and remorse. "Oh, I've been making you think I did care, all these two weeks," she said.

Her voice choked in a pitying tenderness. "It was so wonderful that I—I didn't think ahead. I—I've been making you think I cared!"

Still Morrow did not speak, crushing a white rose petal with his fingers.

"I didn't look ahead, honestly," Sandy pleaded. "Oh, I know what I've done is just as bad as though I'd done it on purpose. I was—I was just leading you on, like a common flirt. I knew you cared, but it was so wonderful that I didn't think of anything else. I didn't look ahead—oh, please forgive me!"

Morrow looked up then into her swimming eyes. "Sandy, for the love of heaven don't think I'm blaming you! I'm just disappointed, that's all."

"Oh, but you should blame me! I shouldn't have let you get to—caring so much—I've known you were for days. But I"—she faced him honestly—"nobody has ever loved me before and—and well, just didn't stop to think that I ought to be caring to I hardly knew that I wasn't. I just took your caring—and it made me so happy that—but I wouldn't have hurt you for anything—please understand please don't hate me!"

"Hate you!" He caught her hands and made her face him. "Sandy, dear, of course I understand. I guess in a way I've understood right along—but I realized that you weren't in love with me, just with being loved. But you were so beautiful, so sweet, so so everything, that I just wouldn't let myself face the truth."

Sandy was sobbing softly. "If I could just back and undo it," she said.

The man stopped her sharply. "Undo it! Has it made you happy—till now?"

"Yes, but —"

"Undo it! Why, Sandy, I wouldn't take a million dollars for having known you. Please, please do cry—there's nothing to cry about. I'm a good deal older than you, my dear—probably everybody's right and I am too old for you—so maybe I don't look things quite as a youngster would. I've wanted things before that I couldn't have—and I've always found a way to get along without them. Sometimes this I've wanted the worst of all, I've found out afterward that it was a good deal better I didn't get. I'm—I'm just pretending that I'm not sorry you don't care, but you don't—and that's all there is to it. Neither of us can help that. There is something you can do, though, that would please me a good deal."

"What is it?" asked Sandy. "I'll do anything—anything." "Just stop feeling unhappy and guilty and sorry for me. I understand just exactly how it was, and I love you and I glad I love you. You've given me the happiest experience of my life."

"It has been my happiest too," said Sandy.

"Then let's let it go at that. Don't let's spoil it with tears and regrets."

SHE looked up at him, and after a few moments smiled determinedly. "All right, I'll try," she said tremulously. "Would—would you let me kiss you once, just to remember you by?"

Sandy raised her lips as simply as a little girl. He kissed her reverently, took her in his arms for a brief, ten moment.

"I just wish I could know you were always going to be happy," he said. "I wish I could give you whatever I want most in the world."

Sandy was silent a moment; then, "I think perhaps I have, Philip," she said impulsively.

For Sandy was seeing again the look that was in Webb's eyes when she had glanced back at him over her shoulder. It was the look, interested, admiring, and something more, the old-as-Eden look, the same look that had been in Philip Morrow's eyes that first spring day on Schoolkill Road.

Grace Richmond—Next Month

THE editors of the HOME JOURNAL are pleased to announce that a new serial by that most popular of all Journal authors, Grace S. Richmond, will begin in the March issue. We who have read it are agreed that it is the best story Mrs. Richmond has ever written—and admirers of Red Pepper Burns and Red and Black will recognize that as praise indeed! The new story will be published in six generous installments. Don't miss the first one, next month.

punch, helped Maisie to change to her slim brown traveling dress, caught the tossed bridal bouquet amid shouts of glee. But she was conscious only of Webb's eyes following her in surprise and interest.

She knew that he was watching her as she danced the first time with the best man, as three of Dawson's younger eligibles asked for the next.

"Doesn't Sandy Miller look stunning?" one bridesmaid asked another. "Lilac is certainly her color."

LILAC was becoming, but there was more than that. Sandy, standing slim and straight, carrying her flame of hair like a proud torch, was wearing a garment that was magic, the knowledge that she was lovable. Lilac, rose, blue, ruffles or pleats, lines or colors—all the dressmaker's tricks turn tawdry in the presence of this radiant enchantment. No wonder the three young eligibles who had been ignoring her for years asked for the second dance; no wonder Webb watched curiously from across the room. It was not all sheeplike following. When it comes to putting the real come-hither into a girl's eyes, there is nothing like the knowing that one man has come.

Webb asked for the next dance, but Philip had taken that too.

"I'm sorry, Webb," Sandy said, and smiled up at him.

Her smile was not the bluff, boyish one he had always known; it was startlingly feminine, slightly, subtly inviting.

"The next one, then?" he persisted.

Again the soft, teasing smile. "That's taken, too, Webb. But the next, perhaps?"

"The next!" said Webb firmly.

Philip had come for Sandy and she walked away with him. Just as they were going out the door, Sandy felt a

It's flavor that makes the meal

And these foreign sauces that the Libby chefs have adapted for you, give flavor to the simplest dishes

FOREIGN cooks, especially French cooks, realize more than we do the importance of flavor in cooking. Though the dish served may be simple, eggs perhaps, or macaroni, or a cheap cut of meat—an unusual and delicious sauce will make it something you eat with delight and remember with pleasure—because of its flavor.

Time and patience are required to get this touch. A French cook takes a small pinch of this spice, a bigger pinch of another—a handful of several different kinds of herbs, and cooks them together in a sauce for hours to have that persuasive subtle flavor that comes from the blending of them all.

It's the sauce that makes the flavor

But in Libby's Catchup and Chili Sauce, we in America have already made for us sauces of a deliciousness that European epicures might envy. To make them, red ripe tomatoes, grown in the fertile black soil of Illinois farmlands, are picked when they are mellowed by

Libby's Mustard Sauce
4 tablespoons butter
1 cup hot water or stock
1 tablespoon flour
1/4 teaspoon salt
1/2 teaspoon cayenne pepper
3 tablespoons Libby's Mustard
Melt one-half the butter in a sauce pan and add the flour; blend and slowly add hot water, stirring constantly. When the mixture has thickened add the remainder of the butter, Libby's Mustard, salt and cayenne. Serve hot, with corned beef or other sliced meat. From France, the land of the epicure, comes this piquant sauce the sunshine of long summer days—then rushed to the Libby farm kitchen nearby.

Here in sunny rooms—whose fascinating array of spotless utensils would make any housewife envious—the tomatoes are cooked with fragrant spices from over the sea, with onions, sugar and the best cider vinegar—of savory ingredients that go into them—these wonderful Libby sauces have that same perfection of flavor that distinguishes the careful, painstaking cooking of the French.

Try Libby's Mustard too

The same care and skill that make Libby's Catchup and Chili Sauce so delicious, make Libby's Mustard the favorite of all who try it.

Here we grind it and regrind it, blend it with Libby's Vinegar and beat it all to a smooth creaminess. In flavor as well it is absolutely right—not too tangy, just mild enough.

What a delicious zest this wonderful Libby Mustard gives to meat! Try it in sandwiches—for children's lunches, for picnics or parties. Just a touch of its distinctive flavor makes an ordinary meat sandwich into a delicious appetizer.

You will like these recipes for sauces

For a really new flavor delight, try this recipe for mustard sauce. It is simple, inexpensive—and it adds new interest to the old familiar ways of serving meat. Libby's chefs have adapted it from one of those delightful sauces for which French cooks are rightly famous.

You will find the other recipes for sauces on this page every bit as good, and just as practical. Indeed they make it easy for you to give an interesting, subtle flavor to the simplest dish.

Libby, McNeill & Libby, 102 Welfare Bldg., Chicago
Libby, McNeill & Libby of Canada, Ltd.,
Chatham, Ontario, Canada

A New Sauce for Meat

1 cup Libby's chili sauce 1/2 teaspoon paprika
6 large olives 1/4 teaspoon cayenne pepper
1 1/2 tablespoons butter 1/2 teaspoon salt
Remove stones from olives and cut pulp in pieces. Saute in butter for a few minutes. Add the seasonings. Heat Libby's chili sauce, add the olives; and serve hot with steak. This interesting sauce comes to us from "sunny Italy."

cooked for hours and hours until all the flavors are blended through and through.

And now they are ready to give an appetizing relish to your steaks and chops, a new piquancy to the meat gravy you serve with your roasts, or an unusual touch to your salad dressings. Because of their long, slow cooking, because of the variety

Libby's Cocktail Sauce

1/2 cup Libby's Tomato Catchup 1/2 teaspoon salt
3 tablespoons lemon juice 1 teaspoon Worcestershire Sauce
Mix all ingredients, chill and serve with oysters on the half shell. Here Libby chefs have worked out a new sauce for a dish that is distinctively American

Libby's

For that rare flavor that makes the simplest dish a delight

Our Jazz-Spotted Middle West

Small Towns and Rural Districts Need Clean-Up as Well as Chicago and Kansas City

IT IS an accepted axiom that big cities are wicked, but small towns and rural districts are clean. This view is not well founded. In some respects the cities are better; for example, because of legal regulation of places of amusement. The small-town or country dance hall is usually free from any sort of control. That urban accomplice of evil, anonymity, is achieved in the country by the motor car which takes young folks nightly to distant places where all are strangers.

Our Middle West is supposed to be a citadel of Americanism and righteousness. Probably it is. Yet a survey of its length and breadth shows that it is badly spotted with the moral smallpox known as jazz. Its small towns and rural solitudes can now boast of perfect modernity; they have the same vicious amusement as New York and Chicago. With the invention of the Afro-American dance, that unholy mingling of the civilized with the savage, they seem to feel that the last handicap upon rural life has been removed. Take a few random reports of the Federal Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board:

"A small town in the mountains of Arkansas did not know what the ultradance was until the daughter of a local minister came home from college and with a young college boy as partner demonstrated it at a summer hotel. The people were horrified. It will take a lot of preaching by that clergyman to counteract the effect of his daughter's conduct."

"At Marshalltown, Iowa, a town of fifteen thousand inhabitants, a country club was organized last spring and some nice dances were held. It was a great success until the young people came home from college and introduced the jazz, which utterly shocked the elders and resulted in breaking up the club."

"Winona, Minnesota, has been trying to improve its dances, which at last report were somewhat below the Chicago level. It is difficult for local people to achieve reform unaided. In the small towns you are hitting commercially a relative . . . who has a financial interest in things as they are."

"There are many fly-by-night dancing places in the rural districts. They are generally vicious. It does not take long for the reputation of the latest-established place to spread far and wide, and for patrons to arrive from long distances by means of the automobile. Some of these disreputable resorts are found in decent little communities that hardly realize they are infected until there is a local epidemic of immorality."

"The barn dance, which used to be an innocent rural festival, has become largely a commercial and vicious enterprise. A barn is rented by someone for a few dollars. The patronage is not only from the farming community but from the small towns round, and there is absolutely no supervision. At Marengo, Illinois, a barn dance has been run during the summers for the last five years with trimmings of indecency, fighting and drunkenness. Huntley, Illinois, reports two unsavory places, one a platform dance and the other a barn dance."

"Where barns are lacking, old buildings are used and in default of them an open-air platform is constructed along the wayside or in a patch of woods."

Women Chaperons Needed

ONE point in connection with the reform of dancing is the need of supervision during the intermissions as well as upon the floor. When the music stops the boys often take liberties with their partners, and the latter seem to be utterly unconscious of the fact that this is wrong. This gives an idea of the demoralizing effect of the jazz. It is perhaps logical for young people to think that if liberties are permissible in the dance they ought to be permissible afterwards. A woman chaperon should always be provided, for girls will not make complaint of impropriety to a man."

The Social Hygiene Board plans a reform campaign in the small towns, working in part through the Federation of Women's Clubs, through the organized dancing profession and also by enlarging the scope of the Public Welfare Department of Illinois. Several of the Middle Western States have public welfare departments through which this reform might be forwarded. Kansas specifically provides for supervision of recreation by the Public Welfare Department.

Miss Alice M. Barrows, a field representative of a national welfare organization, has made a special study of recreations in small towns of the Central States. She is a musical specialist and has worked out scientifically the relation of music to human emotions, from both the psychological and physiological standpoints. Her discoveries confirm the view that jazz music amounts to a physical stimulus of a degrading kind; it acts exactly like a drug on specific nerve centers. It is no less direct in its effect than certain contacts of nerve centers that are witnessed on the dance floor.

By JOHN R. McMAHON

"How does the small-town and rural-dance situation compare with that in the cities?" I asked Miss Barrows.

"It is unrealized in its enormity," was the reply. "There is a greater menace in the rural districts through lack of knowledge and of intelligent direction than in a city, where the facts are known and effort is made to improve the conditions."

"Are there any influences in the country town to supplant the jazz?"

"Yes; in some places there is an effort to substitute wholesome forms of recreation, especially such group activities as entertainments and pageants. There are too few of these places and too many communities where the only amusement is the public dance hall."

"What is the attitude of rural parents?"

"It is usually a very serious concern for the late hours kept, but little understanding of what goes on in the dance hall. This again points to the fact that there is not the proper available source of information to acquaint these parents with the facts."

Somebody Else's Daughters

WHY are rural women, the guardians of American purity, apparently so complacent in regard to the modern dance?

"Simply because they do not accompany their girls and boys to, through and from these dances. They do not know. They assume that things are as they used to be, and implicitly trust their children rather than heed the outsider who suggests that the pressure of to-day on the shoulders of the growing boy or girl is one almost grotesquely out of proportion to that existing fifteen years ago. The average parent feels that her son or daughter is maligned by any suggestion of peril, and that the first duty of the parent is to trust the child. This condition and the tragedy it is bringing to the children are not due to any lowering of the standards of the rural mothers, but come through the lack of accurate information as to what their children are really facing and experiencing."

"Are women deficient in sex solidarity?"

"Yes, generally speaking. They do not stand by the girls who are somebody else's daughters. Men who 'pick up' girls complacently ignore the presence of mature women and generally without interference. Take the case where a young waitress in a town's best hotel was persistently besought by an elderly man, who felt absolutely safe so to do in the presence of two other women in the room. It happens everywhere."

"What else have you noticed in your travels?"

"Women have comparatively recently come into possession of facts long known to men. Shocked by what they learn, their reaction often is to shut their eyes and turn away, to deny the facts and to regain the comfort of ignorance. But it is the duty of each woman to undergo the agony of informing herself through contact and experience what is the general level to-day of the recreation into which young folks are forced by the social mode."

"Can you give some examples of parents who evade the facts?"

"Yes," replied Miss Barrows. "In one county a mother actively resented my approaches to the community in behalf of an effort to better their recreation. To my certain knowledge, but unknown to the mother, her son is morally delinquent."

"In another county a leading citizen went far out of his way to refute the need I was showing for leisure-time activities to interest the young people. I warned him, with the rest of the public, that no man's son or daughter with leisure time unguarded should be considered wholly protected. A short time afterwards his own son was reported to me as involved in a delinquency that will require judicial action. This father does not yet know that his son is a moral and legal offender."

"Supervision after the dance is as essential as in the dance hall, is it not?"

"Perhaps even more so. The nature of the music and the crowd psychology working together bring to many individuals an unwholesome excitement. Boy-and-girl couples leave the hall in a state of dangerous disturbance. Any worker who has gone into the night to gather the facts of the activities outside the hall is appalled, first of all perhaps, by the blatant disregard of even the elementary rules of civilization, the absence of privacy in conduct that in many cases is amenable to the statutory law and always to the moral law. I wish the mother who trusts her child could realize into what a night she sends that child. We must always expect a few casualties in social intercourse, but the modern dance is producing little short of a holocaust."

"The statistics of illegitimacy in this country show a great increase in recent years," said Miss Barrows.

River towns along the Mississippi maintain to a degree their traditional reputation with modern trimmings of jazz and bootleg liquor. I found a typical ensemble in Davenport, Rock Island and Moline, three small industrial cities which face each other across the Father of Waters and are practically as one. Divided authority between two states, Iowa and Illinois, accounts in part for loose conditions. A welfare worker in Davenport complained that Iowa lacked social legislation; for example, no age limit to keep mere children out of dance halls. Davenport has no municipal regulation of dance halls whatever.

Some time ago a low type of dance hall was operating across the street from a city police station and young men were taking girls out of the hall to closed cars parked along a railroad viaduct. Instead of return checks for the young folks who went in and out, the doorkeeper put a rubber stamp imprint on each patron's hand. A policeman is now stationed at each dance hall, but he is paid by the management. Darkened halls and spotlights are popular features. River-boat excursions, with dances held below and on dark upper decks, vie with the automobile as a means to ill ends. Young girls stand at street-car-stopping signs, but never take a car. They wait for strange young fellows in automobiles to invite them to ride. They drive into the country and perhaps stop at road houses.

One girl, who came to the government clinic at Davenport for treatment, had an automobile pick-up history and justified her lapse by saying "You know, no girl wants to walk home five miles." These victims of preying males, if they are recalcitrant, are dropped from cars on lonely roads far out and late at night. This sort of thing is so universal and notorious that it has become the subject of a vaudeville joke which most audiences regard as quite humorous. "My wife is a good girl," says the comedian. "She went on an automobile ride—and walked back."

Parents Largely to Blame

DAVENPORT mothers are much like other parents, judging from the one who upbraided the police for taking into custody her two girls, thirteen and fourteen years old, because they were found in an alley at two o'clock in the morning. The mother thought they were visiting friends, but said that anyhow the youngsters were all right to be in the street.

Clinton, Iowa, is an industrial town of nearly thirty thousand population. A municipal clean-up has resulted, I was told, in throwing the scum to the outskirts and the small towns in the vicinity. A questionable dance pavilion in the outskirts ran full blast the past summer and the parking of cars in a lonely street from the place was a notorious feature. Girls of fourteen or less were among the patrons. H. C. Oakes, probation officer, said he had discussed with the county judge the question of holding parents responsible for the illicit behavior of their children. If this could be done it would help the situation a good deal, for parents are largely to blame for the present alarming waywardness of youth.

A traveler through the Corn Belt, looking for evidences of progress, like silos, tractors and hard roads, was puzzled to

(Continued on Page 181)

With Pond's Vanishing Cream as a base, the powder will stay on many times longer.

Every normal skin needs two creams

One to protect it from wind and dust
Another to cleanse it thoroughly at night

Complexion flaws that require a daytime cream without oil

Chap, windburn, roughness. You can protect your skin from the devastating effects of the weather if before going out you apply regularly a softening, protective cream.

Pond's Vanishing Cream is specially made without oil for daytime use, so that it can never reappear in a shine. Rub it lightly over your face whenever you are going out of doors. It disappears at once. It counteracts the drying effect of wind and cold, keeping the skin free from chap or roughness.

Shiny skin. The reason most women are troubled with shiny skin is that, though they are continually powdering, they do not powder properly. Each time before you powder, apply a little Pond's Vanishing Cream, the disappearing cream without oil. This acts as a base for the powder, giving the skin a soft, velvety surface to which the powder adheres smoothly and evenly. You will be amazed to see how long you can go without having your nose or forehead become shiny.

Dull, tired skin. Whenever you feel the need of freshening your skin instantly, you will find that rubbing the face lightly with Pond's Vanishing Cream brings renewed vigor and fresh color. The tired, tense muscles respond at once to the relaxing effect of this soothing cream.

Before retiring rub a little Pond's Cold Cream into the face

Complexion flaws that need a night cream made with oil

Blackheads. When dust and dirt have bored deep into the skin and have been allowed to remain, blackheads form. These can only be reached by a cleansing so thorough that it gets way under the surface of the skin.

At night wash your face with hot water and pure soap. Then rub Pond's Cold Cream well into the skin. This rich oil cream works its way into the pores, gathering up every particle of dirt. Do not omit this nightly cleansing. Though you may think your skin is clean, the dirt that comes off when you wipe off the cream will show you how necessary this more thorough cleansing is.

Wrinkles. Once wrinkles have fastened themselves on the skin, it is almost impossible to erase them. But you can forestall them, if you start while they are still only a suggestion of fine lines.

Rub Pond's Cold Cream into the skin, paying particular attention to those places where wrinkles start first—around the eyes and mouth, under the chin, at the base of the nose. This delicate cream contains the oil needed to lubricate the skin and keep it elastic. It is when the skin loses its elasticity that wrinkles start to form. If you use Pond's Cold Cream regularly, rubbing the face gently but persistently, you will do much to prevent little lines from getting a chance at your skin.

POND'S Vanishing Cream

Begin today the regular use of these two creams

Used regularly, these two creams make steadily for a lovelier skin. They are so delicate that they will not clog the pores or irritate the most sensitive skin. Neither cream will encourage the growth of hair. At all drug and department stores, in convenient sizes of both jars and tubes. The Pond's Extract Co., New York.

POND'S Cold Cream

Generous Tubes—
Mail Coupon
today

The Pond's Extract Co.,
107 Hudson St., New York.
Ten cents (10c) is enclosed for your special introductory tubes of the two creams every normal skin needs—enough of each cream for two weeks' ordinary toilet uses.

Name _____
Street _____
City _____ State _____

that many years since she had done it; but it was amazing how naturally she fell into all the old motions—the feint, the parry, the advance, the retreat, the deliberate twisting of words and the transparent, harmless little double meanings.

She knew all the signs too well to mistake them, although men of her own age never talked like that to her now. Men of her own age and her own set had a horror of being either eager or obvious. Even on first acquaintance they simply drawled out a blunt broad statement or two in a manner that sometimes was witty, more often was just as conventional as the conventionality which they fought to avoid. She had forgotten that men ever talked to women with the leaping, blurring solicitude with which this boy was talking to her now, with which other boys had talked to her fifteen years ago. It was like finding herself in a dream so lifelike that she dreaded to find out whether it was a dream or an actual experience. But yet it was pleasant. It was painfully pleasant, for, as yet, she had not been able to forget that this likable, diffident man who towered head and shoulders above her was almost a generation her junior.

THEY were walking now, by a sort of unspoken consent, through the tangled path by the shore. The youth had started at her side, instinctively looking down at her hands to see whether she had a coat or a basket that he might carry. Then, as the path grew narrower, he fell behind, but constantly kept reaching his arm over her shoulder to hold aside the incessant branches which interrupted the path. At first it almost annoyed her. She could not get over the idea that he was treating her as he would have treated his mother, but then again there came over her the sense of something pleasantly reminiscent in the exaggerated, grotesque politeness of his conventional college-boy manners.

Men of her own age had always treated her that way fifteen years ago.

Where the cove joined the lake was a fine old hemlock, standing out on a little point, and here again, by a sort of unspoken agreement, Alice and young Manwaring found themselves pausing, staring silently over the water.

The boy looked down at her with the hesitant, tentative air which she found so attractive. "Would you—" he began; "do you feel like sitting down for a moment or two?"

She did not know what she said for an answer, but instantly the boy had ripped off his jacket and spread it out on the carpet of tiny brown needles under the hemlock. It left him standing in a thin white tennis shirt from which his broad, oarsman's neck and his big brown forearms showed like those of a lumberjack, but the sun was already cutting its lower edge at the western mountains and a faint cool dampness was creeping out from the fir woods which lined the shore.

Alice hesitated. She thought of such things nowadays. "Won't you be cold?" she suggested.

The boy grinned. "Hardly. At New Haven we used to be out in the harbor in March with—without very much on at all."

Alice smiled to herself. Then it was Yale, after all, and it was the crew of which he had been the captain. It was honest relief to find out, for she would now have gone to any lengths of falsehood rather than let him discover her vagueness concerning his undergraduate glory. Nevertheless, she looked down at the coat with some hesitation, for it had been many years since she sat on a Norfolk jacket spread by a young Sir Walter under a hemlock.

ALICE PARADAY'S life had not been without its sentimental moments even in recent years. There had been one as recent as the previous winter; but those moments had occurred mostly in the tonneaux of motor cars with a cautious eye on the telltale back of the chauffeur ahead, or on promenades of crowded European resorts, or under the lifeboats of ocean steamers. The last had been in the palm-tree courtyard of a Spanish villa at Miami. She wondered whimsically what might be the etiquette of sitting on a Norfolk jacket under a hemlock in this day and generation. Did one shyly leave half of it for the owner as one used to do when the class of 1904 was mighty at Yale; or was that considered "low" or "Victorian" by the new generation?

The crew man made her decision before she could make it herself. He flung himself at full length on the carpet of hemlock needles, put his chin in his palms and gazed again moodily out over the water.

To Alice the scene became more than ever like a familiar but rather disturbing dream. Years before she had seen another man in exactly that position and in exactly that spot, but how many years ago it had been! For a moment her thoughts wandered idly to the man of whom she had been reminded. She had heard of him last doing something or other in Cincinnati, in a yeast company, she seemed to recall.

She found the query dull and without particular interest, and her thoughts came readily back to her present companion. He, too, seemed to have memories or romantic speculations over which it was rather delicious to dream, and for moments neither of them spoke. But possibly the boy found himself as much perplexed about the etiquette of such a moment as she did, for seemingly he felt that he should apologize for his silence.

"I hope I'm not being rude," he explained with elaborate pains, "but don't you think there are times when people can almost say more by just keeping still than by actually talking? Do you know what I mean?"

"I know exactly," replied Alice, but not without a faint smile.

Sumac and Goldenrod

(Continued from Page 39)

She smiled because she found it quite as appalling as pleasant to remember how many times she had heard that same innocent sentence in just such circumstances. How many times, at sunset by some mountain lake or under a moon on the shore of a silvered ocean, had that tentative, timid discovery of the companionship of silence been the delicious preliminary for a timorous, exquisite hour that both man and girl half knew was to follow.

It was preposterous, Alice tried to convince herself, that any such hour could follow in this case; and, anyway, the boy's simple statement had been truth enough in itself. The sun was now three-quarters down behind the dark wooded mountains and, under their eyes, the sheltered lake was being transformed from a rippling surface to one as still and mirrorlike as that of the cove. On the opposite shore the straight rows of pines could be seen upside down in the water, each minute with greater and greater perfection, like a dark photograph being slowly developed on a dull metal plate. At the mouth of the cove a fish jumped with a tiny splash and from behind them the damp woodsy scents came creeping, suddenly cooler and fresher.

NEITHER one of them could really have wished to break the perfection of such a moment, but again the youth, like all youth, seemed to feel that the very perfection could not be completely realized unless one spoke of it. He turned his head slowly, in that cautious, tentative way that Alice had seen so many times in just such minutes. Her heart leaped absurdly as she saw it and recognized it, but again her thrill was half reminiscence. The boy apparently thought better of it, or lost his courage, or, perhaps, like the true undergraduate that he still was, the very thought of doing anything sentimental appalled him, for slowly he turned his head again toward the lake as if his move had been purely casual. Beside him Alice sat feigning utter unconsciousness, but she knew he would do it again; and he did.

This time he took his courage boldly in his hands and turned to her abruptly. "May I say something rather daring?" he asked. He was smiling bravely, but in his voice was the faint little catch that Alice knew only too well.

She almost became alarmed. What in the world was this precious child going to say? And ought she to stop him? But in her heart she knew that she had no intention of stopping him. "Go on," she said simply.

She herself was now sitting very still, looking out at the water with eyes fixed and wistful. She would never know it, but never in her life had Alice Paraday looked sweeter or more girlish than she did at that moment; and when she had spoken there had been in her voice the same little catch that there had been in Manwaring's.

The boy meditated for a moment. "I"—he began—"you mustn't think me fresh; I know that I'm only a kid—but I couldn't help feeling just now as if we had known each other for ten thousand years." He looked at her fearfully, anxiously, evidently dreading not so much her disapproval as her amused condescension.

Instead her gaze dropped to the carpet of hemlock needles at her feet. Five minutes before she would have smiled again at the boyish conventionality of the statement, but she no longer felt any desire to smile or any desire to be fifteen years older. "That is very nice of you," she said.

It seemed to be enough for Manwaring. His chin still in his palms he turned again toward the lake, his strong, fine profile set in that brave, stern expression of youth when it feels that it is beginning to touch on the great things of life.

Alice watched him furtively, afraid to speak lest she break the spell of what she knew must be for him a profound and possibly hallowed moment. For many years Alice Paraday had seen life too clearly to misconstrue now what must be passing in the boy's mind and heart as he lay there staring out at the water. Least of all did she mistake the part that she herself might be playing in the spell that seemed to lie over him. Although he might not know it himself, she knew that for him she was merely the person who happened to be there in companionship at a solemn, revealing moment.

The woods, the silence, the lake at sunset, all these, she knew, were playing their part in awakening a mind which had hitherto been too boisterous, too physically active, to realize the sheer power and calm of natural beauty; but even with these and their magic she knew only too well that another thing lay behind the wistful, almost reverent look in his eyes.

She was reading his mood very accurately, and he must have known that she was, for he suddenly moved his hand slowly toward the still, calm water, now faintly tinted with pink from the last of the setting sun. He turned with a queer, painful smile.

"WHEN you look at that," he said in a low, hushed tone, "it makes your troubles seem less important. I don't know just how to say it. It makes you ashamed of yourself."

Alice nodded. She meditated a moment, then plunged deliberately. "May I, too, say something daring?" she asked.

The boy turned toward her in surprise. "Why, of course." "Well, then," said Alice gently. "Please tell me: Who is she? I want to know." The boy made no pretense that he did not understand her. He lay staring grimly over the water then asked in a strained, husky tone: "Can't you guess?"

The form of his question made the answer suddenly obvious, but to Alice strangely upsetting, incredible. "Is it Vivien Pember?" she asked, unbelieving.

He nodded. To him it seemed as inevitable, as natural as birth and death, but to Alice it came like a shock, almost like something horrible. Vivien Pember must be nineteen. She herself had been less than that when, for the first time, a man had asked her to marry him. But little Vivien Pember! Her mother, although some years older, had been one of Alice's intimate friends. She remembered clearly the day when Vivien had been born. She could still picture her lying, as she had first seen her, a little, red, howling speck in her fluffy bassinet. She still thought of her instinctively as a big-eyed, jerky little girl racing the village streets on a bicycle and stoning her father's pear trees. And now a six-foot captain of a varsity crew had wanted to marry her!

Sumac and goldenrod! Sumac and goldenrod! By main force Alice tried to reduce her mind to the perspective of the thing and continued.

"And she," she asked cautiously—"she is being unkind?"

The great oarsman at her feet swallowed a sob. "She is marrying the other man."

Alice gave a little gasp that was genuine—for his sake, not for Vivien Pember's. "Oh! I'm so sorry!" she said, and at the same moment she leaned forward and pressed her hand on the boy's shoulder.

He did not move, and she kept her hand there for minutes. She knew that it comforted him. At last she withdrew it, and, with a brave show, as if to say that at last it was over and done with, Manwaring suddenly stirred and sat upright. He smiled at her wanly.

"Please tell me," asked Alice, "is it Blackford that she is going to marry?" In her new perspective Blackford had suddenly become as vivid, as important as this youth and Vivien Pember.

The crew man nodded without any show of contempt. But this news was too much for Alice. "The little fool!" she exclaimed decisively.

MANWARING was human, and it did not displease him; but he himself was still a good sportsman toward his luckier rival. His jaw was set hard when he spoke again. "I came here this afternoon quite ready to throw myself into the lake."

Alice did not reply, for she knew that he did not mean to be taken too literally.

"Not actually that," he went on to explain laboriously, "but I came here to fight it out by myself."

Alice looked at the carpet of dry, brown hemlock. "Of course," she said slowly, "it won't help you the slightest bit to tell you that in five years it won't make an atom of difference."

"No," he replied; "it won't help me the slightest. You see I still have the five years before me—and to-night—and to-morrow."

She replied with the silence which she knew to be the most sincere comfort which she could give him, and for five minutes—ten—he sat absolutely unmoving, his eyes on the water, his jaw set hard in his grim, boyish memory of the tragedy. Only once he moved slightly. Some memory, some scene too vivid to bear had broken his grip on the firm, brave attitude that he had set for himself. His breath began to come quickly in broken little gasps, and impulsively Alice reached over and put her hand in his. He took it without even looking around, gripped it and held it.

The sun had long since disappeared behind the mountains. A dozen night sounds of the forest had sprung up around them, and over the lake the shadows had deepened to autumn twilight. A clean-cut line of white mist had appeared on the opposite shore.

THE boy stirred regretfully, pressed her hand hard for a moment, then slowly let it fall. He sprang to his feet in his same violent effort to display a cheeriness which Alice knew well that he still did not feel.

"Forgive me," he begged. "This has been horrible for you. And it must be hours past your dinnertime."

But Alice was far more loath than he to break the spell of the moment and—for her—of her dreams. She sat for some seconds unmoving, then took the hand which he offered to her and slowly rose to her feet. She found that her knees were so cramped that she almost fell, but she would have fainted before she would have let him know it.

Manwaring turned toward the lake and drew a long breath of the damp, woodsy air. Then he turned back toward Alice and looked quietly into her eyes. "This has been very bully of you," he tried to say, but again his voice was uncertain and shaky.

Neither one of them moved. The autumn darkness was now coming fast. It shrouded, dimmed, both of their figures, obliterated the generation between them. At their feet the tweed coat lay forgotten. In the darkness Alice could see the crew man's great chest rising and falling under the white of his tennis shirt. His lower lip trembled a little and his fingers began clenching slowly. She knew that, at that moment, his arms were aching to reach slowly around her and draw her to him—not because she was Alice Paraday, but because she was slight and feminine and because the moment was weird and mystic and because he was heart-sick and lonely.

(Continued on Page 42)

Proper Care of Your Child's Hair

WHY EVERY CHILD SHOULD HAVE BEAUTIFUL HAIR
HOW EVERY MOTHER MAY INSURE IT

THE beauty of your child's hair depends upon the care you give it, or that you teach the child to give it—early in life.

There is a great advantage in starting children out in the right way by teaching them, at the earliest possible moment, how to preserve and care for the hair. Not only is a good growth of hair started early, but good habits of hair hygiene are also established. Shampooing it properly is always the most important thing.

It is the shampooing which brings out the real life and lustre, natural wave and color, and makes their hair soft, fresh and luxuriant.

When your child's hair is dry, dull and heavy, lifeless, stiff and gummy, and the strands cling together, and it feels harsh and disagreeable to the touch, it is because the hair has not been shampooed properly.

Effect of Shampooing

When the hair has been shampooed properly, and is thoroughly clean, it will be glossy, smooth and bright, delightfully fresh looking, soft and silky.

While children's hair must have frequent and regular washing to keep it beautiful, it cannot stand the harsh effect of free

Nature intended every child should have beautiful hair. Has yours? If not, read how you can insure to your child its rightful heritage.

In later life your child will thank you, if you teach it now habits that will preserve the beautiful hair of childhood.

not possibly injure, and it does not dry the scalp or make the hair brittle, no matter how you use it.

You will be surprised to see how really beautiful you can make your child's hair look by the frequent and systematic use of Mulsified Coconut Oil Shampoo.

Follow This Simple Method

FIRST, wet the hair and scalp in clear, warm water. Then apply a little Mulsified Coconut Oil Shampoo, rubbing it in thoroughly all over the scalp and throughout the entire length down to the ends of the hair.

Two or three teaspoonfuls will make an abundance of rich, creamy lather. This should be rubbed in thoroughly and briskly with the finger tips, so as to loosen the dandruff and small particles of dust and dirt that stick to the scalp.

When you have done this, rinse the hair and scalp thoroughly, using clear, fresh water. Then use another application of Mulsified.

Two waters are usually sufficient for washing the hair; but sometimes the third is necessary. You can easily tell, for when the hair is perfectly clean it will be soft and silky in the water, the strands will fall apart easily, each separate hair floating alone in the water, and the entire mass, even while wet, will feel loose, fluffy and light to the touch and be so clean it will fairly squeak when you pull it through your fingers.

Rinse the Hair Thoroughly

THIS is very important. After the final washing, the hair and scalp should be rinsed in at least two changes of good warm water and followed with a rinsing in cold water. When you have rinsed the hair thoroughly, wring it as dry as you can; finish by rubbing it with a towel, shaking it and fluffing it until it is dry. Then give it a good brushing.

After a Mulsified Shampoo you will find the hair will dry quickly and evenly and have the appearance of being thicker and heavier than it is.

If you want your child to always be remembered for its beautiful, well-kept hair, make it a rule to set a certain day each week for a Mulsified Coconut Oil Shampoo. This regular weekly shampooing will keep the scalp soft and the hair fine and silky, bright, fresh looking and fluffy, wavy and easy to manage, and it will be noticed and admired by everyone.

Not only will you be proud of the improved appearance of your child's hair, but you will also save a lot of bother and work for yourself. For Mulsified makes the child's shampoo an easy, really delightful task for both mother and child. Bear in mind also that practically the same course of treatment will yield equally satisfactory results to adults.

Teach Your Boy to Shampoo Regularly

IT may be hard to get a boy to shampoo his hair regularly, but it's mighty important that he does so.

His hair and scalp should be kept perfectly clean to insure a healthy, vigorous scalp and a fine, thick, heavy head of hair.

Get your boy in the habit of shampooing his hair regularly once each week. A boy's hair being short, it will take only a few minutes' time. Simply moisten the hair with warm water, pour on a little Mulsified and rub it vigorously with the tips of the fingers. This will stimulate the scalp, make an abundance of rich, creamy lather and cleanse the hair thoroughly. It takes only a few seconds to rinse it all out when he is through.

You will be surprised how this regular weekly shampooing with Mulsified will improve the appearance of his hair, and you will be teaching your boy a habit he will appreciate in after-life, for a luxuriant head of hair is something every man feels mighty proud of.

You can get Mulsified at any drug store or toilet goods counter. A 4-ounce bottle lasts for months.

What your child's hair needs most —is frequent and regular shampooing

Shampooing has been made a delightfully easy and really enjoyable task by use of Mulsified.

Mulsified benefits the hair—brings out its natural color and lustre—makes it soft, silky, fresh looking—makes it look its very best.

WATKINS Mulsified COCOANUT OIL SHAMPOO

ANYWHERE in the United States or Canada

IN metropolis or country town, you may procure Skinner's Silks and Satins.

If the store you patronize does not have the particular shade you wish, they can quickly get it for you in any quantity you specify. Or write us and we will see that you are supplied.

For frocks and gowns, underthings and negligees—for countless purposes—you will find lasting satisfaction in the wearing quality of

Skinner's All-Silk Satin

And remember—no silk is Skinner's unless the name is woven in every inch of the selvage. Before you purchase

"Look for the Name in the Selvage"

Write for new booklet showing various uses of Skinner's All-Silk Satin.

WILLIAM SKINNER & SONS
New York City

Chicago Boston Philadelphia
Established 1848—Milfa, Holyoke, Mass.

As if by main force, as if compelling himself to a penance, he slowly turned toward the lake; but the effort was too much for him. He turned back toward her again. In his eyes was a queer, hallowed light and on his lips was a wry little smile. Her heart went racing; then slowly the youth bowed toward her, took one of her hands and reverently lifted it to his lips.

He stooped and picked up his coat. Without a word they turned and walked back through the path by the shore, stumbling and halting in the twilight darkness which was more treacherous, more bewildering than actual night. From time to time the boy caught Alice's arm to guide her or, again, moved the branches from her path; but neither one spoke until they regained the open fields and the hilltops, where both seemed to relax.

As they came from the last belt of forest the lights of the Paraday house could be seen gleaming warmly directly below them. Beyond, on the farther hillside, a light here and there marked the various country houses, with, far to the right, a long string of tiny dots from the village street lamps.

The boy spoke gruffly, in flat, forced humor: "They'll be sending out searching parties. The Pembers will be wild. It makes the old gentleman furious to have anyone late for dinner."

Alice did not attempt to reply, for she knew that he spoke only to break the embarrassment of their silence; but at her own gates she suggested tentatively: "Why don't you come in and dine with us? You could telephone, then, and let them go in to dinner without you."

THE boy hesitated and looked up the lane of trees toward the house. "That's awfully good of you. I only wish I could; but, you see, I'm leaving to-morrow." He hesitated again and for the first time his tone referred back to his confession. "I—I think that that is the only thing for me to do under the circumstances. Don't you?"

"It will be easier," replied Alice.

There followed a moment of silence. Then, as the boy made no move to go, she held out her hand. "Thank you for telling me what you did. Good night. You really mustn't be any later than you have to."

But as he took her hand the boy's resolution wavered. "Look here," he suggested. "Are you going to be at home this evening?"

Alice smiled. "I usually am."

The boy hung his head, pondering. "I wonder—" he began; "you see, this evening a bunch of us were going over to the club to dance, but you can imagine how much I feel like dancing just now. Imagine jazz after this! I wondered if you'd mind if I made some excuse and came down to see you. We could just sit out in the moonlight and talk—like we did this afternoon."

"I'd like nothing better," replied Alice; but at her own gates perspectives were again changing back to normal. Gently she put her hand on his shoulder. "My dear boy," she said, "you know that I loved our talk, and I want to do anything that I can to—make things easier; but —"

"But what?" he demanded.

"I am wondering," Alice explained slowly, "whether it wouldn't do you more good to go off with the crowd and try to—to forget —"

"With that bunch of rioters? Not on your life!" replied Manwaring emphatically.

"VERY well," replied Alice, "but don't feel bound to. When you get back to the Pembers and see the crowd starting, if you feel like going on to the club with them, don't hesitate a minute to go ahead. I'll understand."

"I know you will," answered the boy; "but I'm coming just the same." It was his hand which was held out this time, and for another moment they stood there in the dim light from the coaching lanterns which topped the stone gate posts, looking into each other's eyes.

Sumac and Goldenrod

(Continued from Page 40)

Their hands dropped, and the boy went bounding away on a run while Alice turned and walked up the drive with strange, puzzled emotions. She tried to laugh at herself, she tried to drop the memory of the hour just passed; but she knew that she could not do it and, as she passed up the steps and into the lighted hall, she knew that she was dancing with an elation which she had not known for years.

The Query

By

WINIFRED LOCKHART
WILLIS

SOMETIMES, as I my way pursue
Along the street, I gaze into
The eyes that pass, and oftentimes I start
To read my query in some alien heart:
What are you? What are you?

Sometimes, a mirror passing by,
I pause and search the depths that lie
Deep and mysterious in my sober eyes
And ask myself in strange surprise:
What am I? What am I?

Her father had dined long before and was fussing somewhere out in the gardens. He and she seldom waited for each other. Jules, the butler, was hovering at the dining-room door in a way that suggested a faint impatience out in the kitchen; but, with an airiness that was unusual to her, Alice disregarded his hints, went up to her room and dressed with elaborate care. Alice Paraday seldom deceived herself in regard to her emotions. She did not deceive herself now; but, nevertheless, as if driven by some force which she despised but could not resist, she spent twenty minutes in front of her mirror, choosing her gown and arranging her hair.

AT THE dinner table she ate almost nothing, but yet she would not allow herself to cut the ceremony short. Each course in turn she allowed Jules to place before her and then take away, as if to hasten it would be to acknowledge the impatience which she really did feel, but was unwilling to admit. She even pretended to linger over her coffee in her father's study, turning idly the pages of the evening paper, but knowing all the time that her nerves were tense for the sound of the doorbell or of the telephone.

But no sound came. She looked at the clock. Dinner at the Pembers' must surely be over by now, and "the crowd" of young people would have started for the club long before this. Unable to endure any longer her own ridiculous pretense, she slipped on a cape and went out to the east piazza. It was here that she meant to receive Manwaring when he came, and she looked around to see that the long wicker chair, which all men seemed to like, was in place. The ash tray on the piazza table was filled with stubs of her father's cigars and she emptied it over the railing. She wondered whether Manwaring smoked. She had not seen him do it; but, to make sure, she went back to her father's study, filled the cigarette box neatly, returned, placed it near the arm of the long wicker chair, then sat down and waited.

Twenty minutes passed and the edge of the August moon came up over the eastern mountains. From the village she heard a faint scrape of a violin and the roll of a drum, coming only in fragments when the faint breath of the wind brought the sound up the valley. The dance at the club was commencing, but at that distance it sounded like music on a phonograph. She heard her father's slow, ponderous step on the front piazza and then heard the screen door close gently.

It was cold out there in the night air, but she would not allow herself to go in, as if, again, there were some mystic spell in the hour which would be broken by moving. She watched the moon lifting slowly and faintly lighting the lawn. Then, far off, in the depths of the house, she heard the telephone ringing. She listened, alert; then heard the rapid, prim steps of the butler. He came to the open French windows and nodded.

"Miss Alice, the telephone."

ALICE felt her heart leap, but at the same moment there came over her a cold chill of disappointment. She rose slowly and went to the little telephone closet at the end of the hall. She took up the receiver and Manwaring's voice, sounding queerly bass, like that of a stranger, came to her over the wire:

"Miss Paraday? Oh, good evening. Miss Paraday, I wonder if you'll understand —"

But Alice broke in with a little laugh: "My dear boy, I know perfectly well what you're going to say, and you're absolutely right. Go on to the club with the crowd and have a good time."

The boy's voice was rueful and apologetic. "Well, to tell the truth, that's what I was going to say. You see, when I got back here I found that the bunch had made all their plans. They really expected me to go with them, and I thought it would look kind of awkward —"

Alice broke in again: "Please don't be upset about it. I understand perfectly."

The boy's tone was still politely anxious, but he did seem relieved. "I knew that you'd understand," he explained.

"I understand perfectly," Alice repeated.

"Good-by, and good luck."

"Good-by. Good luck to you."

SHE hung up the receiver, picked a heavier coat from a settle in the hall and went back to her seat on the east piazza. The moon had now cleared the mountains entirely and turned to a thinner color, like pearl.

Her father came out on the piazza still in his cap and topcoat, smoking one of his perpetual cigars.

"Who was that, Alice?" he asked. "Who was telephoning?"

"Just the Pembers' house," she replied. "They're having a dance at the club this evening."

As if in corroboration the wind, for an instant, brought a bar of the distant music, the jingle of the old club piano and the staccato beat of the drum.

Her father asked nothing more. He and Alice always got on splendidly in that particular, both tactful and neither especially curious.

He puffed his cigar for a moment and gazed at the mountains. "Cold moon, that," he suggested. "Autumn will be here before we know it."

Alice did not reply.

Her father started away toward the front of the house, then, with an afterthought, stopped and turned. "By the way, Alice, I wish that you'd remind Jules not to put goldenrod in the fireplaces. It starts my hay fever."

Alice stirred a little. "All right, father, I'll tell him."

It's a Delightful Surprise to every woman who hasn't known it before, to learn that oats—the very finest rolled white oats—can now be thoroughly prepared in so short a time.

No more bothering the night before—such a method of preparing nutritious oats is a thing of the past! Just put ARMOUR'S OATS on when you start the coffee and toast; they'll all be done at the same time. And such a wonderful oat flavor—it isn't destroyed by excessive cooking.

Yes, it may be surprising but it's a fact—ARMOUR'S OATS do

Cook Perfectly in 10 to 15 Minutes

Your grocer will respect your good judgment in asking for Armour's Oats

Manufactured by Armour Grain Company
Chicago

Makers of Armour's Guaranteed Cereals—
Oats, Corn Flakes, Pancake Flour,
Macaroni, Spaghetti, Noodles

Is your skin pale and sallow?

—How you can rouse it

SLEEP, fresh air, exercise—all these contribute to a healthy condition of your skin.

But your skin itself must have special care, if you wish it to show all the beauty and charm of which it is capable. Your skin is a separate organ of your body. Neglect of its special needs may result in an unattractive complexion, even though your general health is good.

If your skin is pale and sallow, it needs a more stimulating treatment than you are giving it. Begin now to use the following treatment, and see what a difference it will make in your complexion:

ONCE or twice a week, just before retiring, fill your basin full of hot water—almost boiling hot. Bend over the top of the basin and cover your head and the bowl with a heavy bath towel, so that no steam can escape. Steam your face for thirty seconds. Now lather a hot cloth with Woodbury's Facial Soap. With this wash your face thoroughly, rubbing the lather well into the skin with an upward and outward motion. Then rinse the skin well, first with warm water, then with cold, and finish by rubbing it for thirty seconds with a piece of ice.

The other nights of the week cleanse your skin thoroughly in the usual way with Woodbury's Facial Soap and warm water, ending with a dash of cold.

The first time you use this treatment it will leave your skin with a slightly drawn, tight feeling. Do not regard this as a disadvantage—it means that your skin is responding in the right way to a more stimulating form of cleansing.

After a few treatments this drawn sensation will disappear, and your skin will gain noticeably in freshness and color.

Special treatments for each different skin need are given in the famous booklet of treatments wrapped around every cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap.

Get a cake of Woodbury's today—begin your treatment tonight.

The same qualities that give Woodbury's its beneficial effect on the skin make it ideal for general use. A 25 cent cake lasts a month or six weeks for general toilet use, including any of the special Woodbury treatments.

A complete miniature set of the Woodbury skin preparations

For 25 cents we will send you a complete miniature set of the Woodbury skin preparations, containing:

A trial size cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap
A sample tube of the new Woodbury's Facial Cream
A sample tube of Woodbury's Cold Cream
A sample box of Woodbury's Facial Powder
Together with the treatment booklet, "A Skin You Love to Touch."

Send for this set today. Address The Andrew Jergens Co., 102 Spring Grove Ave., Cincinnati, Ohio. If you live in Canada, address The Andrew Jergens Co., Limited, 102 Sherbrooke St., Perth, Ontario.

What are We Doing With Our Children

(Continued from Page 27)

was ill and how I should feel about your going. Don't you care to be respected?" "Gee, mother, I'd hate to be unpopular; I'm not strong on any hugging business, but I would hate to be unpopular. Don't jaw any more to-night; there's a dear; I'm all in."

The flush had faded; she looked exhausted—naturally, after such continuous excitement. She yawned and went to bed.

Why are our children growing so reckless, unstable and callous? Why is it that they will not brook control; that they chase madly after every new sensation in jazz, joy-ride and petting party; that they are taking a direction which home and press and pulpit view with bewildered and seemingly helpless concern?

Whose is the fault? That night the answer hammered its way into my heart and mind. If Julia were not all I hoped, mine was the responsibility. Our children are as we mothers make them.

We may of course shield ourselves behind "the times," behind the thought which holds the war responsible. But we mothers control the times; in our hands are held the morals and manners of our nation. If we had built a sure foundation, think you a few years of abnormality would have undermined our children's characters?

The Real Sufferers

WHY have we failed? Why, rather, should we not expect to fail? Have we not defied Youth until the imp has retaliated by treating us with toleration, frequently with contempt? Have we not substituted self-assurance for self-control? Have we not, in our craze for giving the child self-expression, for respecting its individuality, robbed it of the old valuable tonic of discipline, made inclination paramount, duty obsolete?

I believe in self-expression; but I also believe that it is practically impossible to stifle it, that anything worth expressing in a human being will come out.

By our modern luxury of habit, by our overlavishness in supply, we are in danger of robbing our children of the valuable quality we children used to call "sand," "grit," and which my mother called "backbone," meaning a moral firmness, an ability to endure discomfort and unhappiness.

I am far from being an old Mother Grundy. I do not regard the mad whim of dress or manner as necessarily implying anything more than youth's desire for freedom. I know that youth always has done, always will do mischievous, often cruelly thoughtless deeds; but in our day there always followed consequences—censure, punishment, soreness of body. When, for instance, in our youthful desire for romantic expression we ran away and got married it wasn't just a joy-ride till the run was over, but a thing which had to be endured until the end.

As a natural result of our modern methods our children do not expect consequences; they grow up instead with the firm conviction that they have a right to do what they please.

No wonder divorce is increasing; it will increase. If you take away every difficulty from the child's path, wrap it in luxury, sap its moral strength by lack of discipline, why should you expect the man and woman to be different? Why, at first sign of boredom or unhappiness, should you not expect them to get away from their responsibilities? And in most cases the sufferers are their children, that new generation.

Another consequence of overindulgence, less vital perhaps, but nevertheless important, is that our children are growing up without a sense of value.

We preach the necessity for restraint and economy and a sense of value in the methods of our public men. How shall we expect it in the lives of our future politicians when such training is largely absent from the life of the child? No virtue can be acquired by a stroke of the pen; it is won hardly, through many years, through childish effort.

And finally, apart from the moral consequence of overindulgence and laxity in discipline, there is another equally important: the physical and mental effect on our children. If you have lately read the statistics of public schools and welfare societies you will have noticed that there is far too much malnutrition in districts where there is no poverty; weakness which may therefore be attributed to overindulgence and bad habits.

I can well remember my childish dislike for the many phrases which so frequently buzzed in my ears: "Children must be seen and not heard," "sit still," "don't talk at table till you are spoken to," "eat slowly"—can well remember that neglecting to follow this last injunction I had nevertheless to wait till everyone else had finished.

But however tiresome from the child's point of view, I often wonder nowadays whether my growing body was not thus better nourished than if I had grown up in the modern way.

Searching your consciences, mothers, do you not agree that we are counting as too important the material welfare of our children, spending money lavishly on their pleasure, clothes, food, education, but neglecting to too great an extent the importance of character, discipline, self-control, endurance—those Spartan things which harden and fit for life?

Overindulgence and lack of discipline did not produce those homely virtues handed down to us from our fine old stock of pioneer, town builder and settler—those homely virtues of patience, stability, honesty of purpose, the instinct for home making and family life, uprightness?

And what is the remedy, you may ask, if you, too, are one of us bewildered mothers, a little fearful of the future of our children, afraid that the situation has got out of our control?

Wanted—Moral Backbone

WE CANNOT, of course, go back to the Spartan conditions of the pioneer. Neither can the problem be solved by any universal panacea, by any new laws, by any new child-welfare societies. It is in the hands of every individual mother in this land.

If each and every one of us did our duty, not just the material duty of seeing that the money our husbands earn is turned into food and clothes and pleasure for our children, but in that more difficult matter of child training—if we were less busy about our various interests and thought more deeply about that chief duty, there would be less fear for this new generation.

It is so much easier to give the child self-expression than to teach it self-control, consideration, habits of economy; so much easier to hand out a dime or a quarter for movies, sodas, candy than to train our children that luxuries must be used sparingly.

We mothers have been slipping along that easy way, losing sight of our responsibilities in our newly acquired freedom.

I am going to pull myself up with a firm hand, spend more time on character building, search those old experiences for moral backbone and a sense of value which will yet enable me to help my Julia towards realizing that fine ideal. It won't be nearly as comfortable, but I'm going to shut my teeth till the end is attained. It will be even more difficult if I am the only mother in our neighborhood to take this sterner note in the belief that it will be for my child's good.

Will you not help me?

Makes things taste better

HEINZ TOMATO KETCHUP

THE DIFFERENCE between Heinz Tomato Ketchup and ordinary ketchup often is the difference between a successful meal and a poor one. For Heinz Ketchup makes things taste better—the meats, vegetables and other things on which ketchup can be used.

And the difference in cost between Heinz Tomato Ketchup and ordinary ketchup is a very small fraction—so small that you wouldn't consider it for an instant if you stopped to realize that the goodness and wholesomeness and economy of the whole meal were at stake.

Use the best ketchup you can get. That is Heinz Tomato Ketchup. Made of luscious sun-ripened tomatoes, choice spices, Heinz Vinegar and pure cane sugar by skilled experts in the spotless Heinz kitchens. Small wonder it excels!

Some of the 57 Chili Sauce Spaghetti Baked Beans Cream of Tomato Soup

All Heinz goods sold in Canada are packed in Canada

GIFTS THAT LAST

"Oh! see what I found"

The secret is out! Little Brother's mischievous fingers have brought to light the treasure of the "hope chest"—a set of Holmes & Edwards silverware!

Embarrassing? Well, naturally. And yet, the hopeful lover must admire the foresight and good taste revealed in her selection of the charming HOSTESS pattern.

Deep down in her heart, she knows he is pleased. And so she blushing relates how, months ago, she started with teaspoons, adding knives, forks and miscellaneous pieces, until now the set is almost complete.

Silver-Inlaid, solid silver where it wears

Super-Plate, protected against wear

At the Better Shops Everywhere

THE HOLMES & EDWARDS SILVER CO.

INTERNATIONAL SILVER CO., Successor
Bridgeport, Connecticut

Manufactured in Canada by STANDARD SILVER CO. of TORONTO, Ltd.

THE HOSTESS TEASPOON

The HOSTESS PATTERN of the House of
HOLMES & EDWARDS

© H. & E. 1922

INTERNATIONAL SILVER CO.

The Juggernaut

(Continued from Page 16)

the impending left wheel which already had smitten him down.

Over him slid the wheel-locked car, through the mud of a recent rain; while the boy clung to the emergency brake and yelled. Over him and past him skidded the car. It missed the prostrate dog, missed him with all four wheels, though the rear axle's housing smeared his snowy ruff with a blur of black grease. On went the machine for another ten feet before it could halt.

Then a chalk-faced delivery boy peered fearfully backward, to see Lad getting painfully to his feet and barking perplexedly at his tiny right forepaw in token of the dislocated shoulder.

The delivery boy saw more. In a swirl of black bad temper Lady had gathered herself up from the ditch where Lad's toss had landed her. Without a moment's pause she threw herself upon the luckless dog whose rough interference had saved her life. Teeth aglint, growling ferociously, she dug her fangs into the hurt shoulder and slung her whole weight forward in the bite. Thus was it the temperamental Lady's wont to punish real or fancied injuries from the place's other animals, and from any humans as well, save only the mistress and the master. She charged first and did her thinking afterward.

Under her fifty-pound impact poor Lad's three-cornered balance gave way. Down he went in an awkward heap, while Lady snarled viciously and snapped for his momentarily exposed throat. Lad turned his head aside to guard the throat; but he made no move to resent this ungrateful onslaught, much less to fight back, which was Lad's way—with Lady.

A shout from the veranda—whither the racket had drawn the master from his study—put a stop to Lady's brainstorm.

A SHARP word of reproof sent Lady skulking into a corner, anger forgotten in humiliation at the public rebuke. The master paid no heed to her. Running up the drive, he met Lad and picked up the suffering collie in his arms. Carrying him into the study, the master gave first aid to the serious dislocation, then phoned for the nearest good "vet."

As he left the study to telephone he encountered Lady, very weebegone and cringing, at the door. When he returned he beheld the remorseful little gold-and-white vixen licking her mate's hurt shoulder and wagging a propitiatory tail in plea for forgiveness from the dog she had bitten and from the master whose law she had broken by her attack on the car. Always after her brief rages Lady was prettily and genuinely repentant and eager to make friends again. And, as ever, Lad was meeting her apologies more than halfway, absurdly blissful at her dainty attentions.

In the days that followed, Lady at first spent the bulk of her time near her lame mate. She was unusually gentle and affectionate with him and seemed to be trying to make up to him for the enforced idleness of strained sinews and dislocated joint. And in her friendliness and attention Lad was very, very happy.

But, as the summer days dreamed themselves away and Lad's splendid health brought him nearer and nearer to recovery, Lady waxed restless under the long strain of indolence and of good temper.

Less and less did Lady content herself with dull attendance on the convalescent. More and more often did she set forth without him on those runs that had formerly meant so much to them both. Lad would watch her vanish up the drive, their fiery little son, Wolf, cantering gleefully at her side. Then, his dark eyes full of sorrow, he would gaze at the master and, with a sigh, would lie back on his rug—and wait. There was something so human, so uncomplainingly unhappy in look and in sigh, that the master was touched by the big dog's loneliness and vexed at the slight Lady's deception.

HE VEERED HIS MACHINE, AIMING THE FLYING JUGGERNAUT DIRECTLY AT THE COLLIE

Stooping down at one such time, he ran his hand over the beautiful silky head that rested against his knee and said in lame attempt at comfort: "Don't let it get under your skin, Laddie. She isn't worth it. We're going over for the mail, the mistress and I. Want to come along?"

THIS morning, for the first time since his accident, Lad was able to spring into the car tonneau unaided. His hurt was all but well. Enthroning himself in the precise center of the rear seat, he prepared to enjoy every inch of the ride.

Only when the mistress and the master both chanced to leave the car at the same time, at market or bank or post office, would Lad cease from this genial and absorbed inspection of everything in sight. Left alone in the machine, he always realized at once that he was on guard.

Marketing done to-day, the trio from the place started homeward. Less than a quarter mile from their own gateway they heard the honk of a horn behind them.

Within a second thereafter a runabout roared past, the cut-out waking echoes along the still road and a poisonously choking cloud of dust whirling aloft in the speedster's wake.

The warning honk had not given the mistress time to turn out. Luckily she was driving well on her own side of the none too wide road. As it was, a sharp little jar gave testimony to the light touch of mud guards. And the runabout whizzed on.

"That's one of the speed idiots who make an automobile an insult to everybody except its owner. The young fool!" stormed the master, glowering impotently at the other car, already a hundred yards ahead, and at the back of its one occupant, a sportily clad youth in the early twenties.

A high-pitched yelping bark, partly of dismay, partly of warning, from Lad broke in on the master's fuming remonstrance. The big dog had sprung up from his rear seat cushion and, with forepaws gripping the back of the front seat, he was peering forward, his head and shoulders between the mistress and the master.

(Continued on Page 49)

By faulty eating we may be daily clogging our systems with poisonous waste matter and wearing out our body tissues without building them up again.

Medicine cannot do this for you— Your strength and vigor depend on what you eat

OUR strength, vigor, health—even the span of life—depend upon what we eat! This is one of the startling discoveries of modern science.

Medicine cannot improve and strengthen either naturally or permanently the entire digestive process, build up the body tissues, and keep the body clean of poisonous waste matter. Only certain food factors can do this. Yet many American meals lack these necessary elements.

Today men and women are getting from Fleischmann's Yeast exactly these essential food factors. For yeast is the richest known source of the necessary water-soluble vitamin.

Fleischmann's Yeast contains elements which build up the body tissues, keep the body more resistant to disease. Also, because of its freshness, helps in eliminating poisonous waste matter. Fresh compressed yeast is recommended in American medical literature.

Why the body needs fresh yeast

It is well known that many of the things we eat have lost their valuable food properties through refining and other such commercial preparation.

Fresh yeast has not been subjected to any such process. Fresh yeast gives you the health essential food factors in all the potency of their fresh form. This is what your body tissues crave.

What laxatives can never do

DOCTORS are agreed that laxatives never remove the cause of the trouble. Indeed one physician says that one of its chief causes is probably the indiscriminate use of cathartics. Fleischmann's Yeast as a fresh food is just the natural corrective you need. Fresh yeast, says a noted doctor, should be much more frequently given in intestinal disturbance especially if it requires the constant use of laxatives.

Hundreds of men and women who have long been in bondage to laxatives are now free. The addition of Fleischmann's Yeast to their daily diet has restored normal action of the intestines.

The natural way to improve digestion

MORE and more science is coming to look on digestive disturbance not as a separate ailment for which one takes a drug but as a danger signal that something is fundamentally wrong with the habits of eating. The food factors which Fleischmann's Yeast contains in fresh form improve the appetite, stimulate the digestion, and strengthen the entire digestive process.

Because of its wonderful effect on the digestion and its laxative action Fleischmann's Yeast clears up skin disorders, ailments so often due to faulty eating.

Popular ways of eating yeast

EAT Fleischmann's Yeast spread on crackers or bread, or nibble it plain from the cake. Try it in water, hot or cold, or in fruit juices or milk. As milk contains the fat-soluble vitamin, Fleischmann's Yeast with milk makes a particularly nutritious drink. Fleischmann's Yeast combines well with almost any familiar dish on your table.

Eat 2 or 3 cakes of Fleischmann's Yeast a day. You will like its fresh distinctive flavor and the clean wholesome taste it leaves in your mouth. Place a standing order with your grocer and get it fresh daily.

Send for free booklet, "The New Importance of Yeast in Diet." Address THE FLEISCHMANN COMPANY, Dept. 102, 701 Washington Street, New York, N. Y.

Fleischmann's Yeast is a food—not a medicine

Fresh yeast has been proved by scientific tests to be a valuable food for correcting common ailments of lowered vitality, especially those which are indicated by impurities of the skin, digestive disturbances and those that require the constant use of laxatives. These original tests were all made with Fleischmann's Yeast.

Avoid the use of so-called yeast preparations. Many of these contain only a small amount of yeast—as little as one-tenth of a yeast cake—mixed with drugs and medicines. The familiar tin-foil package with the yellow label is the only form in which you can get Fleischmann's Yeast. Be sure it's Fleischmann's fresh Yeast. Do not be misled by yeast-substitutes.

Puffed Rice Puffed Wheat

Two Bubble Grains

The finest cereal dainties children ever knew

Think what Puffed Rice and Puffed Wheat contribute to a home.

Not as cereal dishes only. They are tid-bits and confections. You can use them in a hundred ways.

Here are airy, toasted grains, nut-like in their flavor, with the texture of a snowflake.

They are used in candy making—

Used as garnish on ice cream—

Used as thin, crisp, toasted wafers for all soups.

Douse with melted butter, and they become ideal confections for hungry children after school.

Prof. Anderson's foods

Above all else, however, Puffed Grains are scientific foods.

They were invented by Prof. A. P. Anderson, formerly of Columbia University.

The object is to make whole grains wholly digestible. To fit every element to feed.

The grains are sealed in guns, then revolved for an hour in a fearful heat. The moisture in each food cell is thus changed to steam.

When the guns are shot the steam explodes. Over 100 million steam explosions occur in every kernel. The food cells are thus blasted. Digestion is made easy and complete.

The grains come out like bubbles, puffed to eight times normal size. And the fearful heat gives a delicious flavor.

More whole-grain food

Children need whole-grain food, as you know. Puffed Grains make it tempting.

Whole wheat contains 16 needed elements. With milk it forms as great a food as children can be fed. In Puffed Wheat those elements are all made available.

That is why millions of mothers now serve Puffed Grains morning, noon and night.

No breakfast dainty can compare with Puffed Rice served with cream.

Puffed Wheat in milk is the supreme dish for supper or for bedtime.

Flimsy, flavory Puffed Grains add delight to every dish of fruit.

Douse with melted butter for hungry children to eat like nut-meats after school.

The Quaker Oats Company Sole Makers

The Juggernaut

(Continued from Page 46)

A word of rebuke died on the master's tongue, as the mistress with a gasp of fear pointed ahead, and in the path of the speeding runabout. Lady and Wolf had had a jolly gallop through the summer woodlands. And at last they had turned their faces homeward for the plunge into the cool lake which was wont to follow a hot-weather run. Side by side they jogged along to the forest edge and into the sixteen-acre meadow that stretches from forest to highway.

The motor car with the muffler cut out was approaching at high speed.

THE noise was as martial music to Lady. The speed promised exhilarating sport. Her trot merged into a headlong run, and she dashed out into the road. The runabout was a bare fifty yards ahead of her, and it was coming on with a speed which shook even Lady's excitement-craving nerves. She leaped to one side of the road. Not far, but leaving ample space for the driver to miss her by at least a yard. He had honked loudly at sight of her. But he had abated not an atom of his fifty-mile-an-hour pace.

Whether the man was rattled by the collie's antics, whether he acted in sudden rage at her for startling him, whether he belonged to the filthy breed of motorist who recites chucklingly the record of his kills—he did not hold his midroad course. Instead, still without checking speed, he veered his machine slightly to the right, aiming the flying Juggernaut directly at the mischievously poised little collie who danced in imagined safety at the road edge.

The rest was horror.

Merciful in its mercilessness, the hard-driven right front wheel smote the silky golden head with a force that left no terrible instant of fear or of agony. Lady was killed at a single stroke.

The fluffy golden body was hurled far in front of its slayer, and the wheels struck it a second time. The force of the impact caused the runabout to skid perilously and the youthful driver brought it to a jarring and belated halt. Springing to the ground, he rolled the dead collie's impeding body into the shallow wayside ditch, clear of his wheels. Then, scrambling aboard again, he jammed down the accelerator.

Lad had made a flying leap over the door of the master's car. He struck ground with a force which crumpled his healing right shoulder under him. Heedless of the pain, he hurled himself forward on three legs, at incredible speed, straight for the runabout.

BUT, for all his burst of speed, he was too late to avenge, even as he had been too late to save. By the time he could reach the spot where Lady lay crumpled and moveless in the ditch, the runabout had gathered full speed and was disappearing down the bend of the highway. After it flew Lad.

But, at the end of a furious half mile, his wise brain took charge once more of his vengeance-craving heart. He halted, snarled hideous menace after the vanished car, and limped miserably back to the scene of the tragedy.

There, he found the mistress sitting in the roadside dust, Lady's head in her lap. She was smoothing lovingly the soft rumpled fur and trying hard not to cry over the inert, warm mass of gold-and-white fluffiness which, two minutes earlier, had been a beautiful thoroughbred collie, vibrant with life and fun and loveableness.

Head and tail adroop, Lad tolled back to where Lady was lying. A queer, low sound, strangely like a human sob, pulsed in his shaggy throat as he bent down and touched his dead mate's muzzle with his own. Then, huddling close beside her, he reverted all at once to a trait of his ancestors, a thousand generations back.

Sitting on his haunches and lifting his pointed nose to the summer sky, he gave vent to a series of long-drawn wolf howls, horrible to hear. It was the death howl of the primitive wolf, a sound that sent a shiver through the two humans who listened aghast to their chum's awesome mourning for his lost love.

In a few seconds Lad rose wearily to his feet, the spasm of primal grief having spent itself. Once more he was himself, sedate, wise, calm. Limping over to where the Juggernaut car had halted so briefly, he cast about the ground after the manner of a bloodhound. Presently he came to an abrupt halt. He had found what he sought.

As motionless as a bird dog at point, he stood there, nose to earth, sniffing.

"What in blazes —" began the master, perplexed.

The mistress, keener of eye and of perception, understood. She saw Lad's inhaling muzzle was steady above a faint mark in the road dust, the mark of a buckskin shoe's print. Long and carefully the dog sniffed. Then, with heavy deliberation he moved on to the next footprint and the next. The runabout's driver had taken less than a half dozen steps in all during his short descent to the ground. But Lad did not stop until he had found and identified each and every step.

"He knows!" marveled the mistress.

"He saw the brute jump down from his car, and he has found his footsteps. He'll remember them too."

FOR the next few days, until his shoulder was again in condition to bear its quota of his eighty-pound weight, Lad was kept indoors or on the veranda. As soon as he was allowed to go out alone, the big collie went straight to the spot where last he had seen Lady's body. Thence he made a careful detour of the place, seeking for—something. It was two days before he found what he sought.

In the meantime, as ever since his mate's killing, he ate practically nothing and went about in a daze. Time after time, during the next week, the master or the mistress found him lying beside Lady's grave.

Then in a single minute came the cure.

On Labor Day afternoon the finals in a local tennis tournament were to be played at the mile-distant country club. The mistress and the master went across to the tournament, taking Lad along.

Thus, when the two mounted the clubhouse veranda, Lad was at their heels. The playing had not yet begun. And new arrivals were drifting up the steps of the clubhouse. Car after car disgorged women in sport clothes and men in knickerbockers or flannels. There was plenty of chatter and bustle and motion. Lad paid no heed to any of it.

Then up to the foot of the veranda steps jarred a flashy runabout, driven by a flashier youth. At word from the policeman in charge he parked his car at the rear of the clubhouse among fifty others and returned on foot to the steps.

"That's young Rhuburger," someone was confiding to the mistress. "You must have read about him. He was arrested as a conscientious objector during the war. Since then his father has died and left him all sorts of money. And he is burning it in double handfuls. No one seems to know just how he got into the club here. And no one seems to —"

The gossipy maundering broke off short, drowned in a wild-beast growl.

BOTH the mistress and her husband had been eying Rhuburger as he ascended the veranda steps in all the glory of unbelievably exquisite and gaudy raiment. There seemed to both of them something vaguely familiar about the fellow, though neither could place him.

"Hello, folks," Rhuburger was declaiming to a wholly unenthusiastic circle of acquaintances. "Made another record just now. The little boat spun me here from Montclair in exactly nineteen minutes. That's—that's roughly an average rate of a mile in seventy-five seconds. Not so bad, eh? That car sure made a hit with me, all right. Not so much of a hit, maybe, with a couple of chickens and a fat old dog that had the bad luck to be asleep in the middle of the —"

His plangent brag was lost in a sound seldom heard on the hither side of jungle or zoo. From the group of slightly disgusted onlookers, a huge and tawny shape burst

(Continued on Page 50)

DOMINO SYRUP delights the taste with its rare, appealing flavor of sugar cane. Possibly no other flavor in the world is as pleasing to so many people for table use—or is so tasteful in preparing distinctive dishes sweetened with syrup.

You will enjoy the delicious cane sugar flavor of Domino Syrup.

Domino Syrup is made by the refiners of Domino Package Sugars.

American Sugar Refining Company

"Sweeten it with Domino"

Granulated, Tablet, Powdered, Confectioners, Brown, Golden Syrup

Domino Syrup

BERKEY & GAY Furniture

A Dining Room Suite In American Woods

In the selection of woods for Berkey & Gay Furniture, each must stand forth frankly for its structural fitness as well as its true beauty.

This is well exemplified in "The Sevilla." Sturdiness is evident in these native woods; and a delightful color effect results from the joining of the richly figured walnut surface with the dark hues of elm burl and the high-lighted glow of the gumwood turnings.

Such furniture is genuinely friendly to the touch and to the eye. It well typifies Berkey & Gay's ideal of producing furniture of distinction that may be enjoyed by American homes at moderate cost.

Foremost furniture stores are showing "The Sevilla" during February.

Our Brochures, describing "The Sevilla" and other Berkey & Gay Furniture, together with name of nearest dealer, sent on request.

BERKEY & GAY FURNITURE COMPANY
440 Monroe Avenue Grand Rapids, Michigan

This shopmark is used in every Berkey & Gay production. It is the customer's protection when buying and his guide ever after.

The Juggernaut

(Continued from Page 49)

forth, hurtling through the air, straight for the fat throat of the boaster.

Rhuburger, by some heaven-sent instinct, flung up his arms to shield his menaced jugular. He had no time to do more.

LAD'S fury-driven eighty pounds of muscular weight crashed full against his chest. Lad's terrible teeth, missing their throat goal, drove deep into the uplifted right forearm; shearing through imported tweed coat-sleeve and through corded silken shirt and through flabby flesh and clean to the very bone.

The dog's lion roar blended with the panic screeches of the victim; and under that fearful impact Rhuburger reeled from the stairhead and went crashing down the steps to the stone flagging at the bottom.

Not once during that meteoric, shriek-punctuated downward flight did Lad loose his grip on the torn forearm. But as the two struck the flagging at the bottom he shifted his hold with lightning speed; stabbing once more for the exposed jugular.

He lunged murderously at his mark. Yes, and this time he found it. His teeth had touched the pudgy throat and had begun to cleave their remorseless way to the very life of the man who had slain Lady.

But out of the jumble of cries and stamping feet and explosive shouts from the scared onlookers on the veranda above, one staccato yell pierced the swirl of rage mists in the avenging collie's brain.

"Lad!" came the master's sharp, scandalized mandate. "Lad!"

Hating the thought of desisting from his cherished revenge, the dog heard and heeded. It was no light offense for a dog to attack a human. Lad, like every well-trained collie, knew that. His own death might well follow.

The master simply commanded, "Down, Lad!" And as the dog obediently dropped to the ground, the master bent to examine the groaning and weeping Rhuburger.

Rhuburger was all but delirious with fright. His throat was scored by the first taking of Lad's teeth, but in the merest of flesh wounds. The chewed arm was more serious, but no bone or tendon or artery was injured. By more or less of a miracle, no bones had been broken.

As the master and the few others who had descended the steps were working over the fallen man, the mistress checked the turmoil on the veranda. At Lad's leap, memory of this speed-mad motorist had rushed back to her. Now, tersely, for the benefit of those around, she was identifying him with the killer of Lady, whose death had roused so much indignation in the village.

The myriad glances cast at the prostrate and blubbering Rhuburger were not loving. Someone even said: "Good old Laddie!"

As the mistress and the master were closing the house for the night, a car came down the drive. Out of it stepped their friend Maclay, the local justice of the peace.

"Hello, Mac!" hailed the master. "Here to take us all to jail for assault and battery, or just to serve a 'dangerous-dog' notice on us?"

HE SPOKE lightly, but he was troubled. To-day's escapade might well lead the village law to take some cognizance of Lad's ferocious deed.

"No," laughed Maclay; "neither of those. I'm here unprofessionally. I thought you people might like to know a few things before you go to bed. In the first place, the doctor patched up Rhuburger's bites and took him home. He couldn't take him home in Rhuburger's own car. For some of the tennis crowd had gotten at that. What they did to that six-thousand-dollar runabout was a crime; they stripped it of everything. They threw the carburetor and the wheels and the steering gear and a lot of other parts into the lake. Then they left their cards pinned to the dismantled machine's cushions—in case Rhuburger cares to go further into the matter. While they were doing all that, the club's governors had a hurry-call meeting, and for once the board was unanimous about something. It was unanimous in expelling Rhuburger from the club. Then we—By the way, where's Laddie? Curled up by Lady's grave, as usual, I suppose? Poor old dog!"

"No," denied the mistress; "he's asleep in his 'cave' under the piano. He went there of his own accord. And he ate a perfectly tremendous supper to-night. He's—he's cured!"

How We Neglect Our Schools

(Continued from Page 17)

For that opinion there is ample support in the various emergency provisions, exceptions to and nonenforcement of the laws in nearly all the states of the Union.

Everywhere the compulsory-attendance law, carried through to the logical and only effective conclusion of punishment for negligent parents, is about as much of a dead letter as would be a law for compulsory church attendance. The Federal government report shows that the average age for the whole country at which American children quit going to school is the age of the sixth elementary grade; that is, about twelve years.

A word more about Conway and free education. That community did not cherish its schools as a free institution enough to save them from being abolished. But having lost the schools, the town was aroused and all its citizens, both nontaxpayers and taxpayers, spontaneously agreed to pay something, to pay something that they would actually and individually be aware of, to get those schools open again. And under this emergency regime there was more real public interest in the matter of education than that community had ever felt or manifested before. There is no record of any other place in the United States having had the Conway experience. Would it be worth while to try the Conway experiment or some modification of it in a few negligent and indifferent rural districts to see what would happen? Various public school authorities and members of educational improvement associations have thought that it would be worth while.

Suppose the case of a community in which no child may be admitted to the common school until his parents have paid a fee directly to the school authorities. It may not be more than a dollar for the term; but for the purpose of the experiment it must be a direct, personal payment for the sole purpose of tuition, without which the payer fully recognizes that his child will receive no teaching.

Perhaps a few parents may indignantly refuse to pay, and some may neglect to pay it; but that will not be because of ignorance of the situation, for it will be so novel as to be talked about—a fact which in itself will be incidentally beneficial to the cause of education in the community. Discussion indeed will be a most wholesome substitute for present indifference.

Also, refusal or neglect to pay on the part of any parent will have a wholesome sequel. There will come into the situation a most effective factor, now practically nonexistent, the pride of the child and the pride of the parent, accompanied by a useful touch of envy.

The most callous, illiterate father will feel a trifle uncomfortable in the winter-evening circle about the country-store stove if all the fathers except himself have put their boys into school. Something of his pride in telling about the training of his favorite bird dog will be gone if his boy isn't getting any training because of his failure to pay for it. And the mother of the child who is out of school

(Continued on Page 52)

The remarkable power of Yeast Foam to increase the appetite

ARE you one of the many people who accept a light, uncertain, finicky appetite as a natural condition? Has your desire for food slipped away so stealthily and gradually that you scarcely realize it?

Many speak of their "small" appetite as a virtue, little realizing that it is the result of a state of lowered vitality. Vigorous, eager, even ravenous appetites are not peculiar to robust children alone. Adults should eat just as heartily and enjoy their meals as much.

Failure to possess a normal appetite, however, is no longer a mystery. It is due largely to the lack in food of the appetite-creating substance called water-soluble vitamine. Some foods possess it in a natural state, but before it reaches the table it is lost in cooking, canning, storing, milling, sterilization, and many other modern processes invented to refine the flavor and add to the keeping qualities of foods.

Authorities everywhere acknowledge yeast to be probably the richest source of this remarkable appetite-stimulating element.

A great group of hospitals has recently proved in hundreds of cases the great power of Yeast Foam to actually increase the appetite. Foods which patients had no appetite for were eaten with relish after taking Yeast Foam for a while.

Thousands write that Yeast Foam not only builds appetite, and bodily energy and vigor, but overcomes many unhealthy conditions. It helps to digest the increased food eaten; it tends to eliminate intestinal disorders.

Try this simple test: Eat a cake of Yeast Foam three times a day and see how much more you enjoy your meals.

Magic Yeast—Yeast Foam
—just the same except in name.
At your grocer's—10c package.

"You seem so radiant and happy, my dear."
"Oh, that's good health. I feel so wonderfully well since I have been eating Yeast Foam."

Eat a third, half or whole cake three times a day before meals

It's the same Yeast Foam you know so well as a bread raiser.

Yeast Foam is easily eaten; it is a wholesome, edible food and you'll soon like the taste.

Many eat the cake plain. Some follow it with a little water or milk.

Some mash it fine with a rolling pin and mix it with other foods.

Others dissolve the cake and drink the water containing the yeast.

You'll find it convenient to carry a package of Yeast Foam around with you, eating a cake at convenient times.

Begin eating Yeast Foam today while awaiting more interesting information which we shall be glad to send free.

NORTHWESTERN YEAST CO., Dept. G-15.
1750 N. Ashland Ave., Chicago, Ill.
Please send free instructive booklet, "Dry Yeast as an Aid to Health," telling the interesting story of the wonderful new use of Yeast Foam.

Name _____
Address _____

Japanese Crepe in Novelty Gingham check, 30 in. wide, 75c yd.

Write today for Samples of McCutcheon's Imported Dress Fabrics

FOR many years "The Linen Store" has enjoyed a national prestige in Imported Linen and Cotton Dress Goods. By keeping in personal touch with the correct sources of supply in France, Switzerland, Great Britain, and Japan, McCutcheon's always keeps a pace ahead of advancing fashions.

The beautiful imported fabrics we are now showing will see distinguished use this Spring and Summer in wardrobes of smartly dressed women throughout the country.

It is difficult to describe the charm of these lovely fabrics. They must be seen to be really appreciated. And that is why we are offering you liberal samples of any or all of them.

New Imported Dress Fabrics

English Prints—Smart new designs. Practical for Women, Misses, and Children. 32 in. wide at 55c a yd.

Ginghams—New and original combinations in simple checks, plain colors, stripes, and plaids. 32 in. wide at 75c, $1 and $1.25 a yd.

Woven Tissues—Score of new styles in fast colors. Corded checks, stripes, plaids, etc. 32 and 36 in. wide at 75c a yd.

Japanese Crepes—Hand loomed in Japan; dyed to our special order. Upwards of 35 plain colors. 30 in. wide at 50c a yd.

Dotted Swisses—Imported from Switzerland. Colored grounds with white or contrasting dots, novelty checks, etc. 31 in. wide at $1.50 and $2 a yd.

Drop Stitch Voiles—Soft chiffon finish in full color range of the newest plain shades. 38 in. wide at $1.50 a yd.

Write for free samples—No. 56

Registered
Trade Mark

Established
1855

James McCutcheon & Co.
345 Fifth Ave. New York

How We Neglect Our Schools

(Continued from Page 50)

because of family neglect will feel something uncomfortable, something to be got rid of, when she calls on a neighbor.

As things are now, with the emphasis on the freeness of the public school, such parents feel no sense of shame in their neglect to take something for nothing. And the child who now is envied by other children is not the one who goes to school, but the one who stays away.

A still more important and effective incentive growing out of such an experiment would be an entirely new interest in the quantity and quality of the schooling.

It may seem like an outrageous heresy to suggest abolishing free education for all people in the United States. But what really would happen in any rural community trying such an experiment would be the abolishment of the myth that nobody pays for the schools. For that myth would be substituted the idea that everybody who uses the schools must pay and that anybody who fails to pay will be barred.

American fathers and mothers who care more about the free schools to which they send their children than they do about the lodges and clubs to which they pay dues are probably in a minority.

Compulsion in the matter of education may be as futile a thing as compulsion in religion. Laws saying that parents must send their children to school do not prevent the big percentage of nonattendance in sections where interest in education is at low ebb. Attendance might be improved if parents were told that they could not send their children to school unless a small tuition fee were paid.

Thousands of Americans assume as a matter of course that every community in the country has its high school. In each of the wealthy, big tax-producing states or wealthy subdivisions of states throughout the country the people feel, as a matter of local pride, that their schools are a bit better than all other schools, but as a matter of national pride we take it for granted that all the schools of the entire country must be fairly good, otherwise we could not be such a highly educated nation as we have always thought ourselves to be.

It is only now, since the war, that we have begun to realize that no American boast has less foundation in fact than the familiar claim of a high average in school education for the whole country.

One-Room Schoolhouses

WE ARE ahead of where we were before in certain special aspects of the situation for the country as a whole. We are far ahead in almost every respect, with the exception of the quality of teacher material, so far as certain well-to-do, favored regions are concerned. Teachers' pay has increased everywhere, although its percentage of increase lagged two full years behind the percentage increase in the cost of living until the cost of living itself began to recede in 1921. The total amount spent on schools in the United States has increased tenfold in half a century. New high schools have been established at the rate of one a day for the last twenty-eight years. Since 1874 many miserable one-room, one-teacher rural schools throughout the country have been consolidated into as many as twelve thousand better community graded schools. But there are still one hundred ninety-five thousand one-room rural schoolhouses in the United States, in which four million American children get their substitute for education. With the exception of the automobile industry no activity in this country has increased at a greater rate on a mere dollar basis than that of public-school education. But the point is that these gains for the most part are local and not nation wide.

In spite of them we are as a nation far behind where we have thought we were and where we have boasted of being. In some sections there has been no appreciable progress since the beginning. In some sections there has been absolute retrogression.

But there is no chance that America will drop its pretensions to be ranked as a highly educated nation; so the only thing to do is to shame ourselves into making good those pretensions. It will take many years. It is not a mere question of dollars and cents. It certainly is not a mere issue between classical and vocational training. It is not yet even a question of the common high school.

At the outset and as a national undertaking it is—and will be for a long time to come—the task of giving to all the children of all the forty-eight states a good, thorough, elementary education under trained, cultivated teachers. And that task involves the finding of a way to arouse the interest of the native and foreign born parents of all those children and to replant and transplant everywhere in America the traditional thirst for education.

The goal is a long way ahead, and somewhere on the road to it there must rise up an army of consecrated, able teachers who will teach for the love of children and of America.

An Educated Nation?

ALSO we must ask ourselves if it is well for any state to have some of its counties neglected and ignored while others have the opportunity for fair education; if it is well for the whole Union to have some states so backward and some so progressive that America must continue to exist part enlightened and part ignorant.

Of course the quick, characteristic American answer to those questions is an emphatic negative. But judging the whole country by actual procedure and by results, the answer always has been in the affirmative. Perhaps a plausible argument could be made for the affirmative if anybody dared to make it. Many Americans, no doubt, harp less on the pleasing tradition that any American boy may be President than on the cold, practical notion that most boys cannot expect to be much better off than their fathers before them. There are thousands of poor farmers, poor fishermen, poor miners and poor mountaineers throughout rural America. There are thousands of hopelessly poor laborers in cities and towns. There are boatmen living and raising large families along the banks of the Mississippi and other big rivers, in miserable, squalid one and two room cabins. But in our theories and political campaign orations and boasts we make no distinction between the children born in these cabins and the children born in well-to-do homes in communities with the best equipment of schoolhouse and playground. The theories would be splendid—if they fitted the facts.

It is not snobbishness for those who can help to acknowledge that there are those who need help. In other words, the first step on the long, hard road to becoming an educated nation is to stop bluffing, to put an end to our nineteenth century habit of falsely claiming to be an educated nation and to realize that we are not such a country; to ask ourselves if we are such and frankly say "no."

Perhaps the second question that should be faced is: "Do we want to be an educated nation?"

Oh, yes; after a fashion we want to be, if it does not cost too much in money or in the time needed for other matters. Probably no ignorant person would be annoyed if he should wake up some morning and find himself educated as the result of something that had happened to him in his sleep. There are a conspicuous few captains of industry in the United States who look upon all universities as frauds and humbugs, and one of these proclaims that he is sincerely ashamed of the fact that he is himself a college graduate. The country as a whole, however, does not think of education as disgraceful or as something that it would regret having, if the getting were easy.

But if you put the question a little more strongly and ask if the people of the United States are hungry and eager for education, if they want that more than anything else, the honest answer is that they do not want it more than anything else; not yet. That they do not want it that much is proved by the fact that they have not got it. Any individual man, woman or child anywhere in the United States or any group who really wants education enough to struggle for it can and will get it. American history and biography are full of evidence of that fact. Proof of it runs through the early chapters of the lives of the country's greatest men. The good teachers and the good schools are needed chiefly for the common run of us who do not care much whether we are educated or not.

Washington itself, the capital of the nation, furnishes its proof that Americans do not want education more than they want anything else, although admitting that it is indispensable to trained and efficient citizenship. This is no mere local demonstration of the fact; it is national; for the schools of the District of Columbia are financed by and administered under the supervision of the National Congress. But lack of schoolroom space and other grave deficiencies of the Washington schools have been a scandal all this winter. There have been months of delay in erecting needed buildings, although money for them had been appropriated and was available for immediate expenditure.

Contrast this with the amazing rapidity with which Washington covered all its vacant spaces with buildings for war purposes in 1917, with the mushroom growth of cantonments housing forty thousand men each in all parts of the country. It takes more time for Washington to provide adequate housing for a few hundred school children than it took to erect the quarters for four million men of the draft armies. There seems to be a bad discrepancy here, even after making due allowance for the emergency of war.

The Proofs Against Us

AMONG the new school buildings proposed in Washington last year was a grammar school in one of the outlying sections of the District. A committee of the Parent-Teacher Association asked to see the plans of this building. The committee found them to be an exact duplicate of plans of forty years ago. It required an endless amount of work and argument and untangling of red tape to get those plans changed.

Everywhere there are these proofs of the lack of eagerness. For example, no state in the Union feels that its school-system legislation is complete without a law intended to force the children into the schoolrooms. People who are really hungry do not require laws or policemen to drive them into dining rooms.

No, we do not, as an entire nation, want education more than we want anything else. There are many distractions against which education cannot compete. There are many things, other than mere food and clothing and housing, to get which we exert ourselves far more vigorously than we work to get education.

There are more millions of people who have telephones than there are millions who can talk correct English into the transmitters. Suppose you had a free evening school for the teaching of the correct use of English and a school across the street, not free, for the teaching of the correct steps of the newest jazz dances. Which would get the larger attendance? Compare the attendance of your night schools in any city with the number of half-educated and noneducated persons in that same city who spend their evenings at motion pictures and in dance halls. The comparison is suggested merely because it is relevant to the fact that we do not want education very much. We do not regard it as a necessity, nor do we yearn for it as a stimulating luxury.

not merely a naphtha soap-not merely a white laundry soap but the best features of both combined

Armstrong's Linoleum

for Every Floor in the House

The New Floor for Modern Homes

THE floor you see in this picture is very different from the temporary linoleum floor covering of a few years ago—tacked down in kitchens, halls, and pantries.

This floor of Armstrong's Linoleum is a permanent floor, cemented over a layer of builders' deadening felt. Rugs are laid on this floor. It is waxed and polished occasionally, and always looks fresh and new.

It is not uncommon today for an interior decorator to build up an entire decorative plan for a room or suite from a well-chosen floor of this modern linoleum. There are rich plain colors, delicate two-tone Jaspés, and many distinctive inlaid and printed designs from which to select.

These linoleum floors are smooth and solid. They are quiet and comfortable under foot. They are easy to clean.

ARMSTRONG CORK COMPANY, LINOLEUM DEPARTMENT

941 Mary Street, Lancaster, Pennsylvania

Linoleum is a cool floor in summer and a warm floor in winter.

Such floors are inexpensive, too. For instance, the floor of Armstrong's Inlaid Linoleum, shown above, would cost $49.00, laid in a dining-room of average size, 12 x 14 feet (slightly higher in the far West).

Any good linoleum merchant will be glad to show you Armstrong's Linoleum in a variety of colors and designs, and also tell you what modern linoleum floors will cost you.

Write to our Bureau of Interior Decoration for advice as to proper patterns and colors for use in any scheme of home decoration. No charge for this service.

"The Art of Home Furnishing and Decoration"

(Second Edition)

By Frank Alvah Parsons, President of the New York School of Fine and Applied Art. Sent, with de luxe color plates of fine home interiors, on receipt of twenty cents.

If one of these Armstrong patterns is more suitable for your dining-room than the 3510 shown in the illustration, order by number from your linoleum merchant.

730

690

8064

Look for the CIRCLE "A" trademark on
the linoleum back

Armstrong's Linoleum Rugs

You can also buy rugs of Armstrong's Linoleum, suitable for kitchen, dining-room, or bedroom, and fully guaranteed to give satisfactory service. Send for free booklet, "Armstrong's Linoleum Rugs," showing color plates of many pleasing and artistic designs.

Human Nature in the Bible

(Continued from Page 24)

poet as well as a statesman, and who celebrated the treacherous murder of Captain Sisera by a splendid battle hymn:

The inhabitants of the villages ceased, they ceased in Israel, until that I Deborah arose, that I arose a mother in Israel.

Awake, awake, Deborah! awake, awake, utter a song: arise, Barak, and lead thy captivity captive, thou son of Abinoam.

And the princes of Issachar were with Deborah. . . . For the divisions of Reuben there were great thoughts of heart.

Why abodest thou among the sheepfolds, to hear the bleatings of the flocks? For the divisions of Reuben there were great searchings of heart.

They fought from heaven; the stars in their courses fought against Sisera.

The river of Kishon swept them away, that ancient river, the river Kishon. O my soul, thou hast trodden down strength.

Then were the horsehoofs broken by the means of the pransings, the pransings of their mighty ones.

Blessed above women shall Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite be, blessed shall she be above women in the tent.

He asked water, and she gave him milk; she brought forth butter in a lordly dish.

The mother of Sisera looked out at a window, and cried through the lattice, Why is his chariot so long in coming? why tarry the wheels of his chariots?

Her wise ladies answered her, yea, she returned answer to herself,

Have they not sped? have they not divided the prey; to every man a damsel or two; to Sisera a prey of divers colours, a prey of divers colours of needlework, of divers colours of needlework on both sides, meet for the necks of them that take the spoil?

So let all thine enemies perish, O Lord: but let them that love him be as the sun when he goeth forth in his might.

It is interesting to see that Sisera's mother was interested in fine needlework; she seems especially to have admired the skill of the Jewish women.

Forty years of rest followed the defeat of Sisera; then the Israelites made their accustomed deviation into idolatry, and the victorious Midianites ruled over them seven years. They were finally delivered by the cautious and skeptical Gideon, who must have tried God's patience with his doubtings, questionings, and bargainings, but who for some reason received the divine favor. His faith, like that of many others, depended wholly on facts and figures. I cannot regard him as a hero; he took no chances. For a considerably less display of doubt Moses was forbidden to enter the Promised Land. The calculating shrewdness of human nature, the desire to invest only with assured profit, are magnificently revealed in the character of Gideon.

A Book of Brilliant Short Stories

THE Book of Judges abounds in brilliant short stories; the adventures of Gideon are thrilling, and those of that ruffian, his son Abimelech, even more so. This ambitious and reckless young man conspired against his brothers even as Edmund conspired against Edgar in King Lear. Instead of buying a birthright, like Jacob, he took it by audacity and force; for although he was conspicuously lacking in religion and morality, he never lacked courage. His creed was that of Napoleon—Might makes Right. Dominion and authority belong to those who are ready and willing to take advantage of opportunity. So at this point in Israel's history a conscienceless, melodramatic and picturesque dare-devil appears on the scene and wins headship by a coup d'état. It is a stirring story, the story of Abimelech the Adventurer.

Gideon had seventy legitimate sons, and also Abimelech, born of his maidservant in Shechem. When the father was dead Abimelech visited his own mother's relatives and put before them this question of government: Is it better to have seventy rulers or one? He drew them over; they gave him money, by which he secured a gang of hired cutthroats—"wherewith Abimelech hired vain and light persons, which followed him." He began his turbulent career by butchering his seventy brothers, with the exception of clever Jotham, who hid himself. Abimelech was then formally crowned king.

But Jotham, who was a persuasive orator, stood on an elevation, and, poised a-tiptoe for flight, he pronounced a sylvan allegory to the multitude, beginning authoritatively, for he felt himself to be the legitimate heir:

Hearken unto me, ye men of Shechem, that God may hearken unto you.

The trees went forth on a time to anoint a king over them; and they said unto the olive tree, Reign thou over us.

But the olive tree said unto them, Should I leave my fatness, wherewith by me they honour God and man, and go to be promoted over the trees?

And the trees said to the fig tree, Come thou, and reign over us.

But the fig tree said unto them, Should I forsake my sweetness, and my good fruit, and go to be promoted over the trees?

Then said the trees unto the vine, Come thou, and reign over us.

The Prayer of Busy Hands

By B. Y. WILLIAMS

DEAR God, Thou know'st how many tasks await my hands to-day;
If all are done at set of sun, no time is left to pray.
Thou know'st how many duties press, how urgent is each need;
I may not dare a moment spare to fashion me a creed.

Thou know'st the hungry must be fed, the naked clothed must be;
My scant store wanes; no gift remains of sacrifice for Thee;
So if, when life is done, I come with no gift in my hand,
No prayer nor creed—just this I'll plead: Thou, God, dost understand.

And the vine said unto them, Should I leave my wine, which cheereth God and man, and go to be promoted over the trees?

Apparently it was as hard to get good men to go into politics as it is now in America; and they refused for the same reason.

Then said all the trees unto the bramble, Come thou, and reign over us.

And the bramble said unto the trees, If in truth ye anoint me king over you, then come and put your trust in my shadow: and if not, let fire come out of the bramble, and devour the cedars of Lebanon.

If ye then have dealt truly and sincerely with Jerubbaal and with his house this day, then rejoice ye in Abimelech, and let him also rejoice in you.

But if not, let fire come out from Abimelech, and devour the men of Shechem, and the house of Millo; and let fire come out from the men of Shechem, and from the house of Millo, and devour Abimelech.

Jerubbaal was another name for Gideon; Millo was a fort near Shechem; Shechem itself was an important town in sacred history, the first Canaan city visited by Abraham, the scene of the crowning of Abimelech and later of Rehoboam, and the place where Jesus spoke with the woman of Samaria.

Jotham let this prophecy of civil war sink into the people like a poisoned arrow; it was a much more powerful speech than if he had indulged in vituperation or jealous rage. And after three years there was dissension between Abimelech and his people; an agitator named Gaal, who lacked the courage of his convictions at the critical moment, induced the people to rise against Abimelech. That resolute man had no difficulty in defeating Gaal and the rebels, and took fierce vengeance on Shechem. A small party escaped, and hid in a stronghold of the house of the god Berith. But Abimelech, who feared neither god nor man, adopted the same method that brought such terror to the heart of Macbeth. He and every man in the army carried a bough on their shoulders, and advanced like a moving forest; as they drew near to the place of refuge, they set fire to it, using their boughs as fuel; so was fulfilled literally and impressively the prophetic allegory of Jotham. In a subsequent fight Abimelech had his skull cracked by a stone dropped from a woman's hands; and he commanded his armor-bearer to slay him, that he might not die in disgrace. He was consistently masculine; he died as he lived, by the sword.

Social inequalities, characteristic of all communities in time of peace, are annihilated by the common danger in time of war. As Abimelech, the son of a housemaid, had risen to be king, so Jephthah, the son of a harlot, who had been expelled from his father's house by his legitimate brothers, was sent for when Israel was attacked by the Ammonites. For in war the question is not Who was your mother? but What can you do? And Jephthah was a mighty man of valor. He was proud and clever enough to tell the ambassadors that if he agreed to lead them in battle they must acknowledge him as ruler after the victory. To this they agreed; and we see in the history of Israel, as elsewhere, how a powerful leader may rise from humble origin.

Jephthah, like the wise man he was, tried to avoid open hostilities with the children of Ammon, and a spirited correspondence took place between him and their king; when negotiations failed, he smote them hip and thigh. If only he had not made his famous vow!

Samson the Nazarite

JEPHTHAH and his nameless daughter are immortal figures of tragedy; they conquer more people every day than Jephthah did on the happiest and saddest day of his life. She died for her country and for her father's honor; every year thereafter the daughters of Israel celebrated her heroism with public lamentation.

About twenty-five years after the death of Jephthah, the sinister shadow of the Philistines begins to spread across the Promised Land; it will be remembered that their country stood directly in the path of the Israelites when they escaped from Egypt, and it was owing to this obstacle that the Hebrews made a wide detour. They inhabited a part of the seacoast on the southwest portion of Canaan, though their army seems to have been much more important than their navy.

The original hindrance was prophetic; they were to give Israel trouble many years; for the Israelites surrendered to the Philistines before surrendering to their men at arms. The Philistines had beaten and ruled the Hebrews forty years when Samson was born.

He hated the foreigners as Hannibal hated Rome, and it was destined that he should trouble them.

An angel of the Lord appeared to Manoah and his wife, predicted that they would have a son, that he must be a Nazarite, and keep the vows; after which the angel ascended to heaven before their astonished eyes.

The word Nazarite means Separated, and the rules which a Nazarite must obey were

(Continued on Page 57)

Learn how to Dress Up Your Skin

Let this Little Booklet Teach You the Finer Arts of the Powder Puff

When Nature fashioned a woman's skin, so delicate and so radiantly fair, she did not anticipate the smoke and grime and dust of the modern city. The complexion which survives today is one which has been tenderly cared for and protected.

Long ago the belles of the Old South, famed the world over for their beauty and charm, discovered this secret, and it was among them that Freeman's, a face powder so incomparably fine and pure that it blends perfectly with the most exquisite skin, first found favor.

Let us make you acquainted with Freeman's, favorite today in fashion centers everywhere. The attached coupon, with ten cents in stamps, will bring you four generous samples and "The Etiquette of the Powder Puff," a helpful little booklet on the care of the skin.

Since 1876
Freeman's
FACE POWDER • Talc • Rouge

Ask for FREEMAN'S at any of the better Drug Stores, Department Stores, or Beauty Shops

Send Today for
"The Etiquette of the Powder Puff"

THE FREEMAN PERFUME CO.
2002 Norwood Avenue, Cincinnati, Ohio

Gentlemen: I am enclosing ten cents in stamps for your beauty booklet, "The Etiquette of the Powder Puff," and samples of Freeman's.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

"You Folks Have Me Handicapped With Your Comfys"

YOU can't really rest and enjoy yourself to the full when you continue to wear your heavy walking shoes in your hours of ease and relaxation.

More and more people of good taste and refinement are taking a commonsense view of this matter, especially when, to get real foot comfort, it is no longer necessary to wear hideous, sloppy "bedroom" slippers.

That is the thing so many discriminating people like about Genuine Daniel Green Comfys. They can slip them on as soon as they come home at night, and if friends drop in, they know that their feet will look trim and neat, with no need to apologize for their informality.

Quiet and dignified in color and style, their trim custom-built appearance and perfect fit make them unlike any other slippers. They are the last word in good taste and good form.

Of course you would naturally expect such well built shoes as Daniel Green Comfys to cost slightly more. They look so much better at the beginning, and hold their shape so perfectly after long months of wear, that you will readily agree that their greater value is far more than the slight difference in cost.

Don't forget that inferior slippers—either carelessly or otherwise—are sometimes offered as Comfys. Insist on the genuine that bears the Comfy label. Daniel Green Felt Shoe Company, Dolgeville, N. Y. New York Office: 116 East 13th Street.

Why—do they describe other felt slippers as "just as good" if Daniel Green Comfys were not the best? Don't be misled, look for this label in the slippers you buy.

Daniel Green Comfy Slippers

For Men, Women and Children

Human Nature in the Bible

(Continued from Page 55)

set forth with precision in the sixth chapter of Numbers:

He shall separate himself from wine and strong drink, and shall drink no vinegar of wine, or vinegar of strong drink, neither shall he drink any liquor of grapes, nor eat moist grapes, or dried.

All the days of his separation shall he eat nothing that is made of the vine tree, from the kernels even to the husk.

All the days of the vow of his separation there shall no razor come upon his head . . . he shall be holy, and shall let the locks of the hair of his head grow.

You see, he was forbidden even grape juice; and he must neither shave nor have his hair trimmed. It would contribute to the general pulchritude if all Americans would take a vow not to have the back of their necks shaved, a fashion as commonly vulgar as it is vulgarly common.

Samson is the champion athlete of the Bible and, like most athletes, was then and is now enormously popular. College undergraduates are often ridiculed for their worship of football players; but they are merely following afar off the manner of the world. Men who are physically powerful have ten times more admirers than those who are intellectually distinguished; this fact is more evident to-day than in the age of the cave man. Had Monsieur Carpentier won the prize fight of 1921 the world would have wallowed in a morass of sentimentality, and in his own land this boxer would have been a greater hero than Marshal Foch or Anatole France. Compare the number of Americans who are interested in Jack Dempsey with those who admire the art of John Sargent. Although unfitted for the position, Samson was appointed Judge, and judged Israel twenty years. Like most heavyweight athletes, he was a good fellow and good-naturedly generous when not opposed; but he was not conspicuous for intellectual brilliancy; his head was as solid as the muscles on his arms. He was fond of betting, an easy prey to women, and his humor expressed itself in practical jokes. He never had his hair cut but once, and found that even more expensive than it is to-day.

Others Like Samson

LIKE most stupid people, he took the easiest way and followed his instincts. He saw a Philistine girl and wanted to marry her; in response to the expostulations of his father, he merely replied: "Get her for me; for she pleaseth me well."

It is interesting to notice that this Philistine foreign wife betrayed him to the Philistines; prophetic of the later conduct of Delilah. Samson paid his bet in grim fashion and then left his wife to herself. It is characteristic of him, however, that he came back to her, his desire always being stronger than his wit; and when he found his "best man" had taken her he destroyed the harvest of the Philistines with illuminated fox tails. His methods of destruction showed more originality than the results thereof; for on a subsequent occasion he slew a thousand Philistines with the jawbone of a certain animal, which is by no means the last illustration of what widespread havoc can be wrought by an ass.

Another woman nearly proved his destruction; and he would have been lost if he had not had the unusual advantage of being able to walk out of the locked gates of the city, taking them with him as he went. Delilah finally succeeded in compassing his downfall;

she did it not by cleverness, but by persistently being herself. I remember as a boy Samson's giving her his secret seemed to be wholly inexplicable; how could he be such a fool? He not only knew the necessity of keeping his strength, but her absolute treachery had been proved in his presence three times.

My father had found it impossible to explain the situation to me, though I noticed it seemed natural enough to him. One must have lived some time in the world in order to understand how natural it was; it happens every day. Samson was not the only fool in the world.

It was only when he became blind, like Gloucester, that he really saw the truth. Good health often blunts one's perceptions. Do you remember the infinitely melancholy words of Gloucester when, in response to a sympathetic inquiry, he said:

I have no way, and therefore want no eyes;
I stumbled when I saw.

Either Delilah did not tell the Philistines the reason of his weakness, or they were stupid enough to forget it; they should have kept the prison barber at him every day. I suppose, however, they enjoyed watching his feats of strength, which they made him perform in public for their amusement; he willingly acquiesced in satisfying their curiosity, knowing that it was necessary to keep in condition.

The Story of the Tribe of Benjamin

MILTON made a glorious poem out of Samson's sufferings. He understood them. He, too, had suffered both by blindness and by women. Milton never forgot his first wife, and in the colloquy between the captive giant and Delilah, who had the assurance to visit him, there is more than a touch of autobiography.

After the Philistines came general anarchy; no king had as yet been appointed, and no judge had succeeded Samson. "Every man did that which was right in his own eyes," which means they all did wrong.

A quarrel over one woman started a terrific civil war, which nearly annihilated the tribe of Benjamin. This horrible story, a duplicate of what had happened in Sodom, illustrates the unnatural wickedness in Israel, and the sacredness of hospitality, according to which the safety of a guest was considered more important than the welfare of the family. The tale is told with Russian intensity; and the battle that followed the death of the woman is set forth in detail. The children of Benjamin, who were on the defensive, had a number of sharpshooters:

Among all this people there were seven hundred chosen men left-handed; every one could sling stones at an hair breadth, and not miss.

The city of Benjamin was taken by a stratagem; much slaughter resulted. Now the other tribes had all taken a vow that not one of them would give his daughter to a man of Benjamin in marriage. Later, their hearts softened toward the outcast tribe, and the method by which—while still the vow was held inviolate—the surviving warriors of Benjamin secured wives is rude and decidedly interesting.

NOTE—In the next, the fifth, article Professor Phelps will write of the beautiful pastoral story of Ruth and treat of Eli and his sons, Saul, the covetous, the exploits of Jonathan and the incorruptibility of Judge Samuel.

Maternity

THE period preceding the birth of her child finds the prospective mother half joyful, half afraid. She anticipates the happiness to come, yet doubts her courage and strength as the time draws near. These doubts and fears are Nature's warning that the great gift she is to bestow must be prepared for.

Scientific authorities have long realized the grave consequences, to both mother and infant, of improper elimination of food waste during pregnancy.

When food waste is not promptly and thoroughly eliminated, poisons are formed that increase in quantity and potency and are absorbed into the system. They endanger the health, even threaten the life, of the mother and the child she is to bring into the world.

How may proper elimination be secured?

Not by the use of laxatives or cathartics, for, writes an eminent authority, "An inestimable amount of injury is done by the use of these intestinal irritants, most of which provide temporary relief only, at the expense of permanent injury."

Science has found a newer, better way; a means as simple as Nature itself.

Lubrication

In perfect health a natural lubricant keeps the food waste soft. Thus it is easily eliminated. But in the case of the expectant mother, this natural lubricant is frequently not sufficient.

To find something to take the place of this natural lubricant, leading medical authorities have conducted exhaustive research. They have discovered that the gentle lubricating action of Nujol most closely resembles that of Nature's own lubricant. As Nujol is not a laxative, it cannot cause distress. It is not a medicine in any sense of the word—and, like pure water, it is harmless.

Leading medical authorities, realizing the dangers of continued use of laxatives and cathartics during pregnancy, are advocating the gentle, lubricating action of Nujol. Get a bottle from your druggist today.

Nujol

A Lubricant—Not a Laxative

Guaranteed by Nujol Laboratories, Standard Oil Co. (New Jersey)

Mail coupon for booklet, "The Expectant and Nursing Mother," to Nujol, Room 821-B, 44 Beaver Street, New York. (In Canada, send to Nujol, 22 St. Francois Xavier Street, Montreal.)

Name

Address

For Children

Of 50 nations—extra-flavory oats

This is how we won the world to the use of Quaker Oats.

We made this brand a super-grade—made it from queen grains only. All the small grains were discarded. Only the rich, plump, flavory oats were flaked. We got but ten pounds from a bushel.

The delicious flavor won millions of homes in America. Then we sent it abroad. Gradually oat lovers all the world over were won by these flavory flakes.

Quaker Oats soon came to dominate everywhere. The true oat lovers of nearly every race sent over seas to get them.

You get this grade at any store when you ask for Quaker Oats. It costs no fancy price.

It helps to foster the love of oats, and that is what you want.

The oat is supreme food for children—almost the ideal food. Each pound of Quaker Oats supplies 1810 calories of 16 needed food elements.

Make this dish doubly inviting. Serve these fragrant, flavory flakes.

Quaker Oats

Just the cream of the oats—in flakes

5 dishes 2½c

The large package of Quaker Oats—the family package—makes 60 liberal dishes.

The price is 30 cents, save in distant sections. In such economical food, why serve less than the best?

Packed in sealed round packages with removable covers

Making Our Schools Safe for Our Children

By S. JOSEPHINE BAKER, M. D.

Director, Bureau Child Hygiene, Department of Health, New York City

USUALLY a mother feels that she has done her duty, so far as the school is concerned, when she has seen that her child is properly clothed, goes to school on time and does whatever home work is necessary to keep up with his classes. The father feels that he has done his duty if his taxes are paid and his child brings home a report of work accomplished. But what do the fathers and mothers of this country know about the schools their children attend? Do they know whether they are well ventilated, or whether the children are compelled to breathe superheated and vitiated air over and over again? Do they know whether the drinking water is clean, whether the sanitary arrangements are proper, whether the classroom is overcrowded? Have they any idea about the proper arrangement of school desks and chairs, or do they know that their children are rapidly getting curvature of the spine because the school seats are never adjusted to the child's needs? Have they any idea whether or not the lighting of the schoolroom is bringing on defective vision that may lead to blindness? In short, do they know whether the conditions that obtain in the school are factors of great importance in causing the children to have physical defects, or whether the schools are so maintained that the child is as safe or safer in the classroom than it could be anywhere else? One thing is certain, and that is that so long as education is compulsory and the child must go to school, whether he wishes to or not, from the time he is six years old, it is the business of the state to furnish a safe, decent and wholesome place in which the child can obtain the education that is required. Certain it is that there never was and probably never will be such a change of normal habits as that which occurs when we take an active, growing child of six years or more and compel it to spend several consecutive hours of the day under conditions which are found to exist in many classrooms.

The Country Schoolhouse

WHEN we find, as we do in a large number of schoolhouses of this country, that the conditions under which the child must live five or more hours of the day are wholly abnormal and unhealthful, then it is time for every mother and father in this country to see that not only are the schools made safe for their children but safe for all children.

Not long ago a committee representing our two largest educational and health associations reported that over half of the children of this country are attending rural schools, and said that "the country schoolhouse is the worst, the most insanitary and inadequate type of building in the whole country, including not only buildings for human beings but also those used for domestic animals. Rural school children are less healthy and are handicapped by more physical defects than are the children of the cities, including even the children of the slums."

These statements are not exaggerations. Strange as it may seem, the city child has a better chance for health in its school life than if it lived in the country. But the city child is not wholly safe in this regard, for a recent survey in one of our largest cities showed that one school out of every five was so insanitary as to be a positive menace to the health of the children.

The draft figures showed that thirty-nine out of every hundred of the people of this country are unhealthy, and our school figures show that an even greater proportion of our children of school age are suffering from some sort of physical disability which, if not removed at an early age, will handicap them all through life.

We have had ample warning about this condition. At least five years ago Doctor Wood, of Columbia University, called attention to the fact that three-quarters of the twenty-two million school children of this country are suffering from some condition which interferes with their health or which may cause serious ill health in the future.

The Mother's Influence

MONEY is not needed to any great extent in order to provide healthful surroundings for the growing child, but intelligence and understanding are absolutely essential. If the school is responsible for so large a proportion of physical defects and resultant ill health among the larger number of our children, we must change the conditions in the schools which allow this ill health to be produced or to continue. Practically speaking, there is probably not a community in the United States where a small group of active and interested mothers, combined with the school-teacher or teachers, cannot themselves place the school in a decent, sanitary condition or bring forward the facts which will cause the school board to take the necessary action.

What are the points about our schools that need attention and that affect the health of the children? First of all, our schoolhouses should be built on well-drained ground. The well or other source of water supply should never be in a position where it is on a level lower than or within three hundred feet of the outhouse. All possible methods of contamination of the water supply should be eliminated and if there is any doubt as to the purity of the water, samples should be sent to the state department of health for analysis.

Outhouses or privies should never be of the ordinary "hole-in-the-ground" type. If nothing better can be afforded, cans which fit tightly under the seat and which can be removed as soon as they are filled furnish a perfectly sanitary and safe method to be used. Plans and specifications for building such closets may be obtained from the United States Public Health Service, Washington, D. C.

The school building itself, whether it be one room or many, should be so constructed that the windows are on the side of the classrooms. The lighting of the schoolroom is of the utmost importance in conserving eyesight. The seats should be so arranged that the light does not shine into the child's eyes but comes in slightly from the back and over the child's shoulder, preferably on the left. Remember that light is to see by and not to look at. The window area should be at

(Continued on Page 61)

Six Savings from Soap

Made possible with Fels-Naptha by its perfect combination of splendid soap and real naptha. How this golden bar brings ease and economy in doing your washing and general housework

1. A saving of clothes

Why not make your lovely clothes last longer? Those dainty undergarments with edgings and insertions you crochet with your own hands, are too precious to be worn-out so soon in washing.

When you rub clothes between a hard soap and a hard washboard that means wearing away the fabric and hurrying it to the rag-bag.

Fels-Naptha is particularly safe. Because it is not a brick-hard soap it rubs off easily on the clothes without wear. And it washes clothes so gently! The real naptha in Fels-Naptha makes the dirt let go by loosening it from the fibre without injury to the fabric. Only extremely soiled places need a light rubbing. You don't have to do any hard rubbing at all. This is why Fels-Naptha keeps clothes from wearing-out fast.

3. A saving of time

In using Fels-Naptha you simply wet the clothes, soap them, put them to soak, then go about the house for half an hour doing something else while the real naptha in Fels-Naptha goes through and through the clothes and loosens the dirt. At the same time, Fels-Naptha makes the water soapy, ready to flush away the dirt when you douse the clothes up and down a few times. Extremely soiled places, of course, will need a light rubbing. Rinse, and the washing is done. A saving of time!

4. A saving of fuel

Since you can do the washing with Fels-Naptha in lukewarm water, what is the use of wasting gas or coal? You can save all the extra heat needed to boil clothes, if you use Fels-Naptha.

When you use a washing-machine:—because the naptha in Fels-Naptha loosens the dirt even before the washer starts to work, you don't have to run the washer so long—you save electric current.

5. A saving of energy

When you use Fels-Naptha there is no need to spend the morning bending over the washtub, or to rub your strength away on the washboard. There is no boiler to lift on and off the stove, and no lifting of clothes in and out of the boiler. You will never dread the weekly wash when you do it the Fels-Naptha way, because it doesn't tire you out.

If you have the washing "done out" with Fels-Naptha, the clothes come home sweeter and cleaner, and with less wash wear-and-tear. Or, if the washing is done at home for you with Fels-Naptha, the strength saved enables your laundress to do the ironing, too, the same day. That's what a saving of energy gains!

6. A saving of money

Besides the saving of money in fuel, time, and clothes, very often with Fels-Naptha you save doctor's bills by preventing colds from overheating, and other illness from over-exertion.

The only way you can make this all-round saving from soap is to be sure you get Fels-Naptha—the original and genuine naptha soap—of your grocer. The clean naptha odor and the red-and-green wrapper are your guides.

The clean odor of Fels-Naptha shows it contains real naptha

It is amazing how quickly and thoroughly Fels-Naptha works throughout the house—brightening painted woodwork, taking spots out of rugs, carpets, cloth, draperies, cleaning enamel of bathtub, washstand, and sink.

FELS-NAPTHA

THE GOLDEN BAR WITH THE CLEAN NAPTHA ODOR

Armour's Star Bacon

THE unvarying quality and flavor of Star Bacon are attained by our extreme care in selecting only the choicest of the millions of pounds we cure yearly. Star Bacon keeps so well and may be served in so many ways that it is economical to buy an entire piece.

Serve Star Bacon in these appetizing ways: bacon omelette; bacon and beans; stuffed bacon slices; sautéed liver and bacon; bacon and hominy; bacon muffins; bacon and spinach, etc.

In frying, always start the strips on a cold skillet and fry slowly. Save the drippings for flavoring—for sautéing and deep fat frying.

Star Bacon is identified as highest grade by the Armour Oval Label—the quality mark that takes the guesswork out of buying.

Ask your dealer for these Oval Label Foods:

STAR HAM	DRY AND FRESH SAUSAGE
SIMON PURE LEAF LARD	CLOVERBLOOM BUTTER
Nestlé CANNED MEATS	NUT-OLA MARGARINE
Nestlé EVAPORATED MILK	Nestlé EGGS

ARMOUR AND COMPANY, Chicago

Also sold sliced, in glass jars and in 8 and 16 oz. cartons.

Making Our Schools Safe for Our Children

(Continued from Page 58)

least one-quarter of the floor space. Direct sunlight should be subdued by dark shades. Blackboards should be directly in line with the vision of the child and should not have any cross-lights upon them. They must be kept clean so that they are entirely dark and erasers should be cleaned at least once a day. This will result not only in keeping the blackboard clean but will also avoid the irritating dust that is so often responsible for nose and throat troubles.

The length of the classroom should depend upon the distance from which the child in the last row can see the blackboard. Often it will not be possible to change the size of the room or the number of pupils in it. When the room is large, however, every child who is apparently straining his eyesight in looking at the blackboard should be given a seat nearer the front, while only those with apparently perfect vision should be placed in the rear seats.

The desks and chairs need attention. Badly adjusted school desks are probably responsible for more spinal curvature than any other one cause. It is an easy matter to notice how children sit at their desks. The proper position is to have the seat at such a height that the child's feet are placed solidly on the floor. The desk should be just high enough so that the child may sit upright before it, with elbows resting easily on the top of the desk. Each child should have its seat and desk adjusted to its own height. The right proportion is to have the seat two-sevenths and the top of the desk three-sevenths of the height of the child.

Individual Cup and Towel

THE common drinking cup and the common towel are among the most ordinary sources by which infection may be carried from one child to another. Contagious eye and skin diseases and the common contagious diseases of childhood in general are frequently started in the form of an epidemic simply because school children have used the same towel or the same drinking cup. In cities it is common practice to install drinking fountains in new school buildings. The use of these fountains is a great help in solving the problem, but they are quite expensive. So it is with provisions for proper washing facilities. The use of paper towels is to be recommended in every instance where it is practicable, but such towels are fairly costly and many communities feel that they are a luxury rather than a necessity. The pail and dipper and the roller towel of the little red schoolhouse are fast becoming obsolete, but a cheap and sensible solution of this difficulty, both in cities and rural communities, would seem to be to have each child bring its own cup and its own towel from home. The cup may be of tin or china and the towel may be any clean piece of absorbent white material.

I have kept for the last the all-important question of ventilation of the schoolroom. In comparison with this, every other feature of school life must take a lower place in the scheme of the important things to be considered. Free ventilation, provision of an adequate amount of pure, clean air in the classroom at all times, is the most important single factor that makes for health. We have found in New York City that in classrooms kept at a temperature of 68 degrees Fahrenheit and ventilated by artificial means which depend upon closed windows for their efficient operation, common colds were ninety-two per cent more prevalent and serious respiratory diseases such as bronchitis and pneumonia were thirty-two per cent more prevalent than among children who spent their school days in rooms kept at the same temperature but where the rooms were ventilated by means of open windows.

The question of adequate ventilation of classrooms is not the number of cubic feet of air space that is allowed for each child, so much as it is the number of times the air can be changed within a given period. The problem is to see that this air change is carried out without any undue drafts. In towns and cities where a small amount of money may be spent, window boards or window deflectors may be used. Window boards are simply straight pieces of board about six inches wide and as long as the window is wide. The lower sash is raised and the window board placed directly under it. The sash is then brought down to come into close contact with the upper edge of the window board. The air will come into the room between the upper and lower sashes. As it is deflected upward there is no draft, but a constant current of fresh air is carried into the room. The same is true of window deflectors. These consist of straight pieces of board or glass, placed with the lower edge in close contact with the window sill, and the upper edge deflected into the room. The window is then pulled down about even with the upper part of the deflector and the air enters in a constant upward current, without drafts.

Make the School as Safe as the Home

A SIMPLE method that has been found to be inexpensive and entirely satisfactory in country schools is to remove one or two of the upper panes of glass from the window and tack over the opening a piece of unbleached muslin. This acts as a filter for the air and at the same time allows a soft, gentle current which will give an adequate air supply. Sufficient fresh air is the great enemy of the contagious diseases and all diseases of the lungs. In the changing climate that we encounter in most parts of this country it is impossible for us to live outdoors all of the time, but if we would keep well we must bring the outdoor air indoors as much as possible. The temperature in the classroom should never be above 68 degrees Fahrenheit, but above everything there must be abundant fresh air.

The school should be as safe as the home for the child, in providing healthful surroundings and preventing the occurrence or spread of contagious diseases and in preventing the occurrence of ill health or physical defects. The changes in school hygiene that are necessary to produce these desirable conditions may be made without the aid of a school doctor or nurse. The continued health oversight of the children is so important, however, that the school nurse must be considered as necessary a part of the school system as the teacher, and every community should do everything within its power to see that school nurses are employed in every school district.

EDITOR'S NOTE—In an early issue Dr. Baker will discuss the unnecessary diseases of children.

Stout Women

Dress
Fashionably

Look
Slender

This Book is Free and Tells You How

Ultra-Modish Clothes With Slenderizing Lines

STOUT women, now, may dress in latest fashion. They can follow the latest mode, fashions of the hour—and look slender.

They can now procure ultra-modish clothes, with becoming, slenderizing lines—ready to put right on and wear.

New York and Paris Fashions

Lane Bryant specializes in providing just such clothes. New York and Paris fashions re-designed with lines that slenderize. The finest materials and the best workmanship—always.

Yet the prices are very low, for Lane Bryant manufactures as well as designs—and sells direct to you.

Service by Mail

Our service is nation wide. The Lane Bryant stores in New York, Chicago, and Detroit serve daily the elite of the land. The Lane Bryant Style Book brings this service right to your door.

Beautiful Style Book Free

Sent absolutely FREE—the new 76-page Lane Bryant Style Book, "Slenderizing Fashions for Stout Women"—the only Style Book published exclusively for Stout Women. Pictures newest Spring and Summer Coats, Suits, Dresses, Waists, Skirts, Corsets, Hose and Underwear—just for stout women. Sent Free. A post card will bring it. Write today.

Sizes
up to 56
Bust

An example of the Slenderizing
Styles shown in the Lane Bryant
Style Book.

Lane Bryant
Address Dept 52
38th Street at
Fifth Avenue NEW YORK

Smart Embroideries for Spring and Summer

EVERY woman has had the experience of admiring a frock and sustaining a compound fracture of her sense of fitness when she learned the price. Only then did she discover, nine times out of ten, that the value lay in the embroidery which seemed so much a part of the frock that she had scarcely noticed it. This distinctive needlework touch, however, may be in every woman's wardrobe at little expense beyond the purchase of a pattern and the use of odd moments for the work. On these two pages are some of the smartest designs for the coming spring and summer, and all of them are well adapted to that most popular of all frocks—the chemise.

Delicate shadow embroidery has never been used to better advantage than in the graceful poppy design at the extreme left above. With sheer cream batiste or cotton voile as the material, the work is done in a medium-weight white floss; and the whole design, with the exception of the outline and the spirals running up onto the waist, is embroidered on the wrong side in either a short and long or a darning stitch. On the right side the outline stitch is used, with little dots here and there in flat satin stitch. Palest blue with sky-blue embroidery and flesh with coral would also be lovely combinations. This same design could be applied very effectively to crêpe de Chine, Canton crêpe or any of the heavier Georgettes by couching on several strands of soft silk, very heavy floss or a soft cord, and doing the embroidery on the right side.

Gay red headed cherries, with tiny green leaves and stems, are used above with delightful result on a chemise frock of ivory or black crêpe de Chine or Georgette, sashed in cherry ribbon.

The frock, from which spring grapes and grape-leaves, is of linen—oyster over a black silk slip, or tan over emerald, or white over coral, or gray over deep blue. The design is cut from the linen, all the edges are buttonholed and, on the back, the fruit and leaves are caught together and to the cut-out circle in which they are placed. Those who hesitate to cut holes in their dresses may use the same design by embroidering the fruit solidly and the leaves in long and short stitches.

In the interesting design on the frock at the extreme right (page 62) the buttonhole stitch is used for the scallops. On navy serge, platinum gray scallops are very good-looking, with the same gray floss used for the satin-stitch dots and the outlined ovals and angles, and the central row of diamonds filled in with beads of garnet or Chinese red. A Canton crêpe frock of platinum gray would be stunning with dark blue embroidery and diamonds of fine Chinese red beads, or solid embroidery.

Embroidered sleeves on a plain frock are especially attractive when combined with a band of matching embroidery about the neck, as sketched above. This design may be worked in cross-stitch, or in a combination of solid embroidery with outlining done in either silk floss or beads. On any plain summer fabric, such as batiste, heavy linen or handkerchief linen, floss should be used, in self-color or in the dull blues and Chinese reds; the bead and embroidery combination is best on tricotine or one of the silk crêpes. Midnight blue crêpe de Chine embroidered in soft gray worsted is a fascinating possibility.

For the sheer summer materials, from cotton voile to Georgette, the flower and butterfly design above is lovely in outline stitch, or couching, and French knots. White worked with black or orange would be tremendously effective, as would colored voile embroidered in deeper shades of the same color. Any of the crêpes or Georgettes are lovely worked in gold or silver thread, or beaded.

The two designs at the right above are particularly well adapted for use on tricotine, twill or Canton crêpe and are equally attractive in solid embroidery, outlining or beading. In a heavy material, however, the puffed sleeves of the frock at the left, which are delightfully quaint in voile or batiste, should be replaced by wide, straight ones. Coral crêpe, embroidered in blue, is particularly lovely for this.

The Most Luxurious Perfume In The World

The perfume of infinite delicacy, abiding fragrance and rare distinction.

A memory of the famous court beauties and the lovely gardens of old France from whence it comes.

is offered in all the most necessary toilet articles—

EXTRAIT
EAU DE TOILETTE
POUDRE TALC
SACHET SAVON
BATH CRYSTALS
BRILLANTINE

The supreme art of the parfumeur, inherited and enhanced by three generations, is expressed today in Fleurs d'Amour and the many other exquisite creations of this old French house.

ROGER & GALLET

PARIS

25 WEST 32ND STREET
NEW YORK

CREATORS OF RARE
PERFUMES

Our Guide to the most exquisite "Parisian Toilet Specialties" on request.

Best Dealers
Everywhere

Filet Designs that Accord With Lingerie

108

For the sweater or wool dress comes the vestee and collar set above. Fine blue linen scrim is the material, and filet motifs, made of No. 100 linen thread, the trimming.

Motifs of filet, crocheted with No. 90 thread, oddly decorate beautiful hand-loom Belgian linen to make the interesting and unusual coat set below.

108

PHOTO BY WM. SHEWELL ELIOT

Janet Beecher, shown proudly exhibiting her young son, has a leading part in A Bill of Divorcement, that remarkable play which is featuring Allan Pollock, a talented young English actor who has "come back" after the most grueling war experiences.

107

Pongee is one of the most satisfactory of lingerie materials, whether in the white or tan color, and when trimmed with filet, crocheted with No. 100 thread, is as pretty as it is sturdy and practical. The knickers and vest set above is of white pongee with a filet of excellent design.

107

107

107

linen scrim, the motifs being crocheted of No. 100 thread in the same lovely shade of blue. Both sets offer an exceedingly attractive use for odds and ends of old hand-woven linen that still survive from the trousseaus and household chests of two or three generations ago. Since the designs are very simple, anything, from the finely woven white linen to the heavy coarse gray or tan, may be utilized. The linen thread for the filet, of course, should be carefully chosen, so that it will be in perfect harmony with the quality of the linen.

One may give one's lingerie a very distinctive touch by crocheting from No. 125 thread a single medallion for each piece with one's initial surmounted by a handsome coronet. White washable satin was used for this vest, knickers and slip set, though nainsook, batiste or crêpe de Chine might have been chosen.

107

Washable satin, or taffeta, or nainsook is appropriate for this as well as for the set in the center of the page, with its bands of filet. Pongee is also a desirable lingerie material, for it wears and launders beautifully, is comparatively inexpensive and exceedingly good-looking. Even the tan makes most attractive undergarments and is often more becoming than pure white. Nightgowns to match these sets may be easily made.

Hand-loom Belgian linen was used for the coat set with its several insets, which were crocheted from No. 90 thread. The collar and vestee set, to be worn with a one-piece dress or a sweater, is made of fine blue Embroidery Transfer Patterns may be secured from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City.

CHOCOLATE LAYER CAKE

Cream $\frac{1}{2}$ cup shortening with 1 cup sugar, beating well; add 1 beaten egg, 1 cup milk slowly, and mix well. Add $\frac{1}{2}$ cup flour sifted with $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoon salt and 2 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder; mix in 1 teaspoon vanilla and bake in 3 greased layer cake tins in moderate oven 15 to 20 minutes. Put together with chocolate filling and icing made with $\frac{1}{2}$ cups confectioner's sugar to which is added slowly sufficient boiling water to make smooth paste; add 1 teaspoon vanilla, 1 oz. unsweetened melted chocolate and $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon grated orange peel.

PINEAPPLE LAYER CAKE

Cream $\frac{1}{2}$ cup shortening; add $\frac{1}{2}$ cup sugar slowly; add 2 beaten egg yolks. Sift together $\frac{3}{4}$ teaspoon Royal Baking Powder, $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoon salt, and $\frac{1}{2}$ cup flour and add alternately with $\frac{1}{2}$ cup milk; add 1 teaspoon vanilla and fold in 2 beaten egg whites. For filling and icing—Put $\frac{1}{2}$ cups confectioner's sugar into bowl; add $\frac{1}{2}$ cup milk and beat until smooth; add 1 tablespoon lemon juice and 1 tablespoon small pieces of canned pineapple; add 1 teaspoon melted butter. Spread between layers and sprinkle with small pieces pineapple drained well. Spread icing on top and sides of cake and add pieces of the pineapple while icing is still soft.

MAPLE NUT CAKE

Cream $\frac{1}{2}$ cup shortening with 1 cup light brown sugar; add 2 egg yolks, mix well and add $\frac{1}{2}$ cup milk; sift together $\frac{1}{2}$ cup flour, $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon salt and two teaspoons Royal Baking Powder and add; mix in one cup finely chopped nuts—preferably pecans—and 1 teaspoon vanilla. Bake in greased loaf pan in moderate oven 35 minutes. Cover top and sides with maple icing as follows: add $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon butter to 2 tablespoons hot milk; add $\frac{1}{2}$ cups confectioner's sugar to make smooth paste; add $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon maple flavoring and spread. Sprinkle with nuts while icing is still soft.

ROYAL CREAM LOAF CAKE

Cream $\frac{1}{2}$ cup shortening well with 1 cup sugar; add 2 egg yolks; add 1 teaspoon lemon extract; add a little at a time, $\frac{1}{2}$ cup rich milk or thin cream. Add $\frac{1}{2}$ cup flour sifted with $\frac{1}{4}$ cup cornstarch and 3 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder. Fold in 2 beaten egg whites and bake in greased loaf pan in moderate oven about 45 minutes. Make frosting as follows—Put 1 unbeaten egg white into shallow dish; add gradually $\frac{1}{2}$ cups confectioner's sugar beating with wire whip until of right consistency to spread; add 1 teaspoon vanilla and spread on top and sides of cake.

CHOCOLATE ROLL

Beat 2 egg yolks; add 1 cup sugar slowly and 4 tablespoons cold water. Sift 1 cup flour with $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoon Royal Baking Powder and $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoon salt, and add alternately with 2 beaten egg whites. Spread very thinly on long greased pan. Bake in moderate oven about 15 minutes. Turn out on damp cloth sprinkled with powdered sugar—trim hard edges; spread with filling and roll in cloth while warm. When cool remove to plate, and sprinkle with powdered sugar. For filling—scald $\frac{1}{2}$ cup milk with 1 1/2 squares melted unsweetened chocolate. Thicken with $\frac{1}{4}$ cup flour mixed with $\frac{1}{2}$ cup cold milk; add 1 tablespoon butter. Beat $\frac{1}{2}$ cup sugar, 1 egg and $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoon salt together and add. Cook over hot water until smooth and thick. Add $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon vanilla and spread.

ROYAL DINNER ROLLS

Sift together 4 cups flour, 1 teaspoon salt, and 6 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder. Rub in 1 tablespoon shortening; add $\frac{1}{2}$ cups milk and mix to smooth dough, turn out on floured board, knead well to make smooth. Cut dough into small pieces to make rolls about $2\frac{1}{2}$ inches long by 1 inch wide; form each into smooth roll with square ends. Place on greased pan far apart and stand in warm place 20 minutes. Brush with butter; bake in very hot oven 10 minutes; brush again with butter; bake 5 minutes and serve hot.

ORANGE CREAM LAYER CAKE

Cream $\frac{1}{2}$ cup shortening; add 1 cup sugar slowly, beating well; add 1 beaten egg. Sift together $\frac{1}{2}$ cup flour, $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoon salt, and 2 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder and add alternately with 1 cup milk, a little at a time. Add 1 teaspoon vanilla and bake in 3 greased layer cake tins in moderate oven 15 to 20 minutes. Spread 1 cup sweetened flavored whipped cream thickly between layers. Cover top with orange frosting made with 1 cup confectioner's sugar added slowly to 1 tablespoon cream. Add pulp and grated rind of 1 orange, $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon orange extract, and 1 tablespoon melted butter.

THREE-EGG ANGEL CAKE

Mix well and sift together four times 1 cup sugar, $\frac{1}{2}$ cups flour, 8 teaspoon cream of tartar, 3 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder, and $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon salt. Add $\frac{1}{2}$ cup scalded milk very slowly, while still hot, beating continually; add 1 teaspoon almond or vanilla extract; mix well and fold in 3 egg whites which have been beaten until light. Turn into ungreased angel cake tin and bake in very slow oven about 45 minutes. Remove from oven; invert pan and allow to stand until cold. For icing add $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon butter to 2 tablespoons hot milk and gradually add $\frac{1}{2}$ cups confectioner's sugar; add $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon vanilla and spread. (Use the yolks of the eggs for a Royal Sunshine Cake.)

Send for New Royal Cook Book—It's free
ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO. 102 FULTON ST. N.Y. CITY

Open the airtight can and find SNOWDRIFT
fresh!

SNOWDRIFT

pure · rich · creamy

For making delicate cake, biscuit or pastry. For enriching vegetables. For wholesome frying. And every other use for a fine cooking fat.

1 Tablespoonful Snowdrift
2 Cupfuls Sugar
2 Ounces (squares) Chocolate
½ Cupful Milk
¼ Teaspoonful Cream of Tartar
Few Grains Salt
½ Teaspoonful Vanilla

FUDGE

Combine the sugar, the chocolate cut in small pieces, the Snowdrift, salt, cream of tartar, and milk in a sauce-pan, and stir over the heat until the sugar is dissolved. Boil until a little of the mixture, when tried in cold water, forms a soft ball. Cool until it may be dented with the finger, add the vanilla and beat until creamy. Pour a half inch deep into a pan lightly rubbed with Snowdrift and mark into squares.

We would like to send you a copy of the new Snowdrift Cook Book, with our compliments. Just write "Cook Book" and your name and address on a postal to

SNOWDRIFT

120 Broadway, New York City

Delightful for afternoon wear is the frock of black Romaine crêpe above, with its trimming of Persian embroidery in red, green and gold, and, if the sleeves are closed, it will do equally well for church. The lines are excellent for the matron, for the soft graceful blouse gives a straight line from the neck to hem.

Among the distinctive features of the good-looking afternoon dress directly above must be mentioned the material—midnight blue cashmere crêpe—the trimming of lighter blue ribbon embroidered in black and white, and the loose sleeves gathered at the cuff, but open from elbow to wrist in the most approved fashion.

Strikingly effective is the combination of plain black cashmere crêpe and a Paisley pattern printed in dull colors. The corsage, which appears to be two squares of fabric, sloped off on shoulders, is very new; the draped skirt complies with the Parisian dictum that one give an appearance of breadth, not of thickness.

At the extreme right above, black cashmere crêpe forms the foundation of an exceedingly smart afternoon frock for the young matron. In this instance it is combined with chiffon—white for the bodice and black for the side panels and lower part of the sleeves—and trimmed with shiny black cellophane roses.

"Many New Fabrics Look Marcelled"

Writes Mary Brush Williams from Paris

ROMPTLY at three o'clock the sun gimpled its way through the sulky sky of the forenoon and touched the Champs-Élysées with nimble sleight of hand. It caught a steel bead on the handbag of Mrs. Leister Spalding, of Chicago, which her husband was carrying in the same hand with his umbrella, and pulled it out into a ribbon of light. It executed a toe dance across the shoulders of Madame George Menier, who wore a cape spangled in steel-like chain armor, and it pointed a long, demonstrating finger at a costume of serge, circumnavigated in hemstitching, as much as to say: "Ladies and gentlemen, I call your attention to a new style. You will find it a good lead to follow—'hemstitched serge.'" It bathed the world's thoroughfare of fashion, at one end of which sleeps in triumphal rest the unknown soldier, in a light fair to see. People began suddenly pouring out into it, and two minutes later the almost deserted Champs-Élysées was alive. A slender figure streaked her way up the wide pavement in such a medley of embroidered colors that you would have said she represented the strange, foreign flag of some new nation. She was like the rural flower bed, when the petunias get together to put one over on the color show of the marigolds. What she really embodied was the strange flag of a new style, this being merely a modern way of proclaiming, supplementary to the ancient method of the town crier, that Black, King of the Colors, is dead. By this comprehensive method the news thus reached the Maharajah of Indore, tall, princely ruler of a state in India, who is of equal rank and fortune with King George and entitled to his salute of twenty-one guns. He happened out of Claridge's and gave the costume his undivided attention from the period when his motor left its parking until it reached the curb.

Little wild flowers and things from old-fashioned gardens bloomed that afternoon on cashmeres and serge. Paris thus, amid the furs and the shaggy woolsens, entertained her first harbingers of spring. They hardly ever grow except on wall paper and thin materials, outside the village flower gardens, other signs, would indicate that we shall celebrate old home year in styles. There were rag-rug effects made into waistcoats for tailleurs, and dresses from your grandmother's quilt done in what I remember as the log-cabin pattern. They were set with squares. Materials look like the clothes wrung out and dried without ironing. Some of them surely must have been pressed while damp against the brocade of the parlor sofa, until they have taken the imprint of its plush roses.

The crêpes would appear to have it. Something similar to our old friend crêpe Marocain is appearing, without sheen and with a good deal the feel of a crinkly paper napkin. It, too, is going into brocades. The old-fashioned moiré or "watered" effect is fashionable. The wavy line is creeping across materials, like the one on the wall at the oculist's to test whether your eyes work right. Even hemstitching is

(Continued on Page 89)

68 "Wherever there is cleanliness,"

GRAND HOTEL JUNGFRAU
INTERLAKEN

September 5 1921

My dear Mr. Colgate:

It may interest you to know how well distributed I found your products in a twelve weeks' tour of the Netherlands and Switzerland. Here is one incident:

I went to visit my birth-place: a seaport town called Den Helder which is at the very tip-top of the Netherlands on the dykes of the North Sea. I called at an apothecary's there being prepared to accept some substitute for the soaps he was accustomed to at home. The proprietor asked me what I wanted.

"What I am afraid you haven't got!" he answered. "Colgate's Cashmere Boquet Soap."

"Large or small cakes?" he answered to my amazement as he put two boxes before me.

"But you don't keep Colgate's Dental Cream?" I asked.

"Large or small size?" he asked, and produced

EVERYWHERE people know Colgate's. North, South, East, and West—from Alaska to Cape Town, and from New York right around the world until the Statue of Liberty looms in sight again—you will find Colgate's toilet articles on sale, and in favor with people who appreciate the importance of cleanliness and comfort.

THE superior facilities of Colgate & Co. for securing and utilizing the choicest floral essences, aromatic gums, and essential oils from all parts of the world make it possible to impart to Colgate Soaps, Perfumes, and other toilet accessories a quality that is unexcelled by the most expensive foreign products. The name Colgate on toilet articles corresponds to the word "Sterling" on silver.

there is Colgate's —

both sides.

I determined now to see how far I could go, and immediately upon my request he produced your Shaving Stick, Violet Talc and Cashmere Bouquet Powder!

As I knew the American tourist hardly ever penetrated to Den Helder, I asked him why he kept such a full stock of your products.

"Oh," he replied "the best of our own people use the Colgate Soaps and perfumes".

For the moment I had forgotten that I was in the land of cleanliness: your slogan ought to be wherever there is cleanliness, there is Colgate's.

I thought you might like to know!

With kind personal regards, believe me,

Very sincerely yours

Edward W. Bok

(of Philadelphia)

Mr Sydney Colgate

EDWARD W. BOK found, as all tourists find, that "wherever there is cleanliness, there is Colgate's". A house with but one Colgate Comfort is like a garden with but one flower.

LOWEST PRICES!

We Have Turned the World
Upside Down
for Amazing Bargains

Here
They Are!!

Style Book Free

PHILPSBORN'S have turned the world upside down to give our three million customers the biggest bargains and the lowest prices on earth. Choose your Spring outfit from the 2,000 Challenge Bargains in our beautiful 312-page, color-illustrated Style Book—yours free on request.

Charming NEYSA McMEIN

Popular Society Leader, Famous Artist and Designer—everybody knows Neysa—whose beautiful paintings adorn the covers of America's foremost magazines, says:

"Nothing I saw at the famous dress-makers of Paris excels the wonderful display assembled in Philipsborn's Spring and Summer Style Book. It is truly a work of art."

2,000 Challenge Bargains!

More than Two Thousand Challenge Bargains—absolutely unbeatable values! Every style sparkles with newness and beauty. We guarantee our prices to be the lowest in the U.S.A. Everything shipped PREPAID!

REAL PARIS MODELS Gowns, Suits & Coats

The originals costing as high as 5,000 francs in France—purchased direct from famous French dressmakers. We sell actual reproductions of these beautiful Paris importations for as little as $14.98.

SEND RIGHT NOW!

For this charming catalog of Newest Styles and Wonder Values—Coupon or Postal brings it FREE.

PHILPSBORN'S DEPARTMENT 349 CHICAGO

PHILPSBORN'S, Dept. 349, Chicago

Please send copy of Philipsborn's Spring and Summer Style Book, free, postpaid to

Name _____
Address _____
Town _____ State _____

For Formal Daytime Wear and Informal Evening

BETWEEN winter silk and sheer summer organdies comes the informal dancing frock of chiffon, than which there is nothing lovelier or more generally becoming. In the sketch at the left above, sulphur-yellow chiffon is trimmed with folds of self material, and the result is a most happy one. Those who cannot wear to advantage this slightly greenish yellow, so popular this spring, may well anticipate a style note of the coming summer and make the frock all white. While designed primarily for informal evening wear, the frock at the right above could be included with equal appropriateness in the afternoon wardrobe of the young matron. Crêpe de Chine is used for the frock, and the sleeves are of chiffon. It may be all of a color—in black or one of the tans or grays—or may be of black with brilliant red sleeves. Another interesting frock for either afternoon or evening wear is sketched at the left. This may be of black crêpe de Chine with bands and girdle of velvet, or of double-faced black Callot crêpe, using the rough side for the frock itself and the smooth for trimming. A jet girdle may replace the rosettes about the waist, if one wishes. The youthful charm of the white crêpe de Chine dancing frock at the right is greatly enhanced by finishing the edge of each fold with small pearl beads. The same frock is less naïve, but equally delightful, in brilliant red crêpe de Chine, with picoté edges and a velvet flower in the softest of fuchsia shades at the waist.

Patterns may be secured from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from The Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City. Dresses, 35 cents; Coats, 35 cents; Blouses or Skirts, 30 cents; Children's Patterns, 25 cents.

Keep him happy, healthy and successful with vital iron. Raisins contain it.

The Iron Food for Vitality

Raisin Pie

2 cups Sun-Maid Raisins	1 tablespoonful grated lemon rind
1½ cups boiling water	Juice of 1 orange
½ cup sugar	1 tablespoonful grated orange rind
2 tablespoonfuls cornstarch	1 cup chopped walnuts
2 tablespoonfuls lemon juice

Cook raisins in boiling water for 5 minutes, pour into it sugar and cornstarch which have been mixed. Cook until thick, remove from fire and add other ingredients. Bake between two crusts. Walnuts may be omitted if desired.

All measurements for this recipe are level.

Had Your Iron Today?

Renew His Energy—With This Dessert

FULL of tender, juicy, luscious, thin-skinned Sun-Maid Raisins—this pie is the favorite of millions.

Light, tender, flaky pastry; and a rich juice forming a delicious sauce. A delightful morsel fairly melting in the mouth.

Let your husband try it. Hear what he says.

But even better than its flavor is the good that comes from this dessert.

The raisins furnish food-iron in its most assimilable form. Often food-iron is the one lack that keeps thousands under par.

* * * *

Men need but a small bit of iron daily, yet that need is vital. Men are happy, alert, virile and successful only when they have that vital iron.

Proper food is the sole source of natural, organic iron. So you, madam, are doubly concerned with it since you choose the food.

A pie like this is the very best dessert because it furnishes energy as well as iron—raisins supply also 1560 calories of practically pre-digested energizing nutriment per pound.

Men are grateful for those dinners that take the tired feeling away. And this pie does that.

So have a raisin pie tonight—hear the call for more—it will be a satisfaction to you and a real benefit to him.

With Breakfast Foods

Stewed raisins lend new charm and zest to cereals of all kinds—increase nutrition and add healthfulness.

Bread Pudding

You'll make a healthful dish and use up left-over bread if you'll put raisins in bread pudding. The raisins lend charm that makes a "new dish" of this and other so-called "plain foods."

SUN-MAID RAISINS

Always ask for Sun-Maid Raisins, made from California's finest table grapes—grapes too delicate to ship long distances in fresh form. Try these raisins. Taste the luscious foods they make.

Raisins are 30% cheaper than formerly—see that you get plenty in your foods.

Seeded, blue package, (seeds removed) best for pie and bread; Seedless, red package, (grown without seeds) best for stewing; Clusters (on the stem). A delicious quick dessert. All dealers sell them. Insist on Sun-Maid Brand.

100 Recipes Sent Free

We've compiled 100 tested recipes in a valuable free book which we'll send to any woman on request. They suggest the most attractive ways to serve these fine fruit-meats. Simply mail the coupon and get them by first mail.

California Associated Raisin Co.

Membership 13,000 Growers
DEPT. A-102, FRESNO, CALIFORNIA

Blue package (seeded) best for pie and bread.

CUT THIS OUT AND SEND IT

California Associated Raisin Co.,
Dept. A-102, Fresno, California

Please send me copy of your free book, "Sun-Maid Recipes," also new book, "Eating Raisins for Health and Beauty."

Name _____

Street _____

City _____ State _____

Five spots where germs may lurk

In Sinks and Drains

The Garbage Pail

Dark Corners

Toilet Bowls

Floors

Lysol
Disinfectant

Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

SINKS, drains, toilet bowls, garbage pails, floors, sunless corners—these are the spots where disease germs breed in your home. You cannot see disease germs, but that does not alter the fact that they breed by the millions and are a constant menace to health.

And so when some member of your family happens to become a trifle run-down, an excellent opening is offered for an attack of contagious sickness.

Proper disinfection kills disease germs and checks the breeding of germ life. Proper disinfection means that all places where germs might lurk or breed should be sprinkled with a solution of Lysol Disinfectant at least twice a week.

A little Lysol Disinfectant should be added to scrubbing water, too. Being a soapy substance, Lysol Disinfectant helps to clean as it disinfects. A 50c bottle makes 5 gallons of germ-killing solution. A 25c bottle makes 2 gallons.

Lysol Disinfectant is also invaluable for personal hygiene.

Send for free samples of other Lysol products

You can purchase a 25c bottle of Lysol Disinfectant for trial purposes at any drug store. We shall be glad to mail you free samples of the other Lysol products.

Shall we send a sample of Lysol Shaving Cream for the men folks? Protects the health of the skin. Renders small cuts aseptically clean. We will also include a sample of Lysol Toilet Soap. Refreshingly soothing, healing, and helpful for improving the skin.

Send name and address on a postcard.

LEHN & FINK, INC.
635 Greenwich Street, New York
Makers of Pebecco Tooth Paste

Harold F. Ritchie & Co., Selling Agents for the United States and Canada
171 Madison Ave., New York City 10 McCaul St., Toronto

Slipper Satin Hats for You to Make at Home

Miss Elsie Mackaye's good-looking dress hat of black satin just above may be used for sportswear by a simple change of trimming, as in photograph at the right below.

Photos by Nicholas Moray

The small, close-fitting black slipper satin hat with a rolled brim is very generally becoming and is also the type of hat the amateur will find easiest to make and most sure to be successful. Miss Mackaye's brim above is completely covered with small flat velvet or satin flowers in a brownish orange color.

The draped effect which marks as out of the ordinary Miss Mackaye's small black satin hat at the left is not at all too difficult to imitate. If the directions in the text are carefully followed, the hat will have a most professional air and it will not be expensive, for the popular slipper satin is only about three dollars a yard.

FOR afternoon and "best" wear, the small hat at the right above is particularly attractive because of its flower-covered rolling brim. It can be easily made at home, even by an amateur, and is comparatively inexpensive as the best material to use is slipper satin, at about three dollars a yard, or any heavy cotton-backed satin. The first requisite is a rolling brim of buckram, about three and a half inches in front and tapering to about two and a half inches in back; this can be bought in any five-and-ten-cent store. If a separate brim cannot be obtained, buy the whole shape and remove the crown. Unroll the brim, cut a bias piece of silk, the color of the flowers to be used on the hat and twice as wide as the unrolled brim, and cover the brim smoothly inside and out, so that there is no seam on the upper edge. The raw edges of the silk are fastened together inside of crown, to be covered later by the lining. Now roll the brim into its original shape and cover entire outside with small, flat flowers, sewn one against the other, or in bit-or-miss fashion. These flowers may be violets, pansies or any other velvet or silk flower that can be flattened.

Next comes the crown. To make this, cut a bias piece of satin seven inches wide by twenty-five or twenty-six inches long, according to your head size—one inch being allowed for

When Miss Elsie Mackaye, most lovely and gifted of actresses, wishes a sports hat, she removes the lace bow on her black satin one at the top of the page and replaces it with a black satin band, appliquéd in bright-colored woolen flowers. A matching scarf of appliquéd satin is most attractive and, like the hat itself, presents few difficulties to the amateur maker.

Designs from Rita Piacenza

Lacing Hooks
for boys' and girls' shoes—just about as natural and necessary as the lace itself! Quick and easy in every-day use, they are most convenient for mother or child.

Every dealer can secure footwear with the handy shoe hooks. Insist on having what you want!

LACING-HOOKS-FOR MEN'S, WOMEN'S AND CHILDREN'S SHOES

(Continued on Page 74)

Spring Lines in Midseason Frocks for Matrons

Style 374
Genuine
"FRUIT
OF THE LOOM" trimmed with white piqué and matching chambray.

Colors: Green,
Blue or Lavender.
Sizes 16-
18-20 and 36
to 46.

Will be sent to you on receipt of $3.95

Queen Make
TRADE MARK

DRESS

of "FRUIT OF THE LOOM"

AS soon as this wonderful fabric was made in printed designs appropriate for women's apparel, it was secured for "QUEEN MAKE" morning, porch and street dresses. The colors are guaranteed absolutely fast, both by the maker of the fabric and the maker of the dress.

The best stores of the country feature and display "QUEEN MAKE" wash dresses, which is sufficient guarantee of their quality and smartness. You'll find the prices remarkably reasonable, too.

If you should not be able to secure this model from your own store, simply send us your money order, stating size and color you wish, and we will see that you are supplied promptly. Money refunded if not entirely satisfied.

Write For Attractive New Booklet L 2 showing a collection of charming "QUEEN
MAKE" Dresses—advance styles for spring

I. GINSBERG & BROS.
102 Madison Ave. New York City

3411

An interesting departure from the conventional sports suit for Southern wear is this combination of gray-and-yellow-wool plaid skirt and cape with a blouse of yellow silk Jersey. Pattern sizes, small, medium, large.

(Continued from Page 73)

seaming. Pin this bias strip around a circle of the satin, seven and a half inches in diameter, sew the two together on the wrong side with a fine running stitch and make a sloping seam where the ends of the bias pieces join. To join the crown and the brim, pin the seam of the crown to the center back of the brim, at the base, and sew it with long, fairly loose stitches, back-stitching now and then for greater security.

The lining may be of taffeta, China silk or the silk and cotton material much used for dress linings, and is made in exactly the same way as the crown. Last of all, soft folds should be tacked in the sides of the crown; and these can be arranged best when the hat is on.

The average woman considers the large black hat an essential part of her wardrobe. If such a hat, by the interchanging of a satin band appliquéd with flowers and a bow of lace insertion, can be worn for both sports and dress, so much the better. The photographs on page 73 prove that this transformation is possible.

Buy a buckram frame with a brim about three and a half inches wide in front and two and a half inches in back, and sides five inches wide. In order to have the lines of the hat soft and graceful, the frame should be covered with thinnest outing flannel. Double a yard of the flannel and pin it on the underside of the frame to the outer edge of

(Continued on Page 87)

For general daytime wear brown oxfords with matching woolen hose, or black oxfords with gray or beige, are very smart. Suede is good for afternoon slippers, gold and silver brocade for evening, and straps are still essential.

3453

The popularity of the coat dress shows no sign of waning, and it is particularly good for early spring. The dress above is of navy tricotine or twill with a colorful brocade facing the collar and a belt of fancy steel plaques. Pattern comes in sizes 36 to 44.

3433

The frock above is good-looking in cloth or silk crepe for early spring or may be made of white cotton brocade with collar and plaited sides of lawn for summer wear. The pattern may be had in sizes 16, 36 to 44.

3427

A coat dress of black tricotine trimmed with an odd bit of fur may be worn without a wrap during the early spring; and later, brocade may replace the fur. Another possibility, since Worth sponsors soft silks for coat dresses, is to use Canton crepe or a heavy crepe de Chine and trim it with old-fashioned inch-wide ruchings in ladders or circles. The pattern shown at the left is furnished in sizes 36 to 44.

Patterns may be secured from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City. Dresses, 35 cents; Coats, 35 cents; Blouses or Skirts, 30 cents; Children's Patterns, 25 cents.

Keep That Wedding Day Complexion

The blushing bride of today should be the blooming matron of tomorrow, retaining the charm of girlhood's freshness to enhance radiant maturity.

For bridal beauty should not fade, nor the passing of each anniversary be recorded on your face.

Keep the schoolgirl complexion which graced your wedding day, and you will keep your youth. With a fresh, smooth skin, no woman ever seems old.

The problem of keeping such a complexion was solved centuries ago. The method is simple—the means within the reach of all.

Cosmetic cleansing the secret

To keep your complexion fresh and smooth you must keep it scrupulously clean. You can't allow dirt, oil and perspiration to collect and clog the pores if you value clearness and fine texture.

You can't depend on cold cream to do this cleansing—repeated applications help fill up the pores. The best way is to wash your face with the mild, soothing lather blended from palm and olive oils, the cleansers used by Cleopatra.

Science has combined these two Oriental oils in the bland, balmy facial soap which bears their name. You need never be afraid of the effects of soap and water if the soap you use is Palmolive.

How it acts

The rich, profuse lather, massaged into the skin, penetrates the pores and removes every trace of the clogging accumulations which, when neglected, make the skin texture coarse and cause blackheads and blotches.

It softens the skin and keeps it flexible and smooth. It freshens and stimulates, encouraging firmness and attractive natural color.

Oily skins won't need cold creams or lotions after using Palmolive. If the skin is inclined to dryness, the time to apply cold cream is after this cosmetic cleansing.

And remember, powder and rouge are perfectly harmless when applied to a clean skin and removed carefully once a day.

Don't keep it only for your face

Complexion beauty should extend to the throat, neck and shoulders. These are quite as conspicuous as your face for beauty or the lack of it.

Give them the same beautifying cleansing that you do your face and they will become soft, white and smooth. Use it regularly for bathing and let it do for your body what it does for your face.

Not too expensive

Although Palmolive is the finest, mildest facial soap that can be produced, the price is not too high to permit general use on the washstand for bathing.

This moderate price is due to popularity, to the enormous demand which keeps the Palmolive factories working day and night, and necessitates the importation of the costly oils in vast quantity.

Thus, soap which would cost at least 25 cents a cake if made in small quantities, is offered for only 10 cents, a price all can afford. The old-time luxury of the few may now be enjoyed the world over.

THE PALMOLIVE COMPANY, Milwaukee, U. S. A.
THE PALMOLIVE COMPANY OF CANADA, Limited,
Toronto, Ontario

Volume and efficiency produce 25-cent quality
for 10c

Copyright 1922—The Palmolive Company
(142)

The MASTER FORMULA

During the Civil War a certain material used in making one of the Squibb products became very scarce and its price extremely high. A young chemist suggested to Dr. Edward R. Squibb that another ingredient be substituted—one which cost less and was easier to obtain, but was not so satisfactory. "By changing your formula in this way," the young man argued, "you will save money and most people will never know the difference."

"Young man," said Dr. Squibb, "I am always willing to change a formula when I can improve it. But please remember that the Master Formula of every worthy business is honor, integrity and trustworthiness. That is one formula I cannot change."

We all know that there are men and women who devote a lifetime to some science, art or profession with no thought of wealth or profit beyond that which naturally follows worthy achievement. Not only are there such men and women, but there are such business institutions as well.

Such institutions are interested primarily in making something as fine as it can be made, and only secondarily are they interested in the profit.

Of all manufacturers, this honor, integrity and trustworthiness should guide the maker of pharmaceutical and chemical products. Of all things used by mankind there are none where purity and reliability are more important.

For sixty-three years, the House of Squibb has adhered to "the master formula" in a way which has won world-wide recognition for the supremacy of Squibb products. For sixty-three years, the House of Squibb has shared with the world its scientific discoveries. It has used no secret formulas and has made but one claim: That its products are as pure as nature and science can make them, and that there is never an exception to this.

For sixty-three years, the name Squibb has been recognized as full guaranty of skill, knowledge and honor in the manufacture of chemical and pharmaceutical products made exclusively for the medical profession, and used only by the physician and the surgeon.

The name Squibb on HOUSEHOLD PRODUCTS is equally valued as positive assurance of true purity and reliability.

Squibb's Bicarbonate of Soda—exceedingly pure, therefore without bitter taste.

Squibb's Epsom Salt—free from impurities. Preferred also for taste.

Squibb's Sodium Phosphate—a specially purified product, free from arsenic, therefore safe.

Squibb's Cod Liver Oil—selected finest Norwegian; cold pressed; pure in taste. Rich in vitamins.

Squibb's Olive Oil—selected oil from Southern France. Absolutely pure. (Sold only through druggists.)

Squibb's Sugar of Milk—specially refined for preparing infants' food. Quickly soluble. In sealed tins.

Squibb's Boric Acid—pure and perfectly soluble. Soft powder for dusting; granular form for solutions.

Squibb's Castor Oil—specially refined, bland in taste; dependable.

Squibb's Stearate of Zinc—a soft and protective powder of highest purity.

Squibb's Magnesia Dental Cream—made from Squibb's Milk of Magnesia. Contains no detrimental substance. Corrects mouth acidity.

Squibb's Talcum Powder—a delightfully soft and soothing powder. Boudoir, Carnation, Violet and Unscented.

Squibb's Cold Cream—an exquisite preparation of correct composition for the care of the skin.

Squibb's Pure Spices—specially selected by laboratory tests for their full strength and flavor. (Sold only through druggists.)

Sold by reliable druggists everywhere, in original sealed packages.
"The Priceless Ingredient" of every product is the honor and integrity of its maker.

SQUIBB

Making the Popular Chemise Dress

By RUTH SILL

WHEN you have told about the chemise dress, you have told it all!" is a New York designer's apt comment upon the spring fashions. Here is news to delight the amateur dress-maker, for this favored frock is the simplest of them all.

The shops offer a great variety of materials, fascinating in texture and color—crêpe, crêpe de Chine, challis, serge, twill, Jersey cloth—which lend themselves with equal grace to the making of one's chemise dress. Unless one has had special training in clothes-making, it is well to accept the friendly guidance of a pattern, and, for a becoming design, one has only to choose among the many offered by the Home Pattern Company.

One thing is essential, however, whatever the would-be dressmaker's other qualifications—a thorough understanding of her own figure and of the lines and coloring that suit it best.

So first of all choose your pattern wisely, remembering your silhouette. One buys dress patterns according to bust measurement. The bust measure is taken around the body over the fullest part of the bust, under the arms and across the back. It is an easy measurement. All commercial patterns are cut according to average measurements. They are plainly marked, and very definite directions are given on the pattern envelope. There is a diagram showing how to place the pattern on the material, notes explaining all construction marks, notches, seams, hem lines, and so on. You must, to begin with, thoroughly understand these directions. Many women have some irregularity of figure, hence, unless one has had experience with a particular make of commercial pattern, it is wise first to cut a dress in cheap muslin or cambric. Baste this lining or foundation and fit it, making any necessary correction of line before cutting into the real dress material.

Preparing the Foundation

TO PREPARE this cambric foundation for fitting you must:

FIRST. Straighten the ends of the material by pulling a thread, then stretch and pull the material into place.

SECOND. Place the pattern carefully, following the directions, and pin in place.

THIRD. Cut without turning the material. Because of the possible irregularities of figure allow generous seams—one inch or two inches—beyond the edge of the pattern on the underarm and shoulder, and a half inch on the neck. This gives a chance to change the place of a seam line, if that be desirable when fitting.

FOURTH. Mark—by lines of basting done in colored thread—neck line, shoulder, armhole and underarm seam lines, notches and construction lines, center front and center back lines, the exact crosswise grain lines across the front and back, and notches and seams on sleeves.

The seam lines on this cambric lining or any ordinary cotton fabrics may be traced and then marked by basting on traced lines. On fine materials of all sorts the best method of marking is to turn the pattern directly on the seam line and make a line of basting close to the turned edge of the pattern through the upper thickness of material only. Mark in the same way construction lines and notches. Put pins through these basted lines to under thickness of material; turn the work over and make bastings on the second side following the lines of pins. On heavy material the seams and notches may first be marked with chalk and then bastings made on the chalked lines. Never cut out notches. Mark the center folds of front and back by line of basting; and mark crosswise grain lines by basting on thread of material across the front and back about six inches down from the neck.

At right is shown pattern for front placed on material, seam lines traced and basted. The "jogs" admit fullness at bust and hips. At left, back and front show proper markings in colored threads.

FIFTH. To baste the shoulder and underarm seams, put shoulder seams together and match the notches; pin the shoulder seam lines together at these notches, armhole and neck lines, baste on the seam lines.

Here the cambric pattern is being fitted; the slashings and gatherings shown above make the chemise dress becoming even to an extraordinarily large woman.

Put the underarm seams together and match the notches; pin on the seam lines at notches and from notches to armhole and from notches to bottom, baste on seam line.

The pattern shown is for a matron, therefore has the fullness at the shoulder and hip. Before basting underarm seams, cut on the markings exactly on the straight of the material for this fullness, gather the lower edge of each cut about one-eighth of an inch from edge, make a narrow turn on the upper edge, gradually working to nothing at the end toward the center, baste this folded edge on gathering thread, match cross marks and baste into place.

SIXTH. To turn the hem on the bottom of the dress, turn it about five inches in width to the wrong side and baste in place. This is just a temporary hem to hold the bottom of the dress in place for fitting.

SEVENTH. To baste the sleeve seams, match notches, pin seam lines together at the notches, top, bottom and in between; baste on seam line, gather top of sleeve, using small running stitches on seam line between notches. If the finished sleeve is to have fullness gathered into a cuff, gather the bottom of the sleeve on the seam line.

EIGHTH. To press the seams, open them flat; and right here let me offer a warning about pressing: Move the iron slowly over the surface—in other words, press, do not iron. When pressing wool or silk, press over cloth. Light-weight materials should be pressed on a well-padded board with a moderately hot iron. For woolen materials the pressing should be harder and iron hotter.

Fitting the Foundation

THE foundation is now ready for fitting. Cut on the front line down from the neck about four inches so that the garment will go over the head. Try this on, having all seams on the wrong side. Pin the center fronts together at the neck line; put a belt or tape around the waist so that the fullness may be adjusted; then take a general survey of the garment to see if the shoulder and underarm seams are where they should be and fit smoothly, that the armhole line is satisfactory, that the center front and back lines are straight, that the grain lines across the chest are straight, the neck line becoming, and so on. If the dress needs alterations they are made on one side only—the right side. If the dress fits badly around the neck and shoulder, rip the shoulder seam and move the front and back up or down until the desired effect is gained; if the front pokes out and cross grain lines are not straight, drop the front until it hangs straight. Do not cut anything out; make slashes if necessary and mark new lines with pins. Pin the sleeve in place, notches to notches and seam line to seam line. Remove the garment, mark the new seam lines and new cross notches on the right-hand side with basting thread of a different color from that used in the original markings. Then open the altered seams, fold front and back through the centers, pin the original seam lines together and mark corrected lines on the left side of the dress. If many alterations have been made, rebaste foundation and try it on again. If only minor alterations have been made it will be safe to cut the real dress from the cambric after altering the right side only.

Now cut the dress, following the directions used in cutting and marking the cambric foundation, and stitch the seams. One satisfactory method of finishing seams on

(Continued on Page 79)

Fashionette Invisible HAIR NETS

The SOUTHAMPTON

Sub-debs, débutantes and the "young married set" find this coiffure highly intriguing. It's easy to arrange with a Fashionette even if your hair is in the terrifying stage of "just growing out."

The SANTA BARBARA

There is a hint of maturity about the Santa Barbara—an alluring sophistication that suggests the fascinating "woman of thirty" with luxuriant hair, perfectly waved and kept in place with a Fashionette.

The ASHEVILLE

Mountains or seashore are equally friendly to the smart simplicity of this style. It is ideal for all sports wear and very fashionable this season for indoor wear as well. A Fashionette will prevent even a suspicion of straggleness.

Hair Styles Have Changed

"SOCIETY COIFFURES" will show you how to arrange your hair as it is being worn by really smart women. Every one of these modes depends for its effectiveness on a Fashionette—the Hair Net that is invisible, super-strong, and perfectly shaded to match your hair.

Fashionettes in the usual shades and shapes are 25c each, 2 for 25c—single or double mesh—at department stores, specialty shops, and good drug stores everywhere.

Colonial Quality
Samstag's New York
1200 Broadway

Washing tests made by leading woolen manufacturer show safest way to wash woolens

WOOL is more sensitive than any other fabric and requires more careful laundering. A baby's woolen shirt or band, for instance, may shrink and yellow almost beyond recognition in three careless washings.

The manufacturer is as much interested as the wearer in finding the safe way to wash woolens. For this reason the makers of Carter's underwear had laundering tests made. The letter from the William Carter Company tells what these tests showed about the safe way to wash woolens and why, as a result, they enthusiastically recommend Lux.

Horace A. Carter, Treasurer

William H. Carter, President

THE WILLIAM CARTER COMPANY NEEDHAM HEIGHTS, MASS.

Lever Bros. Co.
Cambridge, Mass.

Gentlemen:

We took several infants' shirts and had them washed in Lux the average number of times a shirt is washed before the baby outgrows it. At the end of these washings the shirts were soft and fleecy and as unshrunk as if washed in water alone. These tests prove to our entire satisfaction that a mother cannot do better than to wash her baby woolens in Lux.

The success with Lux is due not merely to its flake form, which makes all rubbing unnecessary, but to the fact that its lather is exceptionally mild and cleansing. A soap or soap flake at all harsh "felts" or shrinks wool.

We are willing to say, without qualification, that Lux will not shrink or injure woolens and we heartily recommend it for laundering them.

Very truly yours,

THE WILLIAM CARTER COMPANY

Horace A. Carter

To keep woolens soft and unshrunk

Whisk two tablespoonfuls of Lux into a thick lather in half a bowlful of very hot water. Add cold water until lukewarm. Dip garment up and down, pressing suds repeatedly through soiled spots. Do not rub. Rinse in three lukewarm waters. Squeeze water out or put through a loose wringer.

Woolens should be dried in an even temperature; that of the ordinary room is the best.

Send today for booklet of expert laundering advice—it is free. Address Lever Bros. Co., Dept. A-2, Cambridge, Mass.

LUX

Won't injure anything
pure water alone won't harm

Making the Popular Chemise Dress

(Continued from Page 77)

Above, a hem on crêpe de Chine shows first fold basted and running stitch in folded edge. Below, taffeta is binding a serge hem.

Neck lines may be finished with bias binding (top) or bias-covered cord (below); at left is shown tape basted in place to prevent stretching.

silk and woolen materials is to stitch by machine or sew by hand on the seam line, then press the seam open and overcast the raw edges. A safety first move, before stitching the seams, is to try on the dress to see that seams and fullness are correct. In this fitting get the correct bottom line of the dress and correct collar and cuff patterns, if collar and cuffs are to be used.

To get the correct line for the bottom of the dress, be sure the fullness is properly adjusted and held in place at the belt line. If you have an assistant to call upon, she will measure with a ruler or yardstick the desired distance from the floor and will mark a line with pins around the bottom of the skirt. See that she holds the ruler perfectly straight and that the dress hangs straight. Remove the dress and mark the bottom line with basting. If you have no assistant and must get this bottom line for yourself, you will first have to make a higher line—a hip line, for instance. Mark this with pins around the dress, straight from the floor, using a yardrule. Remove the dress and mark with basting on the pin line. Then measure from this line straight down the desired length, which will equal the difference between the distance measured from the floor to mark the hip line and the desired length of the dress from the floor. If you have measured thirty-six inches from the floor for the hip line, for instance, and the desired length of dress from floor be eight inches, twenty-eight inches is the length to be measured down from the hip line for the correct bottom line. Mark line with basting.

To make the hem, place the dress on a table and fold the bottom edge to the wrong side of the dress on the hem line. Pin and baste this bottom fold into place, having the center front line of hem fall on center front line of dress; the center back line of hem on center back line of dress, and side seams of hem on side seams of dress. Now measure up from the bottom fold the desired width of hem, mark with pins or chalk and cut a quarter of an inch above. There is always some fullness to be managed on this edge. It may be done in several ways: On fine materials one may crease and turn in material on the width of hem line; press; gather close to folded edge; adjust gathering thread to fit space; pin, baste and hem into place. On heavy or wiry materials it may be clumsy to turn in the edge. Then gather on hem line; adjust the fullness to the space, and press; if necessary, shrink out the fullness by pressing over a damp cloth, place Prussian binding or taffeta binding with the lower edge just to gathering thread; baste and stitch in place on hem; baste and hem top edge to skirt.

The popular neck and sleeve finishes are still bias bindings and cordings. The most satisfactory way of making bias bindings is to cut the binding twice the desired width, plus the seams; fold through the center and press if necessary; place the two raw edges to the seam line of the garment, right side of bias to right side of garment; baste and sew in place; then turn the folded edge to the seam line on the wrong side and hem in place. Always stay a neck line first with tape to prevent stretching.

Cordings are made by covering cord with bias strips—then sewing this on the dress, using the edge of the bias to finish the seam.

If your chemise dress is not large enough in neck to get into easily, open one or both shoulder seams for short distance from neck.

(Continued on Page 167)

Trial of different neck lines, sleeves, collars and cuffs may be worked out on the foundation; markings of grain lines, notches, center front, and the like, are shown.

Ask Us Now

This test will delight you

Again we offer, and urge you to accept, this new teeth-cleaning method.

Millions now employ it. Leading dentists, nearly all the world over, are urging its adoption. The results are visible in whiter teeth wherever you look today.

Bring them to your people.

The war on film

Dental science has declared a war on film. That is the cause of most tooth troubles.

Film is that viscous coat you feel. It clings to teeth, enters crevices, and stays. Then night and day it may do serious damage.

Film absorbs stains, making the teeth look dingy. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They are the chief cause of many troubles, local and internal. Very few people have escaped the troubles caused by film.

Two film combatants

Now two combatants have been found. Many careful tests have proved their efficiency.

A new-day tooth paste has been created, and these two film combatants are embodied in it. The paste is called Pepsodent.

Now every time you brush your teeth you can fight those film-coats in these effective ways.

Also starch and acids

Another tooth enemy is starch. It also clings to teeth, and in fermenting it forms acids.

To fight it Nature puts a starch digestant in saliva. She also puts alkalis there to neutralize the acids.

Pepsodent multiplies the salivary flow. It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva. It multiplies the alkalis. Thus these teeth-protecting forces, twice a day, are much increased.

They must be done

These things must be done. Teeth with film or starch or acids are not white or clean or safe. If these are not removed they form a constant danger to the teeth. Millions of teeth are made dingy or ruined by them.

See what the new way does.

Make this pleasant ten-day test and watch your teeth improve.

Pepsodent PAT. OFF.
REG. U.S.

The New-Day Dentifrice

The scientific film combatant, which brings five desired effects. Approved by modern authorities and now advised by leading dentists everywhere. All druggists supply the large tubes.

A few days will tell

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

Do this now. The effects will delight you and lead to constant delights. To all in your home they may bring new beauty, new protection for the teeth.

10-Day Tube Free 757

THE PEPSODENT COMPANY
Dept. 533, 1104 S. Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill.
Mail 10-Day Tube of Pepsodent to

Only one tube to a family

REAL Italian Spaghetti! Beech-Nut Macaroni and Spaghetti are prepared under ideal conditions of sunlight, pure air and cleanliness, and after the same delicious recipe the Italians use.

And nutritious? Prepared from fine, new Durum wheat, it is full of nourishing proteins. The nutrition value of a serving of Beech-Nut Macaroni or Spaghetti is only slightly below that of prime roast beef.

Order from your grocer today—and be sure it is Beech-Nut.

BEECH-NUT PACKING COMPANY
Canajoharie, N. Y.

Beech-Nut

Macaroni and Spaghetti

Beech-Nut "foods of finest flavor"

Bacon	Tomato Catsup
Pork and Beans	Chili Sauce
Macaroni	Prepared Mustard
Spaghetti	Jams and Jellies
Vermicelli	Marmalades
Macaroni Elbows	and Preserves
Macaroni Rings	Ginger Ale

In Betweens of Age and Season

For those windy days of March and February, when mother insists on warm clothes and one's winter coat seems of a sudden dreadfully heavy and decidedly tiresome, a cape of soft wool over a dress of the same material is the pleasantest possible solution of the matter. In the sketch above, both dress and cape are navy, trimmed with checked wool in navy and gray, or navy and dull orange. Pattern for cape is No. 3431, in sizes 4, 8, 12 and 16; for dress, No. 3430, in sizes 6 to 14.

The eternal masculine tries hard to conceal his pride in an extremely "swagger" single-breasted overcoat of faintly plaided English cheviot, but decides that the coat can hold its own, even in competition with the out and out "hum-dinger" of a Norfolk suit made of men's navy-blue suiting. Either boy could testify to the possibility of homemade clothes being as good-looking as the best of ready-mades. Pattern for suit, No. 3402, sizes 6 to 14; for overcoat, No. 3390, sizes 4 to 14.

Patterns may be secured from any store selling Home Patterns, or by mail, postage prepaid, from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City. Dresses, 35 cents; Coats, 35 cents; Blouses or Skirts, 30 cents; Children's patterns, 25 cents.

When days in the schoolroom begin to drag, a new frock will often brighten one's outlook on life. Whether of chambray or gingham, with white collar and cuffs and trimming of rick-rack braid, as at left above, or of navy serge trimmed with scalloped bands of rust-colored duvetyne, the remedy is equally efficacious. Pattern Nos. 3432 and 3428, in sizes 6 to 14.

One's reputation for sartorial savoir-faire will be greatly enhanced by wearing a navy serge frock which boasts a shoulder cape, black silk braid trimming and a patent-leather belt. Pattern No. 3400 comes in sizes 6 to 14.

Over a plaited skirt of plaid wool, in old blue and dull rose, one may wear with great success a blouse of plain blue wool bound with rose; but a gayly flowered cretonne blouse, collared and cuffed in white pique, looks best with a plain skirt. Pattern sizes 6 to 14.

Patterns may be secured from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City. Dresses, 35 cents; Coats, 35 cents; Blouses or Skirts, 30 cents; Children's Patterns, 25 cents.

Corset Diplomacy

Fashion Honors That Which Effaces Itself

SAID a king of France: "The State—It is I!" Because he so exalted his personal self an ancient royal house was humbled. The Corset, queen of costume, is at its best when least perceived. By its unobtrusiveness it moulds the destinies of dress. A corset should never disclose its own existence. Its lines are as good as they are unseen. A vest of pliable elastic enables the P. N. Practical Front Corset to express and perpetuate the best of a woman's native lines, while masking lines less handsome. This inner vest clasps snugly, comfortably and healthfully, with front steels directly at the center of the body and not at either side as in the common "front-lace" corset. It can not ride up nor lose its perfect poise. The outer flap laces quickly and with infinite ease—over flat hooks, shoewise. The daily relacing affords a fresh custom-refitting every time you do it. To a nicety every woman finds what she seeks in the P. N. Practical Front Corset. The multitudinous styles are all distinguished by P. N. Practical Front exclusive features. P. N. Practical Front Corsets are moderately priced at five dollars and upwards to twelve. At most good stores or departments where corsets are sold you may select your appropriate model or

Upon request the makers will mail you a descriptive style book

P. N. Practical Front

Pat. U. S. A. and Foreign Countries

BOSTON CHICAGO AND NEW HAVEN CORSETS I. NEWMAN & SONS 222 FOURTH AVE. NEW YORK

The Corset, queen of costume, is at its best when least perceived. By its unobtrusiveness it moulds the destinies of dress.

Manufactured exclusively in Canada by DOMINION CORSET CO., Quebec, P. Q., Canada; in England by WILLIAM PRETTY & SONS, LTD., Ipswich, England

What Every Woman Knows— and So Often Neglects

What woman does not know how becoming and abundant waved hair looks—and how the effect is reversed when the strands are straight! Yet hair waving has often been injurious and always a nuisance. No wonder one is so often tempted to slight the curling process.

Now here is a truly revolutionary invention that makes hair curling absolutely safe and easy. A most ingenious and satisfactory curler has recently been put on the market—Curlox Perfected Hair Curlers.

Wind any quantity of hair on these curlers and be assured that they will not fly open. Yet at the merest pressure of thumb and forefinger they are immediately fastened or removed.

CURLOX

TRADE MARK REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

PERFECTED HAIR CURLERS

Curlox Curlers bestow a beautiful rippling wave, making possible infinite coiffure combination. Yet not a single hair can be cut or broken. The correctly curved curling bar (exclusive with Curlox) precludes any harm to the hair.

These three striking improvements are protected by patents and may only be found in genuine Curlox Curlers. Yet you pay no more for these features of safety and convenience. Curlox Curlers are obtainable in cards of two at 10 cents, and cards of five, 25 cents. Leading five-and-ten-cent stores, department, variety, and drug stores, and specialty shops everywhere are stocking Curlox Curlers. The great superiority of Curlox Curlers merits your insistence upon them.

If your dealer does not handle Curlox, send us his name and address with purchase price and we will supply you direct.

NATIONAL COMMODITIES CO.,
Philadelphia, Pa.

And be sure to ask for the wonderful Curlox Hair Nets, companion product of Curlox Curlers. They wear so much longer than ordinary nets! Made from the finest human hair specially processed to retain the life and elasticity of the hair. (Stretch a hair from a Curlox Net and see how elastic it is.) Each net generously oversized, to meet modern requirements. Twice sterilized, hand made, inspected, and guaranteed. The Curlox process makes them blend invisibly with the hair. Cap and fringe styles, all shades including grey and white. The shades of Curlox Nets are graded exactly. Only one quality—15 cents for one, 2 for 25 cents. Grey and white and double mesh 25c each. At leading department, drug, variety, and notion stores.

Clothes for the Very Young that are Easy to Make and Launder

KNOWING that the best-dressed children are not necessarily those most expensively dressed, the wise mother provides her youngsters with a variety of simple, inexpensive clothes that depend for their charm upon quaintness of line, brightness of color or an unusual bit of embroidery. For the oldest daughter—if she has reached no greater age than twelve—such a mother might well choose the coat at the right, for it is very simply made, of fine broadcloth in brown and tan, blue and gray, or in two shades of the same color. It also looks well in wool Jersey, in pongee and in summer coat fabrics such as linen or piqué. Large sleeves are as much the mode for children as for grown-ups, and it is decidedly smart in winter to have leggings that match the band of lighter material on one's coat and a hat of the same shade. The pattern for the coat comes in sizes 2 to 12.

Nothing is quite so dainty for the baby of the family as fine white batiste or Persian lawn with just a bit of embroidery. The cunning yoke dress at the left below is made with seams on the shoulders, has brier stitching around the yoke, cuffs and hem, and is trimmed with tiny easily made roses, either white or a soft blue, which give a trimming touch all out of proportion to the small amount of work they require. A bishop dress is especially adorable for a baby, when it is embroidered with small pink or white flowers and edged with narrow ruffles, as at the right of the sketch below. The tiniest of handmade edgings may be used at the neck and sleeves instead of the ruffles, if one prefers. Either of these white dresses is also attractive in handkerchief linen, or in dimity with the flowers omitted. Patterns for both come in sizes 6 months, 1, 2 and 3 years.

Chambray, cotton cloths of linen-like weave, linen, and wool Jersey are all well suited to the little frock with knickers in the center of the sketch below. Any simple conventional embroidery pattern in a contrasting or darker shade may be used. The binding may be of a darker shade of the same material or of braid. In a blue-and-white-striped material plain blue bands suffice for trimming, while a checked gingham would be very cunning edged with rickrack, where the bands appear in the sketch. The pattern is in sizes 2, 4 and 6.

Patterns may be secured from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from The Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City. Dresses, 35 cents; Coats, 35 cents; Blouses or Skirts, 30 cents; Children's Patterns, 25 cents.

Pompeian Night Cream

The Cold Cream for Beauty

Why Is He Fascinated?

Such bewitching loveliness, such glorious beauty—no wonder he is fascinated! The rich, youthful color of her radiant skin but emphasizes the tenderness her eyes betray. You, too, should learn her secret of girlish charm and lasting beauty.

Every night before retiring she uses Pompeian NIGHT Cream (the cold cream for beauty). It brings while she sleeps the beauty of a soft, youthful skin.

Just try this simple treatment every night before retiring: First, coat your face thickly with Pompeian NIGHT Cream, patting it gently into the pores. Then, with a soft cloth remove the surplus cream, which will bring with it all the day's dust and grit.

Next, wring out a cloth or towel in warm water and lay it on the face. Pat it gently—do not rub. Now, rinse the face in cool—not cold—water. Dry without rubbing.

Then, again apply Pompeian NIGHT Cream (the cold cream for beauty), and leave it on the skin to "youthify" you through the night. It brings beauty while you sleep.

Pompeian NIGHT Cream is for sale at all druggists' at 50c and $1.00 a jar.

GUARANTEE

The name Pompeian on any package is your guarantee of quality and safety. Should you not be completely satisfied, the purchase price will be gladly refunded by The Pompeian Co., at Cleveland, Ohio.

"Brings Beauty While You Sleep"

TEAR OFF NOW

To mail or to put in purse as shopping reminder

THE POMPEIAN COMPANY
2001 Payne Avenue, Cleveland, O.

Gentlemen: I enclose 10c. (a dime preferred) for 1922 Art Panel. Also please send five samples named in offer.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____

State _____

Natural shade powder sent unless you write another below.

Get 1922 Panel—Five Samples Sent With It

"Honeymooning in Venice." What romance! The golden moonlit balcony! The blue lagoon! The swift-gliding gondolas! The serenading gondoliers! Tinkling mandolins! The sighing winds of evening! Ah, the memories of a thousand Venetian years! Such is the story revealed in the new 1922 Pompeian panel. Size 28 x 7 1/4 inches. In beautiful colors. Sent for only 10c. This is the most beautiful and expensive panel we have ever offered. Art store value 50c to $1. Money gladly refunded if not wholly satisfactory. With each order for an Art Panel we will send samples of Pompeian BEAUTY Powder, DAY Cream (vanishing), BLOOM, NIGHT Cream (an improved cold cream), and Pompeian FRAGRANCE (a talc). With these samples you can make many interesting beauty experiments. Please tear off coupon now and enclose a dime.

"Its fragrance brings you instant charm."

THE POMPEIAN COMPANY, 2001 Payne Avenue, Cleveland, Ohio

Also Made in Canada

© 1922, The Pompeian Co.

PHOTOGRAPH OF HAMILTON CLOTHES ON LIVING FIGURES

Garments Illustrated Above

- No. 550 Tailored Suit of All Wool Navy Tricotine.....$13.95
 No. 650 Dress of fine Black Silk Canton Crepe.....$9.95
 No. 350 Coat of fine quality All Wool Tan Velour.....$8.95
 No. 651 Dress of All Wool Navy Poirer Twill.....$8.95

The purpose of this advertisement is to urge you to send for your FREE copy of HAMILTON'S CATALOG OF FIFTH AVENUE STYLES

More than 300 illustrations of the new and beautiful spring styles we are selling in our Fifth Avenue Building to New York's best dressed women!

- Never before have we been able to offer such wonderful values!
- Never have we assembled as wide a variety of the newest styles!
- Never has Hamilton quality been as high nor the prices as low!

Never in the history of the trade has the following guarantee been made!

WE GUARANTEE HAMILTON PRICES LOWER THAN ANY HOUSE IN AMERICA!

If, before June 15th, you can buy the same merchandise for less, we will refund the difference and let you be the judge!

The above guarantee is so liberal—so unusual—it should be printed in "letters a mile high!"

We please you or refund your money immediately. Postage prepaid.

HAMILTON GARMENT CO.

MAIL ORDER DEPARTMENT A2, 307 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

250—Silk Bead Hat with Ribbon Trimming. Black only $3.95

950—Smart Waist of Fine White Voile; Lace Trimmed.....89c

951—Novelty Weave, Fringe Trimmed, Black Silk Tricotee Blouse.....$2.25

750—Patent Leather Grecian Sandal; Silver Effect Buckle. All Sizes.....$3.65

This Catalog is FREE!

Even if there is nothing you need at present, just mail a post-card with your name and address TO-DAY for this beautiful book of advance styles for Spring and Summer, 1922. Do it now! Thank you!

Modish Suits for Early Spring

One's early spring suit of black Poiret twill or navy tricotine will be particularly attractive if the wide sleeves and long, loose coat are trimmed with rows and rows of flat black silk braid. For the lining crêpe de Chine in matching or contrasting color is excellent. Pattern No. 3439, in sizes 16 and 36 to 44, makes the coat; any plain skirt pattern may be used for the skirt. If one wishes to avoid the conventional black or navy, the wood shades, running from a warm tan to a rich golden brown, promise to be popular this spring, as do also wistaria, gray with a touch of fuchsia, and the various green and gray blues. All these colors should also be considered in connection with the coat blouse below, and the most becoming one chosen, because in a coat of this sort so much depends upon color and material.

3439

3437

The average pattern considers its duty well done when one good-looking coat has been produced, but Pattern No. 3437, in sizes 16 and 36 to 40, is responsible for three. At the left it makes a rather formal suit coat, collared and cuffed with fur. At the right, in soft blue duvetyne with a turned-up cuff at the bottom, it becomes a delightful coat blouse. In the center, a close band of embroidery about hips and matching embroidery on the collar work a further transformation. Any skirt pattern may be used.

Patterns may be secured from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City. Dresses, 35 cents; Coats, 35 cents; Blouses or Skirts, 30 cents; Children's Patterns, 25 cents; Linen, 25 cents.

No. 110
Voile Dress
$1.50
2 to 3 yr.

New Spring Designs
There is Style, Quality and Real Economy

ROYAL SOCIETY EMBROIDERY PACKAGE OUTFITS

To women who appreciate values, the name Royal Society has long been synonymous with ultra style and highest quality. They know there is no line of embroidery packages which offer as many advantages in suitable materials, practical items, correct and sufficient embroidery thread, workmanship and completeness. But added to these desirable features, the economy represented in the made up articles of apparel in Royal Society Packages, is of importance to those who MUST or are inclined to consider costs. Even in putting aside the cost of time and effort consumed in purchasing materials, planning, designing, making, etc., one can readily compare the unusual values in Royal Society Packages with actual costs of similar quality materials in average communities. AND THINK WHAT A CONVENIENCE TO HAVE "Everything in the package, clean and intact," ready for the simple Embroidery.

THE NEW SPRING LINE NOW ON DISPLAY contains an exceptional variety of Children's Dresses, in dainty colored materials and white; washable Hats, Ladies' Undergarments, Negligee and Aprons, Household Articles and Novelties.

LITTLE BUNNY "TUMBLEBUM"
A novelty doll that the children will love. Illustrated and fully described in the Spring Package Outfit Circular. Send for copy.

DEALERS EVERYWHERE
H. E. VERRAN CO., Inc.
Dept. E, 27 East 15th Street
New York

GOLD DUST

© 1921
N. E. F. Co.

Four heaping table-spoonfuls of Gold Dust to a quart of boiling water makes the finest, most cleansing soft soap!

How soft and sudsy Gold Dust makes the water! And it cleanses perfectly with the least amount of rubbing!

See how quickly Gold Dust dissolves in water. And how quickly it dissolves the grease.

Always ready for visitors!

YOU take pride in your dainty tea table and tea wagon, don't you? And you want to keep your teapot and coffee percolator, your cut glass and china "sweet" and sparkling—always ready for visitors!

One housekeeper, who always asks her grocer for Gold Dust, insists that no other cleaner will daily add such a sparkle to china, nickel and silver, because no other cleaner will cleanse so thoroughly as Gold Dust. And no other cleaner will keep "milky and buttery" things so sweet because no other cleaner so thoroughly—and easily—dissolves the grease. Here is her Gold Dust recipe:

Place a scant tablespoon of Gold Dust in the dishpan. Fill with hot water. Use a soft cloth or dish mop for china. For percolator and silver use a soft brush. Scald with clear, hot water.

You can find Gold Dust everywhere! But—like this housekeeper—be sure it is the real Gold Dust you buy.

Let the Gold Dust

Twins do your work

THE N. E. FAIRBANK COMPANY

Slipper Satin Hats for You to Make at Home

(Continued from Page 74)

the brim, placing one of the points exactly in the center front; cut around the edge, leaving half an inch extending beyond brim, and notch front, back and sides. Smooth the flannel on brim and pin it around base of crown, then cut out the material in the center, leaving one inch extending beyond inner edge of brim. Remove pins, take off upper piece of flannel and fasten lower one to the brim, turning in edges to fit frame and sewing with long stitches to the wire. Place the other piece of flannel on top of brim, matching all notches, turn the half inch at the outer edge in under and slip stitch. Baste at the base of crown, so that flannel is very smooth, and sew it fast, letting raw edge turn up to come inside of crown. Apply the satin to the brim in same way.

Cover the crown with a piece of outing flannel, eleven by twelve inches, baste raw edges down on sides and put a bias band, three and a half inches wide, around base of crown, overlapping ends and holding in place with a running stitch, so as not to have a seam. Cover the top with a twelve-inch satin square and the sides with a four-inch bias band of satin, edges turned in, slip-stitched at top and bottom and seamed straight up center back.

The satin band used for trimming is a straight piece, four and a half by forty inches, its edges blanket-stitched with wool. The matching satin scarf is two yards long and eight and a half inches wide. The flowers on both hat and scarf are of lightweight wool, in orange, green and gray, and are applied with blanket stitch. One and a half yards of lace insertion, six inches wide, is used to make the bow, lace wire being run through the hole of the lace and not sewed, and the wire lace then twisted into shape.

To make a small black satin hat that is decidedly different in its smartness—photographed in the center of page 73—cut a double piece of willow, half the length of your head size, so that the front, at fold, will be seven inches wide and it will taper to two and a half inches in back. Seam together at back. Turn up one inch at bottom, blanket stitch a round millinery wire to the turned-up edge and a second wire around the upper edge of the frame. Next, cut a bias piece of satin, allowing an inch to turn under at both top and bottom and arranging to have seam come on side, where it may be hidden by the drapery: apply smoothly to frame and sew fast. For the crown, cut a square fourteen by fourteen inches from thin crinoline, round off the corners and sew it, on inside of frame, to the top of the headband in front and to the bottom of the headband at the back and sides.

Shir in the extra fullness at each side. For the drapery, cut two bias pieces of satin, twelve by twenty-four inches, line with thin black crinoline, turn in an inch on each side and press in with finger, but do not sew. Now lay in each piece a lengthwise box plait, two and a half inches on top and three-quarters of an inch in under. Place the pieces across top of hat, starting at a point five inches from the center front and ending at corresponding point on opposite side. Turn all ends in under one and a half inches and sew fast. The two strips should cross each other and be tacked, one above the other, to give the effect of soft and graceful drapery.

3422-3395

PHOTO, BY BLUE McHARRIS

Pauline Frederick, the film star, comes over the top wearing a most becoming riding suit and bringing oranges from her own California garden. Not all of us can raise oranges, but the riding habit is ours for the making. The pattern comes for the coat in sizes 16, 36 to 44, and is No. 3422, while the knickerbockers are in sizes 16, 28 to 36, and the pattern is No. 3395. Such suits are in high favor for general country wear.

Patterns may be secured from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City.

Do your feet give out in the afternoon?

PROBABLY there is nothing the matter with your feet, but soon after you put on your shoes, they begin to tire. Why?

Nature, thinking that we always would go barefooted, planned the foot to have three points of contact with the ground—heel, ball and outside arch. But your shoes, in raising the heel from the ground, also raise the arch, without providing any firm support for it. Your weight bearing down on the unsupported arch strains it, and the foot gives out before the day is over.

The Arch Preserver Shoe, like all smart footwear, raises the heel and arch from the ground, thus giving the foot the stylish appearance you desire; but, unlike shoes with bending arches, it has a concealed built-in arch-bridge that supports the arch as firmly as the ground supports it when walking barefoot. Though shod in the latest fashion, your feet are free from strain all day long when you wear Arch Preserver Shoes.

Nature plans that the foot rest on heel, ball and outside arch.

Civilization demands that heel and arch be raised.

The Arch Preserver Shoe satisfies both Nature and Civilization.

Arch Preserver Boots and Low-Cuts are made for women and misses in all styles—widths AAAA to E. Sold by 2,000 dealers. Look for the trade-mark shown below. It appears on every genuine Arch Preserver Shoe.

Write for Style Book No. 30 and name of dealer in your city

Made only by

THE SELBY SHOE COMPANY

20 Gallia St., PORTSMOUTH, OHIO

Makers of women's fine shoes for more than 40 years.

THE ARCH PRESERVER SHOE

1847 Jubilee Year 1922

The Family Plate for Seventy-five Years

1847 ROGERS BROS.

SILVERPLATE

When you see the date, 1847, you think of the best in silverplate. It was in 1847 that the first silverplate made in this country—1847 Rogers Bros.—was produced, and ever since, from generation to generation, this silverplate has been the choice of young people—those who desire freshness and beauty of design.

Note the "Ambassador," the supreme silverplate pattern of 1922. Back of this modern, present-day design are seventy-five years' experience and seventy-five years' test of quality and endurance. These we celebrate in this Anniversary Year and we want all our friends, the great buying public, to rejoice with us.

Sold by leading dealers. Write for folder N-28, illustrating other patterns, to the International Silver Co., Meriden, Conn.

INTERNATIONAL SILVER CO.

Coiffures for Young and Old and a Dress for the Matron

The simplest is always the best in hair-dressing for the young girl. Here the hair is parted slightly to one side or, if one prefers, not parted at all, drawn back softly at the sides and pinned, and the back then rolled up over the ends and held beneath a round comb. If soft waving is desired six big kid curlers used "from ear to ear" will give satisfactory results to the most critical.

The matron whose hair is thick will find this coiffure very becoming for evening, and may modify its height for daytime wear if she wishes. Divide the hair into three parts, tie the middle strand and roll upward from ends, then pin a twist on left side next to the knot and finally wrap right side over left, winding ends around knot, being careful to have the hair travel in a sweep.

For the modified French roll, always a favorite with matrons, one divides the hair into three parts, fluffing, rolling and pinning first the right side which includes back, then the top, and finally bringing left side around and binding in place with pins and comb. This is good if one's hair is thin, as the high comb, which should be put in on a slant, conceals any scantiness.

Distinctly smart is Agnès' coat dress at the left, and very becoming to the matron because of its high collar and the slenderizing lines of its silhouette. Since it is made of softest gray serge embroidered in blue, with blue crêpe Georgette showing at sleeves and neck and through the opening in the skirt, it is appropriate for afternoon or theater, but may also appear in church.

Agnès

(Continued from Page 67)

marcelled! Imagine drawing the threads for wavy hem-stitching! Two women supply one house, and, I am told, they can do only six bolts of material in a year.

The zigzag line in gold, like chevrons, goes across serge. And following out the old home idea, do you remember the pictures from a bygone date when what they called puffs were popular? These are really ruffles gathered along both edges and sewed down. This year they climb their way up materials in the form of shirred stripes, woven in. There was a wave of puffs as garnishment back in Indiana when I was a little girl. Two women dressed a doll for me with ornamentation of ruffles. I made them sew down both edges into a puff. They thought this immensely funny. I don't know whether the French dressmakers will think so this spring when they go through the same experience with customers, as they stand an excellent chance of doing.

I have often remarked that if I could spare my red silk umbrella I would halve it into panniers. Of course, you know the movement which Paul Poiret started. It seems to be growing in favor rather than receding, the object being to get yourself just as flat and undecorated front and back as possible, with these halves of umbrellas suspended from the hips. As a silhouette, I should not be afraid to risk it. But in any event, there is this same tendency to push all the ornamentation of a material into one place. Stripes, and even climbing flower gardens, go up one restricted area of a serge or a cashmere and leave the rest untouched.

It is extremely smart to have your clothes held with just as few fasteners as possible. I have a dress that depends for support entirely on a snap on each shoulder, and these in moments least expected are wont to burst open.

I had thought that perhaps the fever was dying out of the strange malady that attacked sleeves and that the swelling was perhaps going down; but, in general, sleeves are of a size! They are still highly tinted. The French never did like pale colors. Give them something crude, or give them black; and I cannot think they will ever relinquish the latter. Already, before fairly out, the bright colors are many times veiled in black. Still, there was a cloth coat on the Avenue bordered in a fence with potted plant on each post.

That and the young woman colored like the village flower garden were the memories of the day. This latter vision sent me flying on my semi-annual pilgrimage to the house of Rodier, shrine of materials, for details about what they were turning out for spring. All that the Champs-Élysées gave out in the bright sunshine the Rodiers confirmed and defended. The flowers that bloom in this spring of fashion are called by us old-fashioned and by the French the flowers of Madame de Pompadour. As the artist-dressmaker looks with contempt on machine embroidery, so does Monsieur Rodier look on any embroidery at all. Exclaim on the marvelousness of his embroidered flowers and he follows close after you with the words: "They are woven—hand woven." And they are everywhere. They will be found in great profusion on cashmere—for cashmere is "in"—serge and crêpe.

Imagine staid old cashmere blooming in great blossoms of yellow and green. Then try to grasp the impression of conservative serge dressed up into something fancy. One of the garnishments consists of set-in squares. I called them handkerchiefs and the Rodiers referred to them as "vitrine," or old-fashioned windowpane trimming. In the thin materials many of these windowpanes are exactly like tiny fine handkerchiefs with cross-bar edges. Hemstitching is the trimming of the day, and many of these little windowpanes are hemstitched into woollens. On one of the serges these squares were decorated with open-work medallions, like a fancy church window. Many of the squares are studded with porcelain beads, some white and some black.

(Continued on Page 92)

Welcome the Fuller Man

Because—He describes the forty-five "Household Necessities" that save time and abolish drudgery in any home.

Because—Fuller Brushes are in universal demand. Represent every modern improvement in scientifically constructed brushes for personal and household use. Based upon 15 years' study of brushing requirements—plus actual experience in millions of homes.

Because—You, the users of Fuller Brushes, get better quality at lower prices (as The Fuller Brush Company is the largest buyer of brush material in the world, and attains unusual economies in purchasing and manufacturing).

Because—The proper amount and kind of material go into every Fuller Brush—only material that fits each brush for its particular job and assures maximum durability. (Brush makers recognize these exclusively Fuller characteristics.)

Genuine
Fuller Brushes
carry this tag in addition to the trade mark. Look for both!

Fuller
TRADE MARK

FULLER

69 USES—HEAD TO FOOT

Because—Fuller Brushes are never sold in stores. In showing them, allowing you to handle them, proving their applications to your individual duties, the Fuller Man renders a service obtainable through no other method of merchandising.

Because—The Fuller Man is one of 2500 trained and supervised salesmen of Fuller Brushes. Chosen for his intelligence, character and ability to be of service to you—as well as for his ability to sell Fuller Brushes.

Because—The Fuller Man is a gentleman, whom you may admit to your home with confidence. His calls are regular—a few months apart.

All Fuller Brushes carry the Fuller Red Tip Tag and have the Fuller trade mark permanently stamped on the handle. All Fuller representatives wear the Fuller trade mark button. Look for these: the tag, trade mark and Fuller button. They assure you genuine Fuller quality.

THE FULLER BRUSH COMPANY

Hartford, Connecticut
Fuller Brush Co. Ltd., Hamilton, Canada

Branch Offices in over 150 cities—consult telephone directory.

BRUSHES

—CELLAR TO ATTIC

Genuine
Fuller Brushes
carry this tag in addition to the trade mark. Look for both!

Fuller
TRADE MARK

Like Rice? Here is your dish

Comet

Uncoated White Rice

YOU'LL never know how good rice can taste until you try Comet. And it's so nutritious for every member of your family—especially for the children. The little ones love heaping dishes of Comet Rice, for white rice makes pink cheeks.

The sealed, dust-proof package, pictured above, keeps it free from impurities from the time it is cleaned until it reaches your kitchen.

At all good grocers'—your grocer's. Look for the Comet on the yellow package with the red band.

COOK RICE RIGHT—the Comet way

H EAT 6 cups water, with pinch of salt, in large saucepan. When boiling violently, add slowly 1 cup Comet Rice. Continue boiling 20 minutes—or until grains are soft. Drain in colander, set on back of stove until grains fall apart. Do not cover—that makes rice heavy and soggy.

EVER EAT BROWN RICE? Doctors recommend whole rice with the natural outside coating and vitamins retained. Highly nourishing. Try Comet Natural Brown Rice.

Seaboard Rice Milling Co.
Galveston and New York

Many a Spring Blouse Features a Puritan Collar

It's tucks that make the blouse at the right—tucks and the material, a rich red crêpe de Chine. Pattern comes in sizes 16 and 36 to 42. Directly below, a youthful blouse of woody-brown crêpe de Chine or silk Jersey has collar and cuffs of brown-and-white-checked taffeta. The pattern may be had in sizes 14 to 20.

Soft gray-blue crêpe de Chine is used for the blouse above, with trimmings of navy crêpe de Chine. Pattern comes in sizes 16 and 36 to 44. At the left below, mulberry cloth is combined with a mulberry-and-gray wool plaid to make a most attractive frock that is particularly becoming to the young and slender figure. For school or college wear, or for one's first venture into the business world, the simplicity of the blue tricot dress below at the right will prove most acceptable. The patterns for both dresses may be had in sizes from 14 to 20.

(Continued from Page 89)

Some of the serges are bordered in yellow, and—the French can never quite get away from the historical—some of them carry a frieze in hieroglyphics. Something from a Chinese document forms the motif for one. Woolly fringe edges others. Those puffs that I saw on the Champs-Élysées appear in fancy patterns, woven in full stripes along plain material. There are flat ribbons in bright colors climbing up staid materials, the ribbons being crossed with tiny tucks.

A bolt of something was spread across the table that I had forgotten the existence of—corduroy! "Will it be fashionable?" I questioned of the head of the house of Rodier.

"It is fashionable," he answered, correcting my tardiness of tense.

He picked something out of a drawer. It was a sample of Riviera material—a cotton material similar to cheesecloth run with corduroy stripes in blue silk. In other words, corduroy attachments are going on to materials of contrasting color and texture. Silk corduroy on cotton is a departure, and most effective, I think. That sublimated cheesecloth, which in one moment they called voile and in another crêpe, is the basis of everything. And it is smartest when crinkled, like English mourning. They call it crêpe Anglaise.

The walls of the Rodier establishment were all but lined with citron yellow, and in my first two minutes I began to plan a wrap for Palm Beach. Long ends of silky, sleazy quilting hung from a rafter, and the one in lemon yellow outshone all the rest. I saw it in fancy beside a moonlit sea. Much of this quilting had little squares set into it—exactly like your bedcovering—and they bloomed with pert flowers. To give this material a body and at the same time baffle our sense of shading, they lined it with another sleazy stuff of contrasting color, and held the two together with the coarsest of basting threads, running a centimeter apart, but not touching the squares. If plain and fancy quilting is not popular, that is because you will not accept it.

In somberer colors one has seen it all winter on the boulevards.

In a general way the materials show roughness rather than any great refinement of texture. And yet no statement is complete without its contradiction. Never have I seen such a riot of organdies before, and in such delicacy. They are "watered" like old-fashioned silk, and changeable like petticoat taffeta, and some have flowers woven into the threads. I am told that in America organdies are not quite so much liked as formerly, but, be that as it may, I know that no woman will ever be able to resist these.

Patterns may be secured from any store selling Home Patterns; or by mail, postage prepaid, from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City. Dresses, 35 cents; Coats, 35 cents; Blouses or Skirts, 30 cents; Children's Patterns, 25 cents; Lingerie, 25 cents.

MORE THAN A FAIR WEATHER FRIEND

The White Spirit of Purity lives in
FAIRY SOAP

THERE are soaps that will keep your skin smooth as silk when Spring is in the air, but fail to do it when blustery weather comes over the hill. They are "fair-weather" soaps that depend largely upon their appearance and odor for their popularity.

But Fairy Soap is an all-weather friend—a soap for every day of the year. It is more than a white floating soap—it is the whitest soap made.

From the time the wrapper is removed until the last thin wafer disappears this whiteness does not change.

And no soap at any price could be purer. Fairy quality is unique.

Fairy soap is used in the leading men's clubs and Turkish baths in New York City. It is a soap for every particular cleansing purpose throughout the home.

It isn't colored, doesn't reek with perfume—nothing but pure, unalloyed soap for people to whom cleanliness is more than an affectation.

For all uses that require soap of highest quality, think of Fairy, the soap that is winning its way the world over.

THE N. K. FAIRBANK COMPANY

FAIRY SOAP

PURE  FLOATING  WHITE

The Little Things That Count—

Nine Nufashond Notions

For a collar's edge, the trimming of a tub frock, center piece, rick rack braid gives a simple youthful touch. And Nufashond Rick Rack has those saucy French points instead of dull, blunt scallops. It will not curl, either. Suggestions for using it will be found in the Nufashond Rick Rack Book described below. Be sure you read the sample offer at the bottom of this page.

Nufashond Edgetrim is the button-hole trimming as dainty as Madeira hand-work. Frocks for the little one, piquant tea aprons and lingerie are enhanced by a touch of Nufashond Edgetrim. You can count upon it wearing as long as the article it adorns—it does not fray as so many trimmings do.

A smart, silky braid and a firm, tailored middy lacer give that finishing touch which stamps the youngster "well dressed." The Nufashond middy lacer has the famous fabric self-color tip which cannot rust, come off or tear as do the metal tips. In the wanted colors.

In the first place they look so smart, Nufashond Shoe Lacers, whether you choose them flat or tubular. But best of all is that self-color fabric tip which won't come off and which you can tuck into your shoe top without endangering your fine hose. In all lengths and desired colors.

THE bit of trimming on a child's frock, the elastic in one's underskirt or knickers, a shoe lacer or shoulder strap—they seem such tiny things, don't they?

And yet how often a frayed trimming, lifeless elastic, lacers broken or without tips will render useless a much needed part of your attire!

The purchase of Notions should not be haphazard and need not be if you'll remember just "Nufashond."

Nufashond Notions are all one family—not the products of various makers assembled under one name, but every one born beneath the Nufashond roof.

Each one has its special features to distinguish it from the ordinary quality and to prove the adage "If it's a Nufashond Notion it's good."

Some Unusual Things to Make by Hand

The uses of Nufashond trimmings—cluny and filet laces, rick rack braid and soutache braid have filled three books! The Nufashond Lace Book, Nufashond Rick Rack Book and Nufashond Knotwork Book—this last named shows designs and instructions for making that fascinating knotwork of soutache braid.

If your store cannot supply you with these books, we will fill your order by mail—Lace Book 25c, Rick Rack Book 25c and Knotwork Book 10c, or 50c for all three.

You may slip Nufashond lingerie braid through your finest underpieces, for with all its firmness and durability, it is as dainty as can be, and its colors are fast. It comes in protective glassine envelope with bodkin attached.

Without Charge

We will be glad to send you a length of Nufashond Rick Rack Braid sufficient to trim a dainty handkerchief together with instructions for making on receipt of 4c to cover mailing. Also a copy of "The Little Things that Count."

NUFASHOND
READING, PA.

Shoulder straps have a habit of lasting when they're made of Nufashond shoulder strapping. It is simple in design and attractive when seen through the transparent blouse.

Did you ever make a Knotwork bag? They're costly in appearance but really inexpensive if you make them yourself of Nufashond Soutache Braid. Countless uses for this unusually fine braid are to be found in the Nufashond Knotwork Book described elsewhere on this page.

An elastic which will hold its lively spring—that Nufashond elastic. Replacing dead elastic is troublesome, so it's worth while to specify Nufashond. 1 widths from fine cord elastic to one and one-half inches.

A broken corset lacer can be a real disaster when one's dressing time is limited. You'll find the life of Nufashond lacer—no matter what its fabric—is surprisingly long. The tip will not come off, neither will it rust nor tear the dainty undervest, for it's a Nufashond self-color fabric tip.

You, Too, Can Have Money in the Bank!

A BANK account is a necessity, now-a-days, for any girl or woman who wants to hold up her head with others. Ida Cooper came to that conclusion after several humiliating experiences and one real scare. And then she found a way to make the extra money to start a fat bank account of her own. Oh, the pride and the comfort it was to her! It makes a real-life story worth telling you.

One day a few months ago one of Ida Cooper's friends, who is secretary to the manager of a big store, phoned her excitedly: "We are going to have a marvelous sale, Ida. Come to the store with about $25 and you will save more than that much."

"Clara, I really haven't got $25," Ida answered her.

"Why, it would pay you to draw it out of the bank, Ida; this is a real bargain sale," returned Clara.

"But I haven't any bank account," Ida had to reply.

This was not the first time Ida Cooper had really lost money, missed opportunities and good times, by not having the money ready. "Why, even poor old Sam (the local dark-complexioned odd-jobs man) has a savings account," she thought bitterly.

True enough! And that very week Ida Cooper came down with a terrible cold that very nearly turned into something worse. At the dread specter, Ida sat up in bed in cold horror, when her doctor said: "I thought we'd have to send you to a sanitarium, young lady." She didn't have a cent of money saved. Suppose something like that, some real emergency—such as come to other people—should happen to her? What would she do?

It must have been her good fairy that sent a copy of the HOME JOURNAL into her hands very soon after that experience. In it she read of a girl who had a hard time to pay for her living expenses out of her salary.

But this girl made extra dollars during her spare hours in the Home Journal's Girls' Club, to pay for all sorts of nice things she could not possibly have had otherwise.

Then Ida read of a married woman who had to make both ends meet on a very small allowance. And this wise little wife also made enough extra money in The Girls' Club to have a good fat little bank account in her own name, ready for her children's doctor's bills or dentist's bills or for any other emergency, from new shoes to a ton of coal or a dainty waist for herself.

"I don't see why I can't make extra dollars if they do," said Ida to herself. "It won't do any harm to find out about it, at least." So she wrote to The Girls' Club, saying she was interested, and she did indeed "find out about it." In less than a month she had made $25 extra cash and had PUT THAT MONEY IN THE BANK. But she never felt prouder in her life than when, a few days later, she received another $10 check from the Club, took it to the bank window and said: "Please deposit to my account!" A grand and glorious feeling!

Week by week Ida has easily earned more dollars through our Girls' Club plan, until now she is ready for whatever happens!

If you, too, would like to have extra dollars for your own bank account, or to spend for something you want very much, or to pay bills, do write and find out about The Girls' Club. Don't you realize we must have a wonderfully easy way to make extra money, when all these others can turn their spare hours into dollars? Married girls, teachers, business girls, grandmothers! All succeed with us. And there's not a penny of expense to you if you join us.

Write me this very minute and let me tell you about it! Simply say you are interested in making spare-time money and want to know how we do it in The Girls' Club; and address me as the

Manager of The Girls' Club

THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL
435 INDEPENDENCE SQUARE
PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA

make a quart of Mapleine syrup
for 22¢

—a quart of clear, golden syrup—deliciously maple-flavored, instantly made. Just pure granulated sugar, water and the Mapleine to supply the good rich maple flavor. The syrup is made and ready for the table in a jiffy. We want you to realize how economical and good Mapleine is as a syrup maker. So fill out the coupon below and enclose 10c. We will immediately send you a trial bottle containing sufficient Mapleine to make a quart of the purest maple-flavored syrup, for a total cost of 22c, your sugar included.

Mapleine is sold by grocers in regular 2-oz bottles at 35c (in Canada duty added) the price of any good flavor. A 2-oz bottle of Mapleine is sufficient to make 12 quarts or more of delicious Mapleine Syrup. A good way is to make as much syrup at a time as you wish, say a pint, a quart, a gallon or more, then use the Mapleine left in the bottle to make new and delightful cakes with maple-flavored fillings and frostings or maple flavored pudding sauces, desserts, candies, ice cream.

CRESCENT MANUFACTURING COMPANY
321 Occidental Avenue Seattle, Washington

MAPLEINE
The Golden Flavor

-----Send 10¢ with this coupon-----

Enclosed herewith find 10c for trial bottle of Mapleine, and recipe booklet:

My name _____

Address _____

My grocer _____

60 Years of Changing Styles

but always the same wonderful Gingham

THERE always has been something unusual about a frock made with Wm. Anderson Zephyr. There's a charm to the pattern; a tone to the coloring; a soft, glove-like feel to the texture that seems to make it a thing apart in the world of ginghams.

And after it's laundered, it always seems more adorable than ever—softer, daintier, charmingly light and fluffy.

Another Wm. Anderson gingham—made in this country—is called IVANHOE. Like the imported, IVANHOE is sunfast and tubfast and comes in a wonderful variety of designs and colorings.

The name "Wm. Anderson" also applies to almost any wash fabric of fashion, to dainty Voiles, Organdies and Dotted Swisses—all of them conforming to the Wm. Anderson standard of fine looms, exquisite designs and dependable colors.

So if you will accept the protection represented by "Wm. Anderson" on selvage or bolt end, your selection of cotton dress goods can be made with assurance of superior quality.

Sold only through retail merchants.

Wm. Anderson
Textile Manufacturing Co., Inc.
48-50 White Street, New York
Glasgow, Scotland

The Unspeakable Gentleman

(Continued from Page 12)

background?" my father continued. "Perhaps it is my bad memory that permits his identity still to be a revelation?"

The stranger nervously arranged a fold in his sea cloak while his little black eyes darted restlessly about the room. "It's Sims, Captain Shelton," he volunteered in a gentle, unassuming voice, "and very much at your service."

"Captain Shelton be hanged!" snapped Lawton. "Keep your name to yourself, Sims, and watch the nigger and the boy. Now, Shelton, for the reason why I'm here: I have come here to-night to induce or force you to return a piece of stolen property. I give you the liberty of taking your choice. Either—"

His voice raised itself to a sharp command: "Blast you, Shelton; sit still!" The picture had changed. Mr. Lawton was leaning across the table, leveling a pistol at my father's head. With a detached, academic interest my father glanced at the weapon and without perceptible pause, without added haste or deliberation, he continued to withdraw the hand he had thrust into his right coat pocket. There was a tense, pregnant silence. Then my father withdrew his hand. He was holding a silver snuffbox, which he tossed carelessly on the table.

"WHY strain so at a gnat, Lawton?" he continued in a conversational manner. "A note penned in three lines would have brought you back your trinket. But when you say it is stolen your memory fails you. I won that snuffbox from you fairly because your horse refused a water jump in Baltimore fifteen years ago."

Mr. Lawton made a grimace of impatience. "Perhaps I can refresh your memory on a more immediate matter," he interjected harshly. "Don't move! At a certain chateau in the Loire Valley, as recently as two months ago, you had an affair with French government agents. You escaped in the company of a certain young lady they were seeking to apprehend. You retained in your possession a list of names of political importance. I say you stole that paper."

"Indeed?" said my father. "In that case permit me. The snuff is excellent, Lawton, although the box is commonplace."

"Hang your impudence!" shouted Mr. Lawton. "I've come to get that list, to return it to its rightful owners. Try your bragging on boys, not on me! For the last time, will you give that letter up?"

My father's hand that held the snuffbox trembled. For a moment he stared at Mr. Lawton's pistol. Then he moistened his lips. "Suppose I should refuse?" he asked.

"IN THAT case," Mr. Lawton said, "I shall summon five men whom I hold outside. They will search the house, having searched you first. If they do not find the letter I shall give you one more chance to produce it."

"You realize your action is illegal?" my father interrupted.

Mr. Lawton laughed. "We've beaten about the bush long enough," he said. "Will I have to remind you again that I didn't come to hear you talk? Come to the point. Will you give up that paper?"

With a sigh of resignation my father fumbled in his breast pocket and produced a long, sealed document which he handed across the table.

Mr. Lawton's eyes glistened as he took it. He held it to the light to scan the seal. "Hang your caution, Sims!" he exclaimed exultantly. "We've got it just as I said we would. Didn't I tell you—" He burst into a violent fit of sneezing.

My father had thrown the contents of his snuffbox into Mr. Lawton's face. At almost the same moment Mr. Lawton's pistol was in my father's hand and leveled at Mr. Sims.

"Brutus," said my father, "unburden Mr. Sims of his weapons. Lawton, a breath of night air may relieve you. Let us go to the window and reflect on the slip that may occur between the container and the nose. My son, give Mr. Lawton your arm. Assist me to open the shutters. Now, Mr. Lawton, call to your men; tell them they may go. Louder! Louder, Mr. Lawton! Surely your voice has more strength. My ears have been weary this long time with its clamor."

III

THE gaunt old room that had entertained so many guests was emptied of its last ones, with nothing except the faint chill that had come through the opened window to remind one of their presence. Brutus was clearing away the dishes. And my father was resting languidly in his chair again, quite as though nothing had happened.

"My son," he remarked, "I was saying to you before our callers interrupted that there are just two things I never do. I think that one may be enough for to-night. It is that circumstances oblige me to keep my word."

"You do not care to tell me any more?" I asked him.

"Only that you had better stay, my son. If you do I can guarantee you will see me at my worst, which is better, perhaps, than hearing of me secondhand. And possibly it may even be interesting, the little drama which is starting—hilarious, in fact, if it were not for the lady in the case."

"The lady!" I echoed involuntarily. "Am I to understand you brought a woman with you across the ocean?"

"A lady, my son, not a woman. You will find that the two are quite different species."

"You mean she is here now?" I persisted.

"To be sure!" he acquiesced. "She is, I trust, asleep in the east guest room, and heaven help you if you wake her! I beg of you, do not judge me harshly."

Launcelot himself—what am I saying?—Bayard himself, up to the present moment, could only commend my every action.

"Even to bringing her to this house," I suggested coldly.

"PRECISELY," he replied. "That in itself was actuated by the highest piece of altruism heaven has vouchsafed humanity—the regard a father has for his son."

"Do you think," I demanded angrily, "that you can bring me into this business? Certainly you've done enough to me to-night, sir, without adding an insult."

My father nodded, seemingly still well pleased.

"You misunderstand me," he said quite gently. "My present occupation requires a shrewder head and a steadier hand than yours, my son."

"And a different code of morals," I was about to retort indignantly, but the words remained unspoken.

For the second time that evening the dining-room door opened. A girl with dark hair and eyes was standing on the threshold, staring at us curiously, holding a candle that softened the austerity of her plain black dress. In the half light there was a slender grace about her that made her seem vaguely

(Continued on Page 97)

MANY WOMEN ask "How can I cook with an oil? I know Wesson Oil is good—I use it in salad dressings. But how can I cook with a liquid? I have always used a hard shortening." Cooking with Wesson Oil is not a new way to cook that you must learn. Cook just as you always cook.

Use your own favorite recipes. Every recipe is a recipe for cooking with Wesson Oil.

Wesson Oil is liquid, of course—and you may be in the habit of using a hard fat. That doesn't make any difference, except the difference you will find in the delicious, wholesome result.

In frying, for instance, you melt any hard fat to an oil long before it is hot enough to fry in. With Wesson Oil you start with an oil, pour it into your frying pan or kettle, and heat it. The only difference is that Wesson Oil is good-to-eat, and you might not care to eat melted hard fat.

When you enrich vegetables, make gravies or home-made candies, what happens to your hard fat? It melts at once—if you haven't melted it first yourself. With Wesson Oil you start with an oil. If you have been in the habit of using butter, add a little salt. Wesson Oil is pure fat—unsalted.

When it comes to shortening, it seems as if there would be the greatest difference between an oil and a hard shortening. There isn't any difference. Many experienced cooks melt hard shortening first. Many of your own recipes tell you to melt hard shortening. Even if you didn't melt hard shortening, it wouldn't mix with flour or sugar if it didn't soften somewhat in the process of mixing. And the first heat of cooking would melt it anyway, wouldn't it?

Use Wesson Oil in your own favorite recipes exactly as you would any other shortening. If your recipe calls for butter use a quarter less Wesson Oil and add salt—because Wesson Oil is all pure fat and unsalted.

Keeps gums firm and healthy

YOUR gums deserve care—and they rarely get it. Dentists know that—that's why they have welcomed Ipana Tooth Paste.

For Ipana is a tooth paste which acts as a stimulant for the gums and cleans the teeth as well.

It contains Ziratol, a healing agent, well-known to dentists, over 2000 of whom have told us that they recommend Ipana to make firm and healthy gum tissue.

But Ipana also does everything that a pure tooth paste can do—and its smooth, snappy and delightful flavor is something you will think of as a treat.

IPANA TOOTH PASTE

Your druggist has it in generous tubes at 50 cents. A sample, enough for a week, may be had for ten cents from Bristol-Myers Co. New York City

The Unspeakable Gentleman
(Continued from Page 96)

unreal, as incongruous as some portrait from a house across the water. I imagined her on the last canvas of the gallery, bearing all the traits of the family line.

Evidently a similar thought was running through my father's mind. "Ah, mademoiselle," he said swiftly in the French tongue, "stay where you are a moment. For as you stand there in the shadows you epitomize the whole house of Blanzky, its grace, its pride, its beauty."

She tried to suppress a smile but only half succeeded.

"A chair for the lady, my son," my father continued blandly. "I trust you have had everything possible done for your comfort?"

She favored me with an inquiring glance and turned back to my father. "I was unable to see you on the ship, captain," she said, "and I wanted to have a word with you at the first opportunity—alone."

"THIS," said my father, "is delightfully unexpected. But I forget myself. This is my son, Henry Shelton. May I present him to Mademoiselle de Blanzky?"

"I suppose you may as well," she replied, holding a hand toward me indifferently. "Let us trust he has your good qualities, monsieur, and none of your bad ones. But I wanted to speak to you alone."

"My son is discretion itself," said my father. "Pray let him stay. I feel sure our discussion will not only interest but instruct him."

Mademoiselle frowned and tapped an angry foot on the floor. "You heard what I said, sir. Send him out," she demanded.

"Stay where you are, Henry," said my father gently as I started for the door. "I have something further to say to you before you leave this house. Pray forgive me, mademoiselle, but I had much rather he remained."

Mademoiselle glanced at me again with an appeal in her eyes which I read and understood. "Mademoiselle," I said, "it is a pleasure to render you even so small a service." I turned to my father and met his glance squarely. "I cannot see any profit to either of us for me to remain longer," I observed, "either here or in this house," and I turned to the door.

"Brutus," called my father, "stand by the door. Now, sir, if you leave this room before I am ready my servant shall retain you by force. Mademoiselle will pardon this domestic scene."

I LOOKED to see Brutus' great bulk grinning at me from the doorway. I saw my father half smiling and fingering the lace at his throat. I saw mademoiselle watching me, partly frightened, but partly curious, as though she had witnessed similar occurrences. Then my pent-up anger or something more than anger got the better of me. Mr. Lawton's pistol still lay on the table. Before my father could divine my intention I had seized it and held it pointed at Brutus' head. "Sir," I said, "I am not used to being threatened by servants. Order him to one side."

My father looked at me almost admiringly. "I had thought we were through with pistols for the evening," he remarked, "and mademoiselle must be fatigued. So put it down, Henry, and let us continue the interview."

"Certainly," I replied; "as soon as you call off your servant I shall wish you a very good evening. Stand where you are, Brutus."

"Come, come," said my father, "it is growing late, my son. Put down the pistol."

"Brutus," I called, "if you move again, backwards or forwards, I'll fire," and I backed towards the wall.

"Good," said my father. "Henry, you have an amount of courage and foresight which I scarcely expected, even in a son of mine." He was leaning slightly forward.

"One instant, father," I said quickly; "if you come a step nearer, I warn you, I shall fire on your servant. Pray believe I am serious."

"My son," he cried in mock alarm, "you distress me. Never be serious. Life has too many disappointments for that."

"Have you reloaded your snuffbox?" I asked him.

"Not that," he said, shaking his head; "but I know a hundred ways to disarm a man. I could have killed you half a dozen times since you have been holding that weapon."

"Admitted," I answered, "but I hardly think you will go to such lengths."

He made a sudden move toward me. "Do you realize your weapon is unprimed?"

"Shall I try it?"

I asked.

"Excellent!" said my father. "You impress me. I have underrated your possibilities, Henry. However, the play is over." He leaned towards the table abruptly and extinguished both the candles. The glow of the embers in the fireplace could not relieve the darkness of the shuttered room.

"Now," he continued, "mademoiselle is standing beside me, and Brutus is between you and me and approaching you. I think it would be safer if you put the pistol down. One's aim is uncertain in the dark. Tell him to put down the pistol, mademoiselle."

HER voice answered from the darkness in front of me. "On the contrary," she said lightly, "pray continue. I have not the heart to stop it, nor the courage to interfere in a family quarrel."

"Quite as one would expect from mademoiselle," his voice replied, "but fortunately my son also has not forgotten his manners. Henry, have you set down the pistol?"

I tossed it on the floor.

"Unfortunately," I said, "I have no woman to hide behind."

My father's voice answered without a tremor: "A woman is often useful, though generally when you least expect it. The candles, Brutus." He rubbed his finger nails on his sleeve and glanced about him with a pleasure he seemed quite unable to conceal. "Brutus, pick up the pistol. You wished to have a word with me, mademoiselle? I am listening. No, no, my son. You will be interested, I am sure. The door, Brutus."

But it was mademoiselle who laid a hand on my arm. "You have been kind," she said softly. Then, fixing her eyes on my father, she continued: "I am not in the least afraid of you, Captain Shelton. We have had to employ too many men like you not to know your type. Your son, I think, must take after his mother. I fear he thinks I am a damsel in distress. But you, captain, know better, though for the moment you seem to have forgotten that you are in the pay of my family. You had contracted to get certain papers from France which were in danger of being seized by the authorities. I accompanied you because —"

"Because you did not care to share the fate reserved for the papers?" my father suggested politely.

FOR a moment she was silent, staring at my father almost incredulously. Then: "I have only one more request to make of you before I leave this house to-morrow morning," she resumed.

He shrugged his shoulders. "I do not think that mademoiselle will leave the house at that date," he said. "The house is already watched by persons in the pay of the French Government."

For the first time her self-confidence left her. She turned pale, even to her red lips, stretched out a hand blindly and grasped the table. "And the paper?" she whispered. "You have destroyed it?"

My father shook his head.

(Continued on Page 98)

The PROPER TREATMENT
for FLOORS, WOODWORK
and FURNITURE.

FREE-This Book on Home Beautifying

S. C. JOHNSON & SON,
The Wood Finishing Authorities
RACINE, WIS. U.S.A.

THIS book contains practical suggestions on how to make your home artistic, cheery and inviting. Explains how you can easily and economically refinish and keep furniture, woodwork, floors and linoleum in perfect condition. Use coupon below.

JOHNSON'S
Paste - Liquid - Powdered
PREPARED WAX

Johnson's Prepared Wax comes in three convenient forms—Paste Wax for polishing all floors and linoleum. Liquid Wax, the dust-proof polish for furniture, pianos, woodwork and automobiles. Powdered Wax for dancing floors.

$3.85 Floor Polishing Outfit for $3.00

With this outfit you can easily keep your floors and linoleum like new. The brush will last for years and save many times its cost. The outfit includes:—

1 Weighted Johnson's Floor Polishing Brush	$3.00
1 Pint of Johnson's Prepared Wax (Paste or Liquid)	.85
	$3.85

This special offer is good through dealers—or send $3.00 direct to us and we will forward, all charges prepaid. (Send $3.50 if beyond the Ohio or Missouri.)

S. C. JOHNSON & SON, Dept. LH2, RACINE, WIS.
(Canadian Factory, Brantford)

Please send me free and postpaid your Home Beautifying Book "The Proper Treatment for Floors, Woodwork and Furniture."

Best Paint Dealer is _____

My Name _____

My Address _____

City & State _____

"At three o'clock we have A DATE"

"CHILDREN get hungry in mid-afternoon, and that is the time when some sweets too often get in their bad work. But we have solved the problem in our household. At three o'clock we have A DATE.

"The Arab youngsters, you know, have about the finest teeth in the world. The date is meat and sweet and medicine for them, all combined.

"So we have a plate of DROMEDARY DATES on the table at every meal, and in mid-afternoon and at bed-time we treat ourselves to another little package of good health. We have a date."

Wealthy Americans returning from the Orient have introduced the date to society.

And now in homes of distinction you will find a silver dish of DROMEDARY DATES.

America is learning the lesson that Nature began teaching men and women thousands of years ago—that good health, good complexion, good teeth, and a good night's sleep are all helped by the luscious date.

SEND for the free DROMEDARY BOOKLET "One Hundred Delights." It tells how DROMEDARY COCOANUT, DROMEDARY TAPIOCA and DROMEDARY DATES can bring to the commonest dishes a touch of tropical elegance. Address Department 16.

THE HILLS BROTHERS COMPANY, 375 WASHINGTON ST., NEW YORK
NEW YORK . . . LONDON . . . RUSSORAH . . . SAN JUAN . . . SMYRNA . . . PARÁ
THE OLDEST AND THE LARGEST BUSINESS OF ITS KIND IN THE WORLD

Dromedary Dates

DROMEDARY PRODUCTS
Tapioca that is ready in an instant; COCOANUT that keeps fresh to the last shred; GOLDEN DATES from the Garden of Eden.

The Unspeakable Gentleman

(Continued from Page 97)

"Then," gasped mademoiselle, "give it to me now—at once, captain, if you please."
"Mademoiselle no longer trusts me?" asked my father in tones of pained surprise. "Surely not that."

"Exactly that," she flung back at him. He bowed smilingly in acknowledgment. "And mademoiselle is right," he agreed. "I have read the paper. I have been tempted. The document I carry has too much value. The actual signatures of the gentlemen who had been so deluded as to believe they could restore a king to France—figure for yourself, my lady. Those names, properly used, are a veritable gold mine."

"And you mean," mademoiselle cried, "you are dog enough to use those names? You mean you are going back on your word either to destroy that list or to place it in the proper hands? Surely, monsieur, a gentleman who has behaved as gallantly as you—No, captain, I cannot believe it."

"Mademoiselle," he said blandly, "still has much to learn of the world. Take myself, for instance. I am a gentleman only by birth and breeding. Otherwise, pray believe I am quite unspeakable, quite. Only one thing has ever remained evident and well-defined for long, and that, my lady, is money. Nearly everything else seems to tarnish, but still money keeps its luster. I believe, mademoiselle, in profiting by the mistakes of others. I believe in profiting by this one. Someone should be glad to pay a pretty price for it."

"You couldn't! Oh, you couldn't!" she began. "Think what you are doing. I—we all trusted you. We ——" Her voice choked in a sob, and she sank into a chair, her face buried in her hands.

MY FATHER looked at her and took a pinch of snuff. "Indeed," he said, "I am almost sorry, but it is the game, mademoiselle. A while ago I was a pawn, paid by your family. But I am approaching the king row now. Forgive me, if things seem different, and rest assured, mademoiselle, that you at least are in safe hands as long as you obey my directions."

I took a step toward him, and he looked up as though to receive my congratulations. "So you leave us, my son," he said briskly. "I fear —"

"You are mistaken," I said. "I am not leaving." I bowed to mademoiselle, who had started at the sound of my voice and was staring at me with a tear-stained face. "I am going to stay until you have disposed of this paper as mademoiselle desires. Or if you are unwilling to do so I shall take pleasure in doing it myself. And now, sir, the paper, if you please."

"What!" exclaimed my father with a gesture of astonishment. "You, too, want the paper? How popular it is becoming!"

"At least I am going to try to get it," I said gravely, and advanced another step.

A sudden change in his expression stopped me. "Wait," he said coldly. "Look before you leap, my son. Allow me to make the situation perfectly clear before you attempt anything foolish. Even if I were alone I doubt if you could take the paper from me. But you forget another." He pointed to Brutus in the doorway.

Brutus grinned back and nodded violently.

"I saw Brutus only last month kill three stronger men than you, my son. I fancy the document is safe in my pocket, quite safe." He half smiled and indulged in another pinch of snuff. "But let us indulge in the impossible," he continued. "Suppose you did get the paper. Let us examine the paper itself." And slowly he drew it from his pocket and flicked it flat in the candle light. "In France to-day anything may happen. In a few scant months dukes have turned into pastry cooks and barbers' boys into generals. To-morrow it may be a republic or a monarchy that governs. Just now it is Napoleon Bonaparte, a very determined little man. I sometimes wonder, mademoiselle," he continued thoughtfully, "if your friends realized the task before them when they attempted to kill Napoleon. Ah, now you grow interested, my son? Yes, that is what this paper signifies. Written on this paper are the signatures of fifty men, signatures to an oath to kill Napoleon Bonaparte and to restore a king to France."

"But why," I demanded, "didn't they burn the paper?"

"Ah," SAID my father with an indulgent smile, "there you have hit the root of the whole matter. It was the old marquis' idea. If everyone in the plot signed the oath it would be a dangerous thing indeed for anyone to inform on the rest, because they would immediately produce the paper which showed him as guilty as they. Now that the plot has failed, the existence of this paper is all that keeps many a man from telling a valuable and dangerous little story. In these signatures I read the names of men above suspicion, men high in the present government. Somehow Napoleon's police have learned of the existence of this paper. It has become almost vital for Napoleon to obtain it. He has tried to get it already. Since it reposed in the strong box at the château of Blanzay it has cost him five men. It has cost me new halyards and rigging for the Eclipse, and Brutus a disfigured countenance. And the game is just beginning, my son. Mr. Lawton is a very reckless man in the pay of France. He will get that paper if he can. Even now his men are watching the house. Suppose you held the paper in your hands, my son; you still have Mr. Lawton." He folded the paper and replaced it in his pocket. "It is safer here at present," said my father.

"In other words, you intend to sell the people who intrusted you with the paper to the highest bidder?" I inquired.

He glanced towards mademoiselle and back to me again and smiled brightly. "That," he admitted pleasantly, "is one way of looking at it, though it might be viewed from more congenial angles. Listen, my son, and you, too, mademoiselle: I have been many things, tried many things in this life, most of them discreditable. I have lost my friends. I have lost my position. Sneer at me, my son; laugh at me, curse me if you wish. But above all things watch me and remember the things I do. Recall my ethics and my logic. They are to be your legacy, my son. What money I may leave you is doubtless tainted. But the things I do—of course you perceive their value."

"Only in a negative sense," I replied.

"Precisely," he agreed. "Their value, as you say, is purely negative. You have only to place them before you and do exactly opposite. It is the best way I can think of for you to become a decent and self-respecting man. And now you have the only reason why I permit you in my society. The lesson has already started—an original lesson, is it not?"

As though to close the interview he sprang up lightly and bowed. "Mademoiselle," he said, "even the pain of distressing

(Continued on Page 101)

Thirst knows no season

The Coca-Cola Company
Atlanta, Ga.

VOLLRATH WARE

-a Household Labor-saver

THINK how much easier it is to do housework today than a generation ago. Progress in invention and industry has brought the electric iron, the vacuum sweeper, the washing machine and many other labor-saving devices into the home.

Every progressive housekeeper is imbued with the idea of labor-saving. And Vollrath Ware is thoroughly in keeping with this modern trend.

Vollrath Ware is remarkably easy to keep clean. Its very appearance invites cleanliness. Its smooth, white, glistening surface can be washed as easily and thoroughly as a china dish. It has no grooves, seams or crevices; no projecting rivet heads, no lodging places for particles of food. All handles and attachments are gas-welded and smoothly coated with enamel of the very highest grade.

Vollrath Ware is therefore the clean, sanitary ware. You will take pride in owning Vollrath Ware, and each piece will be an acquisition to your labor-saving equipment.

Vollrath Ware is sold at hardware and department stores throughout the United States. Ask for it by name.

The Vollrath Co., Sheboygan, Wis.

Every article of genuine Vollrath Ware bears this blue oval label.

The Unspeakable Gentleman

(Continued from Page 98)

you is lessened by the unexpected pleasure of your company to-night. I hope you have found the hour not entirely unprofitable. It has sometimes seemed to me, my lady—pardon the possible effrontery of suggesting it—that you may have seen something romantic, something heroic in me from time to time. I trust you have been disillusioned to-night. The fight on the stairs, the open boat—you see them all as they should be, do you not, the necessary parts of a piece of villainy? Pray forget them—and good night, mademoiselle.

The next moment both he and I started. Mademoiselle was laughing. "Captain," she cried, "you are absurd. You of all people—you cannot sell the paper."

He sighed with apparent relief. "And why not?" he asked.

"Because," said mademoiselle, "you are one of those who signed it."

"Mademoiselle forgets that her name and mine were written at the bottom of the list. It is a precaution I always take with such little matters. The first thing I did, mademoiselle, was to cut both off with my razor. Brutus, light the stairs for the lady."

WITHOUT another glance at either of us she left the room as proudly as she had entered it.

My father sank back heavily in his chair. For a minute we were silent.

Suddenly a speech of his ran through my memory. "May I ask you a question?" I inquired.

"It is my regret if I have not been clear," he said.

"It is not that," I assured him, "but you have appeared to allow yourself a single virtue." He raised his eyebrows. "You have admitted," I persisted, "that circumstances force you to keep your word."

"That," my father said, "is merely a necessity, not a virtue."

"Possibly," I agreed. "Yet in your conversation with Mr. Lawton you stated that you had given your word not to surrender this paper. My question is—how can you reconcile this with your present intention?"

For almost the only time I can remember, my father seemed puzzled for an answer. "Circumstances alter even principles," he answered finally, "and this is one of the circumstances. Brutus, show my son to his bedroom and bring me my cloak and pistols."

Brutus lifted one of the candlesticks and grinned at me.

"A very good night to you, Henry," said my father tranquilly.

I bowed to him with courtesy which perhaps was intuitive. "Be sure," I told him, "to keep your door locked, father."

"Pray do not worry," he replied. "I have thought out each phase of my visit here too long for anything untoward to happen. A very good night to you, Henry. And, Henry—"

I spun about on my heel—"I am going to pay you a compliment. Pray do not be overcome. I have decided to consider you in my plans, my son, as a possible disturbing factor. Brutus, you will take his pistols from his saddlebags." In silence Brutus conducted me into the cold hall, up the winding staircase and through the arched molding that marked the entrance to the upper hall. At his direction I went ahead and opened a door. As I paused on the threshold he slipped past me, set the candle on a stand and bent over my saddlebags. Still chuckling to himself, he dropped my pistols into his shirt bosom.

Then his grin died away. His low forehead became creased and puckered. He drew a deep breath. "Mister Henry"—he began.

"Well," I said.

"Something happen. Very bad here. You go home." His sudden change of manner and the shadowy, musty silence around me threatened to shake my coolness. Unconsciously my hand dropped to the hilt of my traveling sword. I looked across at him through the shadows.

"You go home," said Brutus.

"Something will happen or something has happened?" I asked.

But Brutus only shook his head stupidly.

"Very bad. You go home," he persisted.

"You go to the deuce," I said, "and shut the door; the draft is blowing the candle."

He pulled it to without another word, and I could hear him fumbling with the lock.

For the last ten years I doubt if anything had been changed in that room except for the addition of three blankets which Brutus had evidently laid some hours before on the mildewed mattress of the carved four-post bed. The charred wood of a fire that had been lighted when the room was new still lay over the green, clotted andirons. The strange, musty odor of unused houses hung heavy in the air.

I sat quietly for a while on the edge of my bed, alert for some sound outside. Then my hand fell again on the hilt of my traveling sword. Slowly I drew the blade and tested its perfect balance; then I knotted it over my hand, tossed a blanket over me and blew out the light.

From where I lay I could see the running lights of the Shelton ships swaying in a freshening breeze, three together in port for the first time in ten years. I could hear the low murmur of the wind twisting through the branches of our elms, and once, below, I heard my father's step, quick and decisive, his voice raised to give an order, and the closing of a door.

As I lay staring ahead of me my thoughts returned to the room I had quitted. I heard her voice and felt her hand drop from my arm. Then, in a strange, even cadence a sentence of my father's began running through my memory: "It might be interesting, hilarious, in fact, if it were not for the lady in the case."

IV

SOMETHING was pressing on my shoulder. Half awake, I wrenched myself free, snatching for my sword as I did so. It was a chill cloudy morning, and Brutus was standing by my bed, holding a bowl of chocolate between a thumb and forefinger that made the piece of china look as delicately fragile as a flower.

"Eleven o'clock," he said. "You sleep late."

I looked at him blankly, still trying to shake off the drowsiness that crowded upon me. It seemed only a few minutes back that he had lighted me to that room.

He thrust the bowl he was holding nearer to me. "Last night you kill me. Now I give you chocolate. He! He!"

I glanced at him over the edge of the chocolate bowl. It was the first time I had heard anyone laugh at so truly Christian a doctrine.

"Monsieur sends compliments," he said.

"Brutus," came my father's voice across the hall, "tell him I will see him as soon as he has finished dressing."

When I crossed to his room a few minutes later he was sitting before the fire, wrapped in a dressing gown of Chinese silk, embroidered with flowers. By the tongs and shovel lay a pair of riding boots, still so wet and mud-spattered that he must have pulled them off within the hour. A decanter was near him on a stand. On his knee was a volume of Rabelais. Brutus was busy gathering up the gray-satin small clothes of the previous day which had been tossed in a heap on the floor, and I perceived that they also bore the marks of travel.

He greeted me with a gay wave of the hand and a nod of invitation towards the decanter.

(Continued on Page 103)

Today and Yesterday

Artificiality as the key note of woman's beauty is past. No longer do the powdered wig, the enamelled skin and the beauty patch find favor. The charm of today's girl lies in her natural beauty and simplicity.

Stop, then, the use of harsh cosmetics,—save the hours spent in rubbing or kneading the delicate skin of the face,—throw on Resinol Soap the whole responsibility of giving you a naturally lovely complexion.

A week's trial will doubtless convince you that there is no safer, surer way to retain the skin's youthful softness and radiance:—

Because,—Resinol Soap gently soothes the skin while cleansing it,—because it frees the pores of waste,—because it stimulates the skin to renewed activity, and restores the natural glow of health.

Begin today to use Resinol Soap and have a skin that needs no artificial aids to enhance its beauty.

All druggists and toilet goods dealers sell this delightful toilet soap. Trial size cake gladly sent on request. Dept. I-C, Resinol, Baltimore, Md.

Resinol Soap

You'll Like These

The recipes below show how easily DEL MONTE Fruits lend themselves to the improvement of any meal.

A Delicious Dessert

PINEAPPLE PUDDING: Heat 1 cup of milk with the sirup from one No. 2½ can of DEL MONTE Sliced Pineapple. Mix 1 cup sugar, ½ cup cornstarch, ½ teaspoon salt with ½ cup water and add to the milk. Cook until thick. Add 1 teaspoon butter, juice of half a lemon, and half of the canned pineapple cut in cubes. Fold in the beaten whites of 1 egg, and mold. When firm turn from the mold and garnish with the other half can of pineapple and whipped cream. This dish serves 8 persons.

A Dainty Salad

PEAR AND PRUNE SALAD: Place halves of DEL MONTE Canned Pears on lettuce leaves. Fill centers with cottage cheese balls. Place halves of pitted prunes (or dates) around the cheese, add mayonnaise and sprinkle with paprika before serving. (Note—DEL MONTE Dri-Pak Prunes are especially suited to this purpose. Being dry-cooked and packed solid in cans without sirup, they are delicious, just as they are, for stuffing with nuts, in salads, etc.)

A Breakfast Dish

with a new appeal

APRICOTS WITH SCRAMBLED EGGS: Beat 5 eggs slightly, add ½ cup of the sirup from DEL MONTE Canned Apricots, 1 teaspoon of salt, and ½ teaspoon of pepper, and pour into a hot frying pan in which 1 tablespoon of fat has been melted. Cook over low fire, stirring constantly until mixture is creamy. Pour over toast and put two halves of apricot on each serving.

Another Dessert Delicacy made in a jiffy

DE LUXE PEACH TRIFLE: Place halves of DEL MONTE Peaches on slices of cake. Pour over a sauce made by thickening 1 cup of the peach sirup with 2 teaspoons cornstarch, and flavoring it with 1 tablespoon sugar, 2 teaspoons lemon juice, ¼ teaspoon cinnamon and a few grains of salt. Garnish with whipped cream and a cherry.

Tempting, healthful winter dishes ~ Easy to make ~ economical to serve

Of course, you know how delicious DEL MONTE Fruits are—and how very convenient—just as they come from the can.

And now, with the reduced prices on last year's pack, which make them most economical, thrifty housewives are using DEL MONTE Fruits more freely than ever before to add that special summer touch so essential to winter menus.

For the wide variety and ever-ready goodness of DEL MONTE Fruits make them ideal for quick, sure-to-please service at breakfast, luncheon or dinner, all the year round.

But more important even than their convenience is the almost limitless number of simple, inexpensive and truly palate-tempting ways in which you can use DEL MONTE Fruits to put new variety and charm into every-day meals.

This Book Shows How

Send for a free copy

The recipes on this page give just a hint of their endless possibilities. Try them. And then, for more than 500 others, just as practical and appealing—just as wholesome and inexpensive—write us for a copy of our 64-page book, "DEL MONTE RECIPES OF FLAVOR." It will help you and it is free.

Address Department A
CALIFORNIA PACKING CORPORATION
San Francisco, California

The Unspeakable Gentleman

(Continued from Page 101)

My refusal served only to increase his courteous good nature. "A very good morning to you, my son," he said and waved me to a chair in a slow, sweeping gesture, timed and directed so that it ended again at the decanter. "You will pardon my addressing you through Brutus," he continued, "but it is a habit of mine which I find it hard to break. I never speak to anyone of a morning till I have finished my cup of chocolate. I have seen too many quarrels flare up over an empty stomach." He stretched a foot nearer the blaze and sipped from his tumbler in silence until it was half empty.

"You wanted to see me?" I asked.

"Yes, I wished to see you, Henry, for two reasons. First, I find I do not know the name of the gentleman with whom you had the falling out. If you tell me—who knows?—perhaps we may have something in common, some little mutual interest."

"The man I fought with was Mr. Lawton—at my uncle's country house," I told him.

For a fraction of a second I thought he was astonished, that the look he gave me was almost one of respect. "And you wounded him?" he asked quickly.

"I hardly think Mr. Lawton expected it."

"I fear," he mused, "that the years are telling on Mr. Lawton."

"You had another reason for seeing me?"

"YES; a simple one. I did not want you to go downstairs till I went with you. I have a surprise in store for you. Who do you think has come to see me?"

"I am utterly at a loss," I said, bowing, "unless it is the constable."

"On the contrary, it is the man I hate more than anyone else in the world." His tone was one of pleased anticipation.

He hummed a little tune as Brutus knelt before him to help him on with a new pair of top boots, spotless and shining. A few minutes later he stood before his mirror critically examining a coat of blue broadcloth.

As he spoke I leaned over the chair he had quitted. Lying in the corner of the faded upholstery was an oval of gold. Before he perceived my intention I had picked it up, and almost at the same moment his hand fell on my arm.

"How careless of me to have left it there," my father said gently. "Hand me the locket, if you please, my son, and thanks for picking it up."

The jeweled clasp was under my thumb. I pressed it and the locket flew open, but before I could look he had struck a sharp blow at my wrist, and the locket fell from my hand. "Pick it up, Brutus," he said, his eyes never leaving mine. "Come," he said, "let us go down stairs. We are late already."

So I followed him down the creaking stairs to the morning room. I could not suppress a start as I passed over the threshold. In front of the heavy mahogany table, attentively examining some charts, was my Uncle Jason.

THEY made a strange contrast, my uncle and my father in his gay coat and laces, his slender, upright figure and his face almost youthful beneath his powdered hair. For my uncle was an older man, and years and care had slightly bowed him. The wrinkles were deep about his mouth and eyes. His brown hair, simply dressed, was gray already at the temples. His plain black coat and knee breeches were wrinkled from travel. Yet his cheeks glowed from quiet living, and there was a sly, good-humored twinkle in his brown eyes which went well with his broad shoulders and his strongly knit body. His reputation for genial good nature was with him still.

He stretched forth a hand, but my father had given his undivided attention to the shutters on the east windows, drawing them to and snapping the bolt of each pair into place. Then he turned and rubbed his hands together slowly, examining my uncle the while with a cool, judicial glance. "You are growing old, Jason," he said.

"Ah, George," said my uncle in his deep, pleasant voice, "it does me good to see the father and the son together."

My father joined the tips of his fingers and regarded him solemnly. "Now heaven be praised for that!" he exclaimed with a jovial fervor. "It was kind of you not to keep my son and me apart."

THE words seemed to make a doubtful impression on my uncle. He looked quickly across at me. "Ah, that wit!" he laughed. "It quite reminds me of the old days—with the dances and the races and the ladies. Ah, George, if I only had the receipt that keeps you young!"

"Indeed? You care to know it?" My father quite suddenly leaned forward and tapped him on the shoulder. My uncle drew hastily back. And still my father watched him. Between them was passing something which I did not understand. "Lead a life of disrepute," my father said gravely. "I cannot think of a better cosmetic."

"George!" cried my uncle. "Remember your son is with you."

"And seems amply able to look out for himself; surprisingly able, Jason. Have you not found it so?"

"Thank heaven, yes!" he laughed, and glanced at me again. "He is like you, George, and yet"—he paused to favor me with another glance—"he has his mother's eyes."

My father flicked a speck of dust from his sleeve. "Suppose," he suggested softly, "that we leave your sister out of the discussion. Let us come down to practical matters, and leave the dead alone."

It was the first time he had mentioned my mother. His voice was coldly aloof, but his hand was moving restlessly over his coat, smoothing an imaginary wrinkle. "You understand me?" he inquired after a second's pause. "Pray remember, Jason, I have only two cheeks, and I can recall no Biblical law to follow if you should strike again."

"Heaven bless me!" gasped my uncle in blank amazement. "I did not come here to quarrel. I came because you are in trouble, because you need my help."

"I thought you would come," was my father's response. "In fact, I depended upon it before I set sail from France."

MY UNCLE'S heavy brows knitted together and his mouth moved uneasily. "It is no time for light talk, George," he said ominously. "You cannot know that the house is watched."

"I know," replied my father, "that since my arrival here I have been the object of many flattering attentions. But why are you concerned, Jason? I have broken no law of the land. I have merely mixed myself up in French politics."

Uncle Jason made an impatient gesture. "You have mixed yourself up in such an important affair, in such a way, that every secret agent that France has in this country will be in this town in the next twelve hours."

My father tapped his silver snuffbox gently. "I had hoped as much," he remarked blandly.

"When one is the center of interest it is always better to be the very center."

"Come, George," urged my uncle, "surely you recognize that you have reached the end of your rope. I tell you, George, these men will stop at nothing."

"Has it ever occurred to you," returned my father, "that I also may stop at nothing?"

My uncle frowned, and then smiled bleakly.

"No, George," he said, "you are too fond of

(Continued on Page 104)

HEBE made these delicious sweet muffins

$\frac{1}{4}$ cup butter
 $\frac{1}{2}$ cup syrup or honey
1 egg, beaten
 $\frac{1}{4}$ cup HEBE diluted with 1 tablespoonful water

2 cups flour
3 teaspoons baking powder
 $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoon salt

Mix butter and syrup or honey together and add beaten egg. Sift flour, baking powder and salt together and add to first mixture alternately with diluted HEBE. Place 2 raisins or a date on top of each muffin and bake in greased and floured gem pans about 25 minutes, in a moderate oven. This makes 12 muffins.

This and many other recipes and suggestions for delicious dishes at little cost are contained in the HEBE recipe booklet. You will be delighted to learn that HEBE can be used in almost everything you cook or bake. Use it as a cooking liquid—it moistens, shortens and enriches. Use it constantly and you will notice a decided improvement in your cooking—finer flavor, better results. HEBE never fails.

HEBE is made of pure skimmed milk evaporated to double strength enriched with vegetable fat. It helps to balance the diet and adds food value to your cooking.

HEBE is sold by grocers everywhere. Order several cans and keep it handy for all your cooking. The HEBE recipe booklet is sent free. Write to 2201 Consumers Bldg., Chicago.

THE HEBE COMPANY

Chicago

New York

Seattle

You can make all these with HEBE

Soup Purees

White Sauce for Vegetables, Meats, Fish, Eggs

Escalloped Dishes

Salad Dressings

Biscuits, Hot Breads, Cakes

Pies and Puddings

This is the Somerlet Pattern

REMEMBER when you were a youngster, how the best china was always kept, glistening and bright, in the china closet under lock and key? "Best china" in those days, was mostly to look at and to use on very special occasions.

But how different now! With Syracuse China you have all the charm of that fragile china of years ago—plus the true beauty of real usefulness. This is no china to repose tremblingly in a locked closet, but lovely, exquisite china to grace every meal—from the cozy, fireside breakfast to the formal evening dinner.

You will appreciate Syracuse China. It has the lasting worth of which heirlooms are made. It resists the chipping and nicking which soon disfigures china that is not so well-made.

Choose your pattern carefully—for it will last a long, long time. And because of the great popularity of Syracuse China, we would advise you to place your order early, as it is sometimes impossible to meet all demands immediately.

ONONDAGA POTTERY COMPANY
SYRACUSE, NEW YORK

SYRACUSE CHINA

The Unspeakable Gentleman

(Continued from Page 103)

life for that. Suppose—just suppose—that they had the means of taking you back to France, that there was a boat in the harbor now, manned and victualled and waiting for the tide, with a cabin ready—and irons. They would admire to see you back in Paris, George. I know; they have told me."

"Surely," said my father, stifling a yawn behind his hand, "you can be more interesting."

Jason's face, red and good-natured always, became a trifle redder.

"WE HAVE beat about the bush long enough," he said with an abrupt lack of suavity. "You are running against forces too strong for you, forces that will do anything to gain possession of a certain paper. They know you have that paper, George, and they will prevent your disposing of it at any cost. They will stop at nothing"—again his voice dropped to a confidential monotone—"and that is why I'm here."

My father raised his eyebrows. "I fear my mind works slowly in the early morning. Pardon me, but—why are you here?"

Quite suddenly my uncle's patience gave way. "Because I can save your neck. I have interceded for you, George. I have come here to induce you to give up that paper peacefully and quietly or else to take the consequences."

My father nodded. "You mean," he inquired, "that they propose to take me to France and have me handed over to justice, a political prisoner?"

"It is what I meant, George; as a man in a plot to kill Napoleon." Then his former kindness returned. "And we cannot let that happen, can we?"

"Not if we can prevent it," my father replied. "If the trouble is that I have the paper in my possession, I suppose I must let it go."

Uncle Jason smiled his benignant smile. "I knew you would understand," he said, with something I took for a sigh of relief.

My father drew the paper from his breast pocket. "Yes," he said slowly. "I suppose I must let it go."

"Good heaven! What are you doing?" cried my uncle. My father had turned to the fireplace and was holding the paper over the blaze.

BUT for some reason my uncle was not relieved. His face became a blotched red and white; his eyes grew round and staring and his mouth fell helplessly open. "Stop!" he gasped. "For heaven's sake, George!"

"Stay where you are, Jason," said my father. "I should have burned it long ago." He withdrew the paper slightly.

If my uncle had been on the verge of ruin he could not have looked more depressed. "Don't!" he cried. "Listen, George; I'll be glad to pay you for it."

My father slowly straightened, placed the paper in his pocket and bowed. "Now," he said pleasantly, "we are talking a language I understand."

Uncle Jason moistened his lips. "How much do you want for it?" he asked with a slight tremor in his voice.

"Twenty-five thousand dollars seems a fair demand," said my father; "in notes, if you please."

"What!" my uncle shouted.

My father seated himself on the edge of the table and surveyed his visitor intently. "Be silent," he said, "and very careful, Jason. I am a dangerous man." And he flicked an imaginary bit of dust from his cuff.

My uncle gave a hasty glance at the half-open door.

"And now listen to me," my father continued, his voice still gently conversational. "You have tried to frighten me, Jason. You should have known better. I know you must have that paper, and I know why. The price I offer is a moderate one compared with the unpleasantness that may occur to you if you do not get it. I know that you have come here prepared to pay that price. You have the money in your inside pocket. Bring it out and count it—twenty-five thousand dollars."

Hesitatingly my uncle produced a packet that crackled pleasantly and held it out. "And now the paper," he said.

My father, examining the packet with minute care, waved his request aside. "First you must let me see what you are giving me. Twenty-five thousand dollars! It seems to me I remember that a similar sum once passed between us. In which direction? I seem to have forgotten. Yes, strangely enough, they are quite correct. A modest little fortune, but still something to fall back on."

"And now the paper," my uncle repeated.

"AH, TO be sure, the paper," said my father, and he swung from the table where he had been sitting and smiled brightly. "I have changed my mind about the paper. Jason, and business presses. I fear it is time to end our interview."

"You mean you dare —"

"To accept a sum from you in payment of damage you have done my character? I should not dare to refuse it. Or let us put it this way, Jason: The paper is merely drawing interest. Positively, I cannot afford to give it up."

The red had risen again to my uncle's face. For a moment I thought he was going to leap at the slighter man before him.

But my father never moved a muscle, only stood attentively watching him, with his hands clasped behind his back. "Show him the door, Brutus," he said briskly. "And as you go, Jason, remember this: I have ordered my servant to keep a fire burning in every room I occupy in this house. I make a point of sitting near these fires. If you or any of your friends so much as raise a finger against me the paper is burned. And as for you"—with a quick, delicate motion he raised a hand and drew a finger lightly across his throat. "I wish you a very good morning."

But Uncle Jason had recovered from the first cold shock of his surprise. He drew himself up to his full height. His jaw, heavy and cumbersome always, thrust itself forward, his fingers worked convulsively and his breath whistled through his teeth. "You fool!" he shouted. "You cursed, unregenerate fool!"

AND then, for an instant, my father's icy placidity left him. His lips leapt back from his teeth.

There was a hissing whir of steel. His small sword made an arc of light through the yard of space that parted them. His body lunged forward. "So you will have it, will you? Take it, then," he roared.

It was, I say, the matter of an instant. In a leaden second he stood poised, his wrist drawn back, while the eyes of the other stared in horror at the long, thin blade. And then my father's watchful indolence returned and slowly, very slowly, he lowered the point to the floor's scarred surface.

"Your pardon, Jason," he said pleasantly with an icy little smile. "I fear I have been too much myself this morning. Thank your God, if you have one, that I was not entirely natural. Take him away, Brutus; he shall live a little longer."

But Brutus had no need to obey the order. My father stood, still smiling, watching the empty doorway. Then I realized that I was cold and weak, and I walked unsteadily to the table and leaned upon it heavily.

Thoughtfully my father sheathed his sword. "The morning begins auspiciously, does it not, my son?" he said. "And still the day is young. Indeed, it cannot be more than eleven of the clock."

(Continued in the March Home Journal)

It Took a Volcano and an Artist To Make the Engagement Ring

THE PROCESSES carried on by Nature in the ancient volcanoes at Kimberly, and the skill of the men at the cutting bench and the polishing wheel at Amsterdam, made the diamond and gave it its wonderful charm.

Grape-Nuts, that delicious and nourishing ready-to-eat cereal, was made by the sunshine and shower of summer days, and by the skilled processing which brought the grain elements to food perfection in our modern factories.

From seed to maturity, the crops of wheat and barley took from Nature's chemistry of soil and sun the elements needed to build and sustain the human body—but something else was required.

Then came the malting of the barley, the milling, the careful blending of the proportions of whole flours, the seasoning and the long, slow baking—all in factory rooms as clean and spotless as the sunshine itself.

Grape-Nuts, served with cream or milk, is completely nourishing. It contains the vital mineral elements, including the phosphates for the brain, which Nature stores under the outer coat of the grain.

The grain starches are reduced by the long baking processes to dextrin and maltose, giving to Grape-Nuts an unusual ease of digestibility, and a unique, natural sweetness.

Grape-Nuts has a crispness and richness of flavor which delight the taste, whether served as a breakfast or lunch-time cereal, or made into a delicious pudding for dinner.

All good grocers everywhere sell Grape-Nuts, and Grape-Nuts is served wherever good food is served.

"There's a Reason" for Grape-Nuts

Made by Postum Cereal Company, Inc., Battle Creek, Michigan

—once more HOOSIER leads the world in the development of a later and greater Kitchen Cabinet.

HOOSIER

Saves Steps

The NEW HOOSIER is Tailor-made to Fit Your Height

Practically every important improvement that has been made in Kitchen Cabinets has been introduced first in the Hoosier. Some of these improvements are now considered standard Kitchen Cabinet equipment. Others, however, are confined to us by our patent rights, and can be secured only in the Hoosier. These exclusive Hoosier features are so extremely important that the Hoosier has always been America's foremost Kitchen Convenience.

But Now Comes the Most Important Development of All

Heretofore, Kitchen Cabinets have all been made one standard height. This was all right for some women, but for many the table top was either too high or too low. Now you can get a Hoosier that is exactly as high or as low as you need it. No matter how tall or how short you may be, your New Hoosier exactly fits you.

In a word, the tailor-made height of the New Hoosier is the final reason why you need a Hoosier more today than ever.

The reason the Hoosier is preferred by more women than any other cabinet is because of its superiority as a whole.

Be sure to ask your Hoosier dealer for a demonstration. He has a Hoosier to fit your needs. Prices of Hoosier Porcelain Tables and Cabinets range from $11.50 to $92.50 f. o. b. factory.

THE HOOSIER MANUFACTURING COMPANY

MAIN OFFICE: 222 Jackson Street, Newcastle, Indiana

BRANCHES: Mezzanine Floor, Pacific Bldg., San Francisco; 368 Portage Ave., Winnipeg, Man., Canada

Her Kitchen Doors

By M. H. CARTER

Placing the vestibule door at right angles to the kitchen door heads off the direct drive of wind and snow into the room.

A kitchen vestibule built into the angle of the "L" leaves wall space for three sunny windows in the kitchen.

NO DOOR can be made completely air-tight in the fitting; it has to have room in which to swing—and an ordinary sized kitchen door will have some seventeen feet of crack around it through which the wind will poke icy fingers at you all winter if that door opens directly outdoors with no protection; more wind than you'd ever dream could get around a door until you have to work beside it. I know from experience. I once had a window taken out and the door beside it changed to one half glass to provide light. It was summertime when that bright idea was put into effect, and I thought how clever I was at killing two birds with one stone, getting a window and a door in one piece. When November arrived I sang a different tune. That half glass door stood in the path of the prevailing winter wind, and it prevailed so effectually in the kitchen and made the glass so icy, that the storm door had to be kept closed for the better part of six months. But for that protection we should have had to abandon the kitchen to the cold and take our stove and coffee pot to the dining room for the winter. The moral is that without some protection for it a half glass door should never be put into a kitchen that is used in winter, not even when the door has a southern exposure and lets in a flood of sunlight through the day. At night that glass becomes a cold radiator, and there is no convenient way of putting a storm sash on a door as there is for putting one on a window. As for the double-glassed door—two panes being set about half an inch apart with an air space for insulation—in my experience, it is a snare and a delusion. A kitchen is a steamy room, and little by little that warm moisture creeps in between the panes, and there it stays. At the end of a few months the inside of the glass will be completely fogged, and impossible to clean without removing all the fittings. But every woman wants to see who comes knocking at her kitchen door—it's human nature and a wise precaution. A thick, substantial door with a single pane let in serves the purpose and is the best all-round door to use.

Storm door or none, every outside kitchen door needs at least a rain shelter over it, if only because the paint lasts so much longer. Also, the outside doormat is not perpetually soppy. Also, you can open the door when it rains without having to mop up afterwards. But to my way of thinking, the best protection for the kitchen door in an all-year house—and the cheapest in the end—is the vestibule, or entry, either built in or built on; but built in whenever the house plan allows it and space can be spared.

There is, for instance, the recessed type of vestibule, surrounded on three sides by the house interior, which means that the floor space for it has to be cut off from the contiguous rooms, making them all smaller and leaving unsightly jogs. It's all very well for a mansion, but what about a small house? Against the loss of floor space, however, must be set the advantage of retaining a dignified, unbroken wall line.

You enter this kitchen in a millionaire's home through a recessed vestibule at ground level.

Now to my eye, anything that looks like a fortuitous excrescence spoils the outside of a house. I'd sacrifice floor space for dignity and fine lines outside every time. I would go the length of a recessed vestibule if there were no other way to get a sheltered kitchen door where I needed one. But before embracing either of these desperate extremes I'd examine the possibilities of another little scheme: the semi-recessed entry. Simple as A B C and practical for almost any house. You slice off about five feet from the outside end of the kitchen and put up a lath-and-plaster wall. Then cut the slice in half with another lath-and-plaster wall; add two windows and four doors, and there you are—pantry in one corner, entry in the other with the necessary doors and a window apiece! Placing the entry door at right angles to the kitchen door heads off the direct drive of wind and storm into the kitchen when both doors are open at once—a point to bear in mind though frequently overlooked in building. Kitchen and pantry doors should both be hung on the same "hand" of the jamb, otherwise they will crash.

The pantry-entry plan for disposing of three important kitchen doors and protecting the outside door.

According to this plan of construction the pantry door in the kitchen is made to do double duty as closet-and-passageway door combined, which eliminates one of the necessary doors and leaves two—the irreducible minimum in every kitchen; while the placing of both doors on the same wall releases the maximum of profitable wall space—enough to do something with in the way of sink and dressers, which no kitchen can ever have when all four walls are chopped up into small sections by doors. Remember, the wall space given to windows is still useful for a sink and worktable, but the space given to doors is gone for good.

The way par excellence to protect the door in a wing kitchen is to build out an entry or vestibule into the angle where the wing joins the main body of the house, as shown in the picture of the old house on Martha's Vineyard. A vestibule of this kind in this position has no appearance of being an excrescence, because it is not dwarfed by the walls beside it. At the same time it protects a considerable area of the house wall and keeps the corner room warmer and drier. Also, this vestibule is relatively inexpensive to build because it needs only two walls of its own, the house wall forming the third.

Every phase of baby's bath is carefully demonstrated to the Little Mothers—the time, the temperature of room and water, the articles necessary and how to handle the baby

Send for a set of our Wool Soap Toy Blocks—20 to the set, round-cornered, 1 1/4 inches square, attractively embossed. The children will love them as a plaything of delightful and instructive amusement. Send 5 Wool Soap wrappers, together with 25c in stamps or cash

A Fleecy Lather

How "Little Mothers' Leagues" are learning better care for babies

The necessity of Cleanliness and how to bathe the baby are among the first lessons

ALL the "mothers" are not grown up. Some of them are only little girls. But they are taking loving, intelligent care of the babies in their homes and communities.

For they belong to the Little Mothers' Leagues, organized to enable girls who have to help with the care of younger brothers and sisters to do so more intelligently; and to prepare them, in some measure, for the future work of motherhood.

Little Mothers' Leagues, usually sponsored by a Board of Health or Education, may be connected with public or parochial schools, settlement or private enterprise.

Membership is for girls from 12 to 14 years old. Regular meetings are held and a course of study in baby care is taught by a nurse. A certificate of membership, club emblem and diploma stimulate interest in many clubs.

What the Little Mothers learn

In this way the Little Mothers gain a simple and practical understanding of those things necessary to a healthy home life for little children. They learn about the normal development of a baby; the value of sleep, fresh air, clean milk and cleanliness.

One of the very first lessons is on the necessity of keeping the baby clean. The nurse demonstrates the bath, using a large doll or frequently a Little Mother's tiny brother or sister.

Every possible phase, both of tub and sponge baths, is considered—the time, the temperature of room and water, the articles necessary, how to handle the baby.

Emphasis is placed upon the extreme tenderness of baby's skin and the delicate care it must have. Only the purest, mildest soap should be used. Strong soaps frequently cause an irritation that develops into serious skin trouble. Wool Soap is carefully made to fulfill the requirements for baby's use. It is so mild and bland that with its easy cleansing power it soothes and refreshes.

The fats used in Wool Soap are of such high quality they could be used in cooking. This is the reason it keeps the skin so soft and smooth and preserves its fresh beauty.

Its use is economical, too; it lasts well—a quality mothers will appreciate in a soap for babies and children.

Wool Soap has been in use for toilet and bath in American homes for more than 25 years. Its purity, its dependable quality have made it the preferred soap for children.

A trial cake for baby

We have a trial cake of Wool Soap, baby bath size, which we will send to Little Mothers—and big—for 2c in stamps. Fill out the coupon below. Swift & Company, U. S. A.

4284

Swift & Company, Chicago

Enclosed find 2c in stamps for which please send me a trial size cake of Wool Soap.

Name _____

Address _____

For toilet and bath

A floating white soap

For Children's Skins

Table talks

By Mrs. Knox

If you're tired of the same old things

SOMEONE remarked to me at the tea table that she was tired of canned fruits and did not know how to give them an original touch. I was sure I could help her, and together we went through my booklet, "Dainty Desserts."

"Why, Mrs. Knox," she exclaimed, "I never knew there were so many different desserts in the world. I had no idea you could combine canned fruits with Knox Sparkling Gelatine in so many unusual ways—not only in desserts but in salads as well! I'm going to try this Cherry Sponge Dessert for dinner."

I learned afterwards that she and her family were so pleased with it that I am publishing the recipe here.

CHERRY SPONGE

$\frac{1}{2}$ envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine
 $\frac{1}{2}$ cup cold water $\frac{1}{2}$ cups canned cherries
1 tablespoonful lemon juice $\frac{1}{2}$ cup sugar
1 cup canned cherry juice Whites of 2 eggs

Soak gelatine in cold water five minutes and dissolve in hot cherry juice. Add cherries, stoned and cut in halves, sugar and lemon juice. When mixture begins to set, add whites of eggs, beaten until stiff. Turn into mold, first dipped in cold water, and chill. Garnish with whipped cream, sweetened, and flavored with vanilla, and chopped cherries. Other canned, "put up" or dried fruits may be substituted for the cherries.

Send for my Recipe Book containing over a hundred Desserts and Salads

You'll never get tired of the "same old thing" with a copy of my booklet, "Dainty Desserts." Send for it. It is FREE. Just enclose four cents in stamps to cover postage and mention your grocer's name. Address

KNOX

SPARKLING GELATINE

113 Knox Avenue Johnstown, N. Y.

"Wherever a recipe calls for gelatine, think of KNOX."

Plain Sparkling Gelatine for general use

Contains Lemon Flavor in Separate Envelope

Come Into the Kitchen

By MAE SAVELL CROY

Marvelous aids to housekeeping: From left to right, an electric range with clock attachment; a steam-pressure cooker; hinged drain board for the sink, with garbage chute beneath it; and an electric dishwasher.

THE kitchen at last has come into its own, and the woman who wishes to do something more worth while with her time than devote all of it to the drudgery of old-fashioned housework at last is being given the opportunity. This plan of the service portion of the house, designed with a view to saving labor for mistress or for making the work attractive for a maid of high intelligence, shows not only the kitchen plan but also the laundry and pantry, although when floor space is limited the laundry must be placed in the cellar.

The range, always the central feature of any kitchen, used in this household is an electric range; and because the ovens are built on the fireless-cooker principle, the cost of using it compares very favorably indeed with the cost of using coal for cooking, when electricity is dispensed at the rate of ten cents a kilowatt hour and coal sells for twelve dollars a ton.

The cook may be a hundred miles from the scene of action if she has but taken the precaution to wind the alarm and set it for the hour she wishes her food to start cooking, and pulled out the knife switch so that the current will be turned on when the alarm rings, and not before.

It is not necessary to watch the food as it cooks, not even necessary to baste a roast, inasmuch as the ovens are built on the fireless-cooker principle and are self-basting.

The steam-pressure cooker used in connection with the electric range speeds the cooking process. It is made of solid aluminum, which is not heavy to lift, and cooks the food under five to twenty pounds steam pressure. String beans and other foods requiring fifty to sixty minutes to cook over an ordinary flame will be thoroughly cooked in ten to twelve minutes when the pressure cooker is used. It can be used with equally satisfactory results with a gas flame, wood, oil or vapor.

Dishwashing Machines

DURING the last three years the electric dishwasher has been brought to a perfected state, and even the hand dishwasher constitutes a saving in time and labor to a more limited extent. With the use of this piece of machinery dishes which require from forty-five minutes to an hour in the washing can be washed and put away in five to ten minutes' time, and there is no soaking of the hands in hot, dirty, greasy dishwater and no washing of dirty dishcloths afterwards.

The dishwasher may be either connected with the plumbing or placed on legs and casters and the machine rolled to the dining room for the dishes. The first method is usually preferable.

The dumb-waiter rises to fit into the niche reserved for it on the second and third floors, and down into the cellar. Speaking tubes to each of the three floors mentioned are put in at slight cost when a house is being built, and the combination of dumb-waiter and speaking tubes will save many weary climbs to the upstairs. The dumb-waiter should be from a foot and a half to two feet square—exclusive of shaft.

The ice box is placed against the outer wall and an extra door allowed for the ice box itself, and also a door in the wall just a trifle larger than the ice-box door, which opens outward. With this arrangement the iceman can place the ice through the wall opening into the ice box, and there is never the necessity of his muddy tracks being left on the porch and pantry floors. In this house, however, an electric ice machine was installed; so the iceman is a minus quantity, but the outside wall opening serves a good purpose in permitting cold air to enter during the winter months when it is not necessary to keep the machinery running for the purpose of keeping food cold.

The electric ice box is leaving the luxury class and entering the class of necessities. When electricity costs ten cents a kilowatt hour and the cost of ice is seventy cents a hundred pounds, the electrical charge for operating the machine just about offsets the cost of ice.

In such a laundry as the one shown here wash day loses all its horrors. One can do a big washing with the use of the electric washer and ironer and yet never roll up dainty cuffs. It pays for itself in a year's time in the average family in almost any locality, regardless of the charge a day for labor. Where the charge is three dollars and a half a day, these devices will effect a saving of more than a thousand dollars in five years, interest added. There is so little labor attached to their operation that no woman can afford to be without them.

The laundry is arranged in the natural order in which steps would be taken in doing the work. The gas stove in this laundry is located next to the washer in order that there may be involved no extra steps in taking boiled clothes from the washer and tubs, and there is a faucet outlet from the boiler which connects by a hose to the drain, and the troublesome task of emptying a boiler is eliminated.

The clothes are hung on pulley lines from the casement windows, while on rainy days the overhead clothes dryer suspended from the porch ceiling will take the place of the pulley lines and the clothes brought from the laundry on the wheel tray may get the benefit of the fresh-air drying and yet be protected from the rain.

The electric ironer stands ready at all times to do its share toward making the household happier, and on it can be ironed at least three-quarters of the average weekly wash, including most pieces of underwear, and, for the skillful user, it will even iron shirts satisfactorily. A high stool affords relief, and a whole day's ironing could be accomplished with little strain, were it necessary to devote a whole day to the work, which, however, has never been heard of in an average family. The ironing machine, you know, does four hours' ironing in one hour's time.

The cost of operating a motor for either washer or ironer will not exceed two cents an hour at a ten-cent rate.

A Light for the Oven

FLOOR covering and walls are of great import, both with a view to lessening labor and for actual comfort and pleasure. Rubber cork, nonabsorbent, is ideal for the kitchen and pantry floors, but a good grade of linoleum will give years and years of wear if properly cared for, and if laid over a felt lining will be as soft to the feet as cork. The walls here are of smooth plaster which, painted with enamel paint, is easily washed and the color scheme is easily changed.

A light should be placed where it will illuminate the oven, and this is usually possible with the center ceiling inverted light. Unobtrusive wall outlets will not be at all unsightly.

The type which plugs in and pulls out easily should be used instead of the screw type, which is forbidden by law in public buildings in many states as being unsafe.

In planning for comfort and convenience, beauty was not forgotten. The color scheme is apple green and the woodwork natural finish. The linoleum is a mixture of light green and light tan, and the pretty green is most refreshing on warm days, while there is enough warmth in the woodwork to prevent a chilly appearance on cold days. The flower box in the window is filled with geraniums, since geraniums will thrive even with a northern exposure.

This floor plan, complete even to the flower boxes at the windows, shows excellent arrangements of kitchen, pantry, laundry and porch, drawn to scale, and planned for the greatest convenience.

McCallum
Silk Hosiery

Mary M. Kinnon

"You just know she wears them"

McCallum Nos. 105-113-122-199 in Black; and Nos. 152-153-199 in Colors, are accepted, by merchant and customer alike, as the standard of silk hosiery value.

McCALLUM HOSIERY COMPANY, Northampton, Mass.

The "friendly flavor-full fruit"

OF ALL the fruits you can name, apricots are the "friendliest"—they mix so well with anything. Especially is this true of Sunsweet Dried Apricots. For their tart, tangy flavor puts a keen, "relishy" sensation into any dish.

What could be more alluring than this Apricot Puff? More airy or enticing than this Apricot Charlotte Russe? More open and inviting than this Apricot Tart? And even in dishes where this accomplished fruit-food does not play the major role it offers the major flavor—for example:

Is rice pudding becoming trite at your table? Then try a combination of rice and Sunsweet Dried Apricots. Try apricot juice sometime to "pep up" a fresh fruit cocktail. Or, add cooked apricots to a compote of fruit or a fruit salad and notice the flavor-difference.

Nor should you overlook this more-than-flavor feature: Sunsweet Dried Apricots are "friendly" not only in the kitchen but in the stomach, too. For they supply a natural, tart fruit-acid that the main dinner course must have before it can become a really "happy mixture."

Would you like to know other "friendly" flavor-full dishes you can make with Sunsweet Dried Apricots—the aristocrat of fruit-foods? Then send for our new Recipe Packet—"Sunsweet Surprises for 1922." It is just that—and it's free! California Prune and Apricot Growers Inc., 290 Market St., San Jose, California • 11,000 grower-members.

SUNSWEEET
CALIFORNIA'S NATURE-FLAVORED
Dried APRICOTS

Sunsweet
Apricot Puffs

One egg, 2 tablespoons sugar, 1 cup sifted flour, 1 teaspoon baking powder, $\frac{1}{2}$ cup milk, $\frac{1}{2}$ cup melted shortening, 1 teaspoon vanilla, 2 cups cooked Sunsweet [Dried] Apricots rubbed through a coarse sieve. Beat egg, add sugar; sift flour and baking powder; add alternately with milk; add shortening and vanilla. Pour into buttered custard cups filling half full. Set in a steamer over boiling water, cover closely; steam about thirty minutes. Heat apricot sauce and pour over unmoulded puffs.

Sunsweet
Charlotte Russe

Line four sherbet glasses with narrow three inch pieces of sponge cake and cooked, drained Sunsweet [Dried] Apricots. Whip 1 cup cream, add $\frac{1}{2}$ cup apricot pulp (fruit rubbed through a coarse sieve), $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon pineapple flavoring. Pile in center of glass and serve cold.

Sunsweet
Apricot Tart California

Drain and press cooked Sunsweet [Dried] Apricots through a coarse sieve, having $1\frac{1}{2}$ cups of Apricot pulp. Pour into baked pastry shell; cover top with cooked apricots, cut side up. Place a blanched almond in center of each apricot to simulate a pit. Melt any clear amber jelly and pour over the top to glaze. Jelly may be made of $\frac{1}{2}$ cup of hot apricot juice to which has been added 1 teaspoon gelatine soaked in 1 tablespoon cold water. Cool somewhat before pouring over the fruit and set aside to become firm.

What Science Has Done for the Housewife

By MARY D. WARREN

many purposes a valuable substitute for the more costly butter. No intelligent woman should permit herself to condemn the article when she does not know even the process of its manufacture.

Oleomargarine is made of refined beef fat churned with fresh milk or cream to the consistency of butter. The milk imparts the flavor of butter to the fat.

The processes of making oleomargarine are all conducted under perfectly sanitary conditions, over which the United States Government stands guardian. We have been brought up to like our butter yellow, and the pale, cream-tinted margarine does not appeal to us; but because of a tax we may buy white margarine at a far lower figure than if it were tinted ever so slightly with harmless carotene.

The Truth About Storage

WHAT I have said on the subject of oleomargarine holds true also of nut margarine, which is manufactured from a combination of coconut and peanut oil churned with pure milk. The finished product is white, but sweet in flavor, and may be colored.

Of substitutes for lard there are several excellent ones on the market, all of vegetable origin. Corn oil, cottonseed oil, coconut oil and peanut oil are used, and these oils may very well be used in salad dressings also.

Another prejudice is that against storage eggs—or any cold-storage product in fact. Modern science has so perfected the process of refrigeration that it is possible to keep for months eggs, fruit, vegetables or other articles of food in exactly the same condition as they were when placed in storage.

It may sound like an exaggeration to say that storage eggs are better than fresh ones in December and January; but my experience in using the storage product convinces me of that fact. Storage eggs are almost invariably eggs produced in April, the best month in the year for poultry, when hens have plenty of green feed and are in the open.

That one may be assured of never receiving a very old egg, government laws regulate the length of time they may remain in storage. April eggs must be removed by the following January. Poultry and other products also have a fixed time for removal.

Sometimes a storage egg will taste rather musty and unpleasant, I grant, but this is not the fault of cold storage, but because of carelessness on the part of the farmer or packer. Unless eggs, which are very sensitive to flavors and odors, are packed in dry, sweet hay or straw they will become permeated with a musty flavor. If a broken egg is permitted to remain in the packing the same result will be noticed.

Another excellent plan for preserving food products is freezing. Poultry, fish and meats of all kinds are being submitted to this treatment.

As an experiment, fish have been kept for twenty-seven months in a frozen condition, and when cooked have been found as fine as though freshly caught. From three to four months is the usual time for keeping them, however. Naturally, when frozen fish have thawed they are as perishable as when fresh, and should therefore be as quickly cooked and served. They should be placed in a covered pan in the refrigerator and allowed to thaw gradually. Never soak them in either cold or warm water. In buying these frozen foods, see that they are actually frozen, glazed with ice and stiff.

Look for name stamped in both ends of tin.

ESTABLISHED 1855

PLUM PUDDING

A Food-Confection

that has graced American tables for three generations.

It contains generous quantities of wholesome fruits—raisins, currants and citron peel—with cane sugar, beef suet, pure spices and other approved ingredients.

As wholesome as good bread and butter, and seasonable not only for holidays but for all other occasions when appetite calls.

Simply heat and serve. Makes every dinner a banquet.

OTHER PRODUCTS

BONED CHICKEN
Potted Ham
Potted Chicken
French Process Prunes
(in glass jars)

At your Grocer's in 1, 2, 3 and 4 pound tins

RICHARDSON & ROBBINS
DOVER DELAWARE

A Trial Bottle Of the Most Wonderful Flavoring Extract

TO prove to the good women of this great land that Virginia Dare Extracts are a revelation in food flavoring, I will send a trial bottle prepaid for 10c to pay for postage and packing. There is enough in this bottle to flavor 6 cakes or desserts. It will prove that the natural flavors of fruits, flowers, herbs and spices are contained in all their original freshness and purity in

VIRGINIA DARE
Double-Strength
EXTRACTS

It will prove that half the quantity of a Virginia Dare Extract will give a better, richer flavor. It will prove that Virginia Dare Extracts will not cook out in hot desserts or freeze out in iced foods. It will prove to you the difference between natural and artificial flavoring.

With this trial bottle I will send, FREE, my book "Flavoring Secrets" which will open up so many new ideas in dessert-making that even the expert will be amazed.

This is not a catch-penny offer but a real opportunity to learn something invaluable about improvement of old desserts and the creation of new desserts that are nothing short of wonderful.

Virginia Dare
Garrett & Company, Inc.
10 Bush Terminal, Brooklyn, N. Y.

D-2
Enclosed find 10c for which please send me a trial bottle of your wonderful Virginia Dare 150% Strength Vanilla or Virginia Dare DOUBLE-STRENGTH Lemon (state which), together with your book, "Flavoring Secrets."

Name _____
Address _____ State _____
Grocer's Name _____
Address _____

French Ragouts and Stews

By MARIE JACQUES

COLETTE, one of the editors of that illustrated magazine, writes and tells me that they don't make good stews in America. Why, I can't say. Perhaps they don't know how. Perhaps because they cook with such hot fires, and don't watch the cooking carefully.

"I had to learn the ways of a gas stove once," said Colette in the voice of one who states that she has had a really thrilling experience. "Oh, what misery I had with it! It burnt all—all! But in the end I brought it to reason, and I made it cook quite well, even stews that need such a slow heat. Figure to yourself, I made buy a big sheet of thin tin, just the size of the top of that stove. I put on the sheet of tin. I lighted one burner near the middle. All the tin heated itself, just as the top of my stove does—red-hot near the burner and cooler at the sides, just as the top of a stove is. I only had to pretend that there was a good little fire underneath instead of a gas, and then I was quite happy."

"I will tell them. Now go on and tell them how to make some of your very best and most tender stews and ragouts."

RAGOUT OF CHICKEN LIVERS. Chicken livers are the nicest, but you may also use those of rabbits or ducks if you like. Take out the gall bag, but leave the livers whole. Throw them into hot water, bring them up to the boil, count a hundred and then drain off the water. Pour into the pan a half glass of lemon juice, with enough light stock to cover the livers; add pepper, salt, a good bunch of parsley and a head of garlic. Boil all for a quarter of an hour. Take out the livers. Arrange them on a hot dish. Skim the gravy carefully. Smooth a half teaspoonful of good corn flour in a few drops of cold water. Boil up the gravy again, add the corn flour and stir till the sauce is well thickened. Pour it over the livers, and decorate the dish with snippets of toast. This is a nice luncheon or breakfast dish.

RAGOUT OF MUSHROOMS. Peel one pound of mushrooms and put them into a stewpan with two tablespoonfuls of butter, one tablespoonful of vinegar, one tablespoonful of chopped parsley, pepper, salt and a good pinch of grated nutmeg. Stew gently for a quarter of an hour. Strain the sauce. Put the mushrooms on a hot dish. Reheat the sauce and thicken it with one teaspoonful of corn flour, as directed above. There is no need to put any stock with this ragout, as the mushrooms give off a good deal of juice. This is either a breakfast dish or a lunch entrée.

RAGOUT OF CABBAGE. Take the heart of a nice firm cabbage. Put it into boiling salt and water and cook it fast for a half hour. Then put it into cold water till it is cool enough to handle. Squeeze it well to get out as much water as possible and cut away the stalk. Chop the rest of the cabbage roughly. Melt two tablespoonfuls of good beef dripping in a stewpan, toss the cabbage in it till well greased and then sprinkle in two tablespoonfuls of flour, stirring well all the time. Add one and a half cupfuls of good brown gravy, stir up well, cover the pan and let it simmer very gently till the cabbage is quite tender. Season with pepper, salt and grated nutmeg. Serve very hot indeed. This may be either a vegetable or a supper dish.

RAGOUT OF LITTLE ROOTS. Take three each of carrots, parsnips and turnips. Peel them and cut them into neat little cubes or sticks. Melt three tablespoonfuls of dripping in a stewpan and toss the vegetables in it till they are well greased. Take them out again. Stir one and a half tablespoonfuls of flour into what remains of the dripping and, when it is smooth, add gradually one and a half cupfuls of hot gravy to make a good thick sauce. Return the vegetables to the pan, cover it and simmer till they are quite tender. Add pepper and salt to taste and one level teaspoonful of powdered sugar. Toss the vegetables well, so that the seasoning may be evenly distributed. Serve them in a hot dish and sprinkle them with chopped parsley.

If you wish to make a ragout maigre use potato water instead of gravy and add a drop of browning to color it.

RAGOUT OF POTATOES AND TINNED MEAT. We had this often during the war. Colette thought it one of the nicest ways of serving "box beef," as she called the corned beef which came through to us now and then from America.

Melt in a stewpan two tablespoonfuls of the best fat you have. Slice two onions into it and let them fry till they are lightly colored. Stir in one tablespoonful of flour and one pint of hot vegetable water or meat stock. Add pepper and salt. When the sauce has thickened, put in two pounds of potatoes, peeled and cut into moderate-sized pieces. Cover the pan and simmer very gently indeed, shaking the pan now and then, till the potatoes are almost cooked. Then cut one pound of corned beef or other pressed meat into little squares, add it and simmer again till the potatoes are quite done. Turn all into a deep dish and serve very hot. This makes a good family dinner, one that is inexpensive and easy to prepare, and needs only a dessert and coffee to finish it.

"Have you told them what slow simmering is?" asked anxious old Colette.

"No, but I'll tell them now. When a thing is simmering slowly, the liquid in the pan must just move and bubble a very little, ever so gently, and probably at one part of the pan only. But the solids in the pan, the meat and vegetables, must not move at all. If they dance about, the cooking is going much too fast and the pan must be moved to a cooler place. If there is no motion at all the cooking is not going on and the pan must be put a trifle nearer the central heat of the stove. Always simmer with the lid on, because the lid keeps in the steam, and it is the action of the steam almost as much as that of the hot liquid which cooks the meat and vegetables."

BEEF EN MIROTO. This is a stew of cold beef, or of cold mutton, lamb, veal or pork. Melt two tablespoonfuls of dripping in a pan. Slice into it four onions and let them cook very gently till they are tender and golden. Take care that they do not burn. Add one heaped tablespoonful of flour and stir the pan over the fire till the flour is a nice golden color also. Then add one teacupful of hot stock, stirring it in well, one teacupful of lemon juice and pepper and salt to taste. Boil fast with the lid off the pan till the onion is quite tender and only a tiny drop of sauce remains, just enough to cover the bottom of the pan. Then put in one pound, or a little more, of cold meat, cut into neat little slices. Stir them into the sauce, which will only just be sufficient to damp them. Cover the pan and stand it at the side of the fire till the meat is heated through. Arrange the slices on a hot dish. Warm a half teacupful of vinegar in a little pan and trickle it over the dish. This is a

Which of 237 Colors Becomes You Most?

Brilliant red or delicate blue, soft tan or rich purple—you can choose the precise shade that is most becoming for your next sweater if you use Minerva Yarns.

Their softness and evenness, their lustre and "loftiness," give charm to whatever you knit or crochet.

The dependable, high quality of Minerva Yarns is brought home to you by the long wear and lasting shapeliness of your sweater.

MINERVA YARNS

Illustrated instructions of the smartest styles in sweaters for women and children, scarfs, dresses, and hats are found in the last edition of the Minerva Knitting Book, Vol. VII. For sale at yarn counters, 15 cents. Sent by mail for 20 cents, postpaid.

Sample Offer Wool Flowers

Fifteen pieces of Minerva Yarns of different colors, with instructions for making the wool flowers now so fashionable, will be sent for 10 cents (stamps or coin). Fill out this coupon.

JAMES LEES & SONS CO. 220 Fifth Ave., New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: I am enclosing 10 cents, which please send me Minerva Yarns and instructions for making flowers.

Name _____
Street _____
City _____
State _____

"If it has a wringer
it isn't a Laun-Dry-Ette"

It dries the wash without a wringer

THIS electric washing machine does everything any other washing machine can do and more—it dries an entire tubful of clothes for the line in one minute. It whirles them dry—no wringer needed.

It doesn't break buttons nor tear them off—doesn't bend hooks and eyes nor injure snap fasteners. It dries big bulky comforts and things you couldn't possibly put through a wringer.

It has made good for six years. Thousands in use. Approved by Good Housekeeping Institute and by the New York Tribune Institute. Finely built, each machine rigidly tested and inspected, yet it costs no more than an ordinary washing machine.

Find out about it. Get a Laun-Dry-Ette demonstration before you buy any machine.

If there is no Laun-Dry-Ette dealer near you take this advertisement to the nearest electrical store or hardware dealer and have one ordered for you—or write us for new literature.

THE LAUNDRYETTE MFG. CO.
1179 EAST 152nd STREET
CLEVELAND, O.

LAUN-DRY-ETTE
electric washing machine
WASHES AND DRIES WITHOUT A WRINGER

delicious way of warming up meat. The meat itself is never allowed to boil; it only stands beside the fire for just long enough to heat it through.

RIBS OF BEEF À LA FLAMANDE. Bone the ribs and beat them well. Roll and tie them in a neat shape. Put the piece of meat into a stewpan with three large slices of fat salt pork or bacon and let the beef fry in the pork fat, turning it constantly till it is lightly colored all over. Then add half a glass of lemon juice, two laurel leaves, a sprig of thyme and seven or eight little onions neatly peeled. Cover the pan and let it simmer gently for three hours. Then add three large carrots, peeled and cut into very thin rounds, and an onion stuck full of cloves. If necessary, add two or three tablespoonfuls of white stock, just to keep the meat from sticking; but the less sauce there is with this the better. Cover the pan and stew very gently for three hours more. Then slice the meat thinly, arrange the slices in a dish, put the vegetables round as a garnish. Add a half cupful of boiling water to the pan and boil it upon a clear fire, scraping the bottom well. Strain the sauce over the meat. If you prefer you may serve the whole joint on the dish and carve it on the table, although it is not done in France. You will find the meat beautifully tender.

BLANQUETTE OF VEAL. Take the remains of a roast of veal and carve it in thin, small slices. In a small stewpan melt two tablespoonfuls of butter and stir in one tablespoonful of flour, taking care not to let the mixture get brown in the very least. Add hot water, stirring carefully all the time, till you have a good thick sauce. Add pepper, salt and a little grated nutmeg. Let the sauce boil for three minutes. Then put in the meat and let it warm gently beside the fire for about fifteen minutes. Just before serving, beat up the yolks of two eggs, stir them into the sauce and return the pan to a hotter part of the fire for a moment till the eggs have time to thicken. Then draw it aside again and stir in enough chopped parsley to make it pretty and about two teaspoonfuls of white vinegar, according to taste. Pour the finished sauce over the slices of meat, which should have been taken out of the pan before the egg was added and arranged on a hot dish.

A blanquette, you will agree, is a dainty way of heating up any cold white meat—veal, pork or rabbit. It should be made rather fast than otherwise. Don't begin it more than about a half hour before the meal or it will lose much of its delicacy.

BREAST OF VEAL À LA POULETTE. Cut a breast of veal into small neat pieces and beat them a little to make them tender. Put two tablespoonfuls of butter or lard in a stewpan. Let the fat melt and then stir in two tablespoonfuls of flour, taking great care that it does not brown. Mix well with water to make a thick sauce. Put in the meat. Add pepper, salt and a grate of nutmeg. Cover the pan and let it stew gently for one hour. At the end of that time add one dozen peeled shallots, cover the pan again and simmer for one and a half hours. Try the onions. If they are cooked take out the meat. Arrange it at the middle of a dish. Arrange the onions round. Add three tablespoonfuls of thick cream to the sauce, stir well and pour all over the dish. This is a good main dish at a lunch party.

FILET OF VEAL IN GRAVY. Choose a thin filet. Beat it well and dust it with flour. Melt three tablespoonfuls of butter in a large flat stewpan and fry the filet in it till it is well colored at both sides. Now pour in a cupful of stock or water. Add pepper, salt, two lumps of sugar and two cloves with one laurel leaf. Cover the pan and put it into an oven hot enough to keep it simmering well. Leave it for an hour and a half. It is a good plan to cook potatoes with this meat, as they take the taste of it and become delicious. Choose smallish ones. Peel them. Put them into the pan at the same time as the meat, making a circle of them round it, and pushing them well down into the sauce.

When the meat is cooked slice it thinly. Serve the potatoes on a separate dish. Put the pan on top of a bright fire, pour in a tea-cupful of water and stir well, so that you may scrape off whatever has stuck to the bottom of the pan. Strain the gravy over the meat before serving.

STEWED LEG OF MUTTON. Melt three tablespoonfuls of good dripping in the stewpan and in it fry the leg of mutton, turning it frequently till it is nicely colored all over. Add one pint of water, pepper, salt, two laurel leaves and a sprig of thyme. Under the leg of mutton in the pan lay a big slice of fat bacon or fat salt pork. Cover the pan and stew gently but not too slowly for five hours. At the same time boil a good pan of haricot beans in plain water; salt in the water turns haricot beans hard. Strain your beans. Add a good handful of salt and toss them thoroughly in it. Make a bed of them on a big dish and pour all the mutton gravy over it. Then slice the mutton thinly and arrange it on top. You can make a bed of mashed potatoes if you like, but the haricots are more really French. They must be boiled till they are all broken and coming out of their skins.

FILET OF MUTTON WITH FRENCH BEANS. Beat the filet well, fry it lightly at both sides in a little dripping, add a big cupful of water, pepper, salt and two laurel leaves. Cover the pan and stew for two hours. Then skim off most of the fat and put in one to one and a half pounds of nice little French beans which have been already boiled for five minutes in salt and water. Let them stew with the mutton till they are tender. Serve them as a border round it. This is an excellent stew, though a simple one. If you have a piece of rather underdone roast mutton you may warm it up in this way, putting in the beans at the start and stewing both together till the beans are cooked. If the gravy is not quite as brown as you would like, add a drop of coloring.

HARICOT DE MOUTON. Take about a dozen big turnips and cut each into four or five neat pieces. Melt three tablespoonfuls of bacon or pork fat in a big stewpan. Now trim the cutlets of a neck of mutton, taking away most of their fat, which can be melted down and used for other things. As a family dish you may also use the lumpy little bones in the worst end of the neck, but these will not do for any smart occasion, nor is the haricot used for big dinners. Its flavor, however, is something to be much admired.

Fry the chops in the fat till they are lightly colored. Take them out. Fry the turnips also. Take them out. Thicken what remains of the fat with two tablespoonfuls of flour, letting it brown nicely. Add pepper and salt to taste and return the chops. Stew them gently for one hour. Put in the turnips, making a sort of groundwork of them all round the edge of the pan, with the meat pushed into the middle. Peel a dozen and a half of smallish potatoes and lay them on the turnips. Don't let them go down into the sauce; they are to be cooked in the steam only. Cover the pan and simmer gently again till the potatoes are tender (about one and a half hours). Stand up the cutlets at the center of the dish and make a border of vegetables round. Pour the sauce over all, and serve at once, extremely hot.

Your mirror can't tell you

THE insidious and disturbing thing about halitosis (unpleasant breath) is the fact that in practically every case the person so afflicted is not personally aware of it.

A woman may be blessed with every feminine charm. She may be beautiful and brilliant and cultured. She may be attractive in every imaginable way to her friends and acquaintances.

Yet this one invisible trouble—and a trouble so common with people everywhere—may, unknown to her, be retarding her popularity. On this one subject her mirror is silent—as are even her most intimate friends.

Most cases of halitosis are temporary and yield quickly to the regular use of Listerine as a mouth wash and gargle. This well known liquid antiseptic possesses deodorizing properties ideally suited to combat halitosis. Listerine arrests fermentation in the mouth and leaves the breath sweet, fresh and clean.

Why be disturbed about whether your breath may or may not be just right when this simple, scientific precaution will so quickly put you at ease? Then you know you will not offend your friends in a matter so delicate that they would naturally not be frank with you.

If you are not familiar with Listerine and its many uses just send us your name and address and fifteen cents and we shall be glad to forward you a generous sample of Listerine together with a tube of Listerine Tooth Paste sufficient for 10 days' brushings.

Address Lambert Pharmaceutical Company, 2156 Locust Street, Saint Louis, Missouri.

For HALITOSIS use
LISTERINE

Be Biased

We know you will be pleased with

FA QUALITY

Bias Fold Tape

The newest member of our famous family of

Notion Package Specialties

It is cut on a perfect bias and is a real pleasure to sew
with.

Today's styles call for Bias Fold Trimming. Use it on your next dress.

Comes in Lawns, Cambrics and Percales. White, Black and Colors—all fast and washable.

Other F-A Quality items on notion counters of all good stores are

Lingerie Braids and Tapes
Shoulder Strapping
Middy Braids and Trimmings for Dresses.

Friedberger-Aaron Mfg. Co.
Philadelphia

Dried Fruits De Luxe

By CAROLINE B. KING

DRIED fruits and some dried vegetables and other products we have had for centuries, but the method of drying or dehydrating has improved so rapidly during the last five years that the modern foods so treated bear no resemblance whatever to those which older people may remember from childhood days. Those prepared by the new methods are totally unlike the withered, juiceless objects which once meant all there was to mean in dried apples, peaches and prunes.

STEWED PRUNES must be discussed, for there is a stigma to be removed from this good dish. Other dried fruits receive the same treatment. They should be first covered with tepid water and allowed to remain for five minutes; this will tend to loosen them and make them easily managed and washed. Pour off the tepid water and wash the prunes through several waters, preferably lukewarm; then cover them with cold water and let them stand for five hours or longer. Less cooking is necessary when the fruit has first been soaked.

Do not pour off the water in which the prunes were soaked, but place them to cook in it, over a rather slow fire, three cupfuls of water to a pound of prunes or other dried fruit being the usual amount required. Simmer gently until the flesh of the fruit ceases to cling to the stone, sweetening to taste during the cooking process. Half an hour will usually suffice for making the prunes tender and delicate.

A bit of orange or lemon peel, added to the prunes while cooking, will lend to them a zest which is irresistible; sometimes a half teaspoonful of orange extract will be pleasant, for it will give them a very distinct and different sort of flavor. Half a glass of some tart jelly will provide another unusual taste to the usual dish of stewed prunes.

PRUNE MARMALADE. Wash and soak the medium-size prunes and cook till tender; then remove the stones and cut the pulp into small pieces. To each pound of prunes allow one orange, cut into minute particles. Add the orange to the prune pulp. Cook very slowly, then stir in sugar in the proportion of one pound to a pound and a half of prunes. Continue to simmer gently until quite thick, then add two or three tablespoonfuls of coarsely chopped nut meats, walnut or pecan being the best, and cook ten minutes longer. Pour into glasses and seal when cold.

SPICED PRUNES. Wash and soak the prunes in just enough water to cover; then put them over the fire in the water in which they were soaked, with half a cupful of cider vinegar; cook gently half an hour. Tie two or three pieces of cinnamon and the same number of cloves in a piece of muslin, and drop into the fruit while it is cooking, and sweeten to taste. Cook until the prunes are quite tender and the juice is less than half the original quantity; serve cool.

APRICOT MERINGUE PIE. Stew the fruit as usual and press it through a sieve, with its juice. Then add sugar to taste and cook ten minutes. Fill pastry-lined pie tins with the fruit and bake. When cool spread with a meringue made by beating the whites of two eggs to a stiff froth with four tablespoonfuls of granulated sugar; then beat again until the mixture will retain its shape; now fold in two more tablespoonfuls of sugar and one-quarter cupful of apricot pulp. Brown delicately in a moderate oven.

APRICOT SOUFFLÉ may be a dried-peach or a prune soufflé as well. Stew half a pound of fruit in just sufficient water to soften well, then press it through a sieve; sweeten it well and add half a boxful of gelatin softened in water to cover. Stir over the fire until the gelatin is well dissolved; then cool almost to the congealing point. Now beat half a pint of cream to a stiff, firm froth and fold into the cooling jelly. Pour into a mold and chill before serving. Turn out and decorate with cherries or marshmallows.

PEACH PATTIES. Small cakes of any variety may be used in their making, or a cup or sponge cake which has become slightly stale. Cut the cake in rounds or squares and hollow each piece deeply. If small cakes are preferred, hollow them in the same way. Cook the peaches as usual and arrange two halves together with raspberry or strawberry jam between them and fit into each cake. Place the patties on serving plates and pour a little of the peach juice over them, sprinkle with powdered sugar and, if desired, a few chopped nut meats.

PRUNES STEWED WITH APRICOTS make a pleasing variety for a breakfast or luncheon dish, and should be cooked gently and sweetened delicately.

STEAMED DRIED-PEACH, PRUNE, APRICOT OR FIG PUDDING. Cream together one tablespoonful of butter with two of sugar; add two eggs well beaten, one cupful of milk, half a teaspoonful of salt, and two and a half cupfuls of flour sifted with one and a half teaspoonfuls of baking powder. Beat well, then stir in a heaping cupful of stewed dried peaches or other fruit, thoroughly drained and cut in small pieces. Turn into a well-greased mold and steam two hours. Serve piping hot with a hard sauce, or with one made of the sirup from the peaches, brought to the boiling point and thickened with a teaspoonful of butter and flour rubbed to a paste.

BAKED DRIED APPLES will become a popular dish in any household where they are once tried. The apples are washed and soaked, then placed in a casserole or covered baking dish in layers, each layer being sprinkled with two tablespoonfuls of sugar and a grating of lemon or orange peel. The dish is filled with water and placed in a moderate oven for several hours. Occasionally a little more sugar is sprinkled over them, and half an hour before they are removed from the oven a tablespoonful of gelatin is dissolved in a little water and stirred gently into the juice. When the apples are cold the juice will congeal; serve with cream.

DRIED-APPLE JOHNNY CAKE. Drain and chop slightly a cupful of stewed dried apples, keeping them as dry as possible. For the cake beat one egg, add to it a pinch of salt, a tablespoonful of sugar, and one and one-quarter cupfuls of milk. Sift together a cupful of corn meal, a cupful of flour, and two teaspoonfuls of baking powder. Combine the mixtures and beat well; then stir in three tablespoonfuls of melted butter or margarine and the apples. Pour into a shallow, greased pan and bake in a moderate oven forty minutes. Serve piping hot.

DATE AND WALNUT DESSERT. Beat two eggs to a foam with one cupful of sugar and one-quarter teaspoonful of salt; when very light and thick, add a tablespoonful of flour, mixed with half a teaspoonful of baking powder, a cupful of finely chopped walnut meats, a cupful of chopped and stoned dates and a teaspoonful of lemon extract. Mix well and pour into greased ramekins; bake from ten to fifteen minutes.

*There Came a Time
When Mrs. Price
Had to Support the Family—*

HENRY PRICE was an aviator. Turning his war-time experience to peace-time profit, he was able, by flying, to make a happy home for his wife and their three-year-old child. Then one day something went wrong with his plane, and he was sent to the hospital badly injured. The family income was cut off—it became necessary for Mrs. Price to take care of the home and pay doctors' bills besides. She did it. By acting locally as our subscription representative she earned generous profits from the very start.

Are You Prepared for Emergencies?

EVEN though your income is adequate for today's needs, you should still have an anchor to windward. You can have. As a subscription representative of The Ladies' Home Journal, The Saturday Evening Post and The Country Gentleman you have an opportunity not only to earn extra money for every hour you have to spare now, but to build up a permanent business that will be a splendid insurance against financial misfortune. You need no experience to begin work; if you have even an hour or two a week to spare, this is an ideal opening for you. The work is easy, pleasant and dignified; the returns are generous and permanent. Begin to insure your future TODAY!

*Earn from $5.00 to $50.00
Extra Every Week*

The Curtis Publishing Company,
431 Independence Square, Philadelphia, Pa.

Gentlemen: I am interested in your plan for insuring my future by building up a permanent spare-time subscription business. Please send details.

Name _____

Street _____

Town _____

State _____

MAIL THIS COUPON TODAY!

FREE 2 Gifts for Baby
Simply Mail the Coupon

What 112 Doctors Told us About caring for a Baby's Skin

By the Head of the Research Laboratories of Bauer & Black

MODERN science has perfected a new and radically different way in infant hygiene.

Its object is to overcome diaper rash and skin irritations, and thus, by relieving discomfort, to make baby's days happier—and mother's days less trying.

It embodies new principles—principles now combined in a remarkable new Bauer & Black requisite—B & B Baby Talc. Note coupon below for liberal test package free.

112 Specialists Helped Us

Many months were spent perfecting this new way. Old-time methods were inadequate.

We consulted famous children's specialists, dermatologists, heads of maternity homes—112 in all. We sought a new way—a scientific way—of combating the irritant acids which obtain in perspiration and in urine.

Extensive laboratory experiments were made. Numerous tests effected under the personal direction of a famous baby specialist. Now we believe we have attained the ideal. And highest authorities agree.

Combats the Cause of Irritation

The pores of the skin constantly exude moisture. It is nature expelling impurities from the body. Upon exposure, this perspiration becomes a semi-acid irritant. So does urine. But more intensely so.

These acids make the skin raw, tender—susceptible to rash. Infection often follows. Hence, you must combat them.

Old-time methods attempted merely to dry the moisture, thus affording but indifferent relief.

B & B Baby Talc combats the irritant body acids—makes them harmless to the skin. It strikes at the cause of irritation. It marks a new era in infant hygiene.

Use it after baby's bath. Sprinkle it on diaper cloths. It is cooling, soothing, gently healing—scientific protection in the charming guise of a soft, white talc.

Try it for two days. Results are quick—and amazing. Note how much smoother baby's skin—how much more restful and happy—for comfortable babies are happy babies.

B & B Baby Soap
"Tempered to the Infant's Skin"

A mother's zeal in keeping her baby sweet and clean, as every doctor knows, frequently finds expression in an unfortunate choice of soap. B & B Baby Soap is made of edible fats. It lathers freely, dries slowly, and rinses off readily. It contains a slight percentage of zinc oxide, hence is mildly healing. Bland and soothing, it provides a safe soap for your baby.

Mail Coupon for Free Samples

We want all mothers to try this new way of making babies happy. So we invite you to mail the coupon for liberal trial package of B & B Baby Talc and B & B Baby Soap, free and postpaid.

BAUER & BLACK
Chicago New York Toronto
Makers of Sterile Surgical Dressings and Allied Products

B&B Baby Talc
B&B Baby Soap

"A Bauer & Black Product"

It is well to consider the maker behind the product you use. For twenty-eight years Bauer & Black have held the esteem of the medical profession; of druggists and the public; and we jealously guard this standing.
Druggists everywhere sell all B & B Products.

MAIL THIS L. H. J. 222

BAUER & BLACK, Chicago, U. S. A.
If you live in Canada, address
Bauer & Black, Canadian Laboratories,
Toronto, Canada.

Please send me a trial package of B & B Baby Talc and B & B Baby Soap—these without charge or obligation on my part.

Name _____
Address _____
City and State _____

Winter Woolens— washed with one-fifth the work!

Satina Makes Ironing Easy!

Starched pieces assume a delightful finish when Satina is added to the boiling starch. The iron ceases to stick, the smooth surface delights the eye, and La France Bouquet, with which the tablet is perfumed, imparts an elusive fragrance that appeals to critical women. We will mail you a free sample on receipt of your grocer's name and address.

Winter brings heavy clothes and heavy washings. Don't strain your back washing clothes the old way. No need to do so now! Just add La France to your regular laundry soap—soak the clothes—rinse—and hang out.

No bluing—La France blues as it cleans. No hard rubbing! No wash-board! Same results by boiling or with washing machines. Millions of women do it this simple way.

Notice the result! Clothes snowy—crisp—sweet. You know what domestic science teachers say about La France: "Four-fifths of the work abolished. Two-thirds of the time saved. No injury to fabrics, however delicate."

What a blessing! Save your back, hands, and temper. Don't strain and struggle through another wash-day! La France is ready to help you. And you never saw such clean clothes.

"Better Laundry with any Soap"

Try La France with your favorite soap. Your grocer probably can supply either tablet or powder. If not, send us your name and we will mail you FREE enough La France for your next washing.

Address LA FRANCE MFG. COMPANY, Philadelphia, Pa.

La France

TABLET AND POWDERED
MAKES WASHING EASY

My Years on the Stage

(Continued from Page 21)

At the time there was still more than a year of my contract with Daly to run. I told Daly at once that I was leaving him at the end of our arrangement. I felt that I was at liberty to go and that there was no moral obligation upon my part to stay with a manager with whom I had been for so many seasons. I felt this because Daly had before this rescinded the agreement that he had with Mrs. Gilbert, Miss Rehan, Lewis and myself. He had given us a share in the profits of the season apart from our salaries. It was a semiproprietary arrangement similar to that enjoyed by the actors at the Comédie Française—that is, the Sociétaires who have all had certain years of service.

Daly wrote us that "in view of certain contingencies" he had decided that it was inexpedient to continue this arrangement. He proposed that we take increased salaries in place of the percentage. A small increase in salary went into effect, but a season or two afterwards, when I asked Daly for more money, he declined to give it to me.

Frohman offered me a salary much larger than Daly ever contemplated giving anyone connected with his theater. Accordingly, I signed my first contract with Frohman. It was for three years; I never had another. We merely went on from year to year.

During our whole professional business associations there was never a difference of any sort. I received a salary and at the end of the season a percentage of the year's receipts.

I never had cause to regret my change in management. Charles Frohman was one of the fairest and squarest men I ever met.

On July 30, 1892, I appeared for the last time under the management of Augustin Daly at Stockwell's Theater in San Francisco. The play was a revival of A Night Off, and I played my customary rôle of Jack Mulberry. On October third of the same year I appeared as a star under the management of Charles Frohman at Palmer's Theater, Broadway and Thirtieth Street. This had been Lester Wallack's Theater, and after Palmer's management was renamed Wallack's.

A Tribute to Daly

THE play selected for my first appearance under the new management was The Masked Ball by Alexandre Bisson and Albert Carre.

This play took its name from the celebrated carnival, Veglione, which is held at Nice during the winter.

The adaptation was made by young Clyde Fitch, whose play, Beau Brummel, had made so great an impression when played by Richard Mansfield.

When I left Daly I assured him that if ever the opportunity arose I should be happy to make public acknowledgment of all that I felt that I owed him. It seemed to me that it was the only decent thing to do—to pay some tribute to the man who had taken so much trouble for so many years. Accordingly, on the first night of The Masked Ball, when I was called before the curtain, I said:

"It is trite and hackneyed, perhaps, to allude to a particular time as the proudest and happiest moment in one's life, but if ever phrase were apt for an occasion, I feel that particular one is befitting this moment. This splendid welcome accorded to me by you—kind friends rather than spectators or auditors, who have with your plaudits and consideration encouraged me for so many years in the past—makes this, indeed, a proud and happy moment for me.

"But I feel that all these plaudits and this great greeting might not have been for me, had it not been for one who taught me how to merit and deserve them, who from the beginning of my career has watched and guided my steps, smoothing the way to success for me, and encouraging me in moments of trial and discouragement, and, in fine, striving to make me worthy of this honor to-night.

"I feel, too, that this poor and halting tribute of the heart is little to offer after the years of care and trouble he has bestowed on me, but it is from the heart and I wish to offer it. I am glad, too, to offer it before you—his friends as well as mine.

I see that I need not name him, my friend and preceptor, Mr. Augustin Daly." Eugene Presbrey, who was the first husband of Annie Russell, directed the production of The Masked Ball. Frohman came to rehearsals himself, and he did a good deal of the directing. Often he made suggestions—and good ones—but he never assumed the job of general stage director or producer.

The Masked Ball was a great success, and we played it two seasons. It was a conventional farce, but it gave me, in the rôle of Paul Blondet, a fairly good opportunity. The part of Suzanne established Maude Adams. She scored a greater success in my company as Dorothy in Rosemary, but after her performance in The Masked Ball there was no doubt of her ability and charm.

A Compliment From Fevre

THE second play in which I appeared as a star was The Butterflies, by Henry Guy Carleton, who was the first editor of Life. In this I played Frederick Osian, a heedless young man who is much in love and much in debt. Finally he tries the expedient of going to work, and his love is rewarded. In this play, which was also produced at Palmer's theater, Maude Adams was Miriam and Olive May was Suzanne Elise. The latter made a great hit in a broad comedy part, which was one of the first of the modern slangy rôles and a contrast to the heroine, the delicate Miriam. Carleton's play was as great a hit as The Masked Ball, and we played it for many months.

When we played The Masked Ball in Washington the house was sold out in advance for the first night at the National Theater. The President and Mrs. Cleveland wanted to attend the performance and Mrs. Rapley, the wife of the manager of the theater, gave up the manager's box.

During this same Washington engagement I received a letter which I have always prized very highly. This was from Frederick Fevre, dean of the Comédie Française:

Thanks to you and your excellent artists. We passed a charming evening yesterday at The National Theater. The piece (Butterflies) is extremely light, but the details are very amusing. There is team play and accord in your company, and everyone plays for the whole and not for himself.

My sincere compliments to the stage director. The scene of the flowers in the second act, the scene of the four young people, is graceful and ingenious. It is exquisite.

As for you, dear Mr. Drew, I cannot tell you how much pleasure was given me by your skillful playing—correct, amusing without ever becoming exaggerated, in fact, quite Parisienne. Receive all our thanks for your courtesy, my most sincere felicitations and a cordial handshake.

Fevre, who was on a sort of vacation or leave from the Comédie Française, was giving

(Continued on Page 121)

GEORGIANA DREW BARRYMORE, WITH HER CHILDREN, ETHEL, LIONEL AND JOHN

Are you arranging your hair in the most becoming way?

How many hours have you spent in your life trying different ways of arranging your hair?

And after each series of experiments you probably ended by twisting it up in the usual way.

Try it once more in the way suggested here, and you will be pretty sure to find just the arrangement that suits you exactly.

First send for the free book on Hair Dressing. This will show you many different styles and how to put them up easily and right. And use the Pro-phy-lac-tic Pen-e-tra-tor Hair Brush.

This is the brush that brushes through the hair. It straightens out the tangles; it reaches down and takes care of the hair 'way underneath; it guides all the short and wayward locks the way they should go; and makes hair dressing much easier than it ever was with an ordinary surface-brushing hair brush.

Daily brisk brushing with the Pro-phy-lac-tic Pen-e-tra-tor Hair Brush will improve your hair greatly, giving it a natural gloss and stimulating the scalp.

Made in several styles and finishes.

Always sold in the yellow box at any store where hair brushes are sold

FLORENCE MANUFACTURING CO., Florence, Mass.
Canadian Agency: 247 St. Paul Street West, Montreal

Write for free illustrated booklet, "Ideas About Hair Dressing."

Pro-phy-lac-tic Brushes

30th Anniversary

THIS is the 30th year of Sellers progress. The 30th year of steady improvement in the convenience of the kitchen cabinet.

Compare any cabinet of 30 years ago with the wonderful Sellers of today and you will realize what these years of advancement under the Sellers standard have done for kitchen convenience.

The "15 Famous Features" are today making kitchen work easier for thousands and thousands of housekeepers. These include the famous Automatic Lowering Flour Bin; the Automatic Base Shelf Extender; the Ant-Proof Caster; the Dust-Proof Base Top underneath the Porcelain Work Table; the Oil Hand-Rubbed Finish and many others.

Now, as a fitting tribute to the 30th Anniversary of the Sellers idea, three more long-needed features have been added to the cabinet. Women everywhere acclaim them the greatest improvement for convenience since the perfection of the Sellers Automatic Lowering Flour Bin. Please read the descriptions and judge for yourself.

First, is the new extending Table Drawer Section. Makes it possible to get anything from the big table drawer—even when the work table is fully extended and littered with things.

Second, is the new Automatic Double Base Shelf Extender which brings both base shelves out where you can easily reach pots and pans.

The third is the new Silverware Drawer, just above the roll curtain. Plush lined and a most convenient place for the knives, forks and spoons in frequent use.

Yet, with all these wonderful features, the Sellers costs no more than any good cabinet. Your dealer will endorse that statement. And, if he is like most, he will gladly arrange terms to meet your income.

See your local dealer. Meanwhile, write for a free copy of the new Sellers Blue Book which pictures and describes all the Sellers cabinets and Sellers features.

G. I. SELLERS & SONS COMPANY
ELWOOD - INDIANA

(324)

SELLERS

THE BEST SERVANT IN YOUR HOUSE

The Sellers costs only half as much as a built-in cabinet. Has more conveniences and sanitary features. Requires only the floor space of a kitchen table.

My Years on the Stage

(Continued from Page 119)

very charming little sketches or colloquies with his wife at private entertainments. I saw them two afternoons in Washington.

The Empire Theater, which was so closely associated with the career of Charles Frohman and so important in my own career, as for so many years my season began there either on Labor Day or very close to that time, had been opened in January of 1893.

The opening play was The Girl I Left Behind Me by Franklin Fyles and David Belasco. This was just another version of Boucicault's play, Jessie Brown, or The Relief of Lucknow, with something of the good old classic, Virginius. The performance was given by the Empire Theater stock company, and in the first cast were W. H. Thompson, William Morris, Orin Johnson, Cyril Scott, Theodore Roberts, Sydney Armstrong, Odette Tyler and Katharine Florence.

After my own performance in The Masked Ball at the Standard Theater at Thirty-third Street and Broadway, where we had moved when our time was up at Palmer's, I went up to the Empire to see the last few minutes of Charles Frohman's new production, The Girl I Left Behind Me, in his new theater.

About two years after the opening I played at the Empire for the first time in Henry Arthur Jones' play, The Bauble Shop. The argument in this, and it seems quite unanswerable, was that the private immoralities of a statesman's life may be used by his enemies to defeat and humiliate him in public life. The play was more successful in New York than in London.

I was Viscount Clivebrooke, the leader of the party in power, a cynical, brilliant statesman of forty-odd years, who indiscreetly falls in love with the daughter of a tippling toy maker, a part admirably played by J. E. Dodson. The part of Jessie Keber, the daughter, was played by Maude Adams. C. Leslie Allen, Arthur Byron, Harry Harwood, Frank Lamb, Elsie DeWolfe and Kate Meek were also in the cast.

In all these early productions Frank W. Lamb was my stage manager. He had appeared with W. J. Florence in The Mighty Dollar. He was a son of Ed Lamb, who played for a long time in a stock company in Brooklyn, managed by Mrs. F. B. Conway. In some of the early Daly plays Ed Lamb had played the low-comedy rôles on tour—the parts which James Lewis played in the original company.

Maude Adams' Big Hit in Rosemary

BETWEEN The Bauble Shop and Rosemary, Maude Adams and I appeared in a number of plays. There was That Imprudent Young Couple, which had been tried out at the end of the season before. In this Henry Guy Carleton tried to repeat the gossamer success of The Butterflies, but failed. Then came Christopher Jr., a bright but not altogether logical play, by Madeline Lucette Ryley. We did an English version of L'Ami des Femmes by Dumas fils. The adaptation, which was called The Squire of Dames, was made by R. C. Carton.

Rosemary, by Louis N. Parker and Murray Carson, was one of the biggest successes I had. Only a few years ago I revived the play, and it was successful then.

In the first production Maude Adams made a tremendous hit as Dorothy. This rôle, which was the last she played with me, was the culminating thing in her early career, and it led to her being starred. The next season Frohman produced The Little Minister, with Maude Adams as Lady Babbie. Charles Frohman probably thought that it was a great waste to leave in my company as leading woman an actress who had made so great a hit on her own account. Such delicate, almost spiritual, charm could be turned to great advantage in the proper plays.

ETHEL BARRYMORE

My niece, Ethel Barrymore, was cast for the rustic maid, Priscilla, in Rosemary. She had a dress and shoes which might have made another young girl seem grotesque. However, in spite of this most unbecoming attire, her beauty made a splendid impression.

Priscilla, the maid, was really her first appearance in New York, though she had substituted in my company in The Bauble Shop. One night when Elsie DeWolfe was ill, Ethel Barrymore appeared as Kate Fennell, though she was not announced on the program.

In the late nineties I saw my mother act for the last time, in Chicago. This was in an all-star cast of The Rivals. She played her familiar character of Mrs. Malaprop. William H. Crane was Sir Anthony; Robert Taber, Captain Absolute; Joseph Jefferson, Bob Acres; Nat Goodwin, Sir Lucius; Joseph Holland, Faulkland; Edward Holland, Fag; Francis Wilson, David; Julia Marlowe, Lydia Languish; and Fanny Rice, Lucy. This cast made a celebrated and quick tour through the important Eastern cities, playing in about twenty-seven different towns in less than a month.

Too Old to Fight

I HAPPEDED to be playing in another theater in Chicago, and on Sunday night between the Chicago and Milwaukee engagements I gave a dinner for the cast of The Rivals at The Annex. Ethel Barrymore, who was in my company at the time, was present at the dinner. Jefferson and my mother, who had seen so much of the early days of the American theater, told a great many stories of the old days. The following year I was playing in Salt Lake City in the road tour of Rosemary, when I received word that my mother had died at Larchmont.

At the time, Ethel Barrymore was playing with Henry Irving in London. They were rehearsing a new play. She returned to the afternoon rehearsal late, and she told Irving that she had been to send a cable; her grandmother was dead.

Irving excused her from rehearsal. "Mrs. John Drew," he said, "was the finest actress in her line that I have ever seen."

After the road tour of Rosemary—Isabel Irving played Dorothy part of the time—I appeared at the Empire Theater in A Marriage of Convenience, adapted by Sydney Grundy from Un Mariage sous Louis XV. I played the part of the count who falls in love with his young wife less than three days after the wedding. Isabel Irving made her first appearance as my leading lady in New York as the young countess. Of course I had played with her often before at Daly's, and she had played the leading part opposite me in The Cabinet Minister, when Ada Rehan refused to play it. Elsie DeWolfe played the waiting maid in A Marriage of Convenience.

The next play was One Summer's Day by Henry V. Esmond, and then came one of my biggest successes, Henry Arthur Jones' play, The Liars. In this sparkling comedy I played Sir Christopher Deering, the friend of everybody and the preserver of family honor.

When the Spanish-American War broke out, I very much wanted to go, and I applied in person to Theodore Roosevelt, who was then organizing a regiment of cavalry. I had known him when he was police commissioner in New York. I met him at lunch one day at Delmonico's with Richard Harding Davis; when I joined them they were having a heated but friendly argument about something or other. I don't remember what it was about, but they were both much excited.

The day I saw Roosevelt at the war department in Washington he told me that both Henry Cabot Lodge and I were too old

(Continued on Page 122)

1001 Drops in a Le Page's Tube and a use for every drop SILHOUETTE LAMP SHADE: Cover a wire frame with colored silk. LePage on small Copley prints or pictures cut from magazines. Then cover with Georgette and LePage the edges with braid that will blend in color.

EVENTUALLY you will use up the Drops in a Tube and have to buy another, but you never can exhaust the uses.

The mere having of a Tube in the house suggests uses which perhaps no one else but yourself ever would need or even think of. And yet, those uses would effect a convenience or a worth-while saving—usually both—that would pay for the Tube many times over.

There are such simple conveniences with LePage's, as stiffening the end of a shoe lace (when the tip has broken off) so that it will continue to lace easily. Simple, convenient, and saves buying new laces—a 10c. or 15c. item, not to mention repeated vexations.

There are more important savings such as fastening a loose tile in the bathroom, or in the hearth of a fireplace; a few Drops and a few minutes' time replacing the expensive process of having a mason mend it with trowel and mortar—surely a saving of several dollars.

Handles that have come off of umbrellas, whisk brooms, powder puffs and what-not, can be refastened.

Eye-glasses, which a sudden gust of wind or an unfortunate motion of the hand carries to a crash, may be repaired temporarily with LePage's.

LePage's will make as well as mend. For instance, a candy box may be covered with cretonne for a handkerchief case. Children can amuse themselves by the hour on rainy days gluing paper dolls or soldiers on cardboard so they will stand up.

These are only a few suggestions, but we will gladly send you a little book which gives all the known uses. Write Dept. L. Ask for "LePage's—the Handy Helper for Making and Mending." It is full of valuable money-saving suggestions. By the way, this is the same Glue that your husband uses on his office desk.

RUSSIA CEMENT COMPANY
Laboratory and Factory, Gloucester, Mass.

LE PAGE'S GLUE

THE STOPPER IS ALSO THE SPREADER

Do your slippers or rubbers slip off too easily? Glue a strip of felt on the inside heel edge. It will tighten them.

Wall paper often loosens in corners and at seams. Then a drop or two of LePage's will stick it down to stay.

Here's a candy box. Here's a piece of cretonne. LePage cretonne on box and there you are—for handkerchiefs, collars, jewels!

Belding's

Makers of Fine Silks for Gowns, Linings, Lingerie

For Gowns

Enduring, beautiful, reasonable in price—
worthy the patronage of three generations

NEW and unusual designs for small gifts, scarves, sport hats, sweaters, bags, etc., including a full color page of cross-stitch designs—all in

Belding's Book of

Silk Embroidery, Knitting and Crochet

Fifteen Cents, at your dealer's or from Belding Bros. & Co., 902 Broadway, N.Y. Use Belding's New Process Embroidery Silks—made of pure silk—for articles which must withstand long wear or frequent launderings and Belding's Crochet Silks to give the utmost durability to crocheted articles. Belding's Syltex—a fast dye artificial silk—is especially adapted to dress embroidery.

My Years on the Stage

(Continued from Page 121)

to think of going to war, that we knew nothing of warfare and that I had a wife and child to support. I hadn't the moral courage to point out to him that he had four or five children.

A familiar figure round the New York theaters in the nineties was Charles Hoyt, the writer of many successful farces. The titles of these invariably began with the article "A"—A Temperance Town; A Midnight Bell; A Contented Woman; A Stranger in New York. Hoyt was a most amusing person. He came from New Hampshire, and he had an uncompromising Yankee accent. When he died he gave his place in New Hampshire to the Lambs Club in perpetuity, so that actors who had no place else to go might go there to stay.

One of the often-told funny stories about him was that on the first night that Goodwin was going to play Clyde Fitch's "Nathan Hale," Hoyt had tickets for it, and there landed in on him some friend from New Hampshire. He had to entertain this man in some fashion, and he said he had two tickets for the theater.

The other man said: "What is it?"

Hoyt told him: "It is the opening of a new play, Nathan Hale, with Nat Goodwin."

The New Hampshire friend said: "I don't want to see Goodwin. I don't like him."

"You don't?" Hoyt asked.

"No, I don't. I don't like him. I don't like him as a man; I don't like him as an actor. I don't like him."

"But," Hoyt said, "you will like him in this play."

The other fellow said: "I won't like him."

Hoyt said: "Yes, you will; they hang him in the last act."

In The Tyranny of Tears

AFTER I left the Daly company I saw Daly now and again. The last time that I saw him was at the Continental Hotel in Paris.

A year or so later I was in Dresden, waiting for my daughter's school to close before the summer vacation, and we got the news that Augustin Daly had died in Paris.

The season of 1899 and 1900 I played that delightful comedy, The Tyranny of Tears, by C. Haddon Chambers. This was one of the finest light comedies that I played. I revived it a few years ago, and it was equally successful then. When it was revived Chambers came over and made certain changes in the play to shorten it somewhat. There were certain scenes that were really unnecessary. In the last act some of the scenes between the girl secretary and Parbury's friend were cut out. This did not disturb the play or the continuity of the action. It was done so that I might play the same evening Barrie's play, The Will. This bill was one of the most attractive that I ever played.

The rôle of Parbury, the novelist, in The Tyranny of Tears was a most grateful one. Isabel Irving was very good as the wife, and Ida Conquest made a great hit as Hyacinth Woodward, the novelist's amanuensis. In the revival Laura Hope Crewes was the wife and Mary Boland the secretary.

The next year I left light comedy for dramatized fiction. As Frohman did not have a play for me, I played Richard Carvel, a dramatization of Winston Churchill's book by E. E. Rose.

"C. F." asked me to come up to his farm, Hidden Brook Farm at Mount Kisco. He read me the dramatization. "What do you think of that?" he asked.

I didn't know; nor did I know at that time that the play had been done with James K. Hackett in mind. Charles Frohman had cajoled his brother Dan into giving this thing up to him for me. Hackett would have been ideal for the character. I was never happy in it. It was out of my sphere, and I was too old for the handsome young hero.

A Compliment From the Gallery

AT SUPPER one night in Chicago Sarah Bernhardt asked me whether I'd like to come to Paris and act in a play that she was thinking of doing. Sarah Bernhardt's companion, a little woman, who not only was her companion, but played parts in the company, and a man from the French newspaper, Figaro, were also present, and the conversation was carried on in French.

I was very diffident about my French—that is, the thought of going to Paris to play in French made me feel diffident. "But my French is not good enough," I said in answer to her query.

She said: "You speak French very well."

"Yes, that's all right—the fluency of it perhaps, but not the accent."

"Oh, that won't matter. This is an Englishman you are going to play."

Apparently Madame Bernhardt had not a very high regard for the English fashion of speaking French.

My niece, Ethel Barrymore, played a few parts in my company, played with Irving in his familiar repertoire in London and played Jessie Milward's part in a road company of Captain Marshall's play, His Excellency, the Governor. Then Charles Frohman decided to star her in Clyde Fitch's play, Captain Jinks. This play of New York life just after the Civil War, with costumes inspired by Godey's Lady's Book and scenes in the Brevoort House, made a great impression when it was produced in New York.

Before it came to the Garrick Theater it was tried out at the Walnut Street Theater in Philadelphia, the oldest theater in the country. Twenty years ago at the Walnut there was an old-fashioned, regular gallery audience, keen to approve of what it liked and quick to voice its disapproval. My niece, playing for the first time a long and important rôle, was somewhat nervous and not quite audible.

A friendly voice called to her from the gallery: "Speak up, Ethel. You're all right. The Drews is all good actors."

(Concluded in the March Home Journal)

JOHN DREW AND LIONEL BARRYMORE IN "THE MUMMY AND THE HUMMING BIRD"

© 1922
J. & J.

WONDERFUL MOTHER

To be a Mother is to be among the greatest artists of the world. A tiny will, a tiny mind, even the threads of a Future are in her hands. What will she build with them?

"I had a wonderful mother," said Lincoln. "All that I am I owe to her."

If greatness is a gift, the greatest gift a baby can have is a wonderful mother—a mother who knows that hours and hours of restful sleep are essential to baby's future.

Does it seem odd that a mere "baby powder advertisement" should be so serious? Perhaps baby powder isn't so mere after all.

Do you realize that Johnson's Baby Powder was the suggestion of a famous physician who knew that skin comfort is the surest path to sounder sleep? And that it is made especially for babies in laboratories that prepare hundreds of articles for the medical profession?

The difference between Johnson's Baby Powder and ordinary talcums appeals to a mother.

Johnson's
Baby Powder
Best for baby—Best for you

YOUR DRUGGIST IS MORE THAN A MERCHANT

The druggist—your neighborhood druggist—is the Good Samaritan among merchants. Health, safety, comfort are the three main things he has to sell. Pharmacy is an ETHICAL profession; the druggist is a college-trained scientist who thinks of quality and service first.

THE WHAT SHALL I GIVE BABY? PROBLEM SOLVED

You have often been perplexed in selecting a present for somebody's adorable baby. The BABY GIFT has been prepared for those who prefer that their love for baby shall be expressed by a useful gift. It contains three dainty articles essential to the comfort and happiness of baby—Johnson's Baby Powder, Baby Cream and Baby Soap. You can give nothing more welcome. Ask your druggist for it.

JOHNSON & JOHNSON
New Brunswick, N. J., U. S. A.

The "CHIPPENDALE." Design 1928—in Twin Pair

More Good News from Simmons

THIS is the first time Simmons has been able to announce to women nationally Simmons Mattresses—built for sleep.

Now, anywhere, everywhere—these clean, wholesome mattresses, sealed in cartons, are deliverable at any home.

As you would expect of Simmons—these Mattresses are built entirely of pure, clean, new silken floss or cotton. No "renovated" materials.

Mattresses so far away from the articles of ordinary consumption, that no healthy-minded woman can afford to spend her sleep-money for anything else.

Like Simmons Beds, built for sleep—sanitary, luxurious sleep.

Your choice of four styles—at a popular range of prices—

1st Blue Label	3rd Green Label
2nd Red Label	4th White Label

A Service due the American Public

Today Simmons can give the public a complete sleeping unit. Beds, Springs and Mattresses—all built for sleep. In this way, you secure a real guarantee of sleep satisfaction.

Simmons Company makes this unqualified Statement to every merchant who sells Simmons Mattresses:

"Cut open any Simmons Mattress that comes into your store. If you do not find it up to specifications, or better—ship back every item of Simmons merchandise and never send us another order."

NEW YORK

ATLANTA

SIMMONS COMPANY

CHICAGO

KENOSHA

SAN FRANCISCO

MONTREAL

(Executive Offices: Kenosha, Wis.)

SIMMONS BEDS

Built for Sleep

FREE BOOKLET ON SLEEP!
Write us for "Sleep and its Environment."

These place-cards are cookies covered with an icing made by slowly stiffening the white of an egg with confectioner's sugar and flavoring with lemon juice. When hardened, decorate by painting with colored fruit paste.

A Round of Parties for February

By CLAIRE WALLIS

IT WAS pure luck in the form of chickenpox that closed the schools in February and sent Aunt Mary Burnham with her two children, Nita and Roy, back home to Westville for a long-promised visit. Of course everyone wanted to entertain for her, and as the children were almost grown up they were included in the plans.

"I want her first," Libby Snowden, spinster, Mary's oldest friend, had said.

All the Burnhams looked questions at each other, for they knew how small Libby's house was and her bank account too. But they let her have her way and accepted eagerly her invitations for a supper party on Lincoln's birthday.

It was a surprise when they saw how she had arranged the table. It started in the small living room and went right through the double doorway into the smaller dining room. Young Buster Marion had to investigate the lengthy board and found that she had added two kitchen tables to her dining-room table, covering all with two long red tablecloths cherished for years. There were fringed napkins to match and the lighting was done with kitchen candles in black kitchen candlesticks, "giving it quite a pioneer air," as Dan Lawrence's new wife put it.

But it was on the centerpiece Libby's clever fingers had done their best work. Here, around a small bust of Lincoln in a pedestal of flowers, red-white-and-blue pencils stuck into flat corks made the spine and feet for little 1860 figures—ong-coated, tall-hatted men and full-skirted women. The men's figures she had cut double from stiff black paper, jutting the edges together. When you pinched them gently they slipped right over the pencil. A wisp of plaid stuff was pinned around each for a shawl like Lincoln wore. The girls were made the same way, with bits of net for fichus and r pe-paper skirts added to the tinted cardboard. And for the face of each she had used—guess what! A brand new Lincoln penny.

YOU ARE CORDIALLY INVITED TO ATTEND A PRIVATE SHOWING OF DAN CUPID'S MASTERPIECES
ON FEBRUARY FOURTEENTH, EIGHT O'CLOCK EXHIBITION UNDER THE PATRONAGE OF MISS JULIE ANN BURNHAM

When Mary Burnham and her friends trooped into Julie Ann's roomy home they found she had stretched a length of black cambric around the four walls of the living room, and on this had "hung" with thumb tacks numbered pictures cut from magazines, comic valentines, and so on, all signed with Cupid's heart-and-arrow cipher in red ink and "framed" with narrow gilt paper. The guests were handed catalogues bound in pink cardboard in which were the titles of all the pictures, but no numbers. Their hostess explained that they would have to find the pictures by their titles and number the catalogues for themselves.

For instance, for "The First Valentine" Julie Ann had cut out of a picture book two monkeys swinging from the limb of a tree and drawn long tails to intertwine and form two hearts. "The Love Letter" was a capital U; "Love's Messenger," a huge red rose cut from a seed catalogue; "A Study in Black and White," a page from an algebra book; "Portrait of a Well-Known Person," a mirror, and "A Bride's Curse," a portrait of Burns, which Mrs. Lawrence was the first to guess.

When the catalogues were collected and the prize awarded Julie Ann told them that Dan Cupid had asked her to engage some models for his new masterpieces. She then passed out little slips of paper upon which were written subject titles, one for each person, and occasionally the same to two persons who were to pose together. Then as she read the titles the "models" had to come and pose on a platform—low table—at one end of the room, all properties being forbidden and the rest of the party acting as judges. She had picked titles that she hoped would stump them and make the stunts as funny as possible. If you could have seen Harry Burnham and Mary in "The Last Ride Together," Harry squatted as if seated in a buggy, the reins in his hands, and Mary with a disdainful back turned upon him, as if they had just quarreled, you would agree she had succeeded. Libby was a good sport and did "The Windmill" with much swinging of her long arms, while the hit of the evening was Eva Marion's "Girl Feeding Giraffe."

"Now we shall unveil our shy host's latest still life," Julie Ann said, standing before mysteriously drawn curtains.

A Then and Now for Washington's Birthday

"OHS" and "ahs" went up as a beautiful valentine table was disclosed. A frill of lace paper around the edge of the round table, a huge pink-iced cake in the center surrounded by tiny nosegays of gumdrops, then a circle of plates of nut-bread sandwiches cut heart-shaped, then a row of blue cups and saucers, and lastly a row of plates of egg-cheese-and-celery salad made a delightful old-fashioned nosegay. Hot coffee and ice cream were served, and Cupid's "still life" did not remain still very long.

Polly Preston selected Washington's birthday to entertain for Mary. She confided to Libby that her party wouldn't be half so smart as Julie Ann's, because of Grandma Preston and the older folks who had known Mary's mother that she intended to invite. But her invitations sounded promising. Written half in violet ink and half in typewriting they read:

If Great-grandma gave a Washington party
She'd call it a very high tea;
You'd don your best drawing-room manner
And act just as stiff as could be.

To-day all that old-time decorum
And formality are taboo;
So come to a "Then and Now" party;
We'll mingle the old and the new.

When the guests arrived Polly explained that they were going to let Grandma have the first half of the evening. So they "spared their wraps" in the guest room, and were announced with solemnity as they entered the parlor. Then she got out a funny old etiquette book she had found in the public library and read some of the curious old rules. Such things as "Young folks should not speak until spoken to," "A lady never crosses her feet," "A gentleman remains bowing until every lady in the room is seated" kept the party in a continual uproar, for forfeits were claimed of the transgressors. They played all the old games that Grandma Preston and her cronies could remember. Supper was served from a pretty table spread with old damask, set with Grandma's cherished bits of old china, with candles in crystal-drop candelabra and a centerpiece of straw flowers in a glass basket. Grandma Preston herself served the scalloped oysters; hot biscuit were passed, and jam and pickled yellow tomatoes were the side dishes.

Before the dessert course was served a jingle of bells announced the end of the "Then" and the beginning of the "Now" party. Candles were blown out, the electric lights went on, the damask tablecloth was whisked away and a red-white-and-blue cr pe-paper one found underneath. Cocked hats of tissue paper and whistles, snappers, balloons, red white and blue, were given out. Dancing ended the evening.

Games That Can be Played Round the Table

A BIG pot on the back of Libby's range yielded up her famed chicken stew, served with hot rolls. Little "rails" of cheese straws were already on the table, as were plates of iced ginger cookies cut log-cabin shape and iced in white to how doors, windows and logs. Coffee and chocolate were served in big cups without saucers—another pioneer touch, Libby hastened to explain. Frozen custard, as only Libby can make it, and angel food finished the spread.

"Now don't leave the table, or I'm afraid you will topple my house over," Libby announced as the last crumb of angel food disappeared. "Everyone look in the little book t his plate."

Sure enough, there was a small copybook, and on the first page a Lincoln penny was pasted on a different spot in each book. "Now take your pencil favors and, using that penny as a beginning, draw something appropriate to the day."

Such a time as they had! Harry Burnham used his for the tal on the Emancipation Proclamation; Nita turned hers into a moon shining down on the log cabin; Julie Ann Burnham made of it a fat little pig crawling through a rail fence.

Libby rang a bell at the end of ten minutes and started them off with a gay game that she called "Penny Wise." A penny was passed from hand to hand and under the table until she called "Hands up!" when all had to hold their hands over their heads and then y them flat on the table. The one who hid the penny, if discovered, had to tell a funny story, but if the challenger was wrong had to tell the story.

Saint Valentine's cake above unites chocolate Cupids and silhouette with hearts of colored fruit paste. The cake logs of Lincoln's cabin at the left were baked in a bread-stick pan and attached to an oblong cake with icing, while the roof is cardboard, chocolate covered. A loaf cake, iced in white and chocolate, becomes a book at right. All cakes by Marie L. Norfleet.

Why Women Buy Mirro

There can be only one reason for the increasing number of women who are buying Mirro Aluminum kitchen utensils.

These women must know that Mirro Aluminum possesses advantages which other aluminum ware does not have.

True, we have tried to make Mirro the most durable, most convenient and beautiful kitchen ware on the market.

How well we have succeeded, we prefer to have Mirro users tell you—there are several million of them.

The Mirro Aluminum Colonial Tea Kettle, pictured above, will serve you long and faithfully. Like all Mirro utensils, it is made from pure aluminum, rolled again and again, in Mirro mills, to give the hard, dense, lasting qualities which make Mirro ware give a lifetime of service.

Every woman can afford Mirro. Although the quality brand of aluminum ware, it is priced moderately. And its years of service add to its economy.

Back of every Mirro utensil is the guarantee of the world's foremost maker of aluminum ware, with a successful experience of nearly thirty years.

You may buy Mirro at leading stores everywhere. Send for the miniature Mirro catalog.

Aluminum Goods Manufacturing Company
General Offices: Manitowoc, Wis., U. S. A.
Makers of Everything in Aluminum

Every Mirro Utensil
Bears This Imprint

MIRRO ALUMINUM
Reflects
Good Housekeeping

- 1 Sure-grip, ebonized, detachable handle insures easy handling and pouring.
- 2 Projection on rear handle ear prevents lid from falling when kettle is tilted.
- 3 Spout welded on—no loosening—no dirt-catching joint.
- 4 Handle ears welded on; slotted to permit handle being shifted to any position.
- 5 Rivetless, no-burn, ebonized knob.
- 6 Easy-filling, easy-pouring spout.
- 7 Unusually wide base means quick heating and fuel saving.
- 8 Famous Mirro finish.
- 9 Beautiful Colonial design. Also made in plain round style.
- 10 Mirro trade-mark on every piece. Your guarantee of excellence throughout.

Philip the Gay

(Continued from Page 4)

they could offer. He wouldn't play; he wouldn't work; he wouldn't even eat with them. Of course he had been in the hospital for ages, but he had been out of it for ages too; and it was criminal folly to continue to pamper anyone as he was pampered. A man, a real man, would die of shame before he would permit his sisters to give music lessons while he locked himself in his room and laughed.

Never was he with them, save for the brief hour after breakfast when they drank their cups of black coffee under the golden beech trees, and that heavenly space after dinner in the great salon, full of firelight and candlelight and falling rose leaves and music, with Madame de Lautrec stitching bright flowers into her tapestry frame and Monsieur le Vicomte smiling his courteous and tragic smile into the leaping fire in the carved chimney, and the fresh young voices rising and falling about the piano over which Laure bent her golden head, Diane's silver music lilting clearly, Laure's soft contralto murmuring like far waters, and Philippe singing as his troubadour ancestor might have sung, fearless and true and shining.

Fair caught her breath at the memory of that ringing splendor, and then looked stern. It was ridiculous to worship anyone as the de Lautrecs worshiped their tall Philippe, and it was obviously highly demoralizing for him—highly. Laure was the worst; it was as though she couldn't bear to have him out of her sight for a minute; if he rose to go—oh, if he even stirred—she was at his side in a flash, her hand slipped into his, all her white tranquillity shaken into some mysterious terror at the thought that he might escape her again.

SHE was the only one that Philippe would suffer to come near him in all the long hours that he spent behind those dark, barred doors; often as Fair sped by on light feet she could hear the murmur of their voices, low and absorbed, shutting her out, thought Fair forlornly, more than any lock on any door. What did they find to talk about hour after hour, blind and deaf to the world that lay about them golden as honey under the October sun? What spell did Laure use to bind him, what strange magic to dispel all the endless witchery that Fair had spread before him, first carelessly, then startled into wide-eyed consciousness, and finally, during these last flying days, driven to despairing prodigality?

She bit her lip, blinking back the treacherous tears fiercely. Some day—some day he should pay for this indifference, and pay with interest. The loitering feet paused again while their owner visualized through the mist of unwelcome tears a broken and contrite Philippe dragging himself to grovel abjectly at her feet, begging for one small word of mercy and hope.

The vivid countenance suddenly assumed an expression of exquisite contentment. "No, Philippe," she would tell him lightly but inflexibly. "No, my poor boy, it would be sheer cruelty to mislead you. Never, under any possible circumstances, could I—"

"Enfin!" rang out a richly indignant voice. "Do you walk in your sleep, my good goose? We wait and we wait until we are one-half frozen, and you arrive like the snail he was your little brother and —"

"OH, LAURE, I am sorry! Box my ears; no, hard; you tell her to box them hard, Monsieur André."

"I, mademoiselle? But never. We are well repaid for our vigil, hey, Raoul? Here is that very red mallet with which you will beat us all. We take Bravo with us, Diane?"

Diane shook her curly head dubiously at the frantic police dog. "Who holds the leash—you, André? Last time he got loose; he bite three sheep—three—before we catch him. You hear, monster?"

Fair and Bravo exchanged guilty glances. "Well, but Diane, he pulled so; truly he did. He went so fast, right over those hedges, and the leash cut through my mittens and —"

Laure and Diane yielded to outrageous laughter.

"Raoul, you should see them! Right over those sticking hedges they go, Bravo ahead, big like three wolves, and Fair way behind at the other end of the leash, so small like the little Red Riding Hood, and so fast like she was flying. Oh, I thought we die laughing."

"Very, very funny," commented Fair bitterly. "Specially for me. How are we going to-day?"

"How if we go across the little meadow to the Gates and home by the Cœur d'Or? Too far, Raoul?"

"We will be back for lunch? A la bonne heure—we go. Ah, well hit, mademoiselle. Straight like arrows too."

Fair raced after the red ball, her scarf flying behind her like a banner, wings at her heels, stars in her eyes, tragedy forgotten.

SHE smote the ball again, her voice flying with it. "Oh, Laure! Oh, Laure, as I live and breathe, it's cleared the ditch!"

"Monsieur Charette hath said to all his peers, Monsieur Charette hath said to all his peers: 'Come, good sirs!'"

Now let us sally forth and whip the curs!"

The exultant chant wavered for a moment as the proud possessor of the ball cleared the ditch, too, and took up her triumphant lilt, crescendo:

"Take up thy gun, my good Gregory!
Take up thy virgin of ivory;
Fill up thy drinking gourd right cheerily;
Our comrades have gone down
To fight for Paris Town!"

André de Chartreuil swung up beside her, breathless and laughing. Luck was with him; all the English that he had mastered as liaison officer raced to the tip of his tongue.

"But what a child! How old are you, Mademoiselle Fairfax Carter?"

"Too old," mourned Fairfax, shaking her bright head till the curls danced in the sun. "Much, much too old; old enough to know better." She pounced on the half-buried ball with a small shriek of excitement. "Aha, my little treasure, a mere turn of the wrist and—bet I make the gate in four strokes."

"BET you do not," replied André obligingly.

"Done! All the mushrooms that you find in Daudin's meadow to—to what?"

"To the very great privilege of kissing the tips of your fingers." Young de Chartreuil's voice was carefully light.

"Monsieur André!" Fair, her mallet poised for the blow, paused long enough to bestow a distracting glance through her lashes, oddly at variance with her maternal tone. "You aren't going to begin that kind of thing, are you?" Her laughter rang out, gay and lovely and mocking.

Young de Chartreuil smiled back at her, a not very convincing smile. She was the most enchanting creature that he had ever met, but her lack of discretion froze the marrow in his bones. "Mademoiselle, one so charming is privileged to forget that one may also be kind," he remarked formally.

Fair stopped laughing. "Oh, nonsense!" she returned abruptly, forgetting that one may also be polite. She hit viciously at the ball, scowling after it more like a cross little boy than a lady of romance. "There, see what you made me do!"

The astonished André met her accusing gaze blankly. "I, mademoiselle?"

"Yes, sir, you." The tone was unrelenting. "I'm a great deal kinder than I have any business being," she added darkly. "I certainly am. Sooner or later

(Continued on Page 128)

30-Year Teeth in a 70-Year Body

Why shouldn't our teeth last as long as our bodies?

WHY should our teeth begin to go just as our bodies are in their prime? Is it natural or unnatural to lose the teeth?

Early, uncivilized men and women had teeth that stayed firm and sound for a lifetime. Skulls of primitive men and heads of mummies show strong teeth little affected by time.

The hard, uncooked foods and the rugged lives of our ancestors kept the teeth clean and the saliva always alkaline. The modern tendency of teeth is to ache, decay, and require attention long before the rest of the body has gone into decline.

Soft, cooked foods weaken the teeth by denying them exercise. In addition, tiny particles of this food left in the mouth break up and form an acid condition that attacks the structure of the teeth and causes decay.

Most people have "Acid-Mouth"

It is said that as many as nineteen out of every twenty people have "Acid-Mouth." And if it is true that "Acid-Mouth" is the chief cause of early tooth-decay, we can readily understand why so many persons lose their teeth.

Quite probably you have "Acid-Mouth," for if only one person in every twenty is free from this condition, your chances of having "Acid-Mouth" are nineteen to one.

To counteract the destructive work of "Acid-Mouth" is one of the purposes for which Pebeco Tooth Paste is made—and the reason why thousands of men and women use Pebeco night and morning.

How Pebeco checks "Acid-Mouth"

Pebeco counteracts "Acid-Mouth" by stimulating the flow of natural alkaline saliva, which is nature's own mouth-wash, and the most effective means of neutralizing mouth acids.

But not for that reason alone is Pebeco a good tooth paste.

Like thousands of other users, you will like Pebeco for several reasons: First, because it keeps the teeth clean and healthy. Second, because it counteracts the destructive work of "Acid-Mouth." Third, because it eliminates any bad taste that may exist in the mouth. Fourth, because it gives to the mouth a sense of refreshing cleanliness.

And from the first to the last squeeze, Pebeco rolls out of the tube fresh and creamy—none is wasted.

How to tell if you have "Acid-Mouth"

*First, send for Litmus Test Papers
and generous trial tube of Pebeco*

We will send you these necessary materials to demonstrate to you how Pebeco acts.

Moisten a blue Litmus Test Paper on your tongue. If it turns pink, that indicates an acid condition in your mouth. Brush your teeth with Pebeco and make another test. The paper will not change color, thus demonstrating how Pebeco helps to counteract "Acid-Mouth."

Fill in the coupon now, enclose ten cents and mail to us at once. The Litmus Test Papers and big trial tube of Pebeco will be sent you immediately.

Only one person in twenty is free from "Acid-Mouth."

LEHN & FINK, INC.
635 Greenwich Street, New York

Get your Druggist for the Pebeco Tooth Brush—cleans every part of every tooth

Ed F. Ritchie & Co., Selling Agents for the United States and Canada
Madison Avenue, New York City 10 McCaul Street, Toronto

LEHN & FINK, INC.
635 Greenwich Street, New York

Enclosed find 10 cents, for which please send me your Litmus Test Papers and large Trial
Tube of Pebeco.

Name _____
Street and No. _____
City and Town _____
State _____

Sani-Flush

Cleans Closet Bowls Without Scouring

A little Sani-Flush, sprinkled into the closet bowl according to directions, will clean it more effectively than any other means—and with no unpleasant labor.

Sani-Flush does all the hard work—and does it quickly and safely. In addition Sani-Flush eliminates the necessity of using disinfectants because it cleans so thoroughly.

Always keep Sani-Flush handy in your bathroom.

Sani-Flush is sold at grocery, drug, hardware, plumbing, and house-furnishing stores. If you cannot buy it locally at once, send 25c in coin or stamps for a full sized can, postpaid. (Canadian price, 35c; foreign price, 50c.)

THE HYGIENIC PRODUCTS CO.
Canton, Ohio

Canadian Agents:

Harold F. Ritchie & Co., Ltd., Toronto

When Your Child is Three Years of Age

You can't begin too early to save your children's teeth for their old age.

Calox—the Oxygen Tooth Powder—used regularly morning and night, will remove the deposit in which germs breed. It will neutralize all acid conditions, and keep the mouth normal.

Begin today. Teach your children the joy and comfort of a sweet, wholesome mouth, made clean by Calox—the Oxygen Tooth Powder.

Send for liberal sample and free booklet, "The Truth About Tooth Pastes and Dentifrices."

McKESSON & ROBBINS, Inc., New York

CALOX

The Oxygen Tooth Powder

YOU CAN establish a good business of your own by taking the agency for our line of Aprons and Piece Goods. Easily sold. Good profits. Experience unnecessary. Samples free. Exclusive territory. Write now. DELMAR CO., 1478 Williamsbridge Road, New York

Wedding Invitations, Announcements, Etc. 100 in script lettering, including two sets of envelopes, $1.50. 100 Vellum Cards, $1.00. Write for samples. L. OTT ENGRAVING CO., 1331 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

Philip the Gay

(Continued from Page 126)

every single one of you turns on me like—like a viper and tells me that it's not possible that I could have been so everlastingly kind and patient and wonderful if I hadn't meant something by it. Goodness knows what you'd all like me to do," she murmured gloomily. "Make faces and bark like a dog every time one of you comes near me, I suppose. Where's that ball? I wish I were dead."

This time André's smile was clearly unforced. "Oh, no one in the world is droll like you!" he stated with conviction. "But no one. No, do not bark like a little dog; I will be good, I swear." He shrugged his shoulders philosophically. "After all, if you had been made tender-hearted you would spend your days weeping for the ones you broke. So this way it is best, is it not so?"

FAIR beamed on him graciously. "Well, of course!" she assented with conviction. "And I'm certainly thankful that you see it. If you'd had about seventy-eight thousand soldiers spending their every waking minute telling you that they'd fade away and die if you weren't kind to them you'd see that the novelty of it would wear off a little—wear off a good deal." She gave the ball a rather perfunctory hit. After all, Fairfax Carter on the subject of Fairfax Carter was more absorbing than any game ever invented. She drew a deep breath and started off headlong on her favorite topic. "It's perfectly horrible being a girl, and it's a million times worse if you're a—well, if you aren't exactly revolting looking and are what the dime novels call an heiress." Miss Carter tried to look dismal over this harrowing situation, but only succeeded in looking outrageously beguiling.

"It must indeed be hard," agreed young de Chartreuil consolingly.

Fair glanced at him suspiciously from the corner of her eye. "You needn't laugh, my dear boy; it most certainly is. I don't believe men care one little snip for your soul or—or your intellect."

"Oh, but surely!" protested de Chartreuil politely.

"No, sir," maintained the complete cynic, giving an abstracted hit at the ball; "not a single, solitary one. Oh, bother, look where it went then! How many strokes have you had? Four? Four? I've had five, and look at the horrible thing now. What was I talking about? Oh, yes; I don't believe in international marriages, do you, Monsieur André?"

MONSIEUR ANDRÉ made a light and deprecating gesture. "I, mademoiselle? But I have had so few."

"I do think foreigners are horribly frivolous," murmured Fair to the universe at large. "I've not had so many myself, but I can still think they're a bad idea. You couldn't possibly help thinking that they were pretty cold and calculating."

"Could you not?" inquired one who had come very near being a cold calculator. "I, for one, try to look more charitably on the ladies who covet our poor coronets."

"Oh, I wasn't thinking of the girls; who in the world wants a little old coronet! Of course they're nice, if you're used to them," she added hastily. "But it was the men that I was thinking of; you simply couldn't be sure, not ever. You work, don't you?"

"Alas, yes, mademoiselle!" de Chartreuil abandoned resentment and stood leaning on his mallet, laughing down at this incorrigible and enchanting small barbarian.

"Monsieur André, why, do you suppose, does Monsieur de Lautrec not work?"

"Philippe?" His voice was strange.

"Yes, Philippe; you didn't suppose that I meant the vicomte, did you? This place keeps him busy from morning to night. Philippe, of course." Her voice was impatient, but there was a desperate eagerness behind it that checked the quick words on de Chartreuil's tongue.

"Mademoiselle, for four years he worked day and night; he gave the blood of his heart, the blood of his soul in work; would you grudge him a little rest?"

"But, good heavens, he's had two years to rest!" cried Fair despairingly. "He's not going to rest until he dies, is he? You're not resting; Monsieur Raoul's not resting; no one in the world has a right to rest when there's so much to do—no one!"

"It is not two years that he rests, quite," said de Chartreuil. "For ten months after war ended he did not leave the hospital, mademoiselle."

"Well, wasn't he resting then?" demanded his inquisitor fiercely.

"No," replied the boy gravely; "he was not resting then, I think."

"What—what was the matter with him in the hospital?" asked Fair, making her lips into a very straight line, so that they wouldn't quiver.

"It was what you call shell shock."

"Shell shock? That's horrible; oh, don't I know! Those hospitals, like a nightmare, worse than a nightmare." She swept it far from her with a resolute gesture. "It's no good thinking about it; you have to forget. And heaven knows that he's over it now, that he isn't suffering from any breakdown. I've never seen him look even serious for two minutes at a time; I don't believe that he has the faintest idea of what seriousness means. It's all very well to have a sense of humor; I have a perfectly wonderful sense of humor myself when I'm not thinking of something more important; but it's ridiculous to think that that's all there is to it."

SHE hit the ball a reckless blow that sent it flying far across the tawny meadow, and turned to young de Chartreuil a lovely little countenance on fire with righteous indignation and angry distress.

"A real man would know that life ought to be more than just laughing half the day and singing half the night and looking the way the heroes in the moving pictures ought to look, and chatterboxing in his room for hours and hours and hours." Bitter resentment at this unpalatable memory sent the color flying higher in her cheeks, and she swung off after the red ball at a curious scamper. "And, by glory, I'm going to tell him so," she announced tempestuously over her shoulder to the astounded André.

He sprang forward, galvanized into instant action. "Mademoiselle, mademoiselle, wait, I beg you. You jest of course; but—"

"Indeed I do not 'jest, of course,'" retorted Fair hotly. "I don't jest one little bit. Why in the world shouldn't I tell him?"

"There are, I should think, one thousand reasons why," he replied sharply. "Must I give you the thousand and first and assure you that always, always, all the days that you live, it would be to you a very deep regret?"

"It certainly would not," replied his unimpressed audience flatly. Anyone who attempted to frighten Fair out of any undertaking whatever was making a vital, strategic error.

BUT André de Chartreuil was too young and too thoroughly outraged to indulge in strategy. "Mademoiselle, but this is madness—"

"Monsieur, but this is impertinence." Fair's chin was tilted at an angle that implied that battle, murder and sudden death would be mere child's play to her from then on. This—this little whippersnapper of a French infant who had basely pretended to be at her feet, suddenly rising up and dictating a course of conduct to her—to her! Well, it simply proved what she had always maintained: you couldn't trust a foreigner; you couldn't, not ever.

"For what you call impertinence forgive me." The tone was far from repentant, and Fair waited stiffly for further developments. "My poor English renders me clumsy; grant me, I pray, patience."

Very poor English indeed, thought Fair sternly; it might mean anything. Grant him patience indeed! She had precious little patience to spare for anyone this morning, as he would discover to his cost.

"Philippe—he is like no one else." Young de Chartreuil made a gesture of impotent despair, his careful English suddenly turned traitor. "You do not see it, but he is like no

(Continued on Page 129)

An Appealing Profession for Women

Mrs. L. found herself one of the many well-laid women who are, often unexpectedly, called on to make their own way in life. She had the background of education and environment that made difficult to be satisfied with the monotonous and unproductive work usually open to women. She sought "something to do," something which would not only yield her a sufficient income to continue on her accustomed plane of life, but which would also make it possible for her to employ her personality, her taste, her associations—that "something" had to be congenial.

She found it. She learned of a Profession which allowed her to move in the accustomed atmosphere, and yielded nicely, in a financial way, to her every effort.

The Profession she chose was that of a Corsetière—a NuBone Corsetière. Her natural tact, her delightful personality, her charming way of wearing tasteful though inexpensive clothes, her circle of friends and acquaintances—all these, of course, helped. But she would have failed in spite of it had it not been for her earnest purpose and her deep sense of responsibility. She won.

Mrs. L. succeeded in a most pleasing way—pleasing to herself and to those she served in her Profession. She came to us untrained, but she studied our corsetière course diligently—received theoretical and practical training in the corsetière's art. Now she is free and happy.

We should like more women of Mrs. L.'s character and purpose to join the Corsetière's Profession. The NuBone Corsetière individually measures and fits what thousands of women proclaim the most comfortable, the smartest corset in the world—she renders this individual service in her customers' own homes.

And the NuBone Corsetière's service is carried on in our establishments at Erie, Pa., or Corry, Pa., or Los Angeles, Cal., at all of which places the individual corsets are designed; where they are made according to the corsetière's measurements and instructions. A NuBone Corset, whose perfection is based on the only woven wire stay in the world, fulfills the service and promise of every NuBone Corsetière.

Write us immediately. Tell us as much about yourself, your plans and aspirations as you will—everything will help us to judge whether you are justified in expecting the reward that comes to every earnest and determined NuBone Corsetière. Financial independence, comfort and happiness may be yours. The prestige of the NuBone Corset; the gratitude of the NuBone Company and our practical help will support your effort. Don't delay—write us that letter today.

NuBone Corset Company
25th & Ash Streets, Erie, Pa.

Sheet Music 15¢

WHEN you buy sheet music from your dealer insist on Century Edition. You'll pay only 15c and you'll get sheet music as beautifully printed and as completely finished as the editions for which you pay two and three times the Century price. Century gives you at 15c the world's best music—such as "Il Trovatore," "Barcarolle," "Melody in F," etc.—all certified to be correct as the masters wrote them. Insist on Century Edition.

If your dealer won't supply you, we will. Catalogue of 2,000 classical and standard compositions free on request.

VERDI

Century Music Publishing Co.
239 W. 40th St.
New York

Infants Style Book Free

BEAUTIFUL Infants Style Book sent free. Pictures everything to outfit babies and little tots (up to 6 years of age). Everything from simplest separate garments to the most elaborate hand-made layette. Tasteful designs, exclusive materials, dainty trimmings also nursery furniture. All at low prices. Satisfaction guaranteed. Style Book Free. Write today.

Lane Bryant Address Dept. 53 389 2nd Ave New York

OMO DRESS SHIELDS

61 Shapes and Sizes

YOUR own ideas of what a Dress Shield should be, are admirably carried out in the OMO line.

Whatever protection is needed, there is an OMO shield that exactly meets the requirements of material, style and comfort.

All OMO shields are carefully made under the most sanitary conditions and come to you in individual, dust-proof packets.

THE OMO MANUFACTURING CO.

Main Office and Factory
Middletown, Conn.

O-Cedar Polish

For all furniture and woodwork. Imparts a high, dry, lasting lustre without hard rubbing.
The one polish that Cleans as it polishes"

Under an absolute guarantee; your money back if you are not satisfied.

Small Chemical Co., Chicago, Toronto, London, Paris

Use This Chest FREE

Free Trial
A Famous
Piedmont Red
Chest. Your choice of many styles and is sent on 15 days' free trial. A Piedmont chest, wood and flower from moth, mildew, insects. Needed in every home. Lasts for years.
The ideal wedding or birthday gift. Write for free catalog with new reduced prices—postpaid free to you.

MONT RED CEDAR CHEST CO., Dept. B, Statesville, N.C.

Philip the Gay

(Continued from Page 128)

one else, I tell you. I, who was his sous-officer, his—how you call it?—his under-officer—ah, no matter; he was my captain for three years, and I know. You hear me? I know."

"Heaven knows I hear you," Fair assured him with ominous calm. "I should think that they could hear you in Paris."

"Well, then, I tell you that we, his men, we who followed him, we would have given the blood out of our hearts for him to shine his boots with; we knew him, we. You know why they call him Philippe le Gai?"

"I know that there's some story about an old troubadour called Philippe le Gai—"

"About a very great soldier who was also a very great singer, mademoiselle, long years ago in Provence. Philippe is of his race, one of those who meet death itself with a song. That other Philippe died eight hundred years ago, and they say that he died singing. And we—we who followed this Philippe and gave to him our souls, we know that he could face worse than death and still sing."

"There isn't the slightest necessity of making a curtain speech to me about courage," replied the last of the fighting Carters, and the velvet voice rang as cold and hard as drawn steel. "I know quite a good deal about it, thank you. I may not have had any old ancestor that went ram-paging around singing songs about how gay and brave and wonderful he was; but I had three great-uncles and a grandfather who were killed in the Civil War and a brother who was killed in the Spanish War, and—a father"—her voice failed her, but she swallowed hard and pushed on relentlessly—"and a father who died for his country just as much as any of them, because he went right on working for it when he knew that it would kill him; and he didn't even let me know that he was dying, because I couldn't help him and he thought that I might help America; and I was the only one of the Carters left to fight for America. And I kept fighting, even though it just about killed me too; I went into Germany with my men, because I knew that he wouldn't think the war was over until we got what we fought for, until we really got it; and I'd be there yet if it hadn't been for those idiotic doctors. Nervous breakdown! For gracious sakes, I'd like to hear what they'd say if one of their old colonels started to have a nervous breakdown. This isn't any kind of a world to sit and twirl your thumbs and pet your nerves in; and I can't see that singing about it makes it much nobler—or laughing either."

"There are many things, perhaps, that you cannot see," commented young de Chartreuil; and at the tone in his voice there was one thing that Fair did see, and that was red.

"Well, I can see this," she cried in a voice shaken with sheer fury: "I can see that it's possible to be just as much of a slacker after the war as during it."

"Mademoiselle!"

"In America men work," stormed Fair. "They —"

"IN AMERICA you save your generosity for your own faults, it seems." He raised a commanding hand, and Fair stood voiceless, literally transfixed with rage.

"No, wait, I beg you; I have not yet finished. Perhaps in your great country you forget that work is the means, that it is not the end; no, no, believe me, it is not the end. It is also not very wise to condemn utterly that which may differ only in kind, not in degree."

"To you courage may be a dark and stern thing, a duty; but to some—to one at least, mademoiselle—it is a shining and gay and splendid gift; it is a joy."

"Are you through with your lessons for the day?" asked Fair icily. "Because if you are I'm going." She whirled the red mallet about her head like a battle-ax, and sent it spinning far from her after the neglected ball. "Good-by; I'm off. Tell the others I twisted my ankle, got a headache; tell them any old lie you think of —"

"But, mademoiselle, you cannot —"

"Can't I?" she called back defiantly. "Well, wait and see. I'm going to tell your precious Philippe de Lautrec just exactly what I think of a hero who spends his life resting on his laurels while his sisters work their fingers to the bone; and you and Foch and the archangel Gabriel can't stop me, so I'd advise you to stick to croquet-golf. Good-by."

She was gone in a brilliant whirl of flying skirts and scarf and hair. Young de Chartreuil watched her disappearing down the long hill that led past Daudin's farm to the far gate of the château with an expression in which dismay was curiously tempered by a grim satisfaction. After a moment he shrugged his shoulders briefly, retrieved the scarlet ball and mallet and set off slowly towards the sounds of distant laughter that marked the other players. Well, let her go; she was richly in need of a lesson, that lovely little demon!

And to think that for a moment he had dreamed—ah, name of heaven, what an escape!

Fair, in the meantime, raced lightly and surely on her chosen way. She was in a towering rage at de Chartreuil for his presumptuous insolence, and in an even more towering rage at herself for the effect that it had on her. Fortunately, the hateful de Chartreuil child had been even worse than she. He had looked at one time as though it would have been pure ecstasy to throttle the life out of her, the time that she had got in that neat thrust about peacetime slackers.

WELL, she was on her way to tell one of them exactly what she thought of him, as fast as her stubby brown boots would carry her. She wrenched impatiently at the iron latch on the great north gate; it yielded with an unexpectedness that nearly threw her off her feet, and she heard it clang to behind her as she raced up the long alley of lime trees that led to the stone terrace. If she were lucky she might find the object of her righteous wrath basking there in the sunlight, without so much as a book in his graceless hands, dreaming away the hours, his dark face turned to the golden fields of his inheritance. She had found him there before—and, yes, fate was with her; there he was now in his great chair, with his back to the lime trees.

For a moment she hesitated, her heart thundering in her ears; and then she swung recklessly across the sun-warmed flags, hands deep in her pockets, her chin tilted at a simply outrageous angle.

"Oh, there you are," she hailed in her magic voice, but there was something behind the words that turned them from a salutation to a challenge.

Philippe le Gai sat quite still for a moment, and then, without rising, he flung her a radiant smile over his shoulder. "And there are you," he said. "All finished, the croquet-golf?"

"No; just finished for me. It's a stupid game, don't you think?"

"Me? I think no game stupid that once I have started; no, not one. Then I must play it through to the end or count myself defeated."

Fair's eyes darkened ominously. "But you don't start many games, do you?" she asked sweetly.

"No," acquiesced the young man in the chair. "As you say, not many."

Fair set her teeth. Did he think that if he continued to sprawl all his splendid length there, unmoving, that she would pass on? Was this his method of once more conveying to her the information that her presence was an intrusion? Oh, for a man, for some slim, freckled, outraged young American to take this insolent foreigner by his coat collar and jerk him to his unworthy feet! Perhaps it might be better to have two of them; he was simply disgustingly tall.

House all swept —and not tired out!

This light carpet sweeper is easily operated and carried about with one hand. No dust clouds, no stooping. Makes the daily sweeping quick and easy. Costs no more than half a dozen brooms and lasts for years. A real economy as well as a daily convenience.

If you now have a very old Bissell serving you faithfully, let your dealer show you a modern "Cyclo" Ball Bearing Bissell—even easier running and more efficient. It will be a great time-saver to have them both—one for upstairs and one for down.

Beware of unknown sweepers offered at ridiculously low prices. Real economy is to buy a sweeper that will last. A Bissell costs only a few dollars—saves more than original price every year for ten years or longer. You can rely on a

BISSELL'S

"Cyclo" Ball Bearing
Carpet Sweeper

At your dealer's. Price list and booklet "Sweeping Facts and Fallacies"—on request.

BISSELL CARPET SWEEPER CO.

214 Erie Street, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Oldest and Largest Sweeper Makers
Made in Canada, too

Put Your Sweeping Reliance on a Bissell's Appliance

When Coffee
talks

That tempting fragrance of freshly ground coffee is coffee language for "Hurry!" Every moment that coffee is delayed between the grinding and the making means that you are losing coffee goodness. Save that loss by grinding your coffee at home with the

ARCADE CRYSTAL
COFFEE MILL

Put it up on the wall, within easy reach, but out of the way. There's your coffee, unground, but ready to grind, kept airtight, dust-proof and fresh—just reach for the crank and you're off!

It is adjustable to any degree of fineness and the airtight glass container holds a pound of coffee and keeps it clean and crisp. At all dealers.

Drop a postal for our free folder, "How to Make Coffee."

ARCADE MFG. CO.
Freeport, Ill.

Dialogs, Monologs, Musical Comedies, and Revues, Min- Vaudeville Acts, Hootenanny Plays, Make-up Goods, steel Opening Chorus, Darky Plays, Catalog Free.

T. S. DENISON & CO., 623 So. Wabash, Dept. 89, CHICAGO

PLAYS

Wedding Invitations & Announcements
Engraved in the very latest styles. Write for samples.

Dep't J
VIRGINIA STATIONERY CO. RICHMOND, VA.

*We paid $11,000 for this page to tell you of this wonderful
PEACH SHORTCAKE made from BLUE RIBBON PEACHES*

THIS IS HOW TO MAKE PEACH SHORTCAKE

Wash, then soak Blue Ribbon Peaches several hours in cold water. Cook slowly until peaches are tender. Make crust as follows: 2 cups flour; $\frac{3}{4}$ teaspoon salt; 4 teaspoons baking powder; 4 tablespoons shortening; $\frac{3}{4}$ cup sweet milk. Sift flour, salt and baking powder together, cut in the shortening and add milk slowly to make a medium soft dough. Separate in two parts. Roll one-half the dough one-fourth inch thick. Place in a greased pan and spread with softened butter. Roll the other half of dough the same thickness and place on top of the first. Bake in quick oven. When done turn out on a plate. Split the cake. Cover with a layer of peaches, split side down. Sweeten to taste. Cover top crust with another layer of peaches. Whipped cream may be served with the shortcake. If individual cakes are desired, cut the dough with a large cutter or goblet before baking and proceed as above. This recipe was compiled by one of the best-known Nutrition Specialists.

THIS is a good old-fashioned dessert—the kind that makes your mouth water, easy to make and don't cost much. Shortcake filled to overflowing with bright, luscious peaches is a most tempting dessert. We want you to know about it, because your family will like it and you will become a regular user of Blue Ribbon Dried Peaches.

These are different from the ordinary dried peach in that the fuzz and much of the peeling has been removed. They are bright and clean. You can purchase Blue Ribbon Peaches either in bulk or in sanitary cartons.

All of us should eat more fruit. It is a natural food; and dried peaches abound in those mineral elements and fruit acids lacking in many foods, but really vital to good health.

Blue Ribbon Dried Peaches have a delightful flavor and can be used as a Breakfast Fruit, as a Sauce—or in Pies, Cakes, Puddings, Cobblers, etc.

SEND FOR THIS FREE BOOKLET: We have prepared a beautiful recipe booklet containing many low cost recipes, featuring Blue Ribbon Peaches. We will be glad to send you a copy free of charge. Just send us a postal card with your grocer's name. Address us at Room 4.

CALIFORNIA PEACH & FIG GROWERS INC.
MAIN OFFICE: FRESNO, CALIFORNIA MEMBERSHIP 7500 GROWERS

Philip the Gay

(Continued from Page 129)

She swung round the corner of the chair, flames dancing in her eyes. "Are you—are you very busy?" she inquired in a dangerously polite little voice.

Philip le Gai showed all of his white teeth in a sudden flashing smile. "But no," he replied accurately, and made a swift motion as though to rise, only to check himself more swiftly. "Be seated, I pray you."

The look of consuming rage that Fair flashed on him as she seated herself in the small iron chair opposite him would have shriveled a normally sensitive soul to gray ashes.

Her impervious host merely leaned deeper into his bright cushions, the smile still edging his lips. "Laure still plays?"

"Yes," replied Fair. She spoke with considerable difficulty; the royal condescension of that "Be seated" had left her feeling slightly dizzy.

"I have here a paper which will need her sharp wits. She will not be long perhaps?"

"I don't know," replied Fair somberly.

JUST how, she wondered, did you lead up to telling a comparative stranger that you despised him? It was harder than she had thought out there in the meadow that it would be; it was the proud turn of the black head and the sure strength of the long, brown hands and the sheer beauty of the flashing smile that made it hard. No one had a right to look like that and to be despicable. It wasn't fair.

"I think that those poor gods in heaven must envy us our earth to-day," said the object of her scorn, turning his face to the deep blue of the autumn sky. "So warm, so cold, so sweet, like some mad Bacchante. Once, you know, when I was the smallest of little boys, monsieur my grandfather call me to come down from my sleep to drink the health of my very new sister—of young Laure. There was a great banquet, a table brave with fruit and flowers and lace and candles, and they put me onto that table and give me a little something to drink in a great cool glass of crystal; and straight to my head it flew—ah, ciel, the lucky, curly head!

"I remember still, you see; I remember how the world must feel to-day. The world and I, we have been fortunate."

Fair leaned forward swiftly, her hands very cold and her eyes very hot. "Monsieur Philippe, don't you ever, ever get tired of just sitting around doing nothing?"

Perhaps the passion in the clear voice touched him; for a moment Philippe le Gai belied his name. Then he made a slight gesture with the hand that held the papers, a gesture of dismissal to such folly as sober thought. "Tired, Mistress Fairy? How should I be tired, doing nothing? And how are you so sure that I do nothing while I sit around? How are you so sure of that, I wonder?"

"Because I can see you," replied Fair with despairing emphasis.

"Can you then, Wise Eyes? Can you see so well? Then you must see that it is not nothing that I do."

"Oh, isn't it?" she whispered breathlessly, her heart in her voice. "Isn't it?"

"But never. While I sit around I am being very, very busy, me—being alive, and being amused, and being, believe me, most eternally and most exultantly grateful. You call that doing nothing?"

"Of course I call that doing nothing," replied Fair fiercely.

"Now that is strange, because, you know, I am so busy doing it, me, that I can find time to do nothing else. To sit with the sun and beauty and silence all about—that is better than heaven, I think. Always I have loved beauty better than life, and once I thought that I had lost her forever; and, see, she is mine again. In other fields, fields charmed to madness, pale horrors of white clay and red blood, with the proud trees stripped to dirty black stumps—in other fields I remembered these and I swore to that god of battles that if he would send me back to this golden grace, to this greenness and kind quiet, I would ask nothing more."

"And when those stenchies made the poor soul sicker than the body I could somehow hold my breath and smell apple blossoms in the spring moonlight, and yellow roses in the summer sunlight, and spiced wood burning in the great chimneys, and cider blowing across the autumn winds. Now—now I need not hold the breath to smell the good ripe fruit; now I need not close my eyes to see my fields of gold with the little warm, gray sheep against the hills. Now I have come home to my fields, and I keep faith with my God of battles; I ask for nothing more. Look before you, Wise Eyes; what do you see?"

"The alley of lime trees and the north gate and the meadow," said Fair, fighting desperately to harden the voice that wanted only to break.

"Look farther."

"I can see the thatch on Daudin's roof and the road to the village and the little steeple on the church."

"Nothing more?"

"There's nothing more to see."

"YOU do not see a little boy climbing that iron gate and racing home up that long alley, singing—racing quick, quick because it begins to grow dark?"

"Of course I don't see him," replied Fair; but she leaned forward, straining her eyes.

"Look farther; look far away; you cannot see the other little boys—many, many, all hurrying while they sing to get home before it is dark? No? Ah, poor Wise Eyes! Perhaps it is because it is years that those little boys hurry down, instead of just an alley of lime trees; they are hurrying home clear across the centuries. Since that first Philippe came singing up from the south, they have loved these gray stones best of all the earth—best, I think, of heaven. And that last little boy, he did not love it least, believe me. Perhaps he is singing louder than them all, because though they have made it, those others, he has saved it."

"He didn't save it any more than a good many million others," commented Fair ruthlessly.

Philip le Gai threw back his black head with a ringing peal of laughter. "Truly as you say, not more. But that is another reason why he sings, believe me."

"But what did you do before you started in to save it?" pursued the remorseless inquisitor, and suddenly she sickened at her task.

The radiance flagged in the dark face before her; for a moment Philippe le Gai

(Continued on Page 132)

If you Lyonize teeth, they are brilliant and of natural luster

THE possibility of Lyonized teeth began in 1866. Immediately fine teeth became fashionable, and today—American teeth are the admiration of the world. Dr. Lyon's was a great step in advance. It made white teeth an actuality and with safety. These facts have always interested women who are meticulous about their personal appearance. Heartily supported by dentists from the beginning, Dr. Lyon's has gone forward with every step in dental progress—never, however, attempting to assume the responsibility of the dentist or physician. It is unmedicated.

Dr. Lyon's

The Dentifrice that made fine teeth Fashionable

Powder Cream

Approved by the best dental authorities for over fifty years

I. W. LYON & SONS, Inc.

530 West 27th Street, New York

Canadian Distributors:

LYMANS, LIMITED

344 St. Paul St., West, MONTREAL

FREE SAMPLE
Powder or cream
—sent to anyone

With Every Bedroom Occupied

If every bedroom in your home were to be occupied tonight, would you still have an extra bed to offer guests? There is a way to have this extra bed.

Northfield Bed Davenports combine two pieces of furniture needed in every home—a davenport with its comfortable seating capacity, and—a bed. Both of these requirements are met in a most satisfactory and pleasing manner in every Northfield.

Northfield Bed Davenports

First and foremost, Northfields are davenports—deep-cushioned, comfortable, perfect in design, faultless in construction and rich in finish and materials. Although no hint of their night time usefulness is revealed, yet, they are quickly converted into full-size, restful beds whenever an extra bed is required.

Northfields are made in period styles, in oak, walnut and mahogany, as well as in finely modeled designs in fibre-reed. A chair and a rocker are made to match each davenport, and pieces may be chosen singly or en suite as desired. In short—there is a Northfield designed, finished and upholstered appropriately for every home.

"The Davenport with a Secret," is a Northfield. Also, it is the title of a booklet we would like to send you. Will you write?

The Northfield Company
Makers of Good Furniture
Sheboygan . . . Wisconsin

Philip the Gay

(Continued from Page 131)

looked mortally tired. "Me? I was an artist, and an engineer." He sat staring ahead of him, tense and straight, and then he relaxed easily, the smile playing again. "Not so good an artist, and not so bad an engineer, Mistress Fairy. I was, oh, most young, and, oh, most vain, and gray-headed old gentlemen from far away came to beg a little advice as to what to do with their sick mines."

"Mines?" Fair's face was alight. "That was what dad used to do, before he went in for cotton. It was copper, you know. D'you know about copper?"

"Every kind of mine that ever was I knew about," he assured her lightly. "But now I have forgotten."

"How could you," she cried, "when they need you so? Don't you think that that little boy would be ashamed if he could see you sitting on this terrace, just sitting and sitting like a great, enormous, lazy black cat? Don't you?"

"Why, no," replied Philippe le Gai. "I do not think that he would be ashamed."

Fair wrung her hands together; she felt defeat closing about her. "Those fields that you talked about—don't you want to make them green and golden again too?"

"They are very tired, those fields," said the man. "Shall we not let them rest?"

"Oh," cried Fair, and the valiant voice struggled and broke, "how can you? Oh, oh, how can you?"

"Fair!" He was on his feet at last.

THE swift move sent the paper flying, and it came fluttering irresponsibly across the sunlit space between them, dancing to a halt almost at her feet. It had blown open, and her eyes were riveted on the letterhead, the little, black letters spelling out the name of dad's attorney, "Henry C. Forrester, Wall Street"; she stared incredulously:

Dear Sir: In further reply to your request for full details as to the fortune left Miss Carter by her father—

A wave of scarlet, a blinding, suffocating wave that held her from heel to brow, swept over her; she felt as though she were drowning; she felt as though she were being buried alive; she felt as though a bolt of lightning had passed clean through her body, leaving her quite dead and still.

"So that is what you are?" she said.

"You—you! I might have known."

"What I am?"

His voice was touched with a little wonder. "No, but I do not understand; what is it that I am?"

"There's no word for you," she told him between her clicking teeth. She was shaking violently, uncontrollably, like someone in a chill. "Crawling to my lawyers—you—you! A common adventurer—"

"You are mad," he said.

"It's here," cried Fair. "Look. It's here in black and white; are you going to deny it?"

"Give me that letter."

"I wouldn't touch it in a thousand years," she flung at him; "not in a hundred, hundred thousand. It's filthy; it can lie there till it rots."

"Pick it up," he told her.

"How dare you?" she whispered. "How dare you? How dare you?"

"It is not so very greatly daring," he assured her softly. "Pick it up, I tell you."

FAIR stared at him voicelessly where he stood, tall and splendid and terrible in the sunlight. No, no, this was nightmare; this was not true. It was not she who bent to the bidding of this relentless monster; it was some other Fairfax, caught in a hideous dream. The paper rattled in her fingers like goblin castanets.

"Now bring it to me."

She crossed the little space of sun-warmed bricks, her eyes fixed as a sleep walker.

"Closer," bade the still voice. "Closer yet. Yes. Now put it in my hand. That way—yes. It was not yours, you see. Did you forget that?"

Fair made no answer. If she opened her lips she might scream; she watched the brown fingers, folding the bit of white paper into a neat oblong.

"I would not, I think, say any word to Laure of this," said the voice. "And I would not, I think, stay here longer. I would forget all this—and go."

"I am going this afternoon," she told him through her stiff lips. "And I am going to tell Laure everything."

"DO NOT," he said. "Do not, believe me." He stood very stiff for a moment, staring down at the paper, and then he spoke again. "I am, as you say, an adventurer," said Philippe le Gai in that terrible and gentle voice. "An adventurer is, as you say, common. For which I thank my gods. You have nothing more to say to me?"

"Nothing."

"Then that is all, I think, Miss Carter."

Obviously the audience was over; the courtier was dismissed. Oh, for one word, one little, little word to blast him where he stood, gentle and insolent and relentless. She could not find that word; she could not find it; and she would die before she would give him any other. Out of this nightmare—she must get out of this nightmare! The brown boots stumbled in their haste on the terrace steps; but at the foot she turned once more to face him, flinging him a last look of terror and defiance and despair and, deeper than all, wonder. But Philippe le Gai's face was turned once more to his golden fields.

Far away, at the end of the long alley, she could see the players coming back; she could hear them, too, laughing and calling to each other. Bravo was barking frenziedly, heedless of Diane's small, peremptory shouts; there, he was off, with Raoul and Diane in mad pursuit, headed straight for the distant stables. She clung to the stone railing for a moment, limp and sick, and then she flung back her head, spurred her flagging feet and set off down the arching lime trees, running. Running because she was desperately tired and desperately frightened; because it was towards battle that she ran, and she must get there swiftly.

Laure hailed her from the far end, gay and kind. "Ah, small deserter, you come to surrender? Come quick then, and do penance."

"I've not come to do penance," said the deserter. She stood very straight with her hands clasped tightly behind her, color like flame dancing beneath her skin. "I've come to say good-by."

"Good-by?" echoed Laure. "Here, André, take this mallet, this ball. What folly is this, Fair?"

"It's not folly; the folly's been in staying. I've learned quite a lot of things in the last few minutes, Laure. Monsieur de Lautrel has some papers that he wants to show you on the terrace."

"PAPERS? Well, but what is all this mystery? Come now, Fair, you are not well. I know. The doctor he said you should not be excited—"

"I am not in the least excited," replied Fair, her eyes two glittering danger signals.

"Are you in this plot, too, Monsieur André?"

"Plot? No, decidedly, this is fever. Let me feel your hands, mon enfant."

"Don't touch me, please," said Fair very clearly and distinctly.

"Did I say fever? But it is delirium! am not to touch you?"

"No." She took a step farther away from Laure, who stood looking down at her, clear

(Continued on Page 134)

How I Made $1150 in Eleven Months —Right in My Own Home

My spare-time earnings made the first payment on our home. We plan to pay the rest the same way. Read how simple it is to turn spare hours into dollars.

By Mrs. Frank Unger

WHEN we were first married, my husband and I used to make a little game of paying the household bills. Every Saturday afternoon as regular as clock work, I got out the bills, and he produced his check book, and settled up with everybody. We used to call it "wiping the slate clean." Back in those days there was always plenty of cash to meet the bills, and maybe enough left over for a couple of theatre tickets or a little outing.

Then by and by we began to notice that somehow there wasn't any surplus. Prices were increasing and my husband began to look grave as he drew the checks. I too was worried. We quit spending anything for recreation and began pinching pennies here and there. But even then we had barely enough to get by with from week to week.

Then one week we had some extra expenses and we found the money would not go around. I felt so badly about it, that I just wanted to cry. But that was only the beginning. Almost every week it seemed as though we had to put off paying some bill. Our expenses were steadily increasing. My husband's wages were hardly enough to meet the household accounts, to say nothing of clothing. And so things ran along for months, with us pinching and skimping and trying desperately to break even.

I began wondering what I could do to help. Surely there must be something. To go out and work was impossible, because I had a four months old baby to care for. Perhaps I could have tucked baby into his carriage and made a few calls in the afternoon, canvassing for something. But I was never cut out for an agent. I knew I would scarcely make pin-money that way. And we needed plenty of real cash.

How COULD I Make Money?

There was just one thing for me. I must find some sort of home work that would pay good wages. I wasn't suited to become a seamstress or a dressmaker. What could I do?

Finally I began looking in the magazines and newspapers for some sort of paying home work. I used to get mightily discouraged in my search. But nothing came of it. No one seemed to have any work to offer me.

Then, one day I opened the paper to look for work, as usual. And on one of the pages this headline caught my eye: "How I Make Money Right at Home." Of course, I started to read, and soon I was real excited. It was about a woman whose husband got a small salary—hardly enough for them to live on with everything so expensive. She wanted to make extra money just as bad as I did. But she had two little children so she couldn't do any paying work unless she could find something to do at home. It was my situation exactly.

Then it went on to tell how at last she did find profitable home work—making socks on a hand-knitting machine, and how the company paid her for making them, and furnished replacement yarn for each lot of standard socks she sent in. The name of the firm was the Auto-Knitter Hosiery Company, and they were located at Buffalo, N. Y.

"Well," I said to myself, "this certainly looks like a chance for me to make some money. At any rate, I can't lose anything by finding out what they have to offer."

So I wrote a letter to the company, asking for their free information. In just a few days I had a reply telling me all about the machine, and the details of their home work proposition. And then I was more enthusiastic than ever.

I told some of my friends about the knitting machine, but most of them only laughed and said I would never make any money with one of those things. My husband was doubtful about it. But finally he said: "Your judgment is usually pretty good. If you really believe you can make money with an Auto-Knitter, why, send and get one."

How I Started.

And that is exactly what I did. I sent the order just as fast as I could. Then pretty soon my knitter arrived. At first I was a little bit afraid, because I didn't know anything about machines.

But I often think now how simple it was to learn to run my Auto-Knitter when I sat down and went at it with the Instruction Book as my guide. If I had done this more carefully when I first received my machine, I should have made a perfect sock much quicker than I did. The book makes everything so clear.

I submitted the first faultless sock I made to the Auto-Knitter Hosiery Company. They said it was fine and they would buy all I could make like it. I was as happy as a lark! At last I had a way to make money without leaving my home and baby.

Well, I started to work then in real earnest, putting in every minute I could spare from my housework. The more I worked the Auto-Knitter the faster I could turn out a pair of socks. The first week I made only one dozen pairs, but the next week I made two dozen, and went on increasing.

Mrs. Frank Unger.

Hosiery Company kept coming in for each lot of standard socks I sent them. I think the pay for this home work is wonderful. I love my work more each week. And the beauty of it is that I don't have to keep regular hours. I can knit whenever I have a few moments to spare, besides taking care of my baby and doing the housework.

Made Over 7,000 Pairs.

My machine works perfectly. The only repairs I have needed were some needles which were carelessly broken. I can now make four pairs of men's socks in one hour. My socks have always been cheerfully accepted and paid for by the company, except a few pairs that I could easily make over. I have knit over 7,000 pairs of men's socks. Several hundred pairs were sold to my friends. When I sell one pair in a family it isn't long before all of the men-folks buy from two to six pairs. Everyone says he has never before had a chance to buy such nice warm socks with the real "home-made" quality worked right into them. I sell them at $1.00 a pair, realizing a nice profit.

I have had my machine eleven months, and I have made in all $1,150.00 out of the socks I have knit with it. With this money we have made the first payment on our home, and plan to pay the rest in the same way. In addition I have made my original investment for machine and yarn.

Just imagine what it has meant to us to have more than $100.00 "extra" money coming in each month. And now we are realizing the dream of a lifetime—a little cottage of our own. Our Auto-Knitter has made it possible. Without the little wonder-worker, we would still be worrying along, facing a hopeless, dreary existence. Oh, I am so glad we are away from it all, that I could just shout for joy! To those who want to make extra money at home in their spare time, I heartily recommend the Auto-Knitter. There is nothing like it.

Mrs. Frank Unger, New York.

How You, Too, Can Make Money at Home.

We asked Mrs. Unger to tell you, in her very own words, her experiences with the Auto-Knitter, because we wanted you to know what can actually be accomplished at home with spare-time work.

Here is a woman who was face-to-face with the "more-money" problem. Her insight and judgment enabled her to size up the Auto-Knitter offer quickly and decide promptly. This judgment was amply vindicated by the fact that she got back her entire original investment with two weeks' average earnings, having made more than $100 monthly, a return of almost 200% a month on her original investment. Not everyone makes as much with the Auto-Knitter as Mrs. Unger, because not everyone devotes as much time and energy to the work, but women everywhere are solving the "extra-money" problem in this way without leaving their home. Men, too, are making money with the knitter in spare time. Why shouldn't you do likewise?

Perhaps you haven't even as much spare time as Mrs. Unger. It may be that you can devote only a few moments at a time to the work. But don't let that discourage you. For in these odd snatches of time you can earn at the same rate as though you operated your machine all day. And, as Mrs. Unger points out, you can pick up the work at any time, knit as long as you wish, and leave your machine when it is necessary to do something else. Auto-Knitting will pay you directly in proportion to the time you spend at it.

Clearly and briefly here is our proposition: The Auto-Knitter Hosiery Company enters into an agreement to buy all the standard socks you knit on the Auto-Knitter, and send in to them, paying a fixed guaranteed price. You can send large shipments or small, just as you please. Checks will be sent promptly for each lot. Replacement yarn is also furnished for every shipment you send in. Thus you have yarn to work up into more socks. Under the terms of our Work Agreement you have steady, pleasant, well-paid employment without "going to work."

Previous experience in hand-knitting is not necessary. Inexperienced persons can learn to turn out standard "Olde Tyme" wool socks, with the aid of the Auto-Knitter. These socks have all of the comfort, warmth and strength of hand-knitted socks. And the machine operates many times faster than even the most skilled hand-knitter.

The Auto-Knitter comes to you with a sock already started in it. Then, too, there's a complete instruction book that makes everything plain. The work is so pleasant and enjoyable you hardly realize it is work. And as you operate the machine you are earning money to buy pretty things to wear, new furnishings for the home—and whatever else you may be needing.

Write Today for Our Liberal Wage Offer.

Of course you want to know more about the wonderful little machine that helped Mrs. Frank Unger make her dreams come true; the machine that has done so much for other women.

Send right away for the company's free literature and read the experiences of other Auto-Knitter owners. Find out about the pleasant and profitable money-making opportunity offered you.

Remember what Mrs. Unger said just a few short months ago—"At any rate I can't lose anything by finding out what they have to offer!" She lost no time in getting the facts. You are in her position today. Will you follow her example?

Just write your name and address in the space below. The Auto-Knitter Hosiery Co., Inc., Dept. 12, 630-632 Genesee Street, Buffalo, N. Y.

The Auto-Knitter Hosiery Co., Inc.
Department 12, 630-632 Genesee Street,
Buffalo, New York

Send me full particulars about Making Money at Home with the Auto-Knitter. I enclose 2 cents postage to cover cost of mailing prospectus, etc. It is understood that this does not obligate me in any way.

Name (Please write plainly.)

Address

City State

L.H.J. 2-22

Little Miss Gage

is the name for a line of hats for girls of from six to twelve years. These hats carry the Gage crown tip; are both tailored and trimmed and reflect in value and style the Gage reputation for distinction in millinery. You will be delighted to find how attractive they are, and to see with what care the Gage insistence for good wear and individual style has been made available in hats for girls.

An illustrated booklet of these new Little Miss Gage Hats has just been issued. It contains also some interesting stories of the "big out-doors" that will please little girls. A copy will be mailed you on request.

GAGE BROTHERS & COMPANY
18 So. Michigan Ave. Fifth Ave. & 37th St.
Chicago New York

36 old world cities on the GATES TOUR that takes you to Oberammergau

LEAVING New York by one of the regular Gates Tours, sailings beginning in May, you will have 14 days in France before seeing the Passion Play—afterwards there come 6 days in Switzerland and almost two whole weeks in Italy. In all 36 old world cities will be visited. Optional dates of return and detours may be arranged.

Gates European Tours $395 up

Covering steamship and hotel accommodations as well as all ordinary sightseeing expenses. Gates Tours, founded in 1892, have earned a reputation of social exclusiveness, they are in reality like a party of congenial friends on tour.

Get the Gates Complete Tour Booklet. Tours from $395 upwards. Write direct or apply to Raymond-Whitcomb Co. General Agents at any of their offices. Ask for Booklet A 13.

All Gates Tours include Paris and the American Botanicals

GATES TOURS—Founded 1892

"World Travel at Reasonable Cost"

225 Fifth Avenue, New York
London—Paris—Rome

SALAD SECRETS

100 recipes. Brief but complete. 15c by mail. 100 Meatless recipes 15c. 50 Sandwich recipes 15c. All three 30c.

B. A. BRIGGS, 250 Madison St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

STUDY NURSING FINE POSITIONS SECURED

Write PHILADELPHIA SCHOOL FOR NURSES
2223 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Philip the Gay

(Continued from Page 132)

and quiet and lovely, with that incredulous lift to her brows. "Don't pretend any more, please; it makes me rather sick. I know about everything, you see."

"That is very exactly what I do not do, ma petite. No, André, do not go; you, too, will wait and see. What is this nonsense, Fair?"

"You needn't keep it up any longer, I tell you," returned Fair fiercely. "I've found out what you and Monsieur de Lautrec have been doing. I thought that you loved me, Laure—you did it pretty well—and all the time you were nothing but fortune hunters, were you? Now you both know what I think of you, and I'm going."

"YOU told Philippe—that?" asked Laure. Every atom of color had drained out of her face, but she did not lift her voice. "No, wait, André. I am not yet through. It would be a good hunter who could find your fortune, Fairfax. You have none to hunt for."

"I have two million dollars," said Fair. "You have not half a million centimes. It was all in cotton, that great fortune; it is gone. Your lawyers had cabled to you while you were ill in Germany; but the doctors, they said you must not hear that bad news then; they asked me to tell you gently when you were much better. So I have waited, and Philippe, he has cabled three—no, four—times to see whether skill and thought and work might not save that so mighty fortune. To-day he thought perhaps that we might have heard—"

"Oh!" said Fair in a small, childish voice.

"Oh!" She put her hand to her head; it hurt dreadfully. "Well, then I can go to work." She made a vague gesture as though if she stretched out her hand work would be there for her to cling to; and Laure smiled, a fine, cruel little smile. Something snapped in Fair's head. "That sounds ridiculous, doesn't it, Laure? But you see, I'm not over six feet tall; I'm not stronger than steel; I'm not busy twelve hours a day sitting around in the sun being an ex-hero; so I'm going to work."

"Did you, perhaps, tell my brother that you thought that of him too?" asked Laure.

"I told him that, and I told him more."

LAURE came towards her, something so terrible in her white face that for a moment Fair thought that she was going to kill her. "Little fool," she said very softly. "Little wicked fool! Philippe cannot work; Philippe is blind." "No!" cried Fair. She clapped her hands over her ears to shut out those dreadful words, her face a twisted mask of terror. "No, no, no!"

"And I tell you yes, yes, yes," repeated the tall girl before her, closing her long fingers over the small wrists, wrenching the clinging hands down relentlessly. "Blind like a stone, I tell you—blind." "He couldn't be; I'd have seen—"

"What have you ever seen that did not touch yourself?" asked Philippe's sister. "He is blind, but not so blind as you. When you came to us, never, never did we think that you would not see, though we could not talk of it—not yet. But Philippe—Philippe, he said, 'No, no; let her alone. She has need of peace and mirth and sunshine, those doctors said; darkness it must not touch her. We will be careful, and perhaps she will not know.' You have well repaid that care, have you not, Fairfax?"

"But his eyes—his eyes—"

"His eyes—because they are still there, you think they see? They saw too much, those eyes; they see no more. What made the light behind them, that nerve behind them—it is paralyzed. Philippe—all day, all night he works; he works—to learn to read, to learn to write, to learn to live."

"Please let me go, Laure," whispered Fair. "Please, Laure! Please, Laure!"

"I will tell Marie Leontine to help you with your packing," said Laure. "And I am glad indeed to let you go. Come, André."

Fair watched them cutting across the garden to the east entrance—not the terrace, not the terrace. She clung to the lime tree, fighting desperately. She mustn't faint; she mustn't cry; she mustn't go mad—not yet. She couldn't run any more; she felt as though she could never run again; but perhaps if she started now and went very carefully, holding to the lime trees, she could get there before he left. She must; she must get there before he left. . . .

Not until she was at the steps did she dare to raise her eyes. He was still there.

"Laure?" he called. "Laure?"

"It's me," said Fair. "I came—back." She saw him grind the paper between his hands, and then he turned towards her.

"You had forgotten something?"

You are weeping? Do not weep. Those little jewels of tears, so small, so shining, so empty, empty—you women love them best of all your jewels, I think. But me, I do not think that they become you best."

"I DON'T cry often," Fair told him. "Not often really. You can ask dad; no, no, not dad. I didn't mean to, truly; it's because I'm tired probably. I came back because I wanted to tell you—"

"Why, because you were a good child and wanted to tell me that you were sorry?"

"No—no. Because I wanted to tell you that I was glad."

"Glad?" He was on his feet.

"How could I be sorry for you, Philippe? Oh, I can't be sorry for myself, not even now, not when I see myself. I wanted so to be proud of you, you don't know—"

"And why did you so want to be proud of me, may I ask?"

"Because I love you," said Fair clearly.

Philippe le Gai caught at the cushioned chair. "You are mad," he said.

"Yes." The voice tripped in its haste. "Yes; but, you see, I had to tell you. You mustn't mind; I'm going. Don't mind, please, Philippe. I didn't know myself, truly—not till Laure told me about—about you, and I knew that I didn't care at all how loathsome and vile I had been, because I was so glad that you—that you—"

"Hush!" He stood quite still, and then he raised his hand to his eyes. "I should send you far from me, Fairfax."

"Yes," said Fair; "I'm not any good, you see. All I had to give you was my money and my—my prettiness. I can't give you either of them."

"When I heard you laugh, that first night when you came," he told her, "I remembered—I remembered that laughter was not just a sound to cover up despair; I remembered how to laugh that night."

SHE stared at him, voiceless. "When you spoke to me—when you spoke to me, my Music, I was glad then that I could not see, because I wished to listen only—always."

"Philippe!" she prayed. "Don't, don't send me away, Philippe." "We are mad," he said. "Come closer."

And once more she went towards him across to where he stood, tall and splendid and terrible.

"Closer still," he said. "Closer still. Why do you weep, my Laughter?"

"Hold me—hold me; don't let me go."

"Blindness," he said; "it is just a little word, a little, dark, ugly word to frighten foolish children. Are you beautiful, my Loveliness? Never, never could you be beautiful as I dream you."

He touched her lips with his brown fingers. "Smile!" he said. And she smiled.

"What is blindness to me who can touch your lips to laughter?" he asked her, bending his black head until his lips swept her lashes. "What is blindness to me, who can touch your eyes to tears?"

The sunlight fell across her bright hair; he could feel it warm against his lips, and suddenly he laughed aloud.

"What is blindness to me?" cried Philippe le Gai to the golden sun. "What is blindness to me who hold my light against my heart?"

A Belated Valentine

By CAROLYN WELLS

GOOD-NATURED Enoch Satterlee had a good-natured wife;

No quarrels ever marred the even tenor of their life. They jogged along serenely in a calm and placid way. And all the neighbors quite agreed a model pair were they.

Almira wasn't much on style, but gave him three square meals; She let him smoke his pipe in peace and darned his toes and heels;

And Enoch never thought to rise when she came in the room— Unless indeed she shooed him out with duster, mop and broom.

And as to little compliments about her looks or dress, He never thought of those at all—and she thought even less. Had he been asked he would have said, "Oh, well, I like her ways."

And "He's a good provider" would have been her meed of praise.

All this was well enough, of course; but as the years went by The pair began to drift apart and couldn't just say why. They loved each other; but, you see, it never had occurred To either of them that love pines for lack of spoken word.

One day as Enoch went downtown, by luck he chanced to pass. Absorbed in their own love affairs, a laughing lad and lass; They read something together, and they smiled at every line; Old Enoch craned his neck to see; it was a valentine!

"By gum!" he said. "By jumpin' jinks! I wonder what she'd say If I should send Almira one? I will—this very day!"

He hurried to the village store and bought the finest one, And sent it to his wife by post—then waited for the fun.

He watched Almira while she read the tender missive through; The tears fell from her shining eyes and—his were filling too; And as he took her in his arms she flushed a lovely pink, And said: "This valentine has brought all that life lacked, I think."

"Yes"; she was quite near now. "I came back to tell you—to tell you—"

His smile deepened. "Ah, tiens! There was something then that you forgot to tell me? Never should I have said it."

"Please," she entreated in that shadow of a voice. "Please, I know now about—about—Laure told me."

"About why I lie like that cat in the sun? Good. Now you tell Laure—" He broke off sharply. "She was not kind, our Laure?"

What Shall I Serve with the Salad?

To nibble a cracker between mouthfuls of salad is a natural taste.

A crisp, salty cracker makes the salad taste better.

Sunshine Krispy Crackers are the sort of crackers that harmonize with the salad course.

As their name indicates, they are crisp without being hard or brittle—a flaky crispness.

They are small and dainty, and salted slightly—just right, you will agree when you taste them.

When you are buying Sunshine Krispy Crackers, look over the other crackers, biscuits and wafers displayed in the Sunshine Biscuit Rack.

You will see many that will suggest ideas for dainty luncheon and dinner service.

LOOSE-WILES BISCUIT COMPANY

Bakers of Sunshine Biscuits

Branches in Over 100 Cities

Everymeal Everyday Sunshine Biscuits

Sunshine Krispy Crackers with Pineapple-Cheese Salad

Put a slice of pineapple on a lettuce leaf for each serving. Place a ball of cream cheese on pineapple. Garnish with pimento. Cover with French dressing. Serve with Sunshine Krispy Crackers.

from the thousand Window
akeries

a new INDESTRUCTO creation with square corners

You have always thought of Indestructo as a high priced, ultra fashionable, arch-corner trunk insured against destruction for five years.

We now offer Indestructo-Z, a square cornered trunk, with angle steel edges, equally fashionable, insured for three years and selling from 25% to 40% less.

You can buy an insured Indestructo-Z wardrobe trunk for $45 or up to $100 according to the interior arrangements and conveniences. An Indestructo arch-corner trunk of similar size and finish will cost from $60 up to $250.

Here is the difference

It costs just as much to build Indestructo arch-corner construction for a $60 trunk as for one costing $250. Special equipment is required to cement the sides, edges and corners together under enormous pressure. This unit-built structure is only to be had in an Indestructo trunk.

No special equipment is required to build the Indestructo-Z models. They derive their name and strength from a Z-angle steel reinforcement between corner, edge and side; consequently it is made and sold for less.

A strength comparison

A Government testing laboratory packed an Indestructo arch-corner trunk with 400 pounds of lead and cloth and dropped it in a fifteen foot testing wheel 5000 times before it began to spill its contents.

Indestructo-Z was dropped 1822 times before the rivets which held it together were loosened. The best trunk of another make previously tested failed after 700 falls.

How to decide which trunk to buy

For continuous or severe travel choose an Indestructo arch-corner trunk even at the higher price. There is real economy in owning a trunk so strong that we can say of it, "If your Indestructo fails to stand the actual travel of five years we will repair it satisfactorily or give you a new one free."

Select an Indestructo-Z, if you want a trunk that will cost less and yet give you a greater proportion of faithful service than you might expect from an average trunk; it is insured for three years against travel abuse.

But by all means buy an Indestructo trunk if you care about having others say when you travel, "You must have a wonderful trunk, my dear, your gowns look as fresh as the day you bought them."

INDESTRUCTO FINE HAND LUGGAGE AND SANITARY HOUSEHOLD HAMPER

The fine hand luggage now being sold under the Indestructo name includes a limited number of suit cases, overnight cases and bags. Exclusive as to design and utility—they embody some unusual features not found in any other hand luggage.

Indestructo Sanitary Hampers find their place in the well-equipped home; for bedroom, bath, kitchen or laundry they provide a convenient storage for soiled linen. Usually obtainable at department and furniture stores specializing in household accessories.

Write for a free copy of "How to Pack a Trunk"

INDESTRUCTO

TRUNK  MAKERS

MISHAWAKA • INDIANA

All styles and sizes sold by better dealers everywhere

Vandemark's Folly

(Continued from Page 20)

hands doubled into fists and beating the air. He bit down upon his Norwegian words with clenched teeth. I was afraid to talk to him. Finally he turned to me and said:

"Ay know de man! Ay keel dis Gowdy! You hare, Yake? Ay keel him!"

Of course I told him that this would never do, and talked the way we all do when it is our duty to keep a friend from ruining himself. He sat down while I was talking, and so far as I could see heard never a word of what I said. Finally I talked myself out, and still he sat there as silent as a statue.

"Ay—tank—Ay—take—a—valk," he said at last, and he went out into the night. I lay back expecting that he would come in pretty soon, but I went to sleep and woke late. He was still absent.

When I got to my place the widow told me that he had been there, had had a long talk with Rowena and had hitched up his team and driven away. Rowena was asleep when I looked in, and I went out to plow. If Magnus had gone to kill Buck Gowdy there was nothing I could do to prevent it. As a matter of fact, I approved of his impulse.

When I turned out at noon I saw Magnus' team and a horse hitched to a buggy tied to my corncrib; and when I went into the house I half expected to find Jim Boyd the sheriff there, to arrest Magnus Thorkelson for murder.

What I really found was Elder Thorndyke and Grandma and the widow, all standing by Rowena's bed. The widow was holding the baby in her arms, but as I came in she laid it in a chair and covered it up, as much as to indicate that on this occasion the less seen of the infant the better. Magnus was holding Rowena's hand, and the Elder was standing on the other side of the bed holding a book. Magnus motioned me to stand beside him, and as I took my place handed me a gold ring. Rowena looked up at me piteously, as if to ask forgiveness. I had never seen a marriage ceremony and was at my wit's end to know what we were doing, thinking sometimes that it was a wedding, and sometimes that it might be something like extreme unction; when at last the Elder said, "I pronounce you man and wife!"

XVI

NOW I leave it to the reader whether in this case of the trouble of Rowena Fewkes and her marriage to Magnus Thorkelson I did anything by which I ought to have forfeited the esteem of my neighbors, of the Reverend and Mrs. Thorndyke, or of Virginia Royall. Yet, that one good act of standing by a poor girl degraded me more in the minds of the community than all he spavins, thorough-ins, poll-evils and he like I ever concealed or glossed over a horse trading.

Grandma Thorndyke came out no more to redd up my ouse and exhibit her ipples of prospective wives to me. he neighbors called a more. I began diving over to the ew railroad to do my marketing, though was twice as close to go to Monterey Center. hen Elder Thorndyke, largely through e contributions of Governor Wade and uckner Gowdy, succeeded in getting his urch built, I was not asked to go to the ings of laying the corner stone or shingling e steeple.

I was an outsider. I know now that things began to change r me in the minds of the people when owena's baby was christened. This took ace early in the winter. Magnus asked me go to the church, so I was present when agnus and Rowena stood before the altar. iter the responses had been made, Elder rorndyke unfolded a paper which had been ended him with the name of the child on it;

then he went on with his part of the ceremony: "In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, I baptize thee —" And then he carried on a whispered conversation with the mother, gave the loudest honk I ever heard him utter, and finished: "I baptize thee, Owen Lovejoy Gowdy."

The elder looked around as if wondering whether he had not committed some sort of crime in thus offending a man who had put so much money into the new church building. He had not, however; for in advertising in this way Gowdy's wrong to one girl he ended forever his sly approaches, under the excuse of getting her some fictitious property, saving his soul, and the like, to another.

THEN came the excitement of the Civil War. This thing, which changed all our lives the way war does, came upon me like a clap of thunder. I was living like a hermit and working like a horse. Lincoln's first call for volunteers took only a few men out of the county, and none from Vandemark township except George Story. I had not begun to take much interest in the matter; and when in the summer of 1861 there began to be war meetings to spur us young men to enlistment the speakers all shouted to us that the war was not to free the slaves but to save the Union. Now this was a new slant on the question, and I had to think over it.

One night at a war meeting I saw Virginia with a young man dressed in store clothes, whom I afterward knew as Will Lockwood, the principal of the Monterey Center school. He seemingly was going forward to put his name down as enlisted. I jumped in ahead of him, so as to show Virginia that her fellow was not the only patriot, and beat him to it.

"So you are going to fight Kaintucky?" said she to me, as if I had engaged to ruin everything she held dear.

"We must save the Union," I said. "I didn't think of you being on the other side!"

"Mr. Lockwood," said she, "this is Teunis Vandemark, an old friend of mine. He's going to fight my friends too."

In two or three minutes I found that he was from Herkimer County and had lived along the Erie Canal, and was actually the son of my old teacher Lockwood. He was my best friend during all my service as a soldier, which you will soon see was not long. We left him on the field at Shiloh.

The recruiting officer got us uniforms—or somebody did; and during the nice weather—it was October when I enlisted—our company did some drilling. We had no arms, but used shotguns, squirrel rifles and even sticks. Will Lockwood tried to drill us, but made a bad job out of it. Then one day Buckner Gowdy, who had also enlisted, took charge of a squad of men and in ten minutes showed that he knew more about military drill than anyone else in the county. He had been educated at a military school in Virginia. All the skill in drill that we ever got we owed to him. It was gall and wormwood for me and worse for Magnus; but when it came to electing a captain of our company I voted for Gowdy, and under the same conditions would do it again. It was better to have a real captain who was a scoundrel than a man who knew nothing but kept the commandments.

Governor Wade gave us a great entertainment at his farm just before we marched. Everybody was there—except Judge Stone.

Virginia was there with the Elder and Grandma. The old preacher and his wife looked more shabby than I had ever seen them—Grandma's gloves more extensively darned, the Elder's clothes shinier, his cuffs in all their whiteness more frayed; and there were beautifully darned places in the stiff,

(Continued on Page 139)

The Walls of These Homes Are Not Alabastined

PLACE on your walls, new or old, dainty colorings of Alabastine—the charm and cheerfulness of tones or tints exactly to your taste, best adapted to light and location, or in close harmony with your rugs or furnishings, and

- if you are a renter—you will not wish to move.
- if you own your own home—you will not care to sell.
- or, if you deal in properties—there will be no lack of tenants or purchasers.

Beautiful and inviting walls are the sure result of using

Alabastine

Instead of Kalsomine or Wall Paper

For Alabastine has proved its superiority—not only in homes but in buildings of all kinds where beautiful interiors are desired.

Sanitary, artistic, economical, easily applied over plaster, wall board, paint, burlap or canvas, Alabastine gives the smooth, perfect coloring which brings out the best in drapes and furnishings and forms a most pleasing background for the personality of your home.

Nearly all good stores selling paints have Alabastine in stock. Any good decorator will use it if you request, or where decorators are not available you can do the work yourself. Just mix Alabastine with pure cold water and apply with a suitable brush. But be sure the sign of the genuine, the cross and circle, is printed in red on every box you buy or your decorator brings.

Send for Our Booklet on Home Decoration

Let us send you, without cost, our booklet showing in actual Alabastine colors the newest and most popular tints for home interiors. Write us about your home and our staff of experts will help you decide upon the most pleasing plan of decoration.

Ask Your Dealer or Decorator About

The Alabastine-Opaline-Process

This is a new vari-colored wall treatment, a charming novelty in home decoration whose beautiful color harmonies it is impossible to describe in words. Before refinishing your walls ask your dealer or decorator to show samples of this new tiffanized effect.

PRICES

5-lb. package White Alabastine	75c
5-lb. package Tinted Alabastine	80c
Special deep shades (No. 33 dark green, No. 58 deep brown)	95c

Alabastine Company

544 Grandville Avenue, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Charles Villiar Sparr, fifteen months old son of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sparr of Prescott, Iowa.

Brown are his eyes and auburn his hair—and his little body is as sturdy as the most devoted mother could wish. "... his constant good health has made him full of vim and pep", Mrs. Sparr says.

Vigor—do you wish it for your boy?

SINCE her son, Villiar, is so healthy and active, both mentally and physically, it is not surprising that Mrs. Sparr is an enthusiast about Eagle Brand. For Eagle Brand has always been Villiar's food—and he has never had even the least of the usual ills of childhood.

When he was ten months old Villiar walked; at fifteen months—when this picture was taken—Villiar's mother began to teach him his A B C's! He has "keen intelligence", Mrs. Sparr reports, and "he learns exceedingly fast". Of course, her own thoughtful care has had much to do with the little boy's development, but she, herself, gives Eagle Brand the credit.

What mother doesn't want her child to be well and vigorous as to body, and quick as to mind? So much depends upon the food—and it is not necessary to experiment with your baby's food. Nurse him, of course, if it is possible—but if for any reason you cannot do this, don't take unnecessary risks. There are no doubts about the purity or the splendid results of Eagle Brand as an infant food. It has been the standard baby food for 64 years.

Eagle Brand is nothing but wholesome country milk blended with pure sugar. Mrs. Sparr is only one of the many thousands of mothers who have testified to its benefits. Doctors recommend it for babies who are puny and are losing weight. When other foods fail, Eagle Brand has proved itself again and again. It is easily digested; its purity and quality remain constant; it can be bought anywhere.

Do you want a cunning record book in which to keep your baby's history? Then write for "The Best Baby" and for chart and booklet about feeding. Both are free.

THE BORDEN COMPANY
Borden Building New York

Borden's
THE NATION'S MILK

Eagle Brand
Condensed Milk
Evaporated Milk
Malted Milk
Milk Chocolate
Condensed Coffee

Established 1857

Borden's
EAGLE BRAND
Condensed Milk

Vandemark's Folly

(Continued from Page 137)

starched bosom of his shirt. He pressed my hand warmly as he said "God bless you, Jacob, and bring you safe back to us, my boy!" Grandma's eyes glistened as she schooled his sentiments and began asking me about my underwear and especially my socks. Virginia looked the other way; but when I went off by myself Will Lockwood came and drew me off into a corner to talk with me about old times along the canal; and suddenly we found Virginia there, and Will all at once thought of someone he wanted to speak to and left us together.

"I didn't mean that I thought you ought not to go to the war, Teunis," said she. "You must go, of course."

"Maybe your friends," I said after standing dumb for a while, "will be on the Union side."

"No," said she. "I have no relations—and few friends there; but all I have will be on the other side, I reckon. It makes no difference. They've forgotten me by this time. Everybody has forgotten me that once liked me—everybody but Elder Thorndyke and Mrs. Thorndyke. They love me, but nobody else does."

"I thought some others acted as if they did," I said.

"You thought a lot about it!" she scoffed. Then we sat quite a while silent. "I shall think every day," said she at last, "about the only happy time I have had since Ann took sick—and long before that."

"What time was that?" I asked.

"You know, Teunis." The tears were falling in her lap now. "Those days when we were together alone on the wide prairie—when you took me in and were so good to me. Something has come between us lately, Teunis. I partly know what, and partly I don't, but something —"

She stopped in the middle of what she seemed to be saying.

"We are very poor," said she, nodding toward the Elder and Grandma. "So, ignorant as I am, I kept a school last summer. Did you know that?"

"Yes," I said, "I knew about it."

SHE touched on so many things—sore things and sacred things—in this speech at I only looked at her with tears in my eyes; and she saw them. It was the only answer I could make, and before she could say any more the Elder and his wife came and took her home.

I had small part in the Civil War. But one thing that took place on the field of Shiloh belongs in this history. Most of the members of my company enlisted in October, 1861, but we did not get to the front until the very day of the Battle of Shiloh. And we did it get our guns until just before we went to battle.

After the guns were issued to us we stood on the bank and lounged about on the siding, waiting for the issue of cartridges, of which we got forty rounds at first, and ten more right afterward. An orderly came to us, with Magnus following him, and gave me the captain's order to report to him in the bin of the transport which lay tied up at the dock. We looked at each other in wonder, for we followed the orderly into the cabin, where we stood at attention. The captain turned our salutes, dismissed the orderly, and after his footsteps had gone out of hearing, turned to us.

"Thorndyke and Vandemark," said he, "have a few words to say to you. I don't have anything in the books covering the case, I am speaking as man to man."

"Yes, sir," said I.

"Ay hare," said Magnus.

"Thorndyke," Gowdy went on, "you have had an ambition to put an end to me. Well, now's your chance, or will be when we get out there where the shooting is going on. You've had a poor chance to practice marksmanship, but maybe you can shoot well enough to hit a man of my size from the rear—for my men will be to the rear of me in a fight."

He stopped and looked straight in Magnus' eyes, and Magnus stared straight back. At last Gowdy's eyes swept around toward me and then back again.

"Well," said he, "what do you and your friend say? The bond to keep the peace don't run in Tennessee."

"I think," said I, "as man to man, that you deserve shooting, but maybe this ain't the place for it. I voted for you for captain because you seem to know your business—and I don't believe we've got another that does. That's how I feel."

Gowdy laughed.

"Captain Gowdy," said Magnus. "Ven Ay bane sworn in, Ay take you for captain. You bane a good-for-nothing rascal, but you bane best man for captain. I am tied up. You bane necessary to maybe save lives of a hundred better men dan you. Ay not shoot. You insult me ven you talk about it."

"IN SPITE of the somewhat uncomplimentary and insubordinate language in which you express yourself," said Gowdy, "which I overlook under the peculiar circumstances, I reckon I must admit that I did assume an attitude on your part of which you are incapable, and that such an assumption was insulting—if a private can be insulted by a commissioned officer. This being man to man, I apologize. You may go, Thorndyke."

Magnus clicked his heels together in the way he had learned in the old country, and saluted; Captain Gowdy returned the salute, and Magnus marched out with his head high and his stomach drawn in.

"Devilish good soldier!" said Gowdy as he went out. "Well, that clears the atmosphere a little! So, Vandemark, you think I need killing, eh?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, it's all in the point of view," said he, leaning toward me and smiling that ingratiating smile of his. "Sometimes I think so too; but there's only one policy for me—lose 'em and forget 'em. I sometimes think that the time may come when I shall wish I had married that girl. Have you seen the baby lately?"

"I used to see it every few days," said I. "It's runnin' all over the place."

"Look like me?"

"It will when it gets older."

"When you go back," said he, "if I don't, will you do me and this little offspring of mine—and its mother—a favor?"

"I'll have to wait and see what it is," said I.

"Same old cautious Vandemark!" said he, laughing. "Well, that's why I picked you to do this, if you will be so good. You can look the matter over in case it comes to anything, and act if you think best; but I think you will decide to act. Please go to Lusch in Waterloo and ask for a packet of papers I left there, to be opened in your presence and at your request if I wink out in this irrepressible conflict. Remember, I shall be on the other side of Jordan or some other stream. Inside of the outer envelope will be a letter to

(Continued on Page 140)

WILSON'S Certified Bacon helps you live up to that good old rule, "Keep cheerful till ten in the morning, and the rest of the day takes care of itself." Crisp and delicious, with an aroma which whets your morning appetite, this specially prepared bacon will add pleasure and nourishment to everyone's breakfast.

You can be sure of just the right proportion of fat and lean—and of the rich, mild flavor imparted by patient curing and smoking—because the Wilson Certified label means these things when it appears on bacon in the whole piece or in convenient one pound cartons. Certified also signifies respect in the care and handling, such as your mother used in the kitchen where she prepared good things for you.

Ask your dealer for Wilson's Certified Bacon, Ham and Lard. If he does not have them, we can supply him, if you will send us his name.

Send for this free book

"Wilson's Meat Cookery," an authoritative book on the economical purchase and use of meats, with splendid illustrations of the different cuts of meat, together with tested recipes—a strictly up-to-date book—will be sent you without charge if you write Wilson & Co., Dept. 234, Chicago.

This mark

WILSON & CO.

your guarantee

The Wilson label protects your table

Sold by the pound

Hand Loom

NOTE PAPER

the best writing paper that can be made

Obtainable at the better stores—

DES ARTS
STATIONERY STYLE AND QUALITY

Whiting & Cook Inc.
Holyoke, Mass.
New York Sales Room, 200 Fifth Avenue

If unable to purchase Hand Loom, send us your dealer's name and $1.75 for a pound box (eighty sheets) and fifty envelopes to match. Free samples of other Des Arts style papers will be included.

Vandemark's Folly

(Continued from Page 139)

Rowena, which please deliver. There will also be one for you, with some securities and other things to be held in trust for the benefit of Rowena's boy—and mine. I hate that 'Owen Lovejoy' part of his name, but he is entitled to the name of Gowdy, and in view of the fact that he has it I want him to have a good chance—as good as he can have in view of the irregularity of his birth. To tell you the plain truth, as my affairs are now situated, I'm giving him more than he could take as my son if he were legitimate—for, as neighbor to neighbor, I'm practically busted. All I'm doing is hanging on for land to rise. Now this isn't much to do, and you won't have to act unless you want to. Will you have the papers opened and act for the dead scoundrel if it seems the proper thing to do? You see, there's hardly anybody else who is satisfactory to me and at the same time a friend to the other parties."

"I'll have the papers opened," said I; "but remember, this don't take back what I said a few minutes ago. I think you ought to be killed."

"Thank you," said he. "Private Vandemark! You may go!"

This is what took place, just as I have stated it; and this is all the Vandemark township, Monterey County or Iowa history there was in the battle so far as I know—except that Iowa had more men in that fight than any other state in proportion to her population.

Just to show you that I didn't run away I must tell you that after ammunition had been issued to us we were told how to use it. Then we formed and marched, part of the time at the double, out into a cotton field. In front of us a few hundred yards off was a line of forest trees, and under the trees were tents that I guess some of our other men were driven out of that morning. Here we were at once under a hot fire and lost a lot of men.

We went into action about half past nine or ten o'clock in the forenoon, and two regiments of us stood the enemy off along that line until about noon. Then they rushed us, and such of us as could went away from there. Those that didn't are most of them there yet. I stayed because of a shot through my leg which splintered the bone. The rebels trampled over me as they drove our men off the field, and a horse stepped on my shoulder, breaking the collar bone. Then, when the rebels were driven back, I was mauled around again, but don't remember much except that I was thirsty. And then, for months and months, I was in one hospital or another; and finally I was discharged as unfit for service because I was too lame to march. I can feel it in frosty weather yet; but it never amounted to much except for the dealers in riding plows and the like. So ended my military life. I had borne arms for my country for about three hours!

IT WAS the eighth of January, 1863, when I got home. I had not gone to see Mr. Lusch in Waterloo, for I had learned that so far from being killed Captain Gowdy had come through Shiloh without a scratch, and that he had soon afterward resigned and gone back to Monterey County. It has always been believed, but I don't know why, that he was allowed to resign either because of his relationship to the great Confederate families of Kentucky or because of his record there before he went to Iowa. Anyhow he never joined the G. A. R. or fellowshiped with the soldiers after the war. I always hated him, but I do him the justice to say here that he was a brave man.

That afternoon J. P. Roebuck, who had seen my smoke, came over to welcome me home and to talk politics with me. We must have a township for ourselves, he said. Now look at the situation in the school. We had a big school in the Vandemark schoolhouse, thirteen scholars being enrolled. We had a good teacher, too, Virginia Royall. But there wasn't enough fuel to last two days, and those Monterey Center folks were dead on their feet and nobody seemed to care if the school closed down. He went on with his argument for a separate township organization, I all the time thinking with my mind in a whirl that Virginia was near and I could see her next day. When he said that if we could get the vote of Doc Bliven, who was a member of the board of supervisors, I began to take notice.

"Bliven always seemed to like you," said Roebuck. "We all kind of wish you'd see what you can do for us with him."

"Yes," I said. "I believe I can get his vote. I'll try."

XVII

I WAS surprised next morning to note the change which had taken place in the weather. It had been cold and raw when I was crossing the prairie to my farm, with the wind in the southeast. In the night the wind had gone down, and it was as still as death in the morning. For the first time in my life, and it has happened but twice since, I heard the whistles of the engines on the railroad twelve miles away to the north. It was thawing by ten o'clock. The temperature had run up as the wind dropped and, as I now know, with the lowering of the pressure of the barometer, if we had had one.

"This is a weather breeder!" This was my way of telling myself what a scientist would have described as marked low barometer; and instead of going to see Virginia before her school opened in the morning I went to work banking up my house, fixing my sheds and reefing things down for a gale. I made up my mind that I would go to the schoolhouse just before four and surprise Virginia, and hoped it would be a little stormy so I could have an excuse to take her home. I need not have worried about the storm. It came.

At noon the northwestern sky, a third of the way to a point overhead, was of an indigo-blue color. It still seemed to be clear sky, though I regarded it with suspicion, it was such an unusual thing for January. As I looked at it Narcisse Lacroix, a neighbor's boy, came by with his little sister. I asked him if school was out, and he said the teacher had sent them home because there was no more fuel for the schoolhouse stove; but it was so warm that the teacher was going to stay and sweep out and write up her register.

As the children went out of sight a strange and awful change came over the face of Nature. The bright sun was blotted out as the edge of that rising belt of indigo blue touched it. This blanket of cloud, like a curtain with puckering strings to bring it together in the southeast, drew fast across the sky—very, very fast, considering that there was not a breath of wind stirring. It was a fearful thing to see—the blue-black cloud hurrying up the sky, over the sky, and far down until there was no bright spot except a narrowing oval near the southeastern horizon; and not a breath of wind. The storm was like a leaning wall that bent far over us while its foot dragged along the ground, miles and miles behind its top. Everything had a tinge of strange, ghastly greenish blue,

(Continued on Page 143)

Good Looks Your Best Social Aid

In the strenuous round of Winter's social activities, it is your complexion that is liable to suffer most. It needs constant care to protect it from the relentless tax of many dances, suppers and parties. The woman with the clear, girlish skin will ever be admired, for her face is young. D. & R. Perfect Cold Cream will keep your skin youthful, clear and without sign of fatigue. Before retiring, apply it freely and rub in well. You will find your skin will soon begin to take on that healthy glow which so greatly enhances feminine charm.

D. & R. Perfect Cold Cream has been favored by American women for three generations. You, too, will be just as enthusiastic over its marked efficiency to keep your skin in its best condition. In tubes, 12c, 30c, 60c. In jars, 40c, 60c, $1.00, $1.65.

TRY IT FREE—Write for free tube of this perfect skin cleanser and complexion beautifier. Daggett & Ramsdell, Dept. 925, D. & R. Building, New York.

DAGGETT & RAMSDELL'S
PERFECT COLD CREAM
"The Kind That Keeps"

Date-Walnut Pudding

2 eggs
2 tablespoons flour
1 teaspoon baking powder
1 cup chopped Walnuts
1 cup chopped dates
1/4 cup sugar

Heat eggs and add sugar; sift flour and baking powder together; add Walnuts and dates. Sprinkle all with cinnamon in a greased pan. Bake about 30 or 40 minutes in a slow oven. Try with a straw. Serve with whipped cream in individual glasses.

Salted Diamond Walnuts

1 cup Diamond Walnut meats
1/2 cup cooking oil
Salt

Heat oil in a very small frying pan; when hot put in enough Diamond Walnuts to cover bottom of pan, and stir until they begin to change color. Remove with spoon or small skimmer, taking up as little oil as possible. Drain on brown paper and sprinkle with salt. Repeat until all are fried.

Hermit Cookies

1 cup butter (or substitute)
1 1/2 cups brown sugar
3 eggs
1 cup chopped seedless raisins
2 cups chopped Diamond Walnut meats
2 scant cups flour
1 teaspoon cinnamon
1/2 teaspoon cloves
1/2 teaspoon allspice
1/2 teaspoon nutmeg
1 level teaspoon salt
1 teaspoon soda
1/2 cup hot water

Cream butter, add sugar, eggs well beaten, soda dissolved in hot water, flour sifted with spices and salt, Walnuts and raisins. Drop from spoon on greased pan and bake in moderate oven.

YOU know the delicious flavor of Walnuts, how they make so many dishes more tempting. But do you know how wonderfully nutritious they are?

In protein, the tissue builder and repairer, they exceed potatoes, milk, graham bread, macaroni, and eggs.

A pound of crisp, flavory Walnut meats contains 3180 calories—heat energy units. In this they lead all the above foods and in addition beef, veal, ham, cheese, sugar, mackerel, beets, cabbage, carrots, cauliflower, parsnips, peas, turnips, beans, and corn.

While some foods lack one essential and supply others in excess, Walnuts supply all of the vital food elements in ideal proportion. They are over 96% pure nutrition.

Walnuts are one of the most delicious meat substitutes. They serve admirably to make dressing for fowls, desserts, cakes, and salads more attractive. Waldorf Salad's alluring flavor is due mainly to Walnuts.

And you can get the best Walnuts for the same price you would pay for ordinary kinds. Ask for Diamond Walnuts. Their thin shells permit the kernels to be extracted whole. The plump, sweet, tender nut-meats are perfect in flavor.

Diamond Walnuts are hand-sorted, crack-tested and selected with infinite care—chosen as you'd choose them for yourself.

Your Dealer has a sack marked with the Diamond Trade Mark like that shown at the bottom of this page. Ask him to take yours from this sack.

DIAMOND California WALNUTS
More Meats Per Pound

Try them in your recipes to increase nutritive value as they lend distinctive flavor and desirable variety to your menus.

DIAMOND Shelled Walnuts are packed in a high vacuum to preserve indefinitely the fresh, sweet flavor characteristic of the newly matured California Walnut. The can contains Halves for topping and slicing, as well as Pieces for filler and salads. The glass contains only carefully selected Halves for table use and fancy dishes.

California Walnut Growers Association

A Purely Cooperative, Non-profit Organization of Over 4000 Growers
Our yearly production more than Forty Million Pounds
LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA

California Walnut Growers Assn.
Dept. 11, Los Angeles, Calif.

Please send me, without charge, your book of tested and proved recipes for Walnut dishes. I give herewith my Dealer's name and address as well as mine.

Name _____

Address _____

Dealer's Name _____

Address _____

Cleans

Windows

Easily
Quickly

A little Old Dutch folded into a thin, dry cloth sifts through, and cleans and polishes the glass. This method saves time; eliminates rewiping; avoids sloppy work. Use a damp cloth for obstinate accumulations Economical · Thorough · Sanitary

Vandemark's Folly

(Continued from Page 140)

and it was growing suddenly dark as if the day had all at once shut down into dusk.

I knew what it meant, though I had never seen the change from calm warmth to cold wind come with such marked symptoms of suddenness and violence. It meant a blizzard. I thought I had plenty of time, however, and I went into the house and changed my clothes; for I wanted to look my best when I saw my girl. I put on new and warm underwear, for I foresaw that it might be bad before I could get home. I put a buckskin undervest under my shirt. I thanked God for this forethought before the night was over. As I stood in this change of clothes, suddenly the house staggered as if it had been cuffed by a great hand. I peeped out of the window, and against the dark sky I could see the young grove of trees bowing before the great gusts which had struck them from the northwest. The wall of wind and frost and death had moved against them.

THE thought in my mind was, "Hurry! Hurry!" For what if Virginia, in the schoolhouse without fuel, should try to reach the place where she boarded or any inhabited house in that storm? As yet there was no snow in the air except the few flakes that were driven horizontally out of the fierce squall. But I knew that this could not last, for the crust on the blanket of snow would soon be ground through wherever exposed to the sand blast of particles driven along the surface of the earth in a creeping sheet of white. As I hurriedly finished my dressing I heard a shower of missiles strike the house and, looking out, saw that the crust was already being pierced by this grinding process; and as the wind got a purchase under the crust it was torn up in great flakes as if blown up by a thousand explosions from underneath. In an instant almost, for these bursts of snow took place nearly all at once, the air was filled with such a smother of snow that the landscape went out of sight in a great cloud of deep-shaded whiteness. The blizzard was upon us. I should have my work cut out for me in getting to the schoolhouse. As the storm continued it always grew cold; for it was the north emptying itself into the south. I knew what the blizzard was; and my breath caught as I thought of Virginia in what I knew would be a losing struggle with it.

EVEN to the strongest man there was terror in this storm, the breath of which came with a roar and struck with a shiver, as the trees creaked and groaned and the paths and roads were obliterated.

As the tumult grows in such a storm, hills are leveled and hollows rise into hills. Every shed roof is the edge of an oblique Niagara of snow; every angle the center of a whirlpool. If you are caught out in it the spirit of the storm flies at you and loads your eyebrows and eyelashes and hair and beard with icicles and snow. As you look out into the white, the light through your bloodshot eyelids turns everything to crimson. Your feet lag as the leathery whiteness comes almost to your knees. Your breath comes choked as with water. If you are out far away from shelter, God help you! You struggle along for a time, all the while fearing to believe that the storm, which did not seem so very dangerous, is growing more violent and that the daylight, which you thought would last for hours yet, seems to be fading, and that night appears to be setting in earlier than usual. It is! For there are two miles of snow between you and the sun. But in a swiftly moving maze of snow, partly spit out of the lowering clouds and partly torn and swept up from the gray and cloudlike earth, in a roar of rising wind and oppressed by growing anxiety, you stubbornly press on.

Night shuts down darker. You cannot tell when you try to look about you what is sky and what is earth; for all is storm. You feel more and more tired. All at once you find that the wind which was at your side a while ago as you kept beating into it on your course toward help and shelter is now at your back. Has the wind changed? No; it will blow for hours from the same quarter—perhaps for days! No, you have changed your course and are beating off with the storm! This will never do; you rally and again turn your cheek to the cutting blast. But you know that you are off your path; yet you wonder if you may not be going right—if the wind has changed; or if you have not turned to the left when you should have gone to the right. Loneliness, anxiety, weariness, uncertainty. An awful sense of helplessness takes possession of you. If it were daylight you could pass around the deep drifts, even in this chaos; but now a drift looks the same as the prairie grass swept bare. You plunge headlong into it, flounder through it, creeping on hands and knees, with your face sometimes buried in the snow, get on your feet again and struggle on.

YOU know that the snow, finer than flour, is being beaten through your clothing. You are chilled and shiver. Sometimes you stop for a while and with your hands over your eyes stand stooped with your back to the wind. You try to stamp your feet to warm them, but the snow, soft and yielding, forbids this. You are so tired that you stop to rest in the midst of a great drift—you turn your face from the driving storm and wait. It seems so much easier than stumbling wearily on.

Then comes the intruding consciousness that to rest thus is to die. You rush on in a frenzy. You have long since ceased to think of what is your proper course—you only know that you must struggle on. You attempt a shout. Ah, it seems so faint and distant even to yourself. No one else could hear it a roil in this raging, howling, shrieking storm, in which awful sounds come out of the air itself and not alone from the things against which it beats. And there is no one else to hear.

You gaze about with snow-smitten eyeballs for some possible light. Why, the sun itself could not pierce this moving earth cloud of snow! Your feet are not so cold as they were. You cannot feel them as you walk upon them. You come to a hollow filled with soft snow. Perhaps there is the bed of a stream deep down below. You plunge into this hollow, and as you fall turn your face from the storm.

A STRANGE and delicious sense of warmth and drowsiness steals over you; you sink lower and feel the cold, soft whiteness sifting over neck and cheek and forehead; but you do not care. The struggle is over. In the morning the sun glints coldly over a new landscape of gently undulating alabaster. Yonder is a little hillock which marks the place where the blizzard overtook its prey. Sometime, when the warm March winds have thawed the snow, some gaunt wolf will snuff about this spot and send up the long howl that calls the pack to the banquet.

(Continued on Page 144)

Fifty New Designs and Reduced Prices for PYREX

FIFTY new dishes have been added to Pyrex, of which there are over 100 styles, now reduced to the standard prices of 1918.

Among the new designs are the new wide-flange Pie Plates in every convenient size, from the dainty small pie for two, to the good old-fashioned family kind.

You will never know how good pies can be until you bake them in

PYREX

The Original Transparent Ovenware

Many women have started their Pyrex collection with the "Pyrex 5"—the essential dishes for every home, each dish being carefully selected for kitchen utility and table beauty.

But no matter how many Pyrex dishes you may have, you will find many others of equal importance in the 50 new designs, which greatly extend the advantage of oven cooking and table serving. Ask your dealer to show them to you.

Pyrex will not break from oven heat.
Pyrex is a welcome gift at any season.

This trade mark is a guarantee of genuine Pyrex ware

Pyrex Sales Division
CORNING GLASS WORKS
Originators and Patentees of Transparent
Ovenware
713 TIOGA AVENUE, CORNING, N.Y.

Do You Need Money?

WRITE TO ME NOW!

and I will tell you an easy way to have more money to spend

Thousands of women have a vital need for more money—to properly bring up their family—to meet the present cost of living and tide them over this period of unemployment. Many of them have been helped in this problem and now have money to spend and a permanent assured income by becoming our representatives and selling our

World's Star Hosiery and Knit Underwear

to their friends and neighbors. As we have shown them, we can show you a fine independent way to have more money to spend.

We've Helped More Than 25,000

They are now enjoying large and prosperous businesses with constantly increasing sales. With our help their incomes are growing larger every day. One woman made over $200 in twenty-one days. By our help one mother of two small children is banking $80 each month after paying all her expenses. You can do just the same as these women have done.

No Previous Experience Is Necessary Write to-day! We will send you our beautifully illustrated catalog—shows how easy it is to become a World's Star Money Maker. Protected territory—prompt deliveries.

We have been in business for twenty-seven years.

WORLD'S STAR KNITTING CO.
Dept. 30 Bay City, Mich.

Drumfire Dishwasher

Washes dishes, silver and glass quickly and thoroughly. Water from hot-water faucet washes dishes and also runs the machine. No cost for power! Saves breaking of china. Also washes vegetables. Water used only once—it's sanitary. The Drumfire works on a new principle—

"It shoots off the grease!"

Price only $45. Partial payments arranged if desired. It's truly a wonder! We give free trial for 10 days in your own kitchen, to responsible persons. Write to our factory—direct.

The Dietz Manufacturing Co.,
Dept. A-2, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Good territory open to high grade women to act as our representatives.

You Can Make at Home Parchment Shades and Lamps

Easy Interesting Profitable

Parchment Shades, Lamps, and Shields in artistic designs are the newest craze. Save a small price by getting our Shades and Lamps flat, designed, ready for coloring, full directions for making. Very simple—any one can do it. 200 shapes, sizes and designs shown in free catalog.

This quaint 8x12-inch Electric Lamp, flat, designed, ready to paint, complete. Gift Braid, 3 Tassels, Ebonized Base, Socket, Silk Cord and Plug, $2.95, postage 15c. Some design. Parchment Lamps for drop light, $2.95, postage 10c.

China Painters!

The latest of everything in china. We effect a great saving for you because we are America's largest white china importers selling direct to users.

Send for Free Catalog No. 50L

THAYER & CHANDLER, 913 West Van Buren St., CHICAGO

Vandemark's Folly

(Continued from Page 143)

Such thoughts as these were a part of our lives then; and with such thoughts my mind was filled as I stepped out into the storm, my trousers tied down over my boots with bag strings; my fur cap drawn down over my eyes; my blue military overcoat flapping about my legs; the cape of it wrapped about my head and tied with a woolen comforter. Through these wrappings a strange sound came to my ears—the sound of sleigh bells; and in a moment, so close were they, there emerged from the whirl of snow a team of horses drawing a swell-body cutter, in which sat a man driving, wrapped up in buffalo robes and blankets until the box of the sleigh was filled. The horses came to a stop in the lee of my house. There had been no such rig in the county before I had gone to the war.

"IS THIS the Vandemark schoolhouse?" came from the man in the cutter. "No, captain," said I, for discipline is strong; "this is my farm."

"Ah, it's you, Mr. Vandemark, is it?" said he. "Can you tell me the way to the schoolhouse?"

Discipline flew off into the storm. I never for a moment harbored the idea that I was to allow Buck Gowdy to rescue Virginia from the blizzard and carry her off into either danger or safety. There was none of my Dutch hesitation here.

This was battle, and I behaved with as much prompt decision as I did on the field of Shiloh, where, I have the captain's word for it in writing, I behaved with a good deal of it.

"Never mind about the schoolhouse," I said. "I'll attend to that!"

"You will not!" said he in that calm way of his. "Let me see. Your house faces the north. These trees are on the section line. The schoolhouse is—I have it now. Sorry to cut in ahead of you, but—Get up, Susie. Winnie, go on!" But I had Susie and Winnie by the bits.

"Vandemark," he said, and as he shouted this to make me hear I could feel the authority I had grown to recognize in drill, "you forget yourself! Let go those horses!"

"Not by a damned sight!" I found myself swearing as if I were in the habit of it.

NOW the man in any kind of rig with another holding his horses' bits is in an embarrassing fix. He can't do anything so long as he remains in the vehicle, and neither can his horses. He must carry the fight to the other man or be made a fool of. Buck Gowdy was not a man to hesitate in such a case. He carried the fight to me—and I was glad to see him coming. I had waited for this a long time.

I have no skill in describing fights and I was too much engaged in this to remember the details. How many blows were exchanged; what sort of blows they were; how much damage they did until the last, more than a cut lip on my part, I cannot tell. Why no more damage was done is clearer—we were both too much wrapped up to be able to do much. I only know that at the last I had Gowdy down in the snow right by my well curb, and that without taking time to make any plan I wrapped the well rope around him so as to make it necessary for him to take a little time in getting loose; I wrote him a receipt for the team and rig, which, N. V. Creede tells me, would not have done me any good; and I went out, very much winded, shut the door behind me and, getting into the cutter, drove off into the blizzard with Gowdy's team and sleigh, leaving him rolling around on the floor, unwinding the well rope, swearing like a trooper, and in a warm room where there was plenty to eat.

It was scarcely a mile to the schoolhouse, which I was lucky to find at all. I could not see it twenty feet away, but I was almost upset by a snow fort that the children had built, and taking this as the sure sign of a playground, I guessed my way the fifty or sixty feet that more by luck than judgment brought me to the back end of the house instead of the front. I made my way around on the windward side of the building, hoping that the jingle of the bells might be heard as I passed the windows—for I dared not leave the horses again as I had done during my contest with Gowdy. Nothing but the shelter in which they then found themselves had kept them from bolting; that and their bewilderment.

I pulled up before the door and shouted Virginia's name with all my might over and over again. But I suppose I sat there ten or fifteen minutes before Virginia came to the door; and then, though she had all her wraps on, she was in her anxiety just taking a look at the weather, debating in her mind whether to try for the safety of the fire-side or risk the stay in the schoolhouse with no fuel. She had not heard the bells or the trampling or my calling.

MORE by my motions than anything else, she saw that I was inviting her to get in; but she knew no more than her heels who I was. She went back into the schoolhouse and got her dinner basket—lucky or providential act!—and in she climbed. If I had been Buck Gowdy or Asher Bushyager or the devil himself she would have done the same. She would have thought of course that it was one of the neighbors come for her; and anyhow there was nothing else to do.

As I turned back the rich robes and the jingle of the bells came to her ears she started; but I drew her down into the seat, and pulling the flannel-lined coonskin robe up over our laps, I wrapped the army blanket and the thick buffalo robe over and under us. As I did so a little black-and-tan terrier came shivering out from under the coonskin robe and jumped into her lap. I started to put it down again, but she held it—and as she did she looked at my blue sleeve and then up at the mass of wrappings I had over my face. I thought she snuggled up against me a little closer then.

I turned the horses toward her boarding place, which was with a new family who had moved in at the head of the slew, near the Plum Pudd'n Pond, and in doing so set their faces right into the teeth of the gale. It seemed as if it would strip the scalps from our heads in spite of all our capes and comforters and veils. Virginia pulled the robe up over her head.

I HAD to face the storm and manage my team, but before I had gone forty rods I saw that I was asking too much of them, and I let them turn to beat off with it. At that moment I really abandoned control and gave it over to the wind and snow.

I thought myself steering for my own house, and I was not much worried, having the confidence of youth and strength. The cutter was low and would not tip over easily. The horses were active and powerful and resolute. We were nested down in the deep box, wrapped in the warmest robes, and it was not yet so very cold. I was not much worried until I had driven before the wind, beating up as much as I could to the east, without finding my house or anything in the way of grove or fence to tell me where it was. I now remembered that I had not mounted the hill on which my house stood.

(Continued on Page 145)

OAK FLOORS (For Everlasting Economy)

Facts Home Builders Should Know

You want Oak Floors. Everybody does. They are beautiful, durable, sanitary and easy to clean. But—"you can't afford them?"

New Low Prices

½ to ¾ less Than a Year Ago

The fact is, a room 14 x 14 feet can now be floored for from $20 to $30 in the highest plain grade, depending on where you live. Ask any lumber dealer, contractor or architect for figures. Compare with other floors. You really cannot afford anything but Oak Floors.

In Remodeling, Too

A ¾ of an inch thickness is made for laying over old floors. Costs even less, the old floor making a sub-floor.

See any dealer or write for our 3 free booklets, in colors

OAK FLOORING, INC.
1053 Ashland Block, Chicago, Ill.

SAVE ½ ON RUGS

Let us show you how to beautify your home with soft, luxurious rugs in the fashionable one and two tone fancy or Oriental patterns at only one-half the cost of new carpets. SEND US YOUR Old Carpets Rugs and Old Clothing We reclaim the wool in them by our special process of cleaning and respinning, then dye the wool and reweave bright, new OLSON Velvet Rugs

—seamless, reversible, firmly-woven rugs, any color, any size—rugs that rival the high-priced Wilton and Axminsters and are guaranteed to wear for many years. Will lend charm to the finest homes. Five days free trial. Read what others say. We pay you for your old material if not satisfied. Every order completed in one week. Learn how easy it is to order.

FREE! Write at Once for catalog of 31 beautiful, new patterns in actual colors, and liberal freight offer. See our new low prices.

OLSON RUG CO., Dept. B-17, 36 Larkin St., Chicago

$3 BRINGS THIS Acme DRESS FORM INTO YOUR HOME

MAKES DRESSMAKING EASY Perfect fitting dresses easily and quickly produced. Makes dressmaking a pleasant and satisfaction. As necessary for fitting in the sewing machine for sewing. DUPLICATES YOUR EXACT FIGURE By setting "each section of form" it pulls and independently adjusts Neck, Shoulder, Bust, Waist, Hips and Skirt to exactly represent your own woman's style, size or figure.

EASY PAYMENT TERMS Remit $3 and we will send you our patented $15 Acme Collapsible Adjustable Form. Pay the balance of $12 at the rate of $4 a month. Ten Days Trial. If unsatisfactory, return form and we will gladly refund your $3.

Order an "Acme" Form today or write to the illustrated Catalogue with detailed information.

ACME SALES COMPANY
Dept. 2F, 180 Throop Avenue, Brooklyn, N.Y.

Write for Illustrated Catalogue and Easy Payment Terms

TABLE SERVICE-WAGON Large Broad Wide Table Top—Removable Service Tray—Double Drawer—Double Stays—Large Deep Underneath—Specially Blended—Rubber Tired Swivel Wheels.

High grade piece of furniture unsurpassed for General Utility—Easy Action—Clean. Write for pamphlet and dealer's name.

Combination Products Co., 504-Q Canal St., Chicago

Corns

Lift Right Off

Drop a little "Freezone" on a touchy corn or callus for a few nights. Instantly it stops aching, then shortly you lift it right off. Doesn't hurt a bit. You can lift off every hard corn, soft corn, corn between the toes, and the "hard-skin" calluses on bottom of feet. Just get a bottle of "Freezone" at any drug store, anywhere.

Edward Wesley and Co., Cincinnati, O.

Broiderfast Needle

DOES beautiful embroidery in one-third the usual time, without eye-strain, or cramped fingers. Give your lingerie, outer garments and household linens the exquisite charm of beautiful needlework. It is easy with the Broiderfast.

Works a wonderful beaded effect for sport blouses, handbags, or coat suits. Simple, indestructible. Comes with three points, for wool, cotton and silk, with full directions, at your dealer's or sent prepaid only $1.00

American Art Needle Company
Frederick Building, Dept. 11
Dallas, Texas

Automatic Rapid Electric Cook Stove

EASIEST method known to prepare family meals. Saves 50% to 75% fuel cost—saves time, labor. Insures better prepared, more tasty food. Gives every facility of electric range plus every advantage of wireless cooker at less cost than a good oil stove.

New Invention Revolutionizes Cooking
Bakes, roasts, boils, steams, fries, boils, toasts. Needs no watching. Shuts itself off. Attaches to any electric socket. No special wiring. Write for 10-day FREE trial offer. Complete facts and special introductory, direct factory prices. Send name and address.

WM. CAMPBELL CO.
Dept. 13 Detroit, Mich.

Dress Designing Lessons FREE

Women—Girls—15 or over, can easily learn Dress and Costume Designing during their spare moments in TEN WEEKS.

Dress and Costume Designers Frequently Earn $45 to $100 a Week

Many Start Parlors in Their Own Homes.

Every woman who now does plain sewing should take up Dressing.

Hundreds Learn Millinery by Mail.

FRANKLIN INSTITUTE
Dept. T650
Rochester, N. Y.

Send me AT ONCE free sample lesson in the subject here checked:
☐ Dress Designing ☐ Millinery

Name _____
Address _____

Vandemark's Folly

(Continued from Page 144)

In fact, I had missed my farm and was lost, so far as knowing my locality was concerned; and the wind was growing fiercer and the cold more bitter. For a moment I quailed inwardly; but I felt Virginia snuggled down by me in what seemed to be perfect trust; and I brushed the snow from my eye opening and pushed on, hoping that I might by pure accident strike shelter in that wild waste of prairie, and determined to make the fight of my life for it if I failed.

It was getting dusk. The horses were tiring. We plunged through a deep drift under the lee of a knoll, and I stopped a few moments to let them breathe. I knew that stopping was a bad symptom unless one had a good reason for it, but I gave myself a good reason. I felt Virginia pulling at my sleeve, and I turned back the robes and looked at her. She pulled my ear down to her lips.

"I know you now," she shouted. "It's Teunis!"

I nodded, and she squeezed my arm with her two hands. Give up! Not for all the winds and snows of the whole of the Iowa prairie! I disarranged the robes while I put my arm around her for a moment, and she patted my shoulder. Then, putting tender-ness aside, I put my horses into it again.

TWO or three times one of the mares fell in the drifts, and nothing but the courage bred into them in the blue-grass fields of Kentucky saved us from stalling out in that fearful moving flood of snow. Two or three times we narrowly escaped being thrown out by the overturn of the sleigh, and then I foresaw a struggle in which there would be no hope; for in a storm in which a strong man is help- less, how could he expect to come out safe with a weak girl on his hands? At last the inevitable happened—the off mare dove into a great drift; the nigh one pulled on; and they came to a staggering halt, one of them kept from falling partly by her own efforts, and partly by the snow about her legs against which she braced herself. As they stood there they turned their heads and looked back as if to say that so far as they were concerned they had done all they could.

I sat a moment thinking. I looked about and saw that we were almost against a huge straw pile where some settler had threshed a setting of wheat. This might mean that we were close to a house or it might not. I handed the lines to Virginia under the robes, got out, and struggled forward to look at my team. Their bloodshot eyes and quivering flanks told me that they could help us no longer; so I unhitched them, so as to keep the cutter as a possible shelter, and turned them loose. They floundered off into the drifts and left us alone. Cuffed and mauled by the storm, I made a circuit of the stack and stumbled over the tumbling rod of the threshing machine, which was still standing where it had been used.

Leaning against the wheel was a shovel, carried for use in setting the separator. This I took with me, with some notion of building a snowhouse for us; for I somehow felt that if there was any hope for us it lay in the shelter of that stack. As I passed the side of the stack, just where the ground was scraped bare by the wind, I saw what seemed to be a hole under and into the great, loose pile of dry straw. It looked exactly like one of those burrows which the children used to make in play in such places.

Virginia was safe for the moment, sitting covered up snugly with her hands warmed by the little dog; but the cold was beginning to penetrate the robes. I could leave her for the moment while I investigated the burrow with the shovel. As I gained a little advantage over the snow, which was drifted in almost as fast as I could shovel it out, my heart leaped, for I found the hole opening out into the middle of the stack. I plunged in on my hands and knees, found it dry and free from snow within ten feet of the mouth, and after enlarging it by humping up my back under it where the settling had made it too small, I emerged and went to Virginia. I took her out with her dog, wrapped her in the robes so as to keep them from getting snowy inside, and backing into the burrow, hauled the pile of robes, girl and dog in after me, like a gigantic mouse engaged in saving her young. Then I went back to get the dinner basket, which was already buried under the snow that had filled the cutter; for I knew that there was likely to be something left over of one of the bountiful dinners which a farmer's wife puts up for the teacher. As I went again into the little chamber of straw I stopped up the mouth with snow and straw. I drew a long breath. This was far better than I had dared hope for. There is a warmth generated in such a pile from the slow fermentation of the straw juices, even when seemingly dry as this was; and far in the middle of the stack vegetables might have been stored without freezing. The sound of the tempest did not reach us here; it was still as death and dark as tar.

I wondered that Virginia did not say any- thing, but she kept still, because she did not understand where she was or what I had done with her. Finally, when she spoke, it was to say: "Unwrap me, Teunis! I am smother- ing with the heat!" I laughed a long, loud laugh. I guess I was almost hysterical. The change was so sudden, so complete. Virginia was actually complaining of the heat!

I UNWRAPPED her carefully and kissed her. Did ever any peril turn to anyone a face so full of clemency and tenderness as this blizzard to me? The darkness in the burrow was full of light. I made it soft as a mouse nest by pulling down the clean straw and spread- ing it in the bottom, with the coonskin under her and the buffalo robe for a coverlid. There was scarcely room for two there, but we made it do—we made it do—and found room for the little dog also. There was an inexpressible happiness in our safety from the awful storm, which we knew raged all about our nest; but to be together and to feel that the things that stood between us had all been swept away at once—even the chaff that fell down our necks only gave us cause for laughter.

"Your coat is all wet!" she exclaimed.

"It was the snow, shoveling the way in," I said. "It's nothing."

But she began right there to take care of me. She made me take off the overcoat and wrap myself in the blanket. The dampness went out into the dry straw; but when drowsiness came upon us, she would not let me take the chance of getting chilled, but made me wrap myself in the robes with her; and we lay there talking until finally, tired by my labors, I went to sleep with her arms about me and her lips close to mine. When I awoke she was asleep, and I lay there listen- ing to her soft breathing for hours. We were both hungry then, and in the total darkness we felt about for the dinner basket.

Soon I found it and we ate frozen pie and frozen boiled eggs and frozen bread and butter; and then lay talking and caressing each other for hours.

We talked about the poor horses, for which Virginia seemed to feel a deep pity out there in the fierce storm and the awful cold. We talked of the beautiful cutter; and finally I explained the way in which I had robbed Gowdy of horses and robes and sleigh and dog.

"He can never have the dog back!" said she. "And to think that I am hiding out in a straw stack with a robber and a horse thief!"

Then she said she reckoned we'd have to join the Bunker gang if we could find any of

(Continued on Page 146)

Convenient, Artistic, Practical

Globe-Wernicke Sectional Bookcases have practically replaced the old-fash- ioned solid bookcase. No heavy lifting or pushing during housecleaning days. Each section may be easily taken off, dusted and replaced. No need to re- move the books. They are absolutely protected against dust and dirt by the solid unit construction and the dust- proof glass doors, cushioned with felt. Made in period designs to go with your furniture. Prices astonishingly low.

Agencies in all cities. Send for FREE Catalog

The Globe-Wernicke Co.

DEPT. 138, CINCINNATI

Detroit St. Louis New York Philadelphia

Chicago Boston Cleveland Washington New Orleans

SECTIONAL BOOKCASES

An Easy Way to Make Money at Home

TAKE up Millinery. The work is easy and dignified. Good milliners are always in demand and they get good prices.

Hundreds of women just like yourself have learned Millinery at home in their spare time, through the Woman's Institute.

You, too, can do as well. There is not the slightest doubt about it. You will not only save half or two-thirds on your own hats, but you will soon become so skillful that you can open a shop of your own and be independent.

Write today for free booklet—"Millinery Made Easy." It describes the course in detail and gives the experience of scores of successful students.

-----TEAR OUT HERE-----

WOMAN'S INSTITUTE
Dept. 38-B, Scranton, Penna.

Without cost or obligation, please send me one of your booklets and tell me how I can learn the subject marked below:

☐ Millinery ☐ Home Dressmaking
☐ Cooking ☐ Professional Dressmaking

Name _____

(Please specify whether Mrs. or Miss)

Address _____

Keith's $2.50 Offer

3 plan books, showing 100 designs of artistic bunga- lows, cottages, or two-story houses—in frame, stucco and brick—with floor plans and descriptions, and 8 months' subscription to Keith's Magazine, all for $2.50.

Keith's Magazine for over 20 years an author- ity on planning, building and decorating homes—25c a copy on newsstands. With its help and Keith's Plans you can get the most distinctive, comfortable and satisfactory home with greatest economy.

8 plan books (260 plans) and Keith's for 12 months—$4.50

Keith Corporation, 500 Abbey Bldg., Minneapolis, Minn.

Trade-mark Reg.
U. S. Pat. Off.

"Waffles, Please!"

My, how they love those crisp, golden-brown hearts, hot from the stove! There's nothing more wholesome and good than a perfectly-baked, light waffle—so put plenty of good butter and pure syrup or delicious jam on the table—and let them have all the waffles they can eat!

Making perfect waffles is a simple matter when you have a Griswold Heart-Star Waffle Iron. There are two styles, No. 118, High Frame and No. 18, Low Frame; either cast iron or aluminum pans. Also other Griswold Waffle Irons with round or square pans.

Write for booklet giving recipes and suggestions for serving waffles.

THE GRISWOLD MFG. CO.,
Dept. G-2, Erie, Penna., U. S. A.

Makers of the Bolo Oven, Extra Finished Iron Kitchen Ware, Heart-Star Waffle Irons, Cast Aluminum Cooking Utensils, Food Choppers, Reversible Dampers, Steel Damper Clips and Gas Hot Plates.

Miss Saratoga TAILORED SCHOOL DRESSES

THESE are not middy dresses. "Miss Saratoga" School Dresses are entirely new and original. Fabrics are durable cottons and linens. Careful tailoring and tasteful trimming characteristic of all "Miss Saratoga" garments. Practical because they are easy to wash, absolutely fast color (guaranteed), and very simple to iron. Charming as school dresses for girls 6 to 14 years of age. Prices surprisingly low for fine garments.

Ask your favorite merchant or write us direct (Baltimore, Md.) for style plates of either School Dresses or Middy Garments. This real photograph shows exactly how the School Dresses look on real girls.

CRIPPEN & REID, Baltimore, Md.

New York Office: Centurian Bldg., 1182 Broadway

Vandemark's Folly

(Continued from Page 145)

it to join. Certainly we should be fugitives from justice when the storm was over; but she for herself would rather be a fugitive always with me than to be rescued by "that man"—and it was lucky for him, too, she said, that I had licked him and shut him up in a house where he would be warm and fed; because he never would have been able to save himself in this awful storm as I had done. Nobody could have done so well as I had done. I had snatched her from the very jaws of death.

"Then," said I, "you're mine."

"Of course I am," said she. "I've been yours ever since we lived together so beautifully on the road, and in our Grove of Destiny. Of course I'm yours—and you are mine, Teunis—ain't you?"

"Then," said I, "just as soon as we get out of here we'll be married."

It took argument to establish this point, but the jury was with me from the start; and finally nothing stood between me and a verdict but the fact that she must finish her term of school. I urged it upon her that my house was nearer the school than was McConkey's, and she could finish it if she chose. Then she didn't believe it would be legal for Virginia Vandemark to finish a contract signed by Virginia Royall—and pretty soon I realized that she was making fun of me, and I hugged her and kissed her until she begged my pardon.

All the time the storm raged. We finished the food in the dinner pail and began wondering how long we had been imprisoned, and how hungry we ought to be by this time.

FINALLY I dug out again, just as we both were really and truly hungry, and went back after Virginia. I made her wrap up warmly, and we crawled out, covered with chaff, rumpled, mussed up, but safe and happy, and found the sun shining over a landscape of sparkling frost, with sun dogs in the sky and spiracles of frost in the air, and a light breeze still blowing from the northwest, so biting cold that a finger or cheek was nipped by it in a moment's exposure. And within forty rods of us was the farmstead of Amos Bemisdarfer, who stood looking at us in amazement as we came across the rippled surface of the snow to his back door.

I left it to Virginia—she had been so sensible and wise in all her words since we had agreed to be married at once—to tell the Elder and Grandma Thorndyke about it. But she went to pieces when she tried it. She ran into their little front room where the Elder was working on a sermon, pulling Grandma by the hand, whom she had dragged out of the kitchen.

"Teunis and I," she gasped, "have been lost in the storm and nearly froze to death, and he tied that man up with the well rope, and maybe he's starved to death in Teunis' house, and Teunis and I slept in a straw stack, and Teunis is just as brave as he can be, and we're going to be married awful soon, and I'm going to board with him then, and that'll be nicer than with the McConkeys and nearer the schoolhouse, and cheaper, and Teunis will build fires for me, and we'll be just as happy as we can be, and when you quit this stingy church you'll both of you live with us forever, and I want you to kiss Teunis and call him your son right now, and if you don't we'll both be mad at you always—no we won't, no we won't, you dear things, but you will marry us, won't you?"

And then she cried hysterically and kissed us all.

"What Virginia says," said I, "is all true—especially the getting married right now and your living with us. We'll both be awful sorry if we can't have you right off."

"I snum!" exclaimed Grandma Thorndyke. "Just as I expected!"

Grandma outlived the Elder by many years, and it was not many months when she came, a widow, to live with us "until she could hear from her folks in Massachusetts."

She heard from them, but she lived with us, and is buried in our lot in the Monterey Center burying ground. Peace to her ashes!

Now I have reached the point in this history where things get beyond me. I can't tell the history of Monterey County and the unsettled matters like the Wade-Stone controversy, the outcome of the betrayal of Rowena Fewkes by Buckner Gowdy, and other beginnings of things like the doings of the Bushyager handits; for some of them run out into the history of the state as well as the county. And as for the township history, it is now approaching the point where there is nothing to it but more settlers, roads, schools and the drainage of the slew.

What remains to be told here is a short horse and soon curried. Vandemark township was set off as a separate township within six weeks of the day we crawled out of the straw stack. On that day we had been married a month, and Virginia was boarding with me as she predicted. Doctor Bliven voted for the new township as a member of the county board, as his wife said he would after I talked with her about it.

N. V. Creede says that at this time I was threatened with political ability but happily recovered. One reason for this joke he finds in the fact that I was elected justice of the peace in the township at the first election of officers, and got some reputation out of the fact that they named the township after me when it was fashionable to name them after Lincoln, Colfax, Grant, Sherman, Sheridan and the rest of the Civil War heroes. The second is the way I handled Dick McGill. N. V. says this was very subtle. I knew that if he wrote up my dragging Virginia into a straw pile and keeping her there two nights and a day he would make folks laugh all over the county, but he would make us ashamed. So I went to him and told him that if he said a word about it I should maul him into a slop and feed him to the hogs.

"Why, Jake," he said, "I never would say anything to take the shine off the greatest thing ever done in these parts. I've got it all written up, and I'm sending a copy of it to the Chicago Tribune. It's an epic of prairie life. Read it, and if you don't want it printed, why, it's me for the swine, for it's already gone to Chicago."

OF COURSE it seemed all right to me, but I was afraid of it and was thinking of pounding him up right then, when in came Elder Thorndyke to put in the paper something about his next Sunday's services, and McGill asked him to read the story and act as umpire.

And after he had gone over it he grasped my hand and said that Virginia and I had not told them half of the strange story of our living through the blizzard out on the prairie, and that it was a great drama of resolution, resource and bravery on my part, and seemed almost like a miracle.

"Will this hurt Virginia's feelings if it is printed?" I asked.

"No, no," he said. "It will make her fiancé a hero. It will tickle her half to death."

Then I told Dick he might go on with it if he would leave it just as it was. The joke was on him after all, for there was nothing in it about my fight with Buck Gowdy or of my robbing him of the team and sleigh and harness and robes and Nick the little dog.

The third thing that N. V. thought might have sent me down through the greased timber of politics, which has ruined more good men than any other form of gambling, was my management of the business of getting the township set off against the opposition of the whole Monterey Center ring. But he did not know of that day in Dubuque, and of my smuggling of Mrs. Bliven into Iowa, as I have told it in this history. It hurt Bliven politically, but he kept on boosting me, and it was his electioneering, which I knew nothing about, that elected me justice of the peace; and it was Mrs. Bliven's urging that caused

(Continued on Page 149)

The Charm of Lemonade

LEMONADE for years has been the favored drink of millions, because of the flavor and healthfulness of lemon juice.

In modern times it has taken on new value and new charm, due to vitamine efficiency and the gentle stimulation it affords.

Lemonade lends character to entertainment. To prepare it for your guests shows thoughtfulness and unmistakable good taste.

There's real refreshment in it. It's a distinctly different drink.

Lemons and oranges, although known as "acid fruits," have an alkaline reaction when taken into the system and are, therefore, valuable in offsetting excess acidity due to acid-producing foods.

Free— New-Day Drinks

A FREE book by Alice Bradley, Principal of Miss Farmer's School of Cookery, Boston, called "New-Day Drinks," will be sent to any woman who requests it.

It suggests a variety of beverages—fizzes, cocktails, punches, cups, lemonades of different flavors, etc.—giving tested recipes for each. Simply send a post card for a free copy.

The Garnish

A delightful and economical custom

By ALICE BRADLEY

Principal, Miss Farmer's School of Cookery, Boston

I AM often asked, "Why use a lemon garnish?" and this is my reply:

Garnishing isn't merely fanciful decoration, as many believed for years.

It makes foods look well, but in that added attraction alone there is indirect but definite dietetic worth. For appetizing appearance is the first step toward the proper digestion of the food. And digestion is something with which all good cooks should concern themselves.

Next, the natural salts and acids of lemon juice are additional direct digestive aids. The juice from a lemon garnish is Nature's sauce, and can be used as vinegar.

So in this "decoration" there is neither fad nor extravagance, but real economic value.

There are other reasons, too. With fish and meats lemon juice acts as an offset to the acidity often caused by these good foods, having, as it does, an alkaline reaction in the blood.

Lemons and oranges, although known as "acid fruits," have an alkaline reaction after digestion when taken into the system and are therefore valuable in offsetting excess acidity due to acid-producing foods, such as bread and meats.

Lemon juice also provides vitamins, the newly discovered accessory food factors which are now deemed vital to good health, and which all scientists recognize.

So here are four reasons, if you need that many, for lemons as a garnish.

I use lemon juice in place of vinegar in many salad dressings, as it imparts an especially delicious flavor.

In fact, when you know lemons as I know them I expect that you'll use twice as many as you do at present.

Lemon juice adds an appetizing zest to fish, meat and vegetables.

Alice Bradley
Principal, Miss Farmer's School of Cookery.

CALIFORNIA Sunkist

Uniformly Good Lemons

Order California Sunkist Lemons, for they are juicy, tart, have bright, clean, waxy skins, and are practically seedless, which makes them best for slicing and cutting in designs.

All first-class dealers sell them in tissue wrappers stamped "Sunkist." Be sure to see our offer of recipe cards, including Miss Bradley's garnishing designs.

CALIFORNIA FRUIT GROWERS EXCHANGE
A Non-Profit, Co-operative Organization of 10,500 Growers
LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA

Buy Them
By The Dozen

Mail This Send 10c with this coupon and we will send you a set of 24 beautifully illustrated Sunkist recipe cards. Each dish pictured in colors. Shows how to serve oranges and lemons in the most attractive ways. Just right size for recipe-card box.

For 75c we will send the set of Sunkist recipe cards, neat oak box without any advertising on it, 100 blank cards and 21 index cards, all prepaid.

This set would cost $1.25 in retail stores. Check the offer you wish to accept and forward with stamps or coins. Offer is good at these prices in both United States and Canada.

☐ 24 Sunkist Recipe Cards—10c
☐ Complete Box and File—75c

(Including above 24 cards)

Address: California Fruit Growers Exchange
Dept. 263, Los Angeles, Cal.

Name _____
Address _____

The Fleisher Yarns

"EVERY COLOR IN THE RAINBOW"

The BERKSHIRE

A NEW SWEATER
SURPRISINGLY EASY TO KNIT

Simply follow these directions:

MATERIALS—Fleisher's Silverglow Yarn, 10 balls. NEEDLES—1 pair each Nos. 4 and 5. 13 stitches=2 inches. 8 rows=1 inch. Size 36.

(These directions also apply to Fleisher's Shetland Floss)

PATTERN—1st row—Knit 8 stitches; purl 1 stitch, knit 1 stitch for 8 stitches. Repeat between *'s across the row, ending with knit 8 stitches. 2nd row—Purl 8 stitches; knit 1 stitch, purl 1 stitch for 8 stitches, purl 8 stitches.

With Silverglow Yarn and No. 5 needles, cast on 88 stitches. Commence pattern. Work 18 inches even. Bind off 5 stitches each side for armhole, decrease 1 stitch each side every 2nd row 3 times. Work 5 inches even. Work 24 stitches. Bind off 24 stitches for the back of neck. On remaining 24 stitches start front. Work 7 rows even. Increase 1 stitch at neck side every other row 8 times. 2 rows even. Work other side the same. Cast on 24 stitches. Join to the first front, work 1½ inches even. Increase 1 stitch at beginning and end of every 2nd row 8 times. Cast on 8 stitches each side. Work same length as back. Bind off.

SLEEVES—Cast on 24 stitches. Increase 1 stitch at beginning and end of every 2nd row 8 times. Work 10 rows even. Cast on 4 stitches each side. Work even until sleeve measures 10 inches. Decrease 1 stitch each side, 10 rows even. Repeat between *'s until there are 42 stitches. Work even until sleeve measures 16 inches. Change to No. 4 needles.

1st row—Knit 1 stitch, purl 1 stitch.

2nd row—Purl 1 stitch, knit 1 stitch.

Repeat these 2 rows for 3 inches. Bind off. Turn up cuff.

Knitting Sweaters is Fascinating and Economical

THE sweater you knit yourself pleases you more and costs you less. And that isn't the only saving. A sweater with separate skirt puts a new outfit in your wardrobe at small outlay. Saves blouses, too, and keeps them neat.

The Fleisher Yarns are spun from soft, elastic wool which keeps its life and strength. They fashion garments which are always stylish looking and hold their shape and fit.

And Fleisher colors are found in the widest and most beautiful range. To use The Fleisher Yarns is to be delighted with your work.

This Book Makes Knitting Easy

THE new FLEISHER KNITTING AND CROCHETING MANUAL gives simple, complete directions for every new and worth while sweater fashion. Not only sweaters, but scarfs, tams, hats, men's sweaters and the most fascinating new knitted novelties for youngsters. 30c per copy at bookstores, news-stands and the stores where The Fleisher Yarns are sold. Or sent direct from us for 15c and 24 trade-mark tickets from The Fleisher Yarns.

S. B. & B. W. FLEISHER, INC.

DEPARTMENT PHILADELPHIA
12 2A

The Berkshire

Look for the Fleisher trade-mark on every ball of yarn you buy. It is a pledge of Quality placed there for your protection.

Vandemark's Folly

(Continued from Page 146)

me to qualify by being sworn in—though I couldn't see what she meant by her interest.

On my next birthday, the twenty-seventh of July, however, something happened that after a few months of figuring made me think that they knew what they were about all the time. On that day the Blivens got up a surprise party for us—though Virginia did not seem to be much surprised. In the course of the evening Doc Bliven started in making fun of me as a justice of the peace.

"I helped a little to elect you, Jake," said he, "but I'll bet you couldn't make out a mittimus if you had to send a criminal to jail to-night."

"I won't bet," I said. "I know I couldn't!"

"I'll bet the oysters for the crowd, Squire Vandemark," he went on deviling me, "that you couldn't perform the marriage ceremony."

Now here he came closer to my abilities, for I had been through a marriage ceremony lately and I have a good memory—and oysters were a novelty in Iowa. It looked like a chance to stick Doc Bliven, and while I was hesitating, Mrs. Bliven whispered that there was a form for the ceremony in the instruction book.

"I'll bet you the oysters for the crowd I can," I said. "You furnish the happy couple—and I'll see that you furnish the oyster supper too."

"Any couple will do," said the doctor. "Come, Mollie, we may as well go through it again."

The word "again" seemed suspicious. I began to wonder, and before the ceremony was over, I reading from the book of instructions and people interrupting with their jokes, I saw that this meant a good deal to the Blivenses. Mollie's voice trembled as she said "I do!" and the doctor's hand was not steady as he took hers. I asked myself what had become of the man who had made the attack on Bliven as he stood in line for his mail at the Dubuque post office away back there in 1855.

"Don't forget my certificate, Jake," said Mrs. Bliven as they sat down; and I had to write it out and give it to her. "And remember the report of it to the county clerk," said Henderson L. Burns, who held that office himself. "The doc will kick out of the supper unless you do everything." I did not forget the report, and I suppose it is there in the old records to this day.

"We got word," whispered Mrs. Bliven to me as she went away, "that I have been a widow for more than a year: You've been a good friend to me, Jake!"

The Amateur Rebel

(Continued from Page 7)

"I don't care," Zette said shortly. She had expected more of her mother's opening remark. The play had begun, but the older actors were not supplied with stirring lines.

Elinor Pendleton's eyes widened slightly; her husband put down his paper and looked at Zette over his glasses.

"Oh!" cried Zette explosively, and followed it with a very naughty word.

Her mother looked at each other and turned again to look at the girl, who stood watching them angrily.

Mrs. Pendleton smiled. "Sit down, Zette," she said, "and tell us what the trouble is. You needn't do your hair now."

"I'm not going to," Zette answered. "My hair, I mean."

She plumped down on the couch and stared at them. Her mother's smile was tinged with affection; on her eighteenth birthday Zette looked somehow younger than she had for several years. Her face was flushed and the tumbled hair made it almost childish.

"I'm going to New York," she said.

Her parents waited a moment for further explanation, but Zette's lips were pressed firmly together.

"Going to New York, Zette?" repeated her mother. "What for?"

I shall not close this history without clearing up my record as to the mares, Susie and Winnie, and the cutter, and Nick, the black-and-tan, who saved Virginia's fingers from freezing, and the robes. First, I kept the property, and every horse on the farm is descended from Susie and Winnie. Second, I paid Buck Gowdy all the outfit was worth, though he never knew it and never would have taken pay—I drove a bunch of cattle over into his cornfield the next fall and left them just before day one morning, and he took them up, advertised them as estrays, and finally, as N. V. says, reduced them to possession. And third, they were legally mine anyhow, for when I got home I found this paper lying on the bed where he had slept those two nights when we were nesting in the straw pile:

BILL OF SALE

In consideration of one lesson in the manly art of self-defense, of two days' board and lodging, and of one dollar ($1.00) to me in hand by J. T. Vandemark, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, I hereby sell and transfer to said J. T. Vandemark, possession having already been given, the following described personal property, to wit:

One bay mare called Susie, weight 1150 pounds, with star in forehead, and white left hind foot, five years old;

One bay mare called Winnie, weight 1175 pounds, with star in forehead, and two white hind feet, six years old;

One one-seated, swell-body cutter, one fine army blanket, one coonskin robe lined with flannel, one large buffalo robe.

It is hereby understood that if any of said animals are ever returned to me at Bluegrass Manor or elsewhere they will be hamstringed by the undersigned and turned out to die.

Signed, J. BUCKNER GOWDY.

One of my grandsons, Frank McConkey, has just read over this chapter and remarks, "He was a dead game sport!" But he had also read what Captain Gowdy had interlined, or rather written on the margin to go in after the description of the property conveyed: "Also one blue-blooded black-and-tan terrier named Nicodemus. The tail goes with the hide, Jacob!" Since his death I have grown to liking the man much better—in fact ever since I whaled him.

Here ends the story, so far as I can tell. It is not my story. There are some fifteen hundred townships in Iowa, and each of them had its history like this, and so had every township in all the great, wonderful West of the prairies.

THE END

The Outline of Youth

— it shall not pass

Fashion's only aim is to give perennial life to the Springtime charm of Youth.

DeBevoise Brassieres were conceived in the spirit of Youth—to hold its lithe, sinuous grace—to express its symmetry and lovely line.

There is a DeBevoise for every type of figure, but each style brings closer to the perfect youthful outline the figure for which it was designed.

The "Willowway," above, is admirably suited to the normal, active figure. It supports without restraint, lengthening and softening body curves into straight, youthful lines and permitting perfect freedom of motion.

DeBevoise Brassieres express a high development of the artistry of needlework and are exquisitely trimmed. Above all, they satisfy in a peculiar degree, the purpose of every woman to retain her youthful outline.

Ask your favorite store for "Debb-E-Voice." An illustrated booklet which we will send will aid your selection.

Made, Labeled and Guaranteed by

CHAS. R. DEBEVOISE CO., Newark, N. J.
World's oldest and largest Brassiere manufacturers

YOUTH SWAY
A ropless corset Bandeau with elastic waistline. Forms straight girlish lines.

De Bevoise
Brassieres that Beautify

LABLACHE

FACE POWDER

50¢ Per Box
Pre-War Price

"Queen of Toilet Powders"

The favorite of three generations

Refuse Substitutes

They may be dangerous. Flesh, White, Pink, or Cream, 50c. a box of druggists or by mail. Over two million boxes sold annually. Send 10c. for a sample box.

BEN. LEVY CO.

French Perfumers, Dept. 134

125 Kingston St., Boston, Mass.

Mother Praises

3-in-One The High Quality Household Oil

"I brought you a can of 3-in-One Oil to help make your housekeeping easy."

"I've used 3-in-One on my sewing machine ever since you were a little girl, and you know that it still sews beautifully. Everything else about the house that ever needs oiling gets a dose of 3-in-One regularly before it squeaks or sticks."

"3-in-One is a wonderful rust preventive, too, and the most satisfactory furniture polish I ever used."

"I even make my own Polish Mops and Dustless Dust Cloths by putting 3-in-One on ordinary twine mops and common cheese cloth. Both pick up dust and lint as well as if they cost a lot of money."

3-in-One is sold at all stores in 1-oz., 3-oz. and 8-oz. bottles and in 3-oz. Handy Oil Cans.

FREE. Generous sample and de luxe edition of Dictionary of Uses. Write for both on a postal card.

THREE-IN-ONE OIL CO., 165-O. Broadway, New York City

2-120

Jack Tar Togs

The accepted regulation School and Sports Wear

Rub 'em - Tub 'em - Scrub 'em
They come up Smiling!

"Clever!" and "How practical!" you'll exclaim, and more, when you see your girl in Jack Tar Togs.

For instance, a Jack Tar midgy blouse of snowy white, with silk-embroidered emblem and stars; or this most practical three-piece bloomer dress, illustrated, with a remarkable combination of 'wear-ways'—as a dress, with or without bloomers, as separate bloomers, as a separate skirt, or as a separate midgy.

Girls find Jack Tar Togs the ideal Spring and Summer every day wear. Go to one of the better stores and see just what Jack Tar Togs really do mean—solve the problem of dress for your daughters!

Send for Style Booklet, addressing Dept. F-1.

The STROUSE-BAER Co.
Baltimore, Md. U.S.A. The Label of Honor

The Amateur Rebel

(Continued from Page 149)

you've done for me and that you bore me to death?" Suddenly, unexpectedly, she bent her head on her arm and began to sob.

Her parents watched her, uncertain what to do.

"My trunk's packed," she said finally. "I'm going on the morning train. I'm going to live with Helen Emerson."

"But why didn't you tell us, Zette? Are we such ogres?"

Zette faced her mother desperately. "Why didn't you know? Can't you see that I hate it all? Can't you see that I hate nice, wholesome things? I—I'd rather live in a hotel than a house; I'd rather have a Pomeranian than a baby; I —"

IT WAS the first time in her life that Suzette Pendleton had ever suspected her parents of a sense of humor. They both burst out laughing, and before they had recovered themselves she was crying again.

They settled then for a talk; nothing but their laughter could have broken her down. If they had been furious, even pleading, she would have felt superior, different. But as she sat on the edge of the couch beside her mother she realized that they were older than she, that somehow, rebel as she might, they were her parents and she did love them. In the end, when they consented to her departure and decided for her on a later train, she was completely crushed. The first fine flair of her rebellion was gone; it was not until she was actually settled in New York, away from them, free, that the feeling of adventure returned.

During the first week in New York, Zette was too busy soaking up impressions of the city, inspecting the shops, finding what was wrong with her Hendon-made clothes, to decide what to do with her freedom. Helen Emerson was away at work all day; occasionally in the evening her friends dropped in, girl friends, secretaries like herself, for the most part. A good number of them were homesick; none of them, Zette felt, were rebels. As she sat and listened while they discussed their respective employers, the plays they had seen and the concerts they had heard, Zette turned her spiritual thumbs downward. This was not what she had come to New York to find.

ON HER second Sunday the heat oozed into the room beneath the striped awnings. Zette's forehead was beaded with perspiration; across the room Helen sat limply in a wicker chair, her brown curls plastered to her moist brow.

"Well, Zette," she said suddenly, "what are you going to do? I haven't spoken to Mr. Burnett about you yet, though I think there's a chance in the filing department. Of course not having had any experience —"

Zette stretched lazily, like a cat before a fire. She had been waiting for that question.

"I saw Ada Langley yesterday," she said casually. "I'm going on the stage."

"The stage, Zette?" Helen's eyes opened wide. "Why, Zette Pendleton?"

"What?" Helen stared at her for a moment. "Well, I thought you wouldn't take any stupid old job," she said. "But—the stage! You are going in for life, aren't you?"

Zette shrugged. "Why not? Got to begin some time. I've got a part in Sunshine; of course it's not much of a part and not much of a show, but it's a beginning."

It was a beginning. Besides the part and a quantity of advice so skillfully given that Zette had not recognized it, Miss Langley had given her some letters of introduction.

"There is a group of young people that I think you'll like," she had said. "They're starting some sort of youngsters' theater; I'm not sure what it is. I believe I'm a patroness or something. But you want to see Mildred Webster; her mother's Dorothy Lockett, you know. She's more or less at the head of it, and she's a talented little thing."

That afternoon Zette and Helen set forth on a regular actress," said Helen. "I've seen her act a dozen times, I think."

"I don't see anything strange about it," said Zette, but her heart was pounding excitedly.

She was at first disappointed in Mildred Webster. She was not sure what she had expected, but she found her a slight girl in her early twenties, with sandy hair and a quantity of freckles; did all actresses have freckles, she wondered? The loose, peacock-blue dressing gown and the splash of a red lipstick made her skin gleam white; her grace, as she rose to meet them, and her utter lack of self-consciousness suddenly banished Zette's disappointment. As they sat in the apartment her enthusiasm mounted higher and higher.

THIS was what she had been looking for. People drifted in and out, young people all of them, and conversation was let loose. They talked about a hundred things that were equally unintelligible to her, but she listened gravely and let her eyes wander about the room.

That first afternoon, while the samovar steamed and people passed about teacups and plates of cake, left only a blurred impression on her mind; her first definite memory of anything was when they rose to go and Tommy O'Brien rose with them. He too was young, a broad-shouldered boy with red hair and a pleasant voice.

"May I walk along with you?"

"Of course," answered Zette.

For a moment she resented Helen's presence; in her blue serge suit, her brown oxford, she was altogether out of the picture. But it was only for a moment; she liked Helen, and she knew that the older girl's admiration and applause were necessary to her. She was going to start with what she had—Helen, the three-room apartment, a job—and construct her own background, her own life.

As they reached the apartment house Tommy laughed. "Do you two live here?"

"Yes."

"So do I—fourth floor."

"We're the third." They smiled at each other. "Come down and see us sometime," said Zette. "We're not quite in order yet, but —"

Helen's eyes widened, but she said nothing.

MOST of Zette's salary for a month went into the background; she realized gratefully that the foundation was there; Helen had bought the necessary furniture. She discarded nothing as she built, but she painted here and there, broke up obvious arrangements, cast away a picture or two—Sir Galahad and The Age of Innocence—and banished family photographs to the bedroom. As the apartment grew, Helen's interest mounted; at first she had been a little hurt by Zette's interference; but she recognized Zette's ability. The place had acquired an astonishing new atmosphere.

Zette enjoyed the theater and her meager part; but, most of all, she enjoyed the evenings after the play at Mildred's and the increasingly frequent evenings at her own place, when Tommy came down and Esther Pierson or Heath Morena strolled over.

At first Helen gasped at this turning of night into day; her work began at nine, irrespective of bedtime. But they were both young, and they slept on Sundays until the sun went down. Zette rose around noon on other days and surveyed the empty

(Continued on Page 152)

There is a curious legend of ancient Greece in which we read that Psyche was assigned the difficult mission of descending to Hades to bring away a fragment of beauty in a box for the gods to sample and lo! when the lid was lifted, there issued—a vapor.

BEAUTY has ever been as elusive, as mysterious, as intangible as the legendary vapor. And mysterious it must remain. Through the ages, men's goddesses have been veiled, and the woman who would be the true artist of herself must know that piquancy is in concealment, not exposure.

THE Mohammedans have a saying that "To Eve, God gave two-thirds of all beauty," and beauty is the birth-right of every woman. But through the multiplicity of the ages we have departed somewhat from the ideal in the Garden of Eden, and if we place our mirrors in a good light and look at ourselves as critically as we look at another woman—we see the truth.

EVEN if we have that loveliest and most desirable and quite the most undependable thing in the world—Youth—it is seldom that our bodies are slim in just the right places. And the wisp of a corset that will coax away the tiny imperfections of youth without detracting one bit from our precious comfort, will save us, a few years hence, from the injustice of looking older than we are.

AGE is a treacherous and resourceful antagonist and when cold cream and massage dispel the evidences of advancing years from well-cared-for hands and face, age seeks revenge by a tell-tale padding of the hips and thighs. If we foolishly have attempted to keep, with exaggerated corsetry, a disproportionately small waistline at the expense of this other more important dimension, or have permitted our figures to unbekomingly sag through lack of proper support, we have put our birthdays where anyone can count them.

BUT just because you must wear corsets, there is no reason why other people should know that you do. This matter of designing for type is the whole secret. The Type Corsetry that Gossard artistry has created conceals itself from the appraising eye of your best enemy. Every type of figure has been individually studied and treated as a special problem, and the Gossards designed for your needs will coax, restrain, supplement—easily, gently, naturally, and bring you by hidden ways to the very most of which your figure is capable. Because they will not attempt to change you radically or make you conform to some fleeting style tendency not inherently becoming to you, you will never have that "tied-in, pinched-together look," that "corseted look," that is just as fatally ageing as its sagging uncorseted reverse.

WHY go on buying just "a corset," when at any of the best stores and specialty shops, a skilful corsetière will unfailingly select for you a Gossard that will make you look so much better and feel so much better, and be forever sure you are not missing something in the mirror that your friends see when you are looking the other way? The cost of Gossards is well within the price you would expect to pay for such superior artistry and workmanship, and they offer an unequalled value in wearing service that makes their purchase a true economy.

"THE Gift of Eve." So we have named a tiny book that is just off our press. It is not pretentious but it will be cherished by every woman who appreciates the importance of that quiet distinction that ever marks the woman of good taste. To you we shall be glad to send it, if you will trouble to write your request to our home offices at 1006 S. Michigan Ave., Chicago, Illinois.

The H. W. GOSSARD CO.
Chicago New York London Toronto Sydney Buenos Aires

Gossard Brassières

EVEN if you are quite naturally "trim," a certain, sophisticated restraint above the low top corset is still the part of wisdom.

GOSSARD Brassières, like Gossard Corsets, are made for types; materials and shaping conform unerringly to individual needs. They are made for those women with a true perception of beauty and an appreciation of that faultless detail that is the certain stamp of superior quality. Their unusual wearing service alone will amply justify their nominal cost.

G O S S A R D
FRONT LACING
C O R S E T S

Be Well—Weigh What You Should Perfect Your Figure!

BUILD up your vitality and health! Do away with nagging ailments! Weigh what you should weigh! Improve your figure and appearance! Enjoy life! Be your own self and be at your best! In other words, live!

I can help you. I know I can—for in the past 20 years I have helped more than 100,000 other refined, intellectual women.

Simply devote a few minutes each day in your room to the common-sense directions I outline in personal letters to suit your individual case.

I will teach you to Stand Correctly

and to Walk Correctly

After a few weeks your friends will hardly know you.

Here are samples of letters from pupils:

"Last year I weighed 216 lbs., this year 146, and have not gained an ounce back. It is surprising how easily I did it. I feel so strong and at least 15 years younger."

"Just think! I have not had a pill or a cathartic since I began, and I used to take one every night."

"My weight has increased 30 lbs. I don't know what indignation is any more, and my nerves are so rested! I sleep like a baby."

I receive a number of such letters every day.

Leading magazines editorially endorse my work. Physicians approve it. Their wives and daughters are my pupils.

Tell me in confidence your particular difficulties and I will write you frankly. The chances are nine in ten that I can help you become strong and well. If I cannot help you, I will tell you what will.

I can positively increase or reduce your weight, and build your vitality. Your letters will be held in strict confidence. I am here at my desk daily—8 to 5. It costs nothing to learn the particulars of my work. Write me NOW before you forget.

Suzanne Acroft
Dept. 36 1819 Broadway New York

The Business for You!

Make and sell Crispettes. Delicious confection. Everybody loves them. Can't get enough. Come again and again for more. Easy to make. I furnish everything. Raw materials plentiful and cheap. Profits enormous.

Quick success possible anywhere—cities, small towns, villages. Amazing market—crowded streets, bargaining throngs at fairs, carnivals, parks, etc.; wholesale to grocers, bakeries, druggists, and so on. Possibilities unlimited! Need no experience. Little capital starts you on road to phenomenal earnings.

Write—Get My Help—Begin Now!

Others are making money—lots of it. Letters just received during this year tell of wonderful successes. You can succeed, too. Start is all you need. I'll gladly help you. I furnish everything—complete outfit, materials, secret formula, full directions, wrappers, etc. Send post card for illustrated book of facts. Tells how to start. Explains most successful methods. Gives all information needed. It's free. Write now!

LONG EAKINS COMPANY
271 High Street Springfield, Ohio

You want to be the best cake maker in your neighborhood. I can teach you how. If you will follow my methods you can on your first attempt build a delicious angel food cake and many other kinds—cakes that will immediately give you a wonderful reputation.

One woman I taught sold 300 cakes, made by my methods, for $3 each. I have thousands of letters from thankful women who are making cakes by the Osborn Cake Making System—My methods are original. You cannot fail with them. They are easy to learn and you are sure of success the first time. Just tear off the coupon, fill it out and mail it in. I will send you particulars right away with no obligation on your part.

Mrs. Grace Osborn,
Box 12, Bay City, Mich.
Send me without obligation full particulars about the famous Osborn Cake System.

Name _____
Address _____

apartment with satisfaction. This was freedom, life!

"I wonder if I could bring a man down for tea to-morrow?" Tommy asked them one night. "He's coming on to bunk with me, a nice chap. Think you'll like him."

"Sure," said Zette. "What's his name?" "Hewitt—Chris Hewitt. Harvard and all that."

"Actor, Tommy?" Helen asked.

"Nope; straight business. However, Christopher's a good sort. You may shock him a little, Zette, but —"

"Shall I wear my Chinese 'trou'?" she asked. "No? Well, I'll do my best, Tommy."

She was inordinately excited. The crowd had accepted her as one of them; no one, not even Helen, knew how often she was shocked by their careless conversation, their word destruction of recognized institutions and emotions. But here was her first chance to impress an outsider, to typify the care-free, Bohemian life toward which she was striving. It was a nice name, too—Christopher Hewitt.

The color mounted in her cheeks as people drifted in; she felt that she could never take friends for granted as Mildred did. Always it excited her that these people should come to see her, these people who were actors and actresses, with their names in the paper!

THE room was filled when Tommy appeared in the doorway. Zette waved lazily from the couch, but her eyes were piercing the dim hall behind him. At first sight, Christopher Hewitt was not unlike many other good-looking young men; he was, perhaps, a bit more punctilious about his dress; Zette felt at once that his shoes were always so perfectly shined, his suit so immaculate and pressed. She had, of course, acquired the crowd's contempt for such precision and she grinned at Helen, a grin that instantly condemned him as an outsider, but in the same moment she rose and held out her hand, smiling at him.

His formality in thanking her for her hospitality, the way in which he seated her in a chair and sat, himself, beside her, embarking smoothly upon a polite conversation, left no doubt that he did not belong. There was nothing formal or even polite about the crowd, and Zette felt rather guilty at being so much attracted to him.

Their conversation soared from its stilted beginning, and Zette was surprised to discover herself telling him about Hendon and her parents. She had meant to keep the past mysterious, to play her part.

"Oh, he's a nice boy," she said casually, when the apartment was again empty and she and Helen sat together on the couch, discussing the party in true girl fashion. "He's pretty conventional, but he may get over that."

ALTHOUGH that first meeting had told Zette little about Chris, the next afternoon, when Tommy telephoned to ask them to go to dinner, told Helen quite a bit about the impression he had made. Zette rushed into the bedroom to change her dress; she hummed as she brushed her hair; her feet pranced in a dance step as she stood before the mirror fastening the long gray veil that floated from her orange toque.

"I should say you liked this young man in spite of his Boston accent," Helen remarked, when Zette was finally ready.

"Helen, you have the most conventional mind," said Zette.

But she did not avoid Christopher Hewitt any more noticeably than he avoided her, which was not at all. The crowd accepted him because there was no alternative, although they never quite knew what to make of him. His formality of manner, the profound way in which he said the most ordinary things, amused and delighted them, but they were never sure whether his serious remarks were entirely serious.

The summer wore on; fall cooled the city and banished organdie and gingham; winter brought furs and woollens, yet still Chris remained, not quite belonging, an accepted outsider.

The Amateur Rebel

(Continued from Page 150)

Helen was at work; she and Tommy were going to dinner and the theater together and would not be back until late. Zette sat at the desk by the window, writing a letter and wondering why Chris did not come. There had been no definite engagement, but he always came. Suddenly she heard someone stumble in the hallway; then a tremendous knocking on her door.

She opened it quickly and faced Chris, smiling at her foolishly. His hat was in his hand and his hair was disarranged; his eyes were so shining that she laughed.

"Well, why all the noise?" she asked, and stared as he pushed past her into the room and sat heavily on the couch. "What's the matter, Chris?"

"NOTTA thing," he answered solemnly. "Notta single, solitary thing."

Zette's arms dropped to her sides. "Christopher Hewitt," she said, "are you —"

"F'lish question number nine million nine hun' red an' ninety-nine—nine—nine—ninety—ni —"

"Stop it!" Zette banged the door and wheeled about, facing him. Her cheeks were flushed and her eyes indignant.

"Are you—drunk?" she demanded.

Chris smiled amiably. "If I'm not," he answered sweetly, "I—ought be. I — Well?" He rose unsteadily and stared at her. "Well, Zette?"

"And you came here!" Her hands were clenching and unclenching furiously. "Oh, I hate you!"

He tried to take her hand, but she snatched it away. As they stood watching each other his smile broadened.

"Free woman!" he said solemnly. "Gay Bohemian life! Can't be shocked! Abs'lutely free! Rebel, am'teur rebel!" He chuckled, liking the phrase. "Am'teur rebel," he repeated. "Am'teur rebel."

Zette opened the door dramatically. "I don't ever want to see you again as long as I live!" she said. "Go away."

"Am'teur rebel." His laughter sounded outside the door; she heard him stumble up the stairs. When the door of his apartment closed she flung herself on the couch.

"I hate him!" she sobbed fiercely. "Hate him!"

The year that sped toward her twentieth birthday, Zette thought, was taken up solely in her career; for after Sunshine closed its run she found a part in a second mildly successful play—and in imbibing newer and freer doctrines of life. Christopher's taunt had not sunk deeply; her second part in a play, and the realization that she was really an actress, she, Suzette Pendleton, convinced her that she had been born different from other women.

As a matter of fact, each day was binding her more closely to Christopher Hewitt. She had been almost sincere in her resolve never to speak to him again, but she had found it unavoidable not to accept his apologies, apologies which took up fully a month of her time. And after he was thoroughly forgiven, it was of course absurd not to see him. So she saw him every morning; each night he called at the theater to escort her home. The days went by, and with each new and revolutionary thought that she pounced upon and brought to Chris he answered her with one a bit more radical, so that she was increasingly appalled by her own unconventionality.

One spring evening they were bidding each other their usual leisurely good night, when Helen's voice interrupted them.

"For heaven's sake, Zette, kiss him and get it over with," she called irritably from her bedroom.

A sharp "Good night, Chris," and the banging of the outer door answered her. She heard Zette's quick footsteps; then the light over her bureau was snapped on.

"Helen Emerson!"

Helen blinked. "I didn't mean to be rude, Zette, but I'm so awfully sleepy," she said. "I've got to get up early. Goodness knows how long I've been waiting for you two idiots to say farewell—needn't be cross about it."

"Needn't be cross!" said Zette. She sat down limply on the edge of the bed.

Helen laughed. "What's the matter—shocked?" she asked.

"Of course I wasn't shocked," Zette said stiffly. "But Chris —"

"Oh, Zette!" Helen was grinning openly. "I think Chris isn't so sensitive as all that; he isn't a radical, you know. How about you two anyway?"

Zette's wrath was checked as her eyes opened in wide innocence. "How about us?" she repeated childishly. "I don't know what you mean."

"THE girl's clever. I mean, of course, are you engaged to him?"

"Engaged! Don't be Victorian, Helen. You know that I don't believe in marriage."

Helen sat up in bed and regarded her friend humorously. "Do you mean to say that Chris Hewitt hasn't proposed to you yet?" she demanded.

Zette flushed. "I hope he has sense enough never to do such an absurd thing," she said. "I think Chris cares for me; I'm not sure that I don't care for him. But marriage —"

"Do you think Chris wouldn't be jealous if you started dashing around with someone else?"

"Not if he really loves me. He wouldn't want to restrict my freedom."

"Why, Suzette Pendleton!" Helen looked at her in mock amazement. "Of course I've heard you say all this before, but —"

Zette got up impatiently and began undressing. Suddenly she wheeled about. "You're reverting to type," she accused her. "Chris and I do believe in freedom. I know we do. We believe all the things we've ever said about marriage. And—I'll prove it to you."

Helen looked at her rather sadly. "I wonder —" Her voice trailed off and she shrugged. "All right," she said. "Go ahead. I'm waiting."

The next Saturday after the performance the crowd gathered in the apartment. Helen and Esther were in the kitchenette making sandwiches, and Zette stood alone for a moment, uncertain whether to join them or to sit beside Chris on the couch and neglect her duties as hostess.

"I've brought Ernest Blanchard, Zette," called Mildred from the doorway.

Zette turned slowly to smile at Mildred and to meet the eyes of the young man who was following her.

"I'M VERY glad you came," she said, holding out her hand, and he followed her to the seat by the window, his eyes devouring the room.

He was blond and rather well fed in appearance; his suit had a trifle too much swagger about its cut, his tie a trifle too brilliant coloring. A fraternity pin glistened against the dark cloth; he wore a heavy signet ring on one of his smooth white hands.

"I expect to be frightfully thrilled," he said languidly, pressing her hand ever so slightly more than was necessary. "I've known Milly since we were kids, but I've traveled about so much that I haven't known many actresses. Are you really as frightful as they say?"

(Continued on Page 155)

The Amateur Rebel

(Continued from Page 152)

"You'll have to find that out for yourself," answered Zette.

"How long does it take to find out?"

"Depends entirely on you," Zette glanced across at Chris with a pleasant feeling of sophistication. "How shall we begin?"

The young man looked at her rather insolently, a long, appraising glance that made the color creep up into her cheeks. "I'm not at my best in a crowd," he said finally. "My car's outside; we might slip away by ourselves for a time."

"I'm being a hostess just now," she said without looking up. "Perhaps later."

"It's a promise," he said.

"Do you live around here?" she asked.

"WE'RE out on Long Island now. Have a big place there—stables, kennels, all that." He looked up at her suddenly. "There's a thought," he said. "The family are off somewhere; why don't you motor out with me and have breakfast on the terrace after this shindig is over? I've always wanted to breakfast there with a pretty woman."

As Zette looked up to answer him, she saw that Chris had just reached the window and from his face she decided that he had overheard.

"It sounds delightful," she said, and held out her hand to Chris. "Sit down with us."

Blanchard had looked up in annoyance at the interruption; now he rose lazily. "Hello, Hewitt," he said. "Didn't expect to see you at this sort of party."

"What do you mean?" Chris asked evenly, and Blanchard's eyes lowered.

"Why, you were always such a plugger at the university," he answered. "Can't imagine you except behind a book."

"You have a good many ideas that need reconstructing," Chris answered, sitting down. "I ran into your father at the Harvard Club to-day, Zette."

"You did?" Zette said. "Why, I thought that father —"

"He came in town for the day."

She looked up at him wonderingly; a letter from her mother that morning had said that they were both in Boston.

"OH, CHRIS!" Helen was calling from the kitchenette, and he got up irritably. "See much of Hewitt?" Blanchard asked.

Zette did not answer at first; she was watching Christopher cross the room. She could see by the way he held his head that he was angry, and she knew that the time for her test had come. Tommy and Mildred were sitting on the couch, talking; Esther and Heath Morena were munching sandwiches and looking at a book of old dramatists. They were all there, theorizing as usual. Let them talk! She lifted her head higher; she was going to show them.

"He and Tommy O'Brien live upstairs," Helen and Chris returned with sandwiches and in the confusion he drew her to one side.

"I don't like Blanchard, Zette," he said abruptly. "Knew him at college; he's a bad sort. If I were you I wouldn't have anything to do with him."

"Really?" She looked at him defiantly. "I don't mean to be fresh or anything, Mr. Hewitt, but what business is it of yours?"

"I thought I was your friend," said Chris. Suddenly he seized her hand and gripped it so that she winced. "Oh, don't be a little idiot, Zette. You know I love you."

Zette pulled her hand away and rubbed it; she was glad of an excuse to look down because she felt that her eyes were blazing with happiness. "Are you jealous?" she asked finally.

"If you want to put it that way. Oh, Zette —"

She raised her eyes and grinned. "I don't know whether I like having you in love with me, if you're going to start right off restricting my friends. It's too much like going home to my parents."

Chris did not return her smile. "Zette, you're a fool," he said, and walked away.

She watched him thoughtfully for a moment before she turned back to Blanchard. The test had begun.

"Your friend seems annoyed," he said as she sat down beside him.

"Oh—men!" said Zette airily.

During the evening she was conscious of Chris watching her; her cheeks were flushed with excitement. Helen too had sensed the situation, and Zette made a face at her.

At four o'clock Blanchard took her hand.

"What about that little jaunt?"

"Oh—I haven't decided yet."

She got up and walked across to the kitchenette. Chris was talking to Esther; she waited impatiently a moment before she spoke. She liked to look at him; she liked his face, his thick brown hair, his sober eyes.

"Come along and help me open some more ginger-ale bottles, Chris."

He followed her silently and she swung up on the kitchen table and watched him as he worked.

"I'm going to motor out to Ernest Blanchard's place for breakfast," she said casually. "Don't you think that will be fun?"

"Just you two?" asked Chris.

"Of course. Breakfast on the terrace and everything."

"Sounds delightful," he said. "Want to take my big coat?"

ZETTE had been leaning on her hands, her head thrown back, her legs swinging childishly. Now she sat up very straight. "But—don't you care?" she asked.

"It's none of my business," he answered. "But —"

He had turned now and stood facing her, smiling slightly. "I wouldn't want to restrict your freedom, Zette."

"But, Chris —"

A Japanese screen shielded them from the outer room; he stepped forward suddenly and, before she had time to think, he had seized her and kissed her mouth. Once or twice before he had kissed her, but now her breath seemed taken away completely; she clung to him, almost frightened.

"You don't mind my kissing you good-by?" he asked quietly.

Zette gasped. "What do you mean?"

He smiled. "Why, nothing. What are you so melodramatic about?"

"N-nothing. But —" She stared at him. She had gained her point, but things were not moving as she had expected. "Well," she said without moving, "I suppose I'd better start."

"I suppose you had." He moved carelessly toward the doorway, and she pulled him back fiercely.

"Don't you dare to let me go," she said. Her eyes were wide with indignation as she stared at his smiling face.

"But, Zette dear, I don't understand. I thought you wanted —"

"YOU don't!" she interrupted angrily. She pulled his arm about her and kissed him. "You don't understand?" she panted.

It was, perhaps, the most difficult moment of Chris Hewitt's life. He pulled her hand from his shoulder gently and patted it. "No," he said.

Her lips began to tremble. "But, Chris!" she said in a frightened voice. "Oh, I've been so foolish! Don't you love me?"

"Of course I love you, but —"

"Don't you want to marry me?" Her voice rose like a frightened child's.

He could not meet her eyes, as her hand gripped his convulsively. "I hadn't thought about marriage," he said. "After all, you don't believe in it, and —"

"Chris!" Her voice was a whisper now, pleading. "I don't mean any of the things I said. I—oh, I don't want to be free at all. I guess—you were right—when you called me—an amateur rebel. I—oh, I'm so frightened, Chris!"

He put his arm around her tenderly. "Zette," he whispered, "have you really and truly had enough of it? Are you sure?"

"Oh, so sure, Chris!"

He lifted her up in his arms and sat her upon the table, took her face in his hands and lifted her chin so that their eyes met evenly. "Will you marry me, Zette?"

"Will I?" repeated Zette. "Oh, Chris—Chris! I never thought I'd say yes to you so quickly!"

Sew at Home and Have More Clothes

BY doing your own sewing, you can have more clothes for yourself and the children.

The manufacturers of J. & P. Coats Spool Cotton recently issued a twenty-four page book of designs for children's clothes. It also contains valuable information about hand and machine sewing, which every mother and daughter should know.

If your dealer cannot supply you, send ten cents for a copy of J. & P. Coats Book No. 10 to the Spool Cotton Company, Dept. 53, 315 Fourth Ave., N. Y.

J. & P. Coats Spool Cotton
The Best Thread for Hand and Machine Sewing

Study Bible Now!

Better Than College Course

William Lyon Phelps, A.M., Ph.D., professor of English language and literature, Yale University, says:

"I thoroughly believe in a university education for both men and women; but I believe a knowledge of the Bible without a college course is more valuable than a college course without the Bible."

"Every one who has a thorough knowledge of the Bible may truly be called educated; and no other learning or culture, no matter how extensive or elegant, can form a proper substitute."

As Former President Roosevelt said:

"To every man who faces life with real desire to do his part in everything, I appeal for a study of the Bible. No book of any kind ever written has so affected the whole life of a people."

The Correspondence method of Bible study is the best method for securing a thorough knowledge of the Bible—better than any oral teaching can possibly be. More than 7,000 persons of 40 different occupations are now enrolled in one or more of the

Former President Roosevelt

Moody Bible Institute's Correspondence Courses

studying the inspired Revelation under the direction of eminent, Spirit-filled, Bible scholars. To really know the Bible is an education out of which springs the fullest and best development of one's powers in any vocation. This marvelous Book has moulded earth's loftiest characters. It meets man's deepest needs. It charts the only path to real and lasting success. Dig in it as for gold and you will secure treasure of value and extent beyond any calculation. Letters of warmest appreciation are constantly received from students and graduates. For example:

"It has never been my privilege to be fascinated with Bible study as I am with this course."

"I have come to know the Bible in an entirely new light. The Old Testament is now intensely interesting."

"The benefits I have received from the Synthetic Course are beyond estimate and above price."

No matter what your occupation you can study the Bible by correspondence. These courses open a new world to you—broaden your vision, develop your understanding, answer your questions, help solve your perplexities, give comfort and encouragement.

We Offer Eight Courses by Mail

Synthetic Bible Study; Scofield Bible Course; Practical Christian Work; Bible Doctrine; Bible Chapter Summary; Introductory Bible Course; Evangelism; Christian Evidences.

THE MOODY BIBLE INSTITUTE
Dept. 1092, 153 Institute Place
CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

"I finished the Scofield Bible Course about three years ago. It has been of greater value to me than any other training I have ever had, though I spent four years in college."

A Clergyman says: "I often mention in my sermons that a Correspondence Course from the Moody Bible Institute has been of far greater value to me than all of my Bible and theological work in college."

Enroll Now! You will be a personal pupil—time, place and amount of study under your own control. The prices are very low—these courses are not sold for profit. There is no better time to start than NOW. Send the coupon at once for Free Prospectus describing our eight Courses in detail.

Mail the Coupon Today

THE MOODY BIBLE INSTITUTE
Dept. 1092, 153 Institute Place, Chicago, Ill.

Send me your prospectus giving complete information regarding your eight courses in Correspondence Bible Study.

Name

Address

DRESSES Fashioned by Peggy Paige
NEW YORK

STYLE, chic, an indefinable smartness—the buoyant, spirited quality that distinguishes the smart girl's clothes! You will find it embodied in the early spring models fashioned by Peggy Paige. For Peggy Paige dresses are the vanguard of the mode. And their prices are more modest than you would ever expect.

Today send for the name of your dealer and for your copy of the spring style book. Address: Peggy Paige, 14 West 32nd Street, New York City.

The Peggy Paige label, sewn in every Peggy Paige dress, guarantees you satisfaction, always while the corn was standing, he was ever more in the timber and less in the open. Feed there was in abundance now, for it was early autumn; and who was to be his guide in this—"What to eat? What to let alone?" These two guides he had and, as it proved, enough: instinct, the wisdom inherited from his forbears, and his keen, discriminating nose.

Bannertail

(Continued from Page 13)

He grew daily in the ways of wood lore. He learned that the gum drops on the wounded bark of the black birch are good to eat, and the little faded-brown umbrella in the woods is the sign that it has a white cucumber in its underground cellar; that the wild bees' nests have honey in them, and grubs as good as honey, but beware, for the bee has a sting! He learned that the little rag-bundle babies hung from vine and twig contain some sort of a mushy, shell-covered creature that is amazingly good to eat; that the little green apples that grow on the oaks are not acorns and yet are toothsome morsels of the lighter sort; while nearly every bush in the woods at autumn now had strings of berries whose pulp was good to eat and whose single seed was as sweet as any nut.

THERE are certain stages of growth that are marked by changes which, if not sudden, are for a time very quick, and the big change in Bannertail, which took place just as he gave up the tricks and habits learned from his cat folk and began to be truly a squirrel, was marked by the fluffing of his tail.

Always long and long haired, it was a poor wisp of a thing until the coming of the hunting moon. Then the hairs grew out longer and plummy, then the tail muscles swelled and worked with power. Then, too, he began a habit of fluffing out that full and flaunting plume. For the tail is to the gray squirrel his special gift, a vital part of his outfit, the secret of his life. The possum's tail is to swing by, the fox's tail for a blanket wrap, but the squirrel's tail is a parachute, a "land-easy"; with that in perfect trim he can fall from any height in any tree and be sure of this: that he will land with ease and lightness and on his feet.

October, the time of the nut harvest, came. Dry leaves were drifting to the ground, and occasional "thumps" told of big, fat nuts that also were falling.

Bannertail would seize a nut, strip off the husk and hide it quickly anywhere. Some of them he would thrust under bits of brush or tufts of grass, some he buried by dropping leaves and rubbish over them, and a few toward the end he hid by digging a shallow hole.

HIGH above, in an old red oak, Bannertail found a place where a broken limb had let the weather in, so the tree was rotted. Digging out the soft wood left an ample cave, which he gnawed and garnished into a warm and weather-proof home for winter.

The sun was rising in a rosy mist and glinting the dew-wet overlimbs as there rang across the bright bare stretch of woodland a loud Qua, qua, qua, quaaaaaaa! Like a high priest of the sun on the topmost peak of the temple stood Bannertail, carried away by a new-born, inner urge. A full-grown, wildwood gray squirrel he was now; the call of the woods had claimed him; and he hailed the glory of the east with an ever longer Qua, qua, qua, quaaaaaaa!

This was the season of the shortest days, though no snow had come as yet to cover the brown-leaved earth. Few birds were left of the summer merry-makers; the crow, the nuthatch, the chickadee and the woodwren alone were there; and the sharp tang of the frost-bit air was holding back their sun-up calls. But Bannertail, a big gray squirrel now, found gladness in the light, intensified, it seemed, by the very lateness of its coming.

Qua, qua, qua, quaaaaaaa! he sang; and done into speech of man the song said: "Hip, hip, hip, hurrah!"

A SCORE of times had he thus sung and whiplashed his tail and sung again, exulting, when far away among the noises made by birds was a low Qua, quaaa!—the voice of another gray squirrel!

His kind was all too scarce in Jerseyland, and yet another would not necessarily be a friend; but in the delicate, meaningful modulations of sound, so accurately sensed by the squirrel's keen ear, this far-off Qua, qua! was a little softer than his own, a little higher pitched, and Bannertail knew without a moment's guessing: Yes, it was a gray squirrel, and it was not one that would take the war-path against him.

The distant voice replied no more, and Bannertail set about foraging for his morning meal.

Next day there was a driving storm of snow, and whether the sun came up or not he did not know. He kept his nest and, falling back on an ancient spendtime of the folk he kins with, he curled up into a sleep that deepened with the cold.

For two days the blizzard hissed. The third day it was very cold; on the fourth day Bannertail peeped forth on the changed, white world. He was stiff and sleepy, and a little hungry as he went forth. His hunger grew with the exercise of moving.

OVER the broad forest floor of shining white he leaped, and made for the beloved hickory grove. There Bannertail quartered the surface of the snow among the silent, bare-limbed trees, sniffing, sniffing, alert for the faintest whiff.

He stopped, swung his keen "divining rod," advanced a few hops, moved this way and that, then at the point of the most alluring whiff he began to dig down, down through the snow. At last he seized and dragged forth in his teeth a big fat hickory nut, one buried by himself last fall, and bounding with rippling tail up a tree to a safe perch that was man high from the ground, he sawed the shell adroitly and feasted on the choicest food that is known to the squirrel kind.

Other days were much like this, as the snow moon slowly passed. But one there was that claimed a place in his memory for long. He had gone farther afield to another grove of hickories and was digging down so deep into the snow that caution compelled him to come out and look around at intervals. It was well he did so, for a flash of white appeared on a near log. It made towards him and Bannertail got an instinctive thrill of fear. Small though it was, smaller than himself, the diabolic fire in its

ERNEST

(Continued on Page 158)

Rubens
Look for the trade-mark

Don't Neglect This, Mother

On and off like a coat. Always fits the body perfectly.

Keep Baby's Stomach Warm

February, March, April—these are danger months. The months when baby is most susceptible to colds.

You must protect the tiny chest and stomach. For lack of protection, at these vital points, is probably the most common cause of illness. Doctors and nurses, all will tell you this.

And they will tell you, too, that the most practical way to insure this protection is with the Rubens Infant Shirt. We have specialized in this garment for more than thirty years. It is our pride—our life work. There is no satisfactory substitute.

Double thickness over the chest and stomach. Cut with the simple convenience of a coat. No tapes, no buttons. Adjustable belt fastens with a single safety pin. Made of finest and softest of materials for infants and children.

Look for the trade-mark "Rubens" before you buy. If your dealer cannot supply you, write direct to us.

Manufactured only by RUBENS & MARBLE, Inc.
24 No. Market St., Chicago
Established 1890

RUBENS INFANT SHIRTS

Style Shoe Distinction without Style Shoe Discomfort

RUTHLESSLY, to-day's frank costuming invites the shoe-ward glance as if to make sure that ankles are faultlessly trim and that shoes seem chosen for sightliness alone.

But there can be beauty—and more. In Martha Washington shoes of distinctive style you may enjoy every grace of envied fashion with the hidden blessings of easeful step and comforting rest. No touch of style has been forfeited for their presence; they are there, ready for your two-fold welcome.

A near-by Martha Washington dealer waits to please you with many styles.

F. Mayer Boot & Shoe Co., Milwaukee

"Sincerity in shoe making—for more than forty years"

Mayor Martha Washington Shoes

Miss Tomboy and Miss Demure both wear the Paul Jones Two-In-One

MISS TOMBOY wears a middy blouse that's long and comfortable—just the thing for gym and sports. Miss Demure is trim and smart from head to toe. Her middy is evenly cuffed, fits snugly, is just blousy enough to be neat and dainty.

Each wears the new Paul Jones Two-In-One. Two turns of the bottom, a swift unsnapping of hidden tabs, an instant to button them in the back, and this comfortable sports middy becomes a charming garment for street or classroom.

Ask your dealer to show you the exclusive Paul Jones Two-In-One. It is made in a variety of styles and materials and priced at $2.00 upwards. Or write us to send attractive style book and name of nearest dealer.

Paul Jones garments are guaranteed without reserve.

MORRIS & COMPANY

412 No. Eutaw St., Baltimore, Md.

PAUL JONES MIDDIES

"It is women themselves who have carried the fame of Angelus from Maine to California."

The Angelus Lemon Creams not only maintain but develop a beautiful complexion. That is why, in a few years' time, they have become famous from Maine to California. We say this, but it is the American women themselves—by their wonderful, unsolicited letters—their tremendous and evergrowing demand for Angelus Lemon Creams—who permit us to say it.

Begin your Angelus treatment today. If your drug or department store cannot supply you, send 35c for introductory tube of Angelus Lemon Cleansing Cream and the new booklet "Complexion Beautiful."

PARK & TILFORD, Division L.
529 West 42nd Street, New York

Introductory Tube by mail 35 Cents

For Complexion Beauty

First use Angelus Lemon Cleansing Cream to cleanse thoroughly the pores of the face. Then apply Angelus Lemon Tissue Cream. Let it remain on overnight—and in the morning let your mirror tell the story.

Your first trial of Angelus will convince you that the clear, healthy depth, the glorious pink and white tints of a beautiful complexion can be yours.

Bannertail

(Continued from Page 157)

close-set eyes gave him a spasm of terror. He felt that his only safety lay in flight.

Now it was a race for the tall timber and a close one, but Bannertail's hops were six feet long, his legs went faster than the eye could see. The deep snow was harder on him than on his ferocious enemy, but he reached the great rugged trunk of an oak and up that, gaining a little.

The ermine weasel followed close behind, up, up, to the topmost limbs and out on a long, level branch to leap for the next tree. Bannertail could leap farther than Fire-eyes, but then he was heavier and had to leap from farther back where the twigs were thick. So Fire-eyes having only half as far to go covered the leap as well as the squirrel, and away they went as before.

BUT every wise squirrel knows all the leaps in his woods, which he can easily make, and which will call for every ounce of power in his legs. The pertinacity of the weasel still hard after him, compelled him to adopt a scheme. He made for a wide leap, the very limit of his powers, where the take-off was the end of a big broken branch, and racing six hops behind was the white terror. Without a moment's pause went Bannertail easily across the six-foot gap, to land on a sturdy limb in the other tree.

And the weasel! He knew he could not make it, hung back an instant, gathered his legs under him, snarled, glared redder eyed than ever, bobbed down a couple of times, measured the distance with his eye, then wheeled and racing back went down the tree to cross and climb the one that sheltered the squirrel. And Bannertail quietly hopped to a higher perch and when the right time came leaped back again to the stout oak bough. Again the weasel with dogged pertinacity raced down and up, only to see the gray squirrel again leap lightly across the impassable gulf. Then Bannertail, gaining confidence, hit on a plan which, while it may have been meant for mere teasing, had all the effect of a deep stratagem played with absolute success.

When next the little, red-eyed fury came racing along the oak limb, Bannertail waited to the very last moment, then leaped, grasped the far-side perch, and turning yapped out one derisive Grrrf, grrrf, grrrf after another, and craned forward in mockery of the little fury. This was too much. Wild with rage, the weasel took the leap, fell far short and went whirling head over heels down seventy-five feet to land, not in the soft snow, but on a hard oak log that knocked out his cruel wind and ended for the day all further wish to murder or destroy.

The hunger moon, out February, was half worn away when again the sky gods seemed to win against the powers of chill and gloom. Food was ever scarcer; but Bannertail had enough and was filled with the vigor of young life. The sun came up in a cloudless sky that day, and blazed through the branches of still, tense woodland; the air was crisp and exhilarating; and Bannertail, tingling with the elation of life, leaped up for the lust of leaping, and from a high perch sang out his loudest song: Qua, qua, qua, quaaaaa!

Ringing across the woodland it went. And though he seemed only to sing for singing's sake, he was conscious lately of a growing loneliness, a hankering for company that had never possessed him all winter indeed he had resented it when any hint of visitors had reached him; but now he was restless and desirous, as well as bursting with the wish to sing.

Qua, qua, qua, quaaaaa! He sang again and again, and on the still, bright air were echoes from the hills.

Qua, qua, quaaaaa! He poured it out again and the echo came, Qua, quaaaa! Then another call, and the echo, Quaaa!

Was it an echo? He waited in silence—then far away he heard the soft Qua, quaa! that had caught his ears last fall. The voice of another graycoat, but so soft and alluring that it thrilled him. Here indeed was the answer to the hankering in his heart.

BUT even as he craned and strained to locate its very place, another call was heard, Qua, qua, qua, quaaaaa! from some big, strong graycoat like himself. All the fighting blood in him was stirred. He raced to the ground and across the woodland to the hillside whence the voice came.

Then on a log he stopped with senses alert for new guidance. Qua, qua, quaaa! came the soft call, and up the tree went Bannertail. A silvery tail tip flashed behind the trunk and, now ablaze with watchfulness, he followed fast.

Then came a lone, long Qua, quaa! and after it a defiant Grrrf like a scream, and a third big gray squirrel appeared, to scramble up after Bannertail.

(Continued in the March Home Journal)

Helpful Ladies' Home Journal Books

Order the following booklets from the Service Bureau, The Ladies' Home Journal, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania:

- NEW JOURNAL BUNGALOWS. Price, 50 cents.
- NEW JOURNAL HOUSES. Price, 50 cents.
- YOUR FIREPLACE AND HOW TO BUILD IT. Price, 5 cents.
- HOW TO BUY YOUR HOME. Price, 15 cents.
- WHAT YOU SHOULD KNOW WHEN BUILDING A LITTLE HOUSE. Price, 10 cents.
- PLANNING THE LITTLE HOUSE GARDEN. Price, 10 cents.
- JOURNAL BIRD HOUSES. Price, 25 cents.
- WEAVING THE NEW BASKETS. Price, 25 cents.
- BASKETS FOR GIFTS AND BAZAARS. Instructions for Pine Needle Work are included. Price, 25 cents.
- HOW TO SEW FOR THE CHILDREN. Hints on saving time and money. Price, 10 cents.
- CHILDREN'S PARTIES AND BIRTHDAY CELEBRATIONS. Price, 15 cents.
- HOW TO DRY FRUITS AND VEGETABLES. Price, 10 cents.
- THE COMPLETE FURNISHING OF THE LITTLE HOUSE. Reprints of the articles comprising this series, as they appear, may be had for ten cents each from the Interior Decoration Department, THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL.
- THE BOOK OF SWEATERS AND KNITTING. Containing the latest designs. Price, 15 cents.

Order the following booklets directly from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City:

FASHION SELECTIONS FOR SPRING AND SUMMER. A thirty-two-page booklet containing more than 250 attractive and popular designs for all occasions. Send two 2-cent stamps for postage.

MASQUERADE COSTUMES. A twenty-four-page booklet of novel designs for party, play or pageant. Price 15 cents.

THE BRIDE'S BOOK. Charming illustrations designs for the entire trousseau, and many valuable suggestions for the wedding arrangements. Price 15 cents.

YOUR CHILDREN'S CLOTHES. Twenty-four pages of simple and easily made garments for children, with complete instructions for cutting and making. Price 15 cents.

THE MATERNITY BOOK. Illustrates attractive, sensible clothes for maternity wear, as well as all the necessary garments for the layette. Patterns supplied for all designs shown. Price 15 cents.

SIMPLIFIED SMOCKING. Teaches the one-process method of smocking, and shows twenty-seven new designs, with many delightful suggestions for their application. Price 25 cents.

Patterns may be had from any store selling Home Patterns by mail, postage prepaid, or from the Home Pattern Company, 18 East 18th Street, New York City, at the following prices:

Dresses	35 cents
Coats	35 cents
Skirts	30 cents
Blouses	30 cents
Children's	25 cents
Lingerie	25 cents
Embroidery Transfer	25 cents to 75 cents

MORRIS

Supreme Sliced
Bacon

Always welcome—a good breakfast of bacon and eggs.

Doubly so if you serve this wonderfully flavored Morris Supreme Bacon.
Know it by the famous yellow and black label.

MORRIS & COMPANY
Packers and Provisioners

Morris Supreme means "flavor supreme"

Bon Ami

for bathtubs

*Principal uses of Bon Ami—
For cleaning and polishing*

Bathtubs
Fine Kitchen Utensils
White Woodwork
Aluminum Ware
Brass, Copper and Nickel Ware
Glass Baking Dishes
Windows
Mirrors
Tiling
White Shoes
The Hands
Linoleum and Congoleum

There you are, Old Tub—spotless, gleaming snowy white. And it's so easy to clean you with Bon Ami.

A sprinkling of the soft, fluffy Bon Ami powder on a damp cloth, a few brisk sweeps, and in a jiffy you shine forth—a great glistening piece of porcelain.

Bon Ami is truly a "good friend" to the housewife. Dirt and grime fly before its magic touch. It polishes as it cleans—there is never a scratch in the soft mineral compound.

Note the various uses listed above.

"Hasn't Scratched Yet"

Cake or Powder
whichever you prefer

The Complete Furnishing of the Little House

Floors of Dignity and Beauty

TO SOME persons the treatment of floors is an uninteresting and painful necessity, demanding quantities of sandpaper, gallons of finish, endless wax, infinite patience, industry and elbow grease, a deep and uncanny knowledge of rugs and an equally inexhaustible supply of money—with the fearful uncertainty that at the end the floor may be wrong after all.

The floor of a room is a background for the furniture as much as walls are, and it should be definitely related to the walls in color, value and character. Every room should be considered as a background in its entirety—the pale ceiling, the neutral walls, which should never be lighter than the ceiling and usually should be slightly deeper in tone, the woodwork that generally matches the walls or the ceiling and acts as a connecting decorative link, and the floor that should always be the heaviest note, keeping the proper balance and staying strictly underfoot.

Every room should be heavier at its base. Even if there is dark standing woodwork the floor may be sufficiently weighted down, and the areas of pale wall may be so managed in relation to the furniture, hangings and pictures that they may combine with the pale ceiling in achieving the proper ascending scale of tone—lighter toward the top. A waxed beamed ceiling may be kept in its proper relation to things if the spaces between the beams are toned a bit lighter than the pale walls.

If you start with your ceiling as the lightest tone and work downward in scale as you approach your floor—counting the shadows that are cast by the furniture, the richness and depth of color, as well as the actual darkness of the furniture and floor treatment as your darker tones—you will have learned your lesson well, and can promise yourself a successful room on this score.

So much for a fleeting view of decorative principles. The next subject to consider is the treatment of wooden floors. Broadly speaking, floors are of two types, hardwood and softwood, the former of plain boards or parquetry, the latter varying anywhere from an excellent quality of matched wood responding well to treatment to such frightfully rough boards that the inexperienced hasten to hide them modestly from sight with any all-over covering that can be obtained. I have yet to see a floor so bad that it cannot be made really good-looking with stain or paint properly applied.

Suggestions for Floor Colors

MOST people want hardwood floors and, in building, use them throughout the house, if possible, or put them at least in the more important rooms. But it is surprising how many people think hardwood floors must be yellow—a shiny outer color upon which darker rugs and furniture appear too heavy.

All hardwood floors should be toned some shade of brown. To refinish a hardwood floor, apply a liquid paint or varnish remover with a brush, and after it has penetrated the old finish, scrape this off with a putty knife. Then wash the floor with benzine. Prepare a solution of oxalic acid—one ounce of acid to a quart of either water or denatured alcohol, the latter being a quicker medium—and use this solution to remove spots, tracks, footmarks or dirt; the floor should be scoured with it, allowing twenty minutes to elapse before washing with clear water.

The floor is now prepared for the filler. Filler is a paste that may be had in many colors or mixed to order in any color at all: powdered burnt umber mixed with plain filler will give, in the varying degrees used, different tones of dark walnut; this is modified by the addition of raw sienna, and raw sienna alone mixed with plain paste filler results in a light oak tone. It must be remembered that hardwood takes any kind of color more palely than does softwood. Enough burnt umber in the paste filler to result in a medium and pleasant brown is the ideal tone for a hardwood floor.

Filler may be thinned with benzine or turpentine, the former having the advantage of drying instantly. The filler may be applied with a brush; when it becomes chalky rub across the grain of the wood with a cloth, removing at the same time any superfluous filler that is not absorbed by the wood. After the grain of the wood is filled, and this is dry, two coats of floor varnish, the best quality that can be obtained, should be applied, allowing a day to elapse between coats.

A floor treated in this manner should be cared for with an oil mop, and it will probably need revarnishing in about a year.

If it is desired to have waxed hardwood floors, two coats of shellac should be substituted for the two coats of varnish, after which wax may be applied in a powdered or liquid form and rubbed to a soft glow; floors should be waxed about once a month to protect the shellac finish and keep them in good condition.

By ETHEL CARPENTER

Illustration by Albert Hencke

Hardwood floors must be laid by an expert. Oak or quartered oak is usually selected for private homes, but if a particularly durable wood is desired maple is chosen. Parquetry differs from the usual hardwood floor in that it is cut in small pieces, matched, and mounted on a canvas back; in this way two kinds of wood may be decoratively blended. But if the blending is at all pronounced or the designs ornate the latter state is worse than the first, and the floors claim an attention in a decorative scheme that should never be accorded them.

But for the millions of folks who have had floors there is more than a ray of comfort. The most conventional way to treat them is to stain them walnut. Walnut is the first choice in color for a floor stain, since it is dark and glows with beautiful reflections; it is so neutral that it blends with any furniture; it has the proper value for a floor and has no unpleasant vividness of color when seen in strong light or sun. If the floor is in very bad condition, with uneven board widths and unsightly cracks, a crack filler will work wonders. And last, but not least, the floor that is painted a color is decorative, and highly satisfactory for its artistic effect.

If a softwood floor has been finished and is not peeling or chipping, there is all probability that it will take its new finish of the same medium without removing the old. If the old finish is flaking or breaking—and this does not just mean signs of wear but a general loosening of the coat of finish, which is easily detectable—the whole will have to be removed by means of the liquid paint and varnish remover, for which directions have already been given. After washing the floor with benzine, the cracks must be filled, if there are noticeable ones. The easiest preparation of which I know is dissolved in water either until it is the consistency of putty, when it is pressed into the cleaned cracks with a putty knife, or until it is more the thickness of paint, when it is poured into the cracks, after which any excess filler is removed with a cloth immediately. Color may be mixed with this crack filler if desired.

How to Use Stain and Shellac

IF THE floor is of very soft wood and has never had a finish on the wood before it is sometimes necessary to give it three coats. In this case the first coat may be of cheaper paint or stain, but the two top coats should be the best paint that money can buy. Paints and varnishes come particularly prepared for floors, and when special colors are desired they should be mixed on the same principles, to insure wear and nonspotting. Floor varnish may be mixed with colored paint when a colored floor is wanted; you may do it yourself if you happen to have both varnish and paint in the house, but it is always better to get an expert to mix your colored floor paint from a given sample.

Another method of painting a floor is to give it two coats of paint and two of shellac, renewing the shellac from time to time. Floors covered with varnish stain should never be allowed to wear down to the wood before being restained or they will be spotty and uneven where the stain soaks down into the wood in some places and stays on top of the old finish in others. It is better to treat your floors to a fresh coat regularly enough to keep them in good condition. This does not hold so rigidly of floor paint, as it is more of an opaque enamel and covers a multitude of sins.

If it is desired to stain a painted floor the paint will first have to be removed. It is possible to flat stain a hard or soft wood floor a desired brown and protect it with wax; this is frequently done, but if vigilance is relaxed and the wax wears thin the finish comes off and the whole floor has to be redone. A coat of shellac between the stain and the outer wax finish adequately protects the stain, but the floor will be so good-looking one will have a pride in keeping it well waxed. This sort of floor is an ideal background for Oriental rugs.

Painted floors are decorative, and when the furnishings are chosen for effect rather than for conventionality the choice of paint for the floor is a happy one. A dull old blue with quite a bit of green in it is a decorative floor color, and may be used delightfully in a dining room with black furniture decorated in peacock, and with a Chinese rug in gold and blue. Dull leaf green is stunning on the floor of a hall with a black and ivory stair; a black floor may be very beautiful with Oriental rugs of rose and gold. On many painted floors, deep-pile plain rugs made of carpeting, and in color blending or contrasting with the color of the floor, prove a delightful solution of the floor problem; and everyone knows the charm of rag rugs on a painted floor.

After the finish of a floor is accomplished rugs and carpets become an all-engrossing subject. Two general types of floor coverings seem to be claiming the popular mind—the genuine Oriental and the plain-colored carpet or rug. The necessary outlay in purchasing real Orientals is undoubtedly great, but when it is remembered that with care they may be made to last a lifetime, that well-chosen Orientals have a quality of furnishing the barest kind of room besides giving hourly joy from the contemplation of their subdued and gorgeous colors, that they may be acquired one or two at a time so that the outlay may be spread over a number of years, it will be seen that they are really an economy in the end.

Rugs—Oriental and Domestic

AMONG the most popular medium-priced genuine Oriental rugs are two Persians, the Serapi and the Mahal, which may be found for $200 to $300 in the nine-by-twelve-foot size, with smaller rugs in proportion. I hesitate to give any prices, as these change constantly, but a scale of value is established by mentioning the present current prices of these rugs as compared with that of one of the finest Persians, the Kermanshah, which to-day costs in the same size from $900 up. Everyone does not care for room-size rugs, and smaller ones laid properly on a well-waxed dark floor will often give a more decorative effect for a smaller outlay.

The Persians are usually of finer design and coloring than the Turkish rugs, the former being more vinelike and delicate in character, the latter more boldly and geometrically planned. The Turkoman rugs are woven by nomad Turkish tribes that have come under Russian domination; possibly the most popular of these are the Bokharas, but the Baluchistans and Afghans are close seconds.

At present the Chinese rugs are the most moderate-priced rugs in the market, and they are wholly delightful when they are chosen wisely. In wonderful blues and tawny golds they are at their best, and if the whole room is keyed lighter in scale, these rugs, which are often paler than other Orientals, may be most artistically used. In inferior grades the Chinese rugs are perhaps not so durable as the Turkish and Persian rugs, but if one is fond of them one is prepared to accord even the fine Chinese rugs greater care in order to prolong their life.

It must be remembered that Oriental rugs are not beautiful or desirable merely because they are Oriental. As many hideous designs are perpetrated among these as in any other article where design goes to form its making. The dull, richly blended colors whose related tones are in such perfect accord, the unobtrusive designs whose patterns are so interwoven that nothing forces itself unpleasantly upon the attention—these are the principal decorative requirements of the desirable Oriental rug.

Many Orientals of modern make are colored with aniline dyes, impermanent colors that have for purposes of cheaper manufacture taken the place of the original vegetable and animal dyes. An expert can tell aniline dye at a glance, but if the amateur must rely on his own judgment rub some part of the rug with a wet cloth; only aniline dyes will run.

In domestic figured rugs posies, bowknots, floral effects and medallions have gone by the board, and when a figured rug is a necessity, those who know are choosing well-covered, unpronounced designs and rich colors interwoven to form an almost one-tone effect, or else the modern allover conventional small-patterned rug or carpet in two tones.

As far as figured rugs are concerned, genuine Orientals are in a desirable class by themselves, so, except in the case of the dining room, when there is a large family or a number of children and a figured rug will therefore give greater satisfaction, plain-colored chenilles, Wiltons and Axminsters are invariably chosen from among the domestic floor coverings. Many people have come to prefer plain rugs to any other kind, since they allow absolute leeway in the choosing

(Continued on Page 162)

Ask for Ferris at the leading stores. The genuine has the name

Ferris
GOOD NEWS

on the garment.

Will yours be a "good" baby?

A baby's goodness is a matter of health, and so are his adorable pink chubbiness, his funny gurgling smile and his strong little limbs!

Every baby, if given the right start, will be that wonderful blessing—a good baby, easy to take care of!

To assure your baby the best possible start in life, select your maternity corset carefully. Its function is two-fold and vitally important—to give support to the mother and protection to the child.

Ferris Maternity Corsets are the result of more than forty years of scientific experience and are recommended by physicians as the standard garment for prospective mothers. Their graceful, concealing lines give both the correct physical support and also that mental comfort so valuable to the happiness of the mother-to-be.

Ferris Maternity Corsets are made in attractive materials, fine mercerized brocades and plain durable coutils—in both white and pink. Also a great variety of models to suit every type of figure.

THE FERRIS BROS. CO.

5-7-9 Union Square West
New York

SEND FOR ILLUSTRATED CATALOG

It gives information that will help you select the type of maternity corset that your figure requires.

Ferris Maternity Corsets

The "Drip Drop"

THE WAGNER DRIP-DROP ROASTER—a modern development of the good old-fashioned Dutch Oven—really does give much better results with roasts, stews, fowl and meats of all kinds. The thick walls distribute heat evenly, cooking thoroughly, without scorching. The natural flavors are cooked in—instead of being cooked out!

The exclusive design of raised angle points on the close fitting cover affords a self-basting feature.

The "Drip-Drop" Roaster (Round and Oval shape) is made in both Cast Aluminum and Cast Iron De Luxe. Ask your dealer. Write for leaflet No. 10.

THE WAGNER MFG. CO.

12 Fair Ave., Sidney, Ohio

Makers of Wagner Cast Aluminum and Cast Iron Cooking Utensils

for
GOOD Roasts!
and Savory Stews

WAGNER
WARE

The Complete Furnishing of the Little House

(Continued from Page 161)

of curtains, upholsteries and ornaments, and the floor is more sure to keep its proper relation to the rest of the room. And for myself, if I could not have the kind of real Oriental rugs I wished, I would without question refuse a figured substitute, choosing instead dull-toned plain rugs for my floors, while for many rooms I should really prefer the plain rugs if I were striving for an original and beautiful color effect.

Among the plain rugs the chenilles are the most expensive, and are considered the most beautiful. They are woven in one piece, and come in many widths, from nine to thirty feet, and of course may be cut in any length, so that they are practical for a room of any size. A brownish gray and a flat gray-brown are among the most serviceable and decorative conventional colors, and these blend with many room color schemes. One may be more daring, however, and choose the rich dull midnight blues, old blues, leaf greens, mulberry, old gold, and even black, depending on the effect desired.

Wilton rugs are less expensive than chenilles, they are of shorter pile and firmer to the foot, since they are woven in an entirely different manner, but their decorative effect is nearly equal to that of the handsomer rug, and they are even preferred by many people. Wiltons are woven in carpet strips twenty-seven inches wide and are seamed, but when the seams are well sewed and the pile is brushed over them they scarcely show. Wiltons come in a number of different grades; the most expensive are worsted Wiltons, made of longer, heavier and better quality wool, and are three-shot, a technical term for a firmer weave. There are different grades in worsted Wiltons, and the best quality of these may be bought for a few dollars less than the medium grade of chenille that has been quoted. Besides the worsted Wiltons there are wool Wiltons, which are the medium and cheaper grade of this type, and these are sometimes three-shot, sometimes two, the latter term meaning a fabric not quite so firm. In the cheaper grades of Wilton a little cotton is mixed in the two-shot weave; but in a special rug of this character that has been designed for wear such excellent results have been obtained in beauty and service that if such a rug is bought from a reputable dealer—the present price of which would be slightly under a hundred dollars in the nine-by-twelve size—satisfaction would be assured. Wilton rugs come in many beautiful and plain colors as well as in the figured designs. It is chiefly in these that the Orientals are copied.

Axminster rugs have lately become very decorative, and are made in the delightful plain colors, as well as in patterns, the former being much more desirable. The best quality of Axminster rug may be advised, and it is of lower price than the Wiltons. A velvet, or Wilton velvet, rug may be obtained in plain colors also; it is a rug of moderate price, and, as its price indicates, it is not so well worth buying as the other rugs that have been mentioned. This rug is printed or dyed after weaving. Body Brussels rugs wear forever and a day, but they are harsh and undecorative, and I should prefer a rug with more beauty that might have to be replaced a trifle sooner.

Among the less expensive rugs there are the plain-colored linens, which have a great many decorative qualities and uses, a similar rug of flat weave in wool, and rag rugs. The latter may be had in woolen or cotton rugs, handmade or machine woven, and in many decorative color combinations. Jute rugs are worthy of note, since in many cases they rather artistically achieve the effect of Orientals, but they are not guaranteed fadeless, and their life is comparatively short, in keeping with their low price.

Carpets are being used more than they have been for years. In the plain colors these are delightful; they make a decorative background for tiny and colorful rugs, they make a small room seem much larger, and they graciously cover an ungainly floor.

EDITOR'S NOTE—This is the second article in a series on the Complete Furnishing of the Little House. The next, to appear in the March Home Journal, will consider curtaining the house.

Ask these Questions in Selecting a Home Site

(Continued from Page 28)

There are many possible nuisances.

The best single test as to the net advantages of a residence district is the class of people who live in it, what sort of homes they are building and whether more of the same sort are coming in. Even though all appearances are favorable, it is not safe to buy or settle until one has taken real pains to verify the first favorable impressions and the glowing assurances of the real-estate agent.

Merely absence of nuisances is not enough, of course, to recommend a building site. There is a long list of desirable items to be combined as well as possible. After safety and good neighbors are assured come matters of the public utilities—transportation, light, water, gas, mail, delivery service, and so forth. Then local improvements. Are the roads, sidewalks and curbs in? Will paving be needed? Are the improvements now in or soon to come, all that will be required? Will there be further levies and assessments against property owners? As to these things ask of the residents and at the city engineer's office.

Next, what are the conditions on the building site itself? What is the subsoil? If rocky or wet costly grading may be involved. Is it sand? It may cave in excavating. Heavy clay tends to be hard to handle and usually requires special foundation work to prevent wet cellars. "Made" ground should usually be avoided. A reasonably loose and well-drained subsoil is preferable and one with a permanent water level well below the cellar floor. And how about local sewerage and drainage arrangements? Are these systems working properly and can one get a good grade to connect them with the new house?

A really good view from at least some of the "best" windows should be assured. The outlook should be pleasant and restful both winter and summer. If trees are essential it is certain that they will not be cut down before long and uncover something unsightly?

Does the lot lie so as to permit a good location for the house and a logical layout for garage, road, gardens and other arrangements? How will you get in the coal and get out the ashes? Will the garage shade the garden space? Will the new house look well from the rear as well as from the front?

Will water be available at the site for building operations? Can you get gas, telephone, water and light connections promptly when needed?

Then consider the legal status of the property. Is the title clear and subject to no encumbrances? Or is it clouded in some way, or subject to mortgage, easements for rights-of-way, ditch or pole lines, or something of the sort? Are all assessments and taxes paid up or are any shortly due? Are there any building restrictions on the lot and do these extend to neighboring property so as to insure uniform and high-class development? Is the owner in a position to give a good warranty deed and prompt possession of the property?

Check the legitimacy of the price asked by the owner by looking up the value placed on this and neighboring property by the local tax assessor and by finding out from near-by residents how the local tax assessments compare with actual sale prices thereabouts. For a further and excellent check on values you can probably find out what your bank would lend on this or similar property in case you buy and want to build on it.

How to Lose Fat

(Continued from Page 5)

some extent the course of exercise, far outnumbered those who were enrolled. Throughout the country our volunteer followers must have reached into the thousands. This was the best result of the enterprise, a far-reaching interest in a better way of living stimulated by the example of the chosen and official squad of women. Young America to its physical benefit plays baseball in imitation of the big leagues. A similar method might well be followed to popularize public health in America. Outdoor athletics are provided for. Something is needed for the indoor grown-ups to stir and keep up interest in the great game of health.

Our squad included a dozen nationalities. Their ages ranged between the teens and the forties. More than half were married and a good proportion were mothers. The lightest member of the class weighed 150 pounds and the heaviest weighed 281 pounds. Some of the extra heavies had not been able to lace their own shoes for months and years previously, and if they chanced to fall down they were unable to regain their feet without assistance. Yet it was not long before these overburdened persons became relatively agile. A rolling exercise on the floor was of special benefit to them and spectators were amazed at the capacity developed by seemingly helpless spheres rolling on the gymnasium mat.

Among the records of those who led the squad in reduction are the following:

Miss Sarah Strong, New York, 32 years of age, 5 feet 7 $\frac{3}{4}$ inches in height. Bust measure was 50 inches and was reduced in three weeks to 42 inches. Weight of 281 pounds was reduced to 256 pounds or a loss of 25 pounds. Occupation, private secretary. A model case, followed diet rules strictly, taking home exercise and long walks nightly in addition to class work. Old American stock, father a Vermont farmer. Put on most of flesh in recent years, attributing it to sedentary life in city. A contributory cause is going back home for summer vacations and eating too much because mother is such a good cook. Says beaux were formerly lacking but since reduction several have made their appearance on the horizon.

Happy Losers

MRS. GEORGIA HEFFNER, Arverne, Long Island, 24 years old, has two young children, is 5 feet 4 $\frac{1}{4}$ inches in height. Bust was 46 inches and now 40 inches is loose. Weight of 194 pounds brought down to 172 pounds, or a loss of 22 pounds. The inefficacy of a Turkish bath was shown in this case, for it added 2 pounds of weight. General health much improved, sleeps better at night. Before joining squad had tried in vain all pills, powders and patent reduction methods. Admits a struggle to keep to diet and has trouble with a Southern colored cook, who disapproves limitation of menu.

Mrs. Ella Weaver, Richfield Park, New Jersey, 33 years of age, 5 feet 8 inches in height. Weight of 258 pounds was brought down to 234 pounds, or a loss of 24 pounds. Attributes excess weight partly to motor car, which was bought two years ago and in which she rode round everywhere instead of walking. Will not give up car but has resolved to walk to local shops, and so on.

Miss Frances Moses, Bronx, 19 years of age, 5 feet 4 inches in height. Weight of 191 pounds was reduced to 168 pounds, or a loss of 23 pounds. A stenographer and in extra time a saleslady. No exercise at work and her beau owns car, which means only riding for recreation. Hereafter will do some walking and continue special exercises.

Among other cases is that of Mrs. Lillie Frankel, Bensonhurst, 24 years of age, 5 feet 2 inches in height, has two young children. A cabaret singer, she lost popularity by too much deposit of adipose tissue, but now bust measure of 44 inches is down to 38 inches and weight from 164 pounds to 145 pounds, her vogue is reviving and she has had several good business offers. A somewhat similar case is that of a Miss Thompson, who found that fat interfered with business. A corset model, she joined the class because she was getting disqualified for her position. Her bust was 38 inches instead of the required 36 inches. After one week she was 10 pounds lighter and had the exact girth desired, whereupon she resigned from the class, saying that a week had achieved what she hoped to do in a month.

Fat Ladies' Yell

While the great reduction contest was on, Doctor Copeland was greeted by his class with this yell:

COMMISSIONER,
Commissioner,
Rah! RAH! RAH!
Are we thinner?
I should say we are!

We've cut out sugar,
We've cut out starch,
We're out of bed early
We take a long march.

Royal S. Copeland!
Rah! RAH! RAH!
We have reduced our waistlines,
Sis—boom—BAH!
Royal S. Copeland,
Ha! Ha! HA!

What to Eat

A REFRACTORY case was that of Mrs. Jean Dwyer, 43 years old, 5 feet 2 inches in height, a widow with twelve children. She weighed 150 pounds at the start and about the same at the finish. A sudden gain of one pound was explained when Mrs. Dwyer confessed in class that she had broken the rules and eaten a large dish of chop suey. The scales detected a few other cases of dietary delinquency.

The sample menus of the reduction squad, which accompany this article, speak for themselves and almost make it unnecessary for me to dwell upon the details of diet. We have in general three kinds of food—fats, carbohydrates and proteins. Anyone who wishes to reduce should keep away as far as possible from the first two kinds. We all know that the fats include butter, cream, vegetable oils and animal fats. The carbohydrates are sugar and starch, which include candy, potatoes, parsnips, white bread, rice, and such like.

The proteins, which do not make fat, are found in lean meat, fish, poultry, white of egg, legumes and some other things. Now it is impossible to live only on proteins. They must be supplemented with other and bulky foods, such as cereals and especially vegetables and fruits.

The best vegetables for the purpose are the leafy kind with plenty of cellulose, as lettuce, celery, spinach, cabbage. These help to fill the stomach and satisfy the appetite, besides having other merits.

For breakfast take any kind of fruit which has no starch in it. Banana? I am surprised. You know it is full of starch. Take orange, grapefruit, apple, any dried fruit or stewed prunes cooked without sugar.

For a cereal take any kind you like, either cooked or uncooked, but since we are after roughage it is better to select a bulky or whole-grain sort. I am willing to permit a trifle of sugar, say a teaspoonful, upon the cereal, provided you must have it; but no cream at all. Furthermore, whatever the cereal, add to it a tablespoonful of bran. This may be had in a package at the grocery store. Bran is most useful to stimulate the intestinal action.

If you take an egg for breakfast, only take one, because the yellow part will add to the fat of your body. Keep away from ham and bacon, likewise from any food that is fried in fat. No fried foods of any sort, but only those which are boiled, baked, roasted or grilled.

In the bread line we are to avoid fresh bread and white bread, using instead Holland rusk, toast, bran biscuits and Graham bread, without butter in every case.

(Continued on Page 164)

Raise the Kiddies on Wheels

The idea of raising children on wheels is a hobby with the management, the three Diemer brothers. They realized years ago, the benefits in health, poise, confidence and self-reliance that come to the children who get plenty of vigorous exercise either indoors or out.

The "American" line is a guaranteed, quality line, built for the safety of the child and for the protection to clothing, floors, door coverings and furniture.

The baby vehicle shown is hand woven of genuine American cut reeds, with beautiful soft upholstery. It is No. 772-P. It has pneumatic tires, shock-absorbing springs, ball bearings, folding robe rail, anti-draft curtain and special hand lift on the front axle for convenience in going up and down steps, extra large package compartment, large, graceful hood—and these are only a few of the exclusive "American" features. It is also equipped with a special foot brake that is easily set or released with the sole of the shoe, as illustrated.

Write for booklet "B" on Baby carriages, strollers and sulkeys, or "J" on Juvenile and Doll vehicles, stating just what you are interested in, and we will send you the Dealer's name in your territory.

"See the American Line First" at your Dealer's.
Sold around the world by Dealers and Jobbers.

The ideal line for "Young America."

The American National Company

THREE FACTORIES • TOLEDO, OHIO, U. S. A.

Dennison's

A procession of gay holidays
—each holiday a charming party!

AND for each party fascinating Dennison's decorations for the table; dainty favors, place cards, bon-bon baskets, candle shades—even timely invitations, caps, and appropriate costumes.

St. Valentine's Day and Lincoln's Birthday will scarcely have passed when Washington's Birthday suggests new and delightful ways to entertain, with Dennison to help at a tiny expense. And, just beyond, is coming good Saint Patrick, with the shamrock and the harp.

Dennison dealers are everywhere—but plan the parties now—send for your copy of the Party Book today.

Send ten cents with the coupon below for Dennison's Party Book—it tells a score of ways to make the holiday gay, and pictures every conceivable article designed for the Day, whatever that day is. An invaluable source of ideas for every hostess.

DENNISON MFG. CO.

Dept. M Framingham, Mass.

Please use pencil

Here is ten cents for my copy of the Party Book

Name _____

Address _____

What Next ?

DR. PRICE'S VANILLA

Try Price's Vanilla! You'll like its evenly balanced, just-right strength. You can use Price's, confident that it will never spoil your cooking through over or under flavoring. Price's is always dependable—it is neither weak nor too strong.

Price's Vanilla is the pure flavor extracted from the finest vanilla beans. Long aging in wooden casks brings to it a rare, mellow sweetness. Price's Vanilla adds an irresistibly delicious flavor to cakes, cookies, custards, puddings, home-made ice-cream and candies. Ask your grocer for it.

Look for the little Tropikid on the label.

PRICE FLAVORING EXTRACT CO.
"Experts in Flavor" Chicago, Ill.

Whispering Spring

How attractive are the pretty tub frocks Sacson has created for Spring! So charming! So colorful! So serviceable always! Splendidly tailored of the finest quality fabrics, Sacson dresses are made to give long wear and complete satisfaction.

There is a Sacson dealer near you. If you do not know his name, send us your check or money order and we will see that the styles you want are sent you.

No. 947 above—Excellent quality checked gingham. Full gathered skirt with patch pockets. Collar and cuffs of organdie, hemstitched and edged with lace. In blue, black, brown, green or red. Price $5.00

No. 930 at right—One-piece frock of novelty checked fine gingham. Collar and pipings of white poplin. Side pleats over hips. In blue, brown or pink. Price $6.50

SIZES: 36 to 46. Misses, 16-18-20

Send for our new Spring style booklet
SACSON, 56 West 21st St., New York

SACSON

Porch & Morning
Dresses

How to Lose Fat

(Continued from Page 163)

All the lean meats, poultry and sea food with plenty of the vegetables previously mentioned are suitable.

As far as drink is concerned, skim milk is a safe article if you take it in reasonable quantities. Black coffee or coffee to which milk has been added, not cream, is all right. Water at mealtimes is bad for fat people because its effect is to wash down too much food. You eat more if you drink water. Do not take water at mealtime, but drink all you want between meals, which will help to carry waste away.

A tablespoon of mineral oil every night is a useful ally of bran in the diet in keeping the bowels open.

Mineral oil is not absorbed by the system, as are the vegetable oils; it merely lubricates the bowels.

Don't look on dieting as a hardship. The hardship is to keep stuffing yourself with the wrong things and feeling miserable in consequence.

Objection has been made to the diet as published that the elimination of butter and cream left out essential vitamins. It was precisely to make up the deficiency in this respect that we emphasized in the menus the leafy vegetables, which contain the vitamins ordinarily received in the body through butter and cream. It would be harmful indeed if a baby or growing child were placed upon such a diet as we are recommending for an obese person. Children must have the vitamins and the elements contained in whole milk. They are entitled to a full ration of butter and cream.

The Lesson for Others

OUR experiment with the reduction squad has the same value that the sanatorium has in the treatment of incipient tuberculosis. The sanatorium cannot care for more than a very limited number of the many affected with tuberculosis, but the sanatorium acts as an object lesson to demonstrate to those affected the proper way of living, and it teaches possible victims the manner of life which will keep them from having the disease. Along this line of thought, it may profit many persons of incipient fatness to consider the reduction diet and to follow it to some extent.

If we treat ourselves properly our bodies will not be fat but will be fit, life will be enjoyable and its span increase. Moreover, there will be more natural beauty in the land. I do not object to the reasonable use of cosmetics, but paint and powder are no substitute for the splendid appearance of good health. The trouble with our modern civilization is that we camouflage the condition of health. A counterfeit complexion with an artful gown and harness enable many persons to pass muster who otherwise would be forced to mend their ways and improve their state of health. A natural trim figure and genuine roses in the cheeks should be the aim of sensible American womanhood.

The following daily menus, used during the contest, are suggestive of the right kind of diet:

Menu

BREAKFAST
Any Fresh Fruit, Except Bananas
Any Cereal (With Tablespoonful of Bran Sprinkled Over, Skim Milk, No Sugar)
One Coddled Egg
Two Slices of Whole Wheat Bread Toasted, No Butter
Tea (Clear, No Sugar, With Skim Milk, if Preferred) Coffee (No Sugar, Skim Milk if Desired) Buttermilk

LUNCHEON
Clear Broth
Chopped Onion and Celery Sandwich (Made With Two Slices of Rye Bread, Pepper and a Little Salt, No Butter)
Tea (No Sugar, Skim Milk if Desired) Coffee (No Sugar, Skim Milk if Desired) Buttermilk

DINNER
Clear Soup
Chicken, Roasted or Broiled (Do Not Eat Skin)
Spinach
Celery
Two Bran Muffins (No Butter)
Cottage Cheese
Coffee (No Sugar, Skim Milk if Desired)

Menu

BREAKFAST
One-half Cantaloupe, or Any Fresh Fruit
Any Cereal (With Bran Sprinkled Over, Skim Milk, No Sugar)
Dry Toast, Two Slices
Coffee (Skim Milk, if Desired, No Sugar) Tea (Skim Milk, if Desired, No Sugar)

LUNCHEON
Clear Soup
Prune Whip
(Pulp of Prune and White of Egg, Beaten Up)
Three Rusks
Lettuce (With Vinegar or Lemon Juice, No Oil) Buttermilk Tea

Menu

DINNER
Clear Soup
Roast Lamb (No Fat)
Romaine Salad (Vinegar or Lemon Juice, No Oil)
One Bran Muffin (No Butter)
One Raw Apple
Coffee
Buttermilk

BREAKFAST
Any Fresh Fruit, Except Bananas
Any Cereal (With Tablespoonful of Bran Sprinkled Over, Skim Milk, No Sugar)
One Coddled Egg
Two Slices of Whole Wheat Bread Toasted (No Butter)
Tea (Skim Milk or Clear, No Sugar) Coffee (No Sugar, Skim Milk if Desired)

Menu

LUNCHEON
Vegetable or Clear Soup
Roast Beef (No Fat)
Cauliflower
Sliced Tomatoes (Vinegar or Lemon Juice, No Oil)
Celery
Two Slices of Bread (No Butter)
Tea (No Sugar) Coffee (No Sugar, Skim Milk if Desired)

SUPPER
Combination Salad (Tomatoes, Lettuce, Onion and Celery, Vinegar May be Used, No Oil, Pepper and Salt)
Two Bran Muffins (No Butter)
Gelatin
Cottage Cheese
Tea (No Sugar) Coffee (No Sugar, Skim Milk if Desired)

Menu

BREAKFAST
Grape Fruit, or Any Fresh Fruit
Except Bananas
Any Cereal (With Tablespoonful of Bran Sprinkled Over, Skim Milk, No Sugar)
The Whites of Two Eggs on Toast
Coffee (No Sugar, Skim Milk if Desired) Tea (Skim Milk if Desired)

LUNCHEON
One Cup of Broth
Combination Vegetable Salad, No Oil, Vinegar or Lemon Juice
(Chopped Onion, Parsley, Celery, Lettuce, Pepper and Salt)
Two Bran Muffins (No Butter)
Clear Jello
Tea Buttermilk Coffee

Menu

DINNER (Boiled)
Vegetable Soup
Boiled Beef
Boiled Carrots, Onions, Turnips
Raw Celery (All You Wish)
Two Slices of Whole Wheat Bread (Twenty-four Hours Old, No Butter)
Stewed Prunes (No Sugar)
Tea (No Sugar) Coffee (No Sugar, Skim Milk if Desired)

Menu

BREAKFAST
Stewed Prunes (No Sugar, Cooked With Lemon if Desired)
Any Cereal (With Bran Sprinkled Over, No Sugar, Skim Milk if Desired)
Two Rusks
Coffee (With Skim Milk, No Sugar) Tea (No Sugar, Skim Milk if Desired)

LUNCHEON
Four Raw Oysters
Celery Salad (No Oil, Vinegar or Lemon Juice)
Two Bran Muffins (No Butter)
Sliced Oranges (No Sugar)
Tea Coffee Buttermilk

Menu

DINNER
Clear Broth (Four Ounces), or Clear Broth
Boiled Haddock, or One Lamb Chop Mashed Parsnips, or Stewed Tomatoes
Two Rusks (No Butter)
Cottage Cheese (All You Wish)
Tea (Clear) Coffee (Clear)

"How Could You Ever Afford So Many New Things?"

Let Us Tell You How—

- You Can Get These Six Smart Garments Without Cost
- How You Can Make $25 to $50 a Week at Home
- and How You Can Always Be Well-Dressed at One-Half to One-Third the Usual Cost

YOU can put these six pretty and useful articles of dress into your closet—and they won't cost you a cent.

They can all be yours free for the making: a smart collar and cuff set; a dainty chemise of sheer material; a useful "over all" apron; a charming blouse; a trim little house dress; and a handsome, stylish afternoon dress.

Think of wearing the six splendid garments pictured above, absolutely without cost! And think too of finding a way to have all the pretty clothes you want—at half to a third the usual price. Three dresses for what you now spend for one.

And then, too, you can learn a new, quick, sure way to turn your spare hours into dollars—to become self-supporting and independent if you wish—to have an income of your own—as much as $25 to $50 a week—to do with as you please.

This "New Way" Helps Women To Make and Save Money

The "New Way" Course in Fashionable Clothes Making brings a whole outfit of better and more stylish clothes within the easy reach of every woman—and at the same time qualifies her to design and finish modish garments which bring high prices.

This simple Course is the result of months of study and co-operation by expert designers, modistes and tailors. After much experiment they have reduced the most important principles of professional tailoring and dressmaking to their simplest possible form, and have arranged them in easy-to-follow lessons. Through this simplified, progressive method even the woman who has never sewed before can learn how to make pretty, stylish clothes for herself and others.

Every woman knows what a hard problem dressing herself on a small income is! You know yourself: you go down town, expecting to find a certain garment at a certain price. But, nine times in ten, it costs much more—and if you pay the difference, it means economizing on shoes, or lingerie, or something else. What a relief the "New Way" Course has proved for women who had always thought they couldn't make clothes that would have "the right look"!

Now they not only have clothes made of better materials—but they can afford more and better shoes, underthings, hats, and all the other things that must be purchased ready to wear.

Short-Cut Methods Take Out Hard Parts

Let us tell you about the remarkable new sewing methods that now enable you to accomplish in minutes what used to require hours. A charming, distinctive gown can be made simply by following a series of easy-to-follow steps, and the exclusive teachings of the "New Way" Course make it possible for you to duplicate the effects produced by famous New York and Paris dressmakers. Let us tell you about "the secret of the silhouette"—the new principles of design—the remarkable idea behind "adaptive dress-making."

Let us also tell you how you can get without cost, all the materials and trimmings necessary to make the six charming garments pictured above. Patterns and full directions accompany the material, and you learn quickly and easily the simple steps needed to make not only these garments, but all the others you need and want.

Find Out How to Get This Modiste's Outfit

FREE

Dress Form Included Without Charge

Learn how you can secure a splendid "professional model" dress form without expense. Also how we present you with a handsome Oriental sewing basket and complete modiste's outfit—in appreciation of your co-operation. The Simplified Dressmaking Chart, the Diploma and the Life Scholarship of this "New Way" Course are also exclusive features which you want to find out all about.

Get Valuable Free Information

It costs you nothing to find out about this wonderful new way to make clothes—and to save and make money.

Do not hesitate. Mail the coupon below, or write a letter, for the free information about all the exclusive features of the "New Way" Course in Fashionable Clothes-making, the free Modiste's Outfit and the Six Free Garments. Learn how you will be able to have three dresses instead of one—dresses that are prettier, finer, better-fitting than those you could buy ready-made at two or three times what they cost you.

There is no obligation. You want to read this information and see for yourself what these new short-cut methods will mean to you. Clip the coupon now, fill it in and mail it at once to—

School of Modern Dress, Dept. 172 821 Jefferson Street, Buffalo, N.Y.

School of Modern Dress
Dept. 172
821 Jefferson St., Buffalo, N. Y.

Without cost or obligation on my part, you may send me complete information regarding the "New Way" Course, how I can make $25 to $50 a week at home, and how I can get the six garments FREE.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

GRACIELA FITZ 1921

In the privacy of her home

The Discriminating American Woman now orders her most important article of wearing apparel—her corset

THERE is a woman in your neighborhood for whose service you may be eternally grateful. She is an experienced and refined woman of taste, who has chosen corsetry as a profession. She will come to your home, and there—but we are getting a bit ahead of our story. The significance to you of this woman's conception of corsetry lies in the fact that the corset is not only the foundation of the dressmaker's art but also of woman's healthy enjoyment of a full day's activities. A corset that is not well fitting and flexibly stayed is a strain, a hardship, a hindrance—to the keen-minded active American Woman of today, and no less to her dressmaker. A correct corset gives the dressmaker the opportunity of gaining her best effects, even with a gown most modest in cost.

A corset need not be inferior to be incorrect. The ordinary corset must be made to please the many, the mass, in a general way, but it simply cannot answer the needs of each individual figure. So it may really be a good corset in itself, but not the correct corset for you.

Perhaps you are still one of those who either do not know of such individual corset service as is rendered by the NuBone Corsetières, or have hesitated to use this service because custom-made corsets are apt to be associated with high prices. May we say right here that the individually fitted NuBone Corset need be no more expensive than any corset of quality-material you may have bought in the past?

Your NuBone Corsetière will let you choose from many samples of fine and delightful materials—let you choose leisurely, unjostled and unhurried by others, in your own home. And there, in privacy, she will study the lines of your figure and its needs; will take the careful measurements required to make a corset to support your body—to strengthen you, to enhance the lines of your figure and give your gown (no matter

Beads edgewise as easily as flatwise

The NuBone Woven Wire Stay

NuBone is the only Woven Wire Stay in existence. The machines that weave the strands of finest piano wire into the NuBone Stay are patented, owned and operated by The NuBone Corset Company only. The stays are used only in NuBone Corsets.

The Woven construction produces a flat, thin, smooth and light stay, having extreme flexibility combined with great strength. It permits the utmost freedom of motion and is guaranteed to support fully any type of figure.

The NuBone Stay will not rust or break. It bends edgewise as easily as flatwise, without twisting or turning. It will lengthen or shorten, give or take, to meet any strain. This prevents the "end thrust" and "side thrust" which are so uncomfortable and so destructive to corsets and gowns.

The economy of NuBone Corsets is due, first, of course, to the moderate purchase price, but then also to the ease and possible frequency of washing. Both the stay and the fabrics can go through many a laundering without showing it.

A Written Guarantee with Every NuBone Corset

A written guarantee accompanies every NuBone Corset, under the terms of which the old corset is replaced by a new one, free of charge, if a NuBone Stay rusts or breaks within a year.

The Only Woven Wire Stay in the World

how modest in cost) that charm so enviable in the correctly corseted woman. Within a short time, your corsetière will come to you again to fit your corset, to adjust it until it is perfectly correct—a vitality-giving companion in all your sport, your domestic or business or social activities. And as comfortable under an evening gown as it is under a sport coat.

A NuBone Corsetière knows the human body, knows the demands of fashion and knows how to adjust the two to the most charming effect. Such knowledge is born of training and experience—and to that is added a high conception of her service to American Womanhood.

And perhaps it is the NuBone Stay that induces so many of these experienced corsetières to select the NuBone Corset as the ideal; a wonderfully flexible stay of fine woven wire—the only woven wire stay in the world.

Won't you ask your NuBone Corsetière more about it? Look for her in your telephone book under "NuBone" or write us at the address given below and we will immediately put you in touch with her. Call her to your home—you are not and will not be allowed to feel under the slightest obligation in arranging an interview.

There is also a pleasing and helpful book which we should like to mail you. Will you send us a note—even a postal card—so that you may receive this booklet within the next few days?

The NuBone Corset Company, 543 East 25th Street, Erie, Pa.

NuBone Corsets are Designed and Made according to your NuBone Corsetière's orders at Corry, Pa. Erie, Pa. Los Angeles, Cal.

SOUTH AFRICA
E. S. Howard
Johannesburg

AUSTRALIA
L. L. Lucas & Co.
Melbourne

CUBA & PORTO RICO
O. C. Whitaker
Havana, Cuba

ENGLAND
Maftan May's
London, W. 14

NuBone INDIVIDUALLY FITTED Corsets

SOLD ONLY THROUGH CAREFULLY TRAINED NUBONE CORSETIÈRES

Motion Pictures in the Fine Arts

MOTION pictures have invaded the fine arts. The attempt to bring the world's masterpieces of painting, sculpture and music onto the screen has proved successful with the presentation of the first of a series, The Beggar Maid, based on Sir Edward Burne-Jones' painting.

The art-dramatic movement that has brought forth The Beggar Maid comes at the top of a wave of reform in motion pictures. The lurid, sensational and distorted plots of modern motion pictures have led many people to think that a picture cannot be a financial success unless it makes liberal use of the "jazz" element. It remained for an enterprising group of artists, art patrons and motion-picture producers to prove that American audiences will welcome with enthusiasm a picture that contains no villain, no triangle, no sex problem, that gives only a simple, genuine story—provided it is interesting and entertaining.

Within recent years, nearly every great stage success, novel and short story has been presented on the screen. But the beautiful stories centering in the characters of famous paintings—here, it was argued, lay a virgin field for the motion-picture dramatist.

A group of artists and art leaders encouraged the plan, cooperating with authors, photographers and motion-picture producers to develop a series of productions worthy of the finest ideals of the higher arts and yet providing all the entertainment that the "jazzy" picture pretends to offer. The advisory board is serving entirely for the interests of the various arts they represent. Among its members are Louis C. Tiffany, creator of the Louis Comfort Tiffany Foundation to encourage young artists; Robert W. de Forrest, President of the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York City; Edwin H. Blashfield, President of the National Academy of Design; Robert I. Aitken, President of the National Sculpture Society; Charles Dana Gibson, President of the Society of Illustrators; and Daniel Chester French, the noted sculptor.

Sir Edward Burne-Jones' Beggar Maid was selected as the first masterpiece to be dramatized. The original painting now hangs in the Tate Gallery, London. In developing a story round this famous painting, sensational elements were not sought. Interpretation of the characters of the painting in appropriate dramatic action were paralleled in a modern story. Tennyson's poem of King Cophetua and the Beggar Maid was delicately woven into the threads of the plot.

*Her arms across her breast she laid;
She was more fair than words can say:
Bare-footed came the beggar maid
Before the king Cophetua.*

In the opening scene of the story we meet the artist in his studio. A friend of his, a wealthy nobleman, is in love with a peasant girl, whose brother resents the match. The artist, reading Tennyson's poem, pictures the scene before him, with the nobleman and the peasant girl as the characters.

*In robe and crown the king slept down,
To meet and greet her on her way;
"It is no wonder," said the lords;
"She is more beautiful than day."*

He decides to paint the scene with these two as his models. Through his efforts he effects a reconciliation—proving that true love knows no class distinction.

*So sweet a face, such angel grace,
In all that land had never been:
Cophetua swore a royal oath:
"This beggar maid shall be my queen!"*

National distribution of The Beggar Maid was secured. The Rivoli Theater in New York City featured it as a pre-release feature. The sincerity and charm of the fifteen-year-old schoolgirl, Mary Astor, who played the part of the beggar maid, brought the newspaper critics to the fore, heralding the newly found star.

The subsequent productions of the art-dramatic movement followed the lines laid down in The Beggar Maid, but in varying light. The second picture is the dramatization of the delightful comedy scene of Josef Israels' Bashful Suitor, the painting now hanging in the Metropolitan Museum, New York. The third picture is based on the motives hidden in Rembrandt's study of The Young Painter. The fourth reveals the wonderful allegory pictured in G. F. Watts' Hope. It is planned to limit the masterpiece productions to two reels, but Leonardo da Vinci's Mona Lisa may run longer.

Making the Popular Chemise Dress

(Continued from Page 79)

To put in the sleeves: Place the right side of the sleeve to the right side of the dress, corresponding marks together, seam lines together; pin in place, being very careful not to stretch the armhole; baste and stitch; overcast the edges together; tack the sleeve seam to the shoulder seam so that the sleeve comes from the waist.

Many women, particularly large women, like the fullness at the belt line adjusted more than by the belt only. The most satisfactory method is to put an elastic in a casing at the belt line. To do this adjust the belt at the proper line; mark the bottom edge on the right side with a line of pins; mark with a basting thread this pin line; fold the dress through the center front, pin the seam lines together and mark the casing line on the left side. Now put a bias or straight casing for the elastic on the under-side of the dress, the lower edge on the basting line. This casing is about five-eighths of an inch wide when finished. It is usually a quarter of an inch wider than the elastic. Sew in place. Elastic a quarter of an inch to three-eighths of an inch in width is satisfactory, and in length two inches shorter than the hip line. Run the elastic in before the dress is hung and tack it to the dress occasionally. The belt, cut on the lengthwise, is tacked on lower edge of casing line.

You will find a dress form a great convenience. Satisfactory forms may be purchased inexpensively. In selecting, be sure to get one having a small enough neck and with good bust and hip lines. Make a tight lining and have it fitted very accurately to you. Put the lining on the dummy, and pad with tissue paper in the misfit parts so that your dummy will exactly fit your lining. Beware of bumps!

A lining of china silk or net is desirable in the chemise dress. Cut it from dress pattern, folding out any extra fullness, and have it reach just below waistline. Tack it to the dress at the neck line and shoulder seams.

Planters PENNANT SALTED PEANUTS

THE crispy freshness of "PLANTERS PENNANT SALTED PEANUTS" adds zest to the salad. They are splendid salad-nuts!

They're good for you, too. There's a regular meal in the 5c bag. The nutriment that nature put in them is kept in by our method of roasting them in a rich combination of vegetable oils. There are approximately 250 food calories in the 5c bag of "PLANTERS PENNANT SALTED PEANUTS"—the same as in a slice of roast beef. They're good. The big whole nuts are crisp and fresh. They are peanuts at their best.

Use them in salads and on the table. You can buy them anywhere.

PLANTERS NUT & CHOCOLATE CO.

Wilkes-Barre, Pa. Suffolk, Va. New York
Chicago San Francisco Boston

5¢
Everywhere in the
"Red Pennant" Bags

Eat them daily for hunger and health

MR. PEANUT
REGISTERED TRADE MARK

Reduce Your Cost of Living

PLANT that vacant space with Henderson's seeds this year and enjoy the benefits of fresh, crisp vegetables right out of your own garden. Half of your living expenses during the summer are for vegetables that you should grow yourself, and a space 25 by 50 feet planted with seeds of good quality will produce all that a family of six will require.

"Everything for the Garden," is the title of our annual catalogue. It is really a book of 176 pages, 16 colored plates and over 1000 half-tones direct from photographs. It is a library of everything worth while for the gardener, farmer or lover of flowers.

An Unusual Offer

To obtain for our annual catalogue, "Everything for the Garden," described above, the largest possible distribution, we make the following unusual offer: To everyone who will mail us 10c., we will mail the catalogue and send our "Henderson Specialty Collection."

After all it is the actual results which count, and to demonstrate the superiority of Henderson's Tested Seeds we have made up this Henderson Collection consisting of one packet of each of the following six great specialties: Ponderosa Tomato, Big Boston Lettuce, White Tipped Scarlet Radish, Henderson's Invincible Asters, Henderson's Brilliant Mixture Poppies, and Giant Waved Spencer Sweet Peas, all enclosed in a coupon envelope which, when emptied and returned, will be accepted as 25c.

cash payment on any order of seeds, plants or bulbs amounting to $1.00 or over. Make this year a garden year.

Peter Henderson & Co.
35-37 Cortlandt Street
New York City

Peter Henderson & Company
35-37 Cortlandt St., New York City
I enclose herewith 10c., for which send catalogue "Everything for the Garden," and "Henderson's Specialty Collection" with complete cultural directions in coupon envelope as advertised.

Name _____
Address _____

"See what a strong healthy child she has grown to be!"

"After having tried numerous prepared foods for my baby without getting the desired results, I was advised to use Nestlé's," writes Mrs. Ethel Steis of Cleveland, "and from the day I started using this food, my baby improved, and today, by enclosed picture, you can see what a strong, healthy child she has grown to be. I can highly recommend it to all mothers."

NESTLÉ'S MILK FOOD

Nestlé's Milk Food has been building strong, healthy children for over half a century.

So you can see how Nestlé's Milk Food will agree with your baby, we will send you, absolutely free, enough for 12 feedings and a book on baby care. Drop us a postcard or use this coupon.

Nestlé's Food Company, Inc.,
Room 42, Nestlé Building,
New York City.

Please send me Free, a Mother's Book and trial package, enough for 12 feedings.

NAME _____
ADDRESS _____
CITY _____

FREE book of California Homes and one complete set of Plans.

"California Homes" contains illustrations, floor plans and descriptions of 50 beautiful California homes, costing from $2,000 to $10,000. REGULAR PRICE $1.00.

We will send you a copy of "California Homes" FREE with your subscription to The Home Designer for one year at $2.50. The Home Designer is a home-building, decorating and landscaping magazine, dealing exclusively with homes costing from $2,000 to $10,000.

EXTRA SPECIAL OFFER: If you subscribe immediately we will send you, FREE, one set of plans (blue prints), complete working drawings all drawn to 1/4" scale, with 1/2" scale details of all inside cases and built-in features, of any home shown in "California Homes." Send check or money order now to:

DIXON AND HILLEN, Publishers
1844 FIFTH AVENUE, OAKLAND, CALIF.

Become a Nurse

BY training at home through our correspondence course. Twenty years of success—12,000 Graduates Earning $18 to $30 weekly. Age 19 to 60. The standard course of home training for nurses. Unavailable for the woman who wants to become a nurse. Indispensable for the practical nurse. Entire tuition earned in a few weeks. Two months' trial. Money refunded if dissatisfied.

Send for catalog and specimen lesson pages.
The Chautauqua School of Nursing
315 Main Street
Jamestown, N. Y.

"SELECT CALIFORNIA BUNGALOWS"

A new, 64-page, up-to-date book of California Bungalows. Shows, plans, etc., types of California bungalows, including the new Adobe. Showing exterior and interior designs.

Not one man's design but carefully selected from thousands of beautiful bungalows. "Get it all in one book." Price $2.00 postpaid anywhere. No stamps please.

GEORGE PALMER TELLING, 361 Kensington Pl., Pasadena, Calif.

Engraved Invitations or Announcements Moderate Prices Write for free samples. Cards $2.00. Royal Engraving Co., 2144 Walnut St., Phila., Pa.

The Call of the Cañon

(Continued from Page 23)

"Nothing wrong!" cried Carley piercingly. "Listen: Nothing wrong in you or life today, nothing for you women to make right? You are as blind as bats, as dead to living truth as if you were buried. Nothing wrong, when thousands of crippled soldiers have no homes, no money, no friends, no work, in many cases no food nor beds? Splendid young men who went away in their prime to fight for you and came back ruined, suffering! Nothing wrong when sane women with the vote might rid politics of partisanship, greed, crookedness? Nothing wrong when prohibition is mocked by women, when the greatest boon ever granted this country is derided and beaten down and cheated? Nothing wrong when there are half a million defective children in this city? Nothing wrong when there are not enough schools and teachers to educate our boys and girls? Nothing wrong when the mothers of this great country let their children go to the dark motion-picture halls and night after night in thousands of towns over all this broad land see pictures that the juvenile court and the educators and keepers of reform schools say make burglars, crooks and murderers of our boys and vampires out of our girls? Nothing wrong when these young, adolescent girls ape you and wear stockings rolled under their skirts and use a lipstick and paint their faces and darken their eyes and pluck their eyebrows? Nothing wrong when great magazines print no page nor picture without its sex appeal? Nothing wrong when the automobile, so convenient for the innocent little run out of town, presents the greatest evil that ever menaced American girls! Nothing wrong when money is God, when luxury, pleasure, excitement, speed are the things striven for? Nothing wrong when some of your husbands spend more of their time with other women than with you? Nothing wrong with jazz, where the lights go out in the dance hall and the dancers jiggle and toddle and wiggle in a frenzy? Nothing wrong in a country where one of the greatest colleges cannot report the birth of one child to each graduate in ten years? Nothing wrong with race suicide and the incoming horde of foreigners? Oh, there's nothing wrong with America except that she staggers under a titanic burden that only mothers of sons can remove! You doll women, you parasites, you toys of men, you silken-wrapped geisha girls, you painted, idle, purring cats, you parody of the females of your species, find brains enough, if you can, to see the doom hanging over you and revolt before it is too late."

XI

CARLEY burst in upon her aunt. "Look at me, Aunt Mary," she cried, radiant and exultant. "I'm going back West to marry Glenn and live his life."

The keen old eyes of her aunt softened and dimmed. "Dear Carley, I've known that for a long time. You've found yourself at last."

Then Carley breathlessly habbled her hastily formed plans, every word of which seemed to rush her onward.

"You're going to surprise Glenn again?" queried Aunt Mary.

"Oh, I must. I want to see his face when I tell him."

"Well, I hope he won't surprise you," declared the old lady. "When did you hear from him last?"

"In January. It seems ages; but, Aunt Mary, you don't imagine Glenn—"

"I imagine nothing," interposed her aunt. "It will turn out happily, and I'll have some peace in my old age. But, Carley, what's to become of me?"

"Oh, I never thought," replied Carley blankly. "It will be lonely for you. Auntie, I'll come back in the fall for a few weeks. Glenn will let me."

"Let you? So you've come to that? Imperious Carley Burch! Thank goodness, you'll now be satisfied to be allowed to do things."

"I'd—I'd crawl for him," breathed Carley.

"Well, child, as you can't be practical, I'll have to be," replied Aunt Mary seriously.

"Fortunately for you, I am a woman of quick decision. Listen: I'll sell this property and go West with you. I want to see the Grand Cañon. Then I'll go on to California where I have old friends I've not seen for years."

"When you get your new home all fixed up I'll spend a while with you. And if I want to come back to New York now and then, I'll go to a hotel. It is settled. I think the change will benefit me."

"Auntie, you make me very happy. I could ask no more," said Carley.

SWIFTLY as endless tasks could make them, the days passed. But those on the train dragged interminably.

Carley sent her aunt through to the Cañon while she stopped off at Flagstaff to store innumerable trunks and bags. The first news she heard of Glenn and the Hutters was that they had gone to the Tonto Basin to buy hogs and would be absent at least a month. This gave birth to a new plan in Carley's mind. She would doubly surprise Glenn. Wherefore she took counsel and engaged a force of men to work on the Deep Lake property, making the improvements she desired and hauling lumber, cement, bricks, machinery, supplies—all the necessities for building construction. Also she instructed the workmen to throw up an improvised tent house in which she could live while the work was being done, and engaged a reliable Mexican and wife for servants. When she left for the Cañon she was happier than ever before in her life.

It was near the coming of sunset when Carley first looked down into the Grand Cañon. She had forgotten Glenn's tribute to this place. In her rapturous excitement of preparation and travel the Cañon had been merely a name. But now she saw it, and she was stunned.

What a stupendous chasm, gorgeous in sunset color on the heights, purpling into mystic shadows in the depths! There was a wonderful brightness on all the millions of red and yellow and gray surfaces still exposed to the sun. Carley did not feel a thrill because feeling seemed to be inhibited. She looked and looked, yet was reluctant to keep on looking. She possessed no image in mind with which to compare this grand and mystic spectacle. A transformation of color and shade appeared to be going on swiftly, as if gods were changing the scenes of a titanic stage. As she gazed, the dark-fringed line of the north rim turned to burnished gold, and she watched it with fascinated eyes. It turned rose, it lost its fire, it faded to quiet, cold gray. The sun had set.

In May, Carley returned to Flagstaff to take up with earnest inspiration the labors of home-building in a primitive land. It required two trucks to transport her baggage and purchases out to Deep Lake. The road was good for eighteen miles, until it branched off toward her land. Then it became a trail of desert rock and sand. But eventually they reached their destination, and Carley found herself and belongings deposited in the windy and sunny open.

The moment was singularly thrilling and full of transport. She was free. She had shaken the shackles. She faced lonely, wild, barren desert that must be made habitable by the genius of her direction and the labor of her hands. Always a thought of Glenn hovered tenderly, dreamily in the back of her consciousness, but she welcomed the opportunity to have a few weeks of work and activity and solitude before taking up her life with him. She wanted to adapt herself to the metamorphosis that had been wrought in her.

To her amazement and delight considerable progress had been made with her plans.

(Continued on Page 169)

Smith's NECK BANDS

EACH SMITH'S Neck Band is "hand-turned" and "double-stitched." They are absolutely correct—shrinkage fully allowed—buttonholes properly placed. Every SMITH'S Neck Band is made of soft, smooth material for easy sewing and stitched in center for extra stiffness and as a guide in sewing. To insure perfect fitting, insert upon SMITH'S and see that SMITH'S is stamped on the Band before sewing. Available at your dealers in three qualities of Cambric at 15, 18 and 20c; also Fongee at 25c and Pure Linen at 25c. Send us 10c for book "How I Make My Husband's Shirts," (fully illustrated with charts and diagrams) or for 25c we will send you the book and a SMITH'S Neck Band (25c quality.) Mention our Catalogue B. Smith Co., Inc. 125 West 17th Street, New York.

GET THIS BOOK ON HOME SHIRT MAKING

Carter-Thorburn Collection of early vegetable seeds is the result of 130 years' selecting and testing. Earliness and quality combined. SUNRISE TOMATO—The earliest, most productive, good sized, scarlet fruit, very even, of fine quality, with solid meat and few seeds. 16 DAY RADISH—Oval, white-tipped, crimson, crisp and tender. CRIMSON BALL BEET—Very early, round, bright crimson, good size and fine flavor. SPRINGTIDE or ALL HEART CABBAGE—A dwarf variety maturing in early spring. Quality unsurpassed. PERPETUAL LETTUCE—All season head lettuce. LITTLE MARVEL TURNIP—The earliest white globe turnip, crisp, solid flesh of delicious flavor.

Try this collection at our expense. The money you send will apply on your first order. Send 25c and ask for Sunrise Collection No. 202 and we will send by return mail the 6 packets of Earliest and Best vegetable seeds, our illustrated catalog and a 25-Cent Rebate Check to apply on your first order of $1.00 or more.

Catalog Free—Our 85th annual Catalog of Carter-Thorburn Tested and Selected Seeds will be mailed free to anyone mentioning this magazine.

CARTERS TESTED SEEDS, Inc., 53 Barclay St., N.Y. City (Consolidated with J. M. Thorburn & Co.) Canadian Branch, 133 King St. E., Toronto, Ont.

CONARD BLOOM ROSES or your money back

Did you ever hear of guaranteeing so fragile a thing as the bloom of a rose? We do it. A new plant or your money back should any Conard Star Rose not bloom. Send for big free catalog. This celluloid Star tag labels your growing rose and is the sign of our guarantee—two exclusive C. & J. features.

CONARD BLOOM ROSES
Box 20
West Grove, Pa. Robt. Pyrie, Pres.
A. Winter, V. Pres. Backed by over 50 years' experience.

WAGNER FLOWERS

FREE CATALOG to Garden Lovers. Gives complete list of Wagner Roses, Hardy Flowers, Bulbs, Shrubs, Trees and Evergreens. Tells you how to make your home surroundings beautiful. Explains the mail service Landscape Department. Write today for catalog 243. Wagner Park Nurseries, Box 83, Sidney, Ohio. Nurseries • Landscape Gardeners • Florists.

VICK'S GARDEN FLORAL GUIDE for 1922

IT'S FREE A WORTH WHILE BOOK WRITE TODAY. For vegetable growers and all lovers of flowers. Lists the old stand-bys; tells of many new varieties. Valuable instructions on planting and care. Get the benefit of the experience of the oldest catalog seed house and largest growers of Asterium America. For 73 years the leading authority on vegetable, flower and farm seeds, plants, bulbs, and fruits. 12 greenhouses, 500 acres. Vick Quality Seeds Grew the Best Crops the Earth Produced. This book, the best we have issued, is absolutely free. Send for your copy today before you forget. A postcard is sufficient. JAMES VICK'S SONS, 1 Stone St. Rochester, N.Y. The Flower City.

DINGEE ROSES On Own Roots

Pot grown rose bushes, on own roots, for every one anywhere. Plant any time. Old favorites and new and rare sorts, the cream of the world's production. "Dingee Roses" known as the best for 71 years. Safe delivery guaranteed anywhere in U. S. Write for a copy of our "New Guide to Rose Culture" for 1922. It's FREE. Illustrates wonderful "Dingee Roses" in natural colors. It's more than a catalog—it's the lifetime experience of the Old and the New. A practical work on rose and flower culture for the amateur. Offers 100 varieties of roses and other plants, bulbs and seeds and tells how to grow them. Edition limited. Published 1922. 70 Greenhouses. THE DINGEE & CONARD CO., Box 284, West Grove, Pa.

Blue Lace Flower

Clusters of delicate light blue blossoms, in size and color like the Forget-me-not, borne on long slender stems. Texture resembles Queen Anne Lace. Acquisite with cut flowers.

Chinese Wool Flower, flower clusters, massive feathery balls of brilliant crimson, blooming all frost.

Aster Novelty Hybrids, will produce many new types and colors never offered.

ALSO 2 FAMOUS VEGETABLES

Matchless Lettuce, remarkable for crispness and juicy texture. Grows somewhat like Romaine.

Sweet Corn, 60-day Makegood. Earliest of all, large, sweet and tender.

All Five Packets for 25c

All tested novelties and easy to grow. Send for big colorplate catalog free. Complete stocks of seeds, bulbs, window plants, perennials, fruits, berries and special novelties. Values exceptional.

John Lewis Childs, Inc., Floral Park, N. Y.

SLATE'S SEEDS

Each grown where it attains perfection

For everything that grows there is some spot where it attains greater perfection than anywhere else. Seeds grown in these places will produce much finer vegetables and flowers, than those grown under less favorable conditions. Fifty-five years of experience have taught us which sections are ideal for the production of each kind of seed and what growers are most careful in keeping varieties pure.

Write for Slate's Guide to Gardening—a helpful Seed Catalog. If you enclose ten cents in stamps, we will send you one packet each of Slate's Matchless Tomato, Scarlet Turnip Radish, Big Boston Lettuce, Dwarf Mixed Nasturtium, Spencer Mixed Sweet Peas, and Shirley Poppy.

SLATE SEED COMPANY
Box 428, South Boston, Virginia

FREE

Send a postal today for your copy of this wonderful 176 page seed book

Complete information about all vegetable and flower seeds (many new varieties), plants, bulbs, nursery stock, tools, insecticides, etc.

MAULE'S SEEDS

Once Grown Always Grown

WM. HENRY MAULE, Inc., PHILA., PA.
2181 Arch Street

Buist's 1922 Garden Guide and Catalogue—now ready for mailing. Contains valuable information for the vegetable and flower garden.

Send for a Free Copy Today.

Buist's Record—Growing and Supplying Seeds of the Highest Grade since 1828.

If you have a garden you should have this book. It tells you what to plant and how to cultivate.

Free Flower Seeds with Orders of 50 Cents and Over

ROBERT BUIST CO., Dept. A, Philadelphia, Pa.

The Call of the Cañon

(Continued from Page 168)

Under a sheltered red cliff among the cedars had been erected the tents where she expected to live until the house was completed. These tents were large, with board floors high off the ground, and there were four of them. Carley had left the arrangements to the overseer. Her living tent had a porch under a wide canvas awning. The bed was a boxlike affair, raised off the floor two feet, and it contained a great fragrant mass of cedar boughs upon which the bed was to be made. At one end was a dresser with large mirror, and a chiffonier. There were table and lamp, a low rocking-chair, a shelf for books, a row of hooks upon which to hang things, a washstand with its necessary accessories, a little stove and a neat stack of cedar chips and sticks, Navajo rugs on the floor, and several new, galvanized iron pails full of water.

Carley heard the rustling of cedar branches over her head, and saw where they brushed against the tent roof. It seemed warm and fragrant inside, and protected from the wind, and a subdued white light filtered through the canvas. Almost she felt like reproving herself for the comfort she was to have there. For she had come West to welcome the hard knocks of primitive life.

It took less than an hour to have her trunks stored in one of the spare tents, and to unpack clothes and necessities for immediate use. Carley donned the comfortable outdoor garb she had worn at Oak Creek the year before; and it seemed to be the last thing needed to make her realize fully the glorious truth of the present.

"I'm here," she said to her pale, tired, yet happy face in the mirror. "The impossible has happened. I have accepted Glenn's life. I have answered that strange call out of the West."

She wanted to throw herself on the sunlit, woolly blankets of her bed and hug them, to think and think of the bewildering present happiness, to dream of the future, but she could not lie nor sit still, nor keep her mind from grasping at actualities and possibilities of this place, nor her hands from itching to do things.

IT DEVELOPED, presently, that she could not have idled away the time even if she had wanted to, for the Mexican woman came for her, with smiling gesticulation and jabber that manifestly meant dinner. Carley could not understand many Mexican words, and herein she saw another task. This swarthy woman and her sloe-eyed husband impressed her favorably.

Next to claim her was the overseer, Doane. He was a man approaching seventy years of age, yet bright and virile, and spry for one who had seen so many years of pioneer life.

"Miss Burch," he said, "in the early days we could run up a log cabin in a jiffy. Axes, horses, strong arms, and a few pegs—that was all we needed. But this house you've planned is different. It's good you've come to take the responsibility."

Carley had chosen the site for her home on top of the knoll where Glenn had taken her to show her the magnificent view of mountains and desert. Carley climbed it now with beating heart and mingled emotions. She had planned an L-shaped house of one story. But some of her ideas appeared to be impractical, and she was persuaded to abandon them. The framework was up and half a dozen carpenters were lustily at work.

"We'd have made better progress if this house was in an ordinary place," explained Doane. "But you see the wind blows here, so the framework had to be made as solid and strong as possible. In fact it's bolted to the sills."

Both living room and sleeping room were arranged so that the Painted Desert could be seen from one window, and on the other side the whole of the San Francisco Mountains. Both rooms were to have open fireplaces. Carley's idea was for service and durability. She considered comfort during the severe winters in that high altitude, but elegance and luxury had no more significance in her life.

Doane made his suggestions as to changes and adaptations and, receiving her approval, he went on to show her what had already been accomplished. Back on higher ground a reservoir of concrete had been constructed near an ever-flowing spring of snow water from the peaks, and from it pipes were being laid to the house. This was a matter of the greatest satisfaction to Doane, for he claimed that it would never freeze in winter, and would be cold and abundant during the hottest and driest of summers. This assurance solved the most difficult and serious problem of ranch life in the desert.

NEXT Doane led Carley down from the knoll to the wide, cedared valley adjacent to the lake. He was enthusiastic over its possibilities. Two small corrals and a large one had been erected, and the latter had a low, flat barn connected with it. Ground was already being cleared along the lake where alfalfa and hay were to be raised. Carley saw the blue and yellow smoke from burning brush, and the fragrant odor thrilled her. Mexicans were chopping the cleared cedars into firewood for winter use.

The day was spent before she realized it. The cold, clear, silent night brought back the charm of the desert. The great spire-pointed peaks lifted cold, pale-gray outlines up into the deep, star-studded sky. Carley walked a little to and fro, loath to go to her tent, although she was tired. She wanted calm. But instead of achieving calmness she grew more and more toward a strange state of exultation.

Westward, only a matter of twenty or thirty miles, lay the deep rent in the level desert, Oak Creek Cañon. If Glenn had been there this night would have been perfect, yet almost unendurable. She was again grateful for his absence. What a surprise she had in store for him! And she imagined his face in its change of expression when she met him. If only he did not learn of her presence in Arizona until she made it known in person! That she hoped for most. Chances were against it, but then her luck had changed.

She looked to the eastward, where a pale luminosity of afterglow shone in the heavens. Far distant seemed the home of her childhood, the friends she had scorned and forsaken, the city of complaining and striving millions. If only some miracle might illumine the minds of her friends, as she felt

(Continued on Page 170)

Fresh Vegetables All Summer for $1

This is our sure-crop vegetable seed collection. A wonderful assortment of our finest strains, 25 varieties.

Imagine the joy of being able to go to your garden all summer long and pick a big market basket full of vegetables and salads for your table, with the dew still on them.

Here is the assortment of seeds we send you for $1, all GUARANTEED. Wax beans, green beans, beets, cabbage, carrots, cauliflower, celery, sweet corn, cucumbers, kohlrabi, 2 varieties lettuce, musk melon, watermelon, onions, parsnip, parsley, peas, peppers, 2 varieties of radishes, rutabagas, spinach, squash and tomatoes. All our garden seeds are tested at our great Cliffwood Farms.

Write for our big, beautiful catalog—FREE. All you have to do to get this wonderful vegetable collection is to send us a $1 bill with your request, and it will be sent to you immediately, prepaid to your address. Write at the same time for our big, beautiful catalog. It is FREE.

John A. Salzer Seed Co., Dept. 13, La Crosse, Wis. Established 1898

$OW $ALZER'S $EEDS

SEEDS

Fresh, Reliable, Pure
Guaranteed to Please
Every Gardener and Planter should test Our Northern Grown Seeds.

SPECIAL OFFER
FOR 10c We will mail postpaid our FAMOUS COLLECTION

1 pkg. 40 Day Tomato	20c
1 pkg. Princess Radish	10c
1 pkg. Self-Drawing Celery	20c
1 pkg. Early Arrow-head Cabbage	15c
1 pkg. Fullerton Market Lettuce	20c
Also 13 Varieties Choice Flower Seeds	25c
Total	$1.00

Write today! Send 10 cents to help pay postage and packing and receive the above "Famous Collection" and our New Instructive Garden Guide.

Great Northern Seed Co.
218 Rose St. Rockford, Illinois

SEEDS Grown by a Woman

Everybody is delighted with my New Early June Asters. Largest, earliest and best. Continuous bloomers.

For 10c I will send 5 liberal packages, white, pink, lavender, crimson and purple. No better seeds grown.

Guaranteed to Please
Order today, send 10c to help pay postage and packing and receive the 5 new varieties of asters and my bargain Seed Book.

Charlotte M. Haines
Dept. 13, Rockford, Illinois

Vaughan's 1922 Gardening Illustrated.

A SEED catalogue unlike any you ever saw. A magazine of home gardening information as well as a complete list with pictures, prices and descriptions of everything a home gardener needs.

WRITE DAISY AMERICAN LEAGION OFFICIAL FLOWER

56 Colored Plates
THE most complete collection of correct illustrations of annual flowers in true colors ever published in a seed catalogue.

Articles by Experts
INSPIRATIONAL and instructive articles by national authorities on "An Hour a Day Vegetable Garden," "Growing Perennial Flowers from Seed," "Color Schemes with Annual Flowers," "A Garden of Iris," with many planting plans.

Plant a Memorial Bed

EVERY home will want a bed of annual White Daisies, just adopted as the American Legion Official Flower, or of Flanders Field Poppy from our specially imported seed. Fill out the coupon and send 10 cents for a packet of daisy or poppy seed and VAUGHAN'S 1922 GARDENING ILLUSTRATED, or write for the catalogue alone. Mailed FREE.

VAUGHAN'S SEED STORE
8 W. Randolph St., Chicago 41 Barclay St., New York

Send to nearest address and cross out seed you do not want.

Enclosed is 10c for which send me a large packet of (1) Annual White Daisy or (2) Flanders Field Poppy Seed and FREE VAUGHAN'S GARDENING ILLUSTRATED.

Name _____

Address _____

Burpee's Seeds

The Leading American Seed Catalog

Burpee's Annual is a handsome book of 180 pages with more than a hundred of the finest vegetables and flowers illustrated in the colors of nature. It is a complete guide to the vegetable and flower garden.

Burpee's Annual is used as a reference book by thousands of gardeners. And even children enjoy reading the Annual because it is so interesting and easy to understand.

Burpee's Annual tells the plain truth about the Best Seeds That Grow. If you are interested in gardening or farming Burpee's Annual will be mailed to you free. Write for your copy of Burpee's Annual today. A post card will do.

W. Atlee Burpee Co.

Seed Growers Philadelphia

Strawberries 50 early, 50 midseason and 50 late Strawberry plants, delicious varieties, all for $2. Black, Red or Purple Raspberry plants 25 for $1. postage prepaid. Berry circular free. A. B. Kaskamer, Macedon, N. Y.

TREES & PLANTS THAT GROW

CATALOG FREE

Great Bargains, Standard Varieties, Best Quality, Low Prices. Satisfaction or money refunded. 60 years in business proof of our responsibility. Write for catalog now.

PETER BOHLENDER & SONS

Spring Hill Nurseries
Tippencanoe City (Miami County), Ohio

ROSES of NEW CASTLE
Is the title of a beautiful book on the culture of roses and other plants; gives expert experience of a lifetime. It's free. Exquisitely illustrated in natural colors; offers and tells how to grow these famous plants. Write for copy today.
HELLER BROS. CO., Box 253, New Castle, Ind.

Trees-Plants-Seeds

Everything for the fruit grower, farmer or suburban home. Highest grade stock, low, direct-from-grower prices. Our free catalog is a mine of planting information. Address
WOODLAWN NURSERIES
880 Garrison Avenue
Rochester, N. Y.
Exclusive sale of the Dr. Worcester Peach

SAVE MONEY
Buy direct from grower—with 50 years' reputation—400-acre Nursery and strongest guarantee back of every sale, and where your dollar brings real 100 cents value.

Beautiful Catalog FREE
Shows fruits, flowers, evergreens, all varieties in natural colors. Also planting plans. Free to all.

Prices Smashed on Evergreens, Fruit Trees, Shrubs, Etc.

Now is the time to plant Evergreens, windbreaks. Prices down to bedrock and quality considered, lowest in 15 years. Windbreak, shelter and protection. Add $1000 or more value to farm. A few more city lots increase their value.

100 Strawberry Plants For $1
20 Red or Black Raspberries, $1.
10 Concord Grape Vines, $1.
12 Blackberries, $1.
20 Gladioli Bulbs, assorted, $1.
25 Asparagus, $1.
Many other Dollar bargains. Also 12 Apple Trees, 4 & 5 ft., popular varieties, $1.95. Earl Farns Nursery Co., 613 Bridge St., Hampton, Iowa

How Does Your Garden Grow?

Highly colored foliage; vigorous plants; brilliant bloom in abundance; prolific yields—that's how gardens grow that are planted with S. & H. seeds, trees and nursery stock.

Send—TONIGHT—for our interesting, well-illustrated catalog.

The STORRS & HARRISON CO.

Nurserymen and Seedmen

Box 133, Painesville, Ohio

Kunderd's Wonderful New Ruffled Gladioli

Send for fine catalog of 56 pages showing 19 varieties in colors. Best cultural information is given, including directions for growing show flowers. No other Gladioli equal these; you can't afford to be without them in your garden next summer. Send today for the catalog—free.

A. E. Kunderd

The Originator of The Ruffled Gladiolus

Box 8, Goshen, Ind., U.S.A.

SEEDS

Reliable and Full of Life
SPECIAL OFFER

Made to build New Business. A trial will make you our permanent customer.

PRIZE COLLECTION Radish, 17 varieties, worth 15c; Lettuce, 12 kinds, worth 15c; Tomatoes, 11 the best, worth 20c; Turnip, 7 splendid, worth 10c; Onions, 8 best varieties, worth 15c; 10 Spring Flowering Bulbs, worth 25c. 65 varieties in all, worth $1.00.

GUARANTEED TO PLEASE

Write today; mention this publication

SEND 10 CENTS

to cover postage and packing and receive this valuable collection of seeds postpaid, together with my big instructive, beautiful Seed and Plant Book; tells all about Buckbee's "Full of Life" Seeds, Plants, etc.

H. W. BUCKBEE

Rockford Seed Farms
Farm 20, Rockford, Ill.

The Call of the Cañon

(Continued from Page 169)

that hers was to be illumined here in the solitude. But she well realized that not all problems could be solved by a call out of the West. Any open and lonely land that might have saved Glenn Kilbourne would have sufficed for her. It was the spirit of the thing and not the letter. It was work of any kind and not only that of ranch life. Not only the raising of hogs!

Carley directed stumbling steps toward the light of her tent. Her eyes had not been used to such black shadow along the ground. She had, too, squeamish feminine fears of hydrophobia skunks, and nameless animals or reptiles that were imagined denizens of the darkness. She gained her tent and entered. The Mexican Gino, as he called himself, had lighted her lamp and fire. Carley was chilled through, and the tent felt unbelievably warm and cozy. She fastened the screen door, laced the flaps across it, except at the top, and then gave herself up to the lulling and comforting heat.

There were plans to perfect, innumerable things to remember, a car and accessories, horses, saddles, outfits to buy. Carley knew she should sit down at her table to write and figure, but she could not do it then.

FOR a long time she sat over the little stove, toasting her knees and hands, adding some chips now and then to the red coals. And her mind seemed a kaleidoscope of changing visions, thoughts, feelings. At last she undressed and blew out the lamp and went to bed.

Days passed. Carley worked mornings with her hands and her brains. During the afternoons she rode and walked and climbed with a double object in view, to work herself into fit physical condition again, and to explore every nook and corner of her six hundred and forty acres.

Then what she had expected and deliberately induced by her efforts quickly came to pass. Just as the year before she had suffered excruciating pain from aches and bruises and saddle blisters and walking blisters and a very rending of her bones, so now she felt victim to them again. In sunshine and rain she faced the desert. Sunburn and sting of sleet were the same to her. And that abomination, the hateful, blinding sand storm, did not daunt her. But the weary hours of abnegation to this physical torture at least held one recompense as compared with her experience of last year, and it was that there was no one interested to watch for her weaknesses and failures and blunders. She could fight it out alone.

Three weeks of this self-imposed strenuous training wore by before Carley was free enough from weariness and pain to experience other sensations. Her general health, evidently, had not been so good as the first time she came to Arizona. She caught cold and suffered other ills attendant upon an abrupt change of climate and condition. But doggedly she kept at her task. She rode when she should have been in bed; she walked when she could have ridden; she climbed when she might have kept to level ground.

And finally, by degrees so gradual as not to be noticed except in the sum of them, she began to mend.

MEANWHILE the construction of her house went on with uninterrupted rapidity. When the low, slanting, wide-eaved roof was completed Carley lost further concern about rain storms. Let them come. When the plumbing was all in, and Carley saw verification of Doane's assurance that there would be ample and continual supply of water, she lost her last concern as to the practicability of the work. That, and the earning of her endurance, seemed to bring closer a wonderful reward, still nameless and spiritual, that had been unattainable, but now breathed to her on the fragrant desert wind and in the brooding silence.

The time came when each afternoon's ride or climb called to Carley with increasing strange delight.

June! The rich, thick, amber light, like a transparent reflection from some intense, golden medium, seemed to float in the warm air. The sky became an azure blue. In the still noontides, when the bees hummed drowsily and the flies buzzed, vast, creamy-white, columnar clouds rolled up from the horizon like colossal ships with bulging sails. And summer, with its rush of growing things, was at hand.

CARLEY rode afar, seeking in strange places the secret that eluded her. Only a few days now until she would ride down to Oak Creek Cañon! There was a low, sweet, singing melody of wind in the cedars. The earth became too beautiful in her magnified sight. She yearned for a cavern in which to hide from the boundless open. A great truth was dawning upon her—that the sacrifice of what she had held as necessary to the enjoyment of life, that the strain of conflict, the labor of hands, the forcing of weary body, the enduring of pain, the contact with the earth had served somehow to rejuvenate her blood, quicken her pulse, intensify her sensorial faculties, thrill her very soul, lead her into the realm of enchantment.

One afternoon when Carley got back to Deep Lake a familiar, lounging figure crossed her sight. It approached to where she had dismounted. Charley, the sheep-herder of Oak Creek!

"Howdy," he drawled with his queer smile. "So it was you-all who had this Deep Lake section?"

"Yes. And how are you, Charley?" she replied.

"Me? Aw, I'm tip-top. I'm shore glad you got this ranch. Reckon I'll hit you for a job."

"I'd give it to you. But aren't you working for the Hutters?"

"Nope. Not any more. Me an' Stanton had a row with them."

How droll and dry he was! His lean, olive-brown face, with its guileless clear eyes, and his lanky figure in blue jeans, so vividly recalled Oak Creek to Carley. "Nope, we shore ain't workin' for 'em any more."

"Oh, I'm sorry," returned she haltingly, somehow checked in her warm rush of thought. "Stanton? Did he quit too?"

"Yep. He sure did."

"What was the trouble?"

"Reckon because Flo made up to Kilbourne," replied Charley with a grin.

"Ah! I—I see," murmured Carley. A blankness seemed to wave over her. It extended to the air without, to the obliteration of the golden sunset. It passed. What should she ask? Which of a thousand sudden, flashing queries? "Are—are the Hutters back?"

"SURE. Been back several days. I reckon Doane told you. Mebbe he didn't know, though. For nobody's been to town."

"How is—how are they all?" faltered Carley. There was a strange wall here between her thought and her utterance.

"Everybody satisfied, I reckon," replied Charley.

"Flo—how is she?" burst out Carley.

"Aw, Flo's loony over her husband," drawled Charley, his clear eyes on Carley.

"Husband!" she gasped.

"Sure. Flo's gone an' went an' done what I swore on."

"Who?" whispered Carley, and the query was a terrible blade piercing her heart.

"Now who'd you reckon on?" asked Charley with his slow grin.

Carley's lips were mute.

"Wal, it was your old beau that you wouldn't have," returned Charley, as he

(Continued on Page 172)

WEST HAIR NET

Beach & Motor Brand
Hand Made Twice Sterilized
All Shades

Cap or Fringe 15c EACH Gray and White Double Price

- for Every Wear - Everywhere -

THE WEST BEACH AND MOTOR HAIR NET is as fine as a fairy web yet so strong that it adapts itself to Every Wear—Everywhere. Thirty-inch strands of hair instead of the usual 18-inch are used in all West Nets and the West process renders them not only invisible but exceptionally strong. Another advantage of the West Net is its shape—each Cap Net is fashioned to give the room needed and yet fit snugly around the edge of the hair. There is a net for every shade of hair, including gray and white.

The West Net is the choice of the elect and universally preferred for dress as well as for business and professional wear.

Ask for, insist on and be sure you get the West Beach and Motor Hair Net

WEST ELECTRIC HAIR CURLER CO., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Canadian Distributors: H. B. Holloway & Co.,
Toronto, Canada

WEST HAIR CURLERS

are unsurpassed in producing any wavy effect desired. Simply dampen the hair slightly and wind loosely around the curler.

This simple little curler cannot catch, cut or injure the hair.

Guaranteed
a Lifetime

Card of 2, 10c
Card of 5, 25c

WEST ELECTRIC
Hair Curlers

SOFTX The Shampoo Exquisite

Softex preserves the natural oils and will make your hair look thicker, softer and lovelier. An absolutely safe shampoo. With or Without Henna.

One Size Only

10c package

WEST
Softex

Note: If your dealer can not supply you, write to us, enclosing purchase price and dealer's name and address, and we will supply you direct.

"Onyx" Hosiery

"Pointex"

REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

Luxurious in texture and distinctive in design, "Onyx Pointex" is naturally the Hosiery of Fashion.

EMERY & BEERS COMPANY INC. WHOLESALE DISTRIBUTORS NEW YORK

The Strenuous Test

Style 660

We picture:

STYLE 660 MIDDY—Of standard jean; turned up effect; all white or with navy and cadet collar and cuffs. Sizes 6 to 22 years.

STYLE 662 SUIT—Middy of unbleached twill; turned up effect; cadet Palmer Linen collar and cuffs. Regulation trimmings. Skirt of Palmer Linen. Suit sizes 6 to 14 years. Middy sizes 6 to 22.

STYLE 293 DRESS—Made of York Galatea. Colors brown, pink and green. Black contrasting regulation trimmings. Sizes 6 to 14 years.

IT'S not how a middy behaves in the store window, but how it stands the strain of strenuous, girlish activity that counts.

Goody Middies outlast the growth of youth. They are designed to give full play to active bodies, and reinforced at strategic points to assure extra endurance.

If your dealer cannot supply you, write for Goody Style Book and give his name.

SAMUEL GOODMAN
Paca & Lombard Streets
Baltimore, Md.

The Call of the Cañon

(Continued from Page 170)

gathered up his long frame, evidently to leave. "Kilbourne. He an' Flo came back from the Tonto all hitched up."

XII

VAGUE sense of movement, of darkness, and of cold attended Carley's consciousness for what seemed endless time.

A fall over rocks and a severe thrust from a sharp branch brought her an acute appreciation of her position, if not of her mental state. Night had fallen. The stars were out. She had stumbled over a low ledge. Evidently she had wandered around, dazedly and aimlessly until brought to her senses by pain. But for a gleam of camp fires through the cedars she would have been lost. It did not matter. She was lost anyway. What was it that had happened?

Charley, the sheep-herder! Then the thunderbolt of his words burst upon her, and she collapsed on the cold stones. She lay quivering from head to toe. She dug her fingers into the moss and lichen.

"Oh, God, to think—after all—it happened!" she moaned.

There had been a rending within her breast, as of physical violence, from which she now suffered anguish. There were a thousand stinging nerves. There was a mortal sickness of horror, of insupportable, heartbreaking loss. She could not endure it. She could not live under it. She lay there until shock gave place to energy. Then she rose to rush into the darkest shadows of the cedars, to grope here and there, hanging her head, wringing her hands, beating her breast.

"It can't be true," she cried. "Not after my struggle, my victory—not now!"

But there had been no victory. And now it was too late. She was betrayed, ruined, lost. That wonderful love had wrought transformation in her, and now havoc. Once she fell against the branches of a thick cedar. The fragrance which had been sweet was now bitter. Life that had been bliss was now hateful. She could not keep still for a single moment.

BLACK night, cedars, brush, rocks, washes seemed not to obstruct her. In a frenzy she rushed on, tearing her dress, her hands, her hair. Violence of some kind was imperative. All at once a pale, gleaming, open space, shimmering under the stars, lay before her. It was water. Deep Lake! And instantly a hideous, terrible longing to destroy herself obsessed her. She had no fear. She could have welcomed the cold, slimy depths that meant oblivion.

But could they really bring oblivion? A year ago she would have believed so, and would no longer have endured this agony. But she had changed. A cursed strength had come to her, and it was this strength that now augmented her torture. She flung wide her arms to the pitiless white stars and looked up at them.

"My hope, my faith, my love have failed me," she whispered. "They have been a lie. I went through torment for them. And now I've nothing to live for. Oh, let me end it all!"

If she prayed to the stars for mercy, it was denied her. Passionlessly they blazed on, true to their task. But she could not kill herself. In that hour death would have been the only relief and peace left to her. Stricken by the cruelty of her fate she fell back against the stones and gave up to grief. Nothing was left but fierce pain. The youth and vitality and intensity of her then locked arms with anguish and torment and a cheated, unsatisfied love. Strength of mind and body involuntarily resisted the ravages of this catastrophe. Will power seemed nothing, but the flesh of her, that medium of exquisite sensation, so full of life, so prone to joy, refused to surrender. The part of her that felt fought terribly for its heritage.

All night long Carley lay there. The crescent moon went down, the stars grew dimmer, the coyotes ceased to wail, the wind died away, the lapping of the waves along the lake shore wore to a gentle splash, the whispering of the insects stopped as the cold of dawn approached. The darkest hour fell, hour of silence, solitude and melancholy, when the desert lay tranced, cold, waiting, mournful without light of moon or stars or sun.

IN THE gray dawn Carley dragged her bruised and aching body back to her tent, and fastening the door she threw off wet clothes and boots and fell upon her bed. The slumber of exhaustion came to her.

When she awoke the tent was light, and the moving shadows of cedar boughs on the white canvas told that the sun was straight above. Carley ached as never before. A deep pang seemed invested in every bone. Her heart felt swollen out of proportion to its space in her breast. Her breathing came slowly, and it hurt. Her blood was sluggish. Suddenly she shut her eyes. She loathed the light of day. What was it that had happened?

Then the brutal truth flashed over her again, in aspect new, with all the old bitterness. For an instant she experienced a suffocating sensation, as if the canvas had sagged under the burden of heavy air and was crushing her breast and heart. Then wave after wave of emotion swept over her. The storm winds of grief and passion were loosed again. And she writhed in her misery.

Someone knocked on her door. The Mexican woman called anxiously. Carley awakened to the fact that she was not alone on the physical earth, even if her soul seemed stricken to eternal loneliness. Even in the desert there was a world to consider. Vanity that had bled to death, pride that had been crushed availed her not here. But something else came to her support. The lesson of the West had been to endure, not to shrink, to face an issue, not to hide. Carley got up, bathed, dressed, brushed and arranged her disheveled hair. The face she saw in the mirror excited her amaze and pity. Then she went out in answer to the call for dinner. But she could not eat. The ordinary functions of life appeared to be deadened.

THE day was Sunday and the workmen were absent. Carley had the place to herself. How the half-completed house mocked her! She could not bear to look at it. What use could she make of it now? Flo Hutter had become the working comrade of Glenn Kilbourne, the mistress of his cabin. She was his wife, and she would be the mother of his children.

That thought gave birth to the darkest hour of Carley Burch's life. She became merely a female of the species robbed of her mate. Reason was not in her, nor charity, nor justice. All that was abnormal in human nature seemed coalesced in her, dominant, passionate, savage, terrible. She hated with an incredible and insane ferocity. In the seclusion of her tent, crouched on her bed, silent, locked, motionless, she yet was the embodiment of all terrible strife and storm in Nature. Her heart was a maelstrom and would have whirled and sucked down to torment all the beings that were men. Her soul was a bottomless gulf, filled with

(Continued on Page 175)

Full flavor means real economy

HAVE you ever figured out what the vanilla you use actually costs? It will prove to you, again, the old rule that the best is the cheapest.

The only way to know the real cost of any flavoring is to consider how much is needed to flavor a dessert and how much the bottle holds. Some vanillas are so weak that you have to use a great deal before you can taste the flavor. Then some come in bottles that appear to be as large as a two ounce size, but actually hold only an ounce or less.

The seemingly low price at which these vanillas and substitutes are sold per bottle may have led you to think them cheap. If you compare them, though, with Burnett's Vanilla, you will quickly find that Burnett's is more economical.

Burnett's Vanilla has such a rich, mellow flavor that you need use only a small quantity for each dessert. This is because it is made of Vanilla beans from Mazatlán, Mexico, the most highly cultivated and carefully cured Vanilla beans in the world. Is it any wonder that extracts made from common varieties or broken, defective beans are bitter, or flat and flavorless by comparison?

When you consider that Burnett's Vanilla is the standard of quality and that it is really no more expensive than poorer grades, and substitutes, it's worth while to insist on it from your grocer.

OVER A HUNDRED RECIPES and practical suggestions are contained in the new edition of the cook book "DAINTY AND ARTISTIC DESSERTS." If you will send us your name and address with 15c in stamps to defray packing and postage, a copy will be mailed you, immediately.

JOSEPH BURNETT COMPANY, BOSTON, MASS.

Burnett's Vanilla

Burnett's Spices are superior in strength and flavor, because they are packed fresh, in sifter cans, and wrapped air-tight.

Since 1847 Burnett's extracts have meant full flavor

In the Aunt Jemima Test Kitchen where pancakes are made every 5 minutes

*—just to make sure that you will have perfect success every time you use ready-mixed
Aunt Jemima Pancake Flour*

Wonderful machines in the Aunt Jemima Mills mix with the choicest of cereals, finely ground, the powdered milk and other ingredients of Aunt Jemima Pancake Flour.

But the chutes that carry the flour from them do not go "bee line" to the packaging room; they lead through a corner of the Test Kitchen.

Here, every five minutes, a little of the flour is taken out and women whisk up fresh batter for the final griddle test. Aunt Jemima Pancake Flour must meet this final test of uniformity and quality—

—so that when you buy it in the famous red packages you are sure to have perfect pancakes every time.

You can't make a mistake, for all you have to do is mix in water, or sweet milk if you prefer, and pop your batter onto the griddle.

Simply this—for pancakes wonderfully light and tender, and surpassingly rich with the real old-time Southern flavor.

To save time and labor and money always get Aunt Jemima Pancake Flour. Your grocer has it or can easily get it for you. Also Aunt Jemima Buckwheat Flour (in the yellow package) which makes delicious buckwheat cakes every time.

Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

"I see in town, Honey!"

Aunt Jemima Rag Dolls

With any package of Aunt Jemima Pancake or Aunt Jemima Buckwheat Flour, you will receive instructions (printed on the top or on slip enclosed) telling just how to get the jolly Aunt Jemima Rag Dolls.

Copyright, 1921, Aunt Jemima Mills Company, St. Joseph, Mo.

AUNT JEMIMA PANCAKE FLOUR

The Call of the Cañon

(Continued from Page 172)

the gales and the fires of jealousy, superhuman to destroy.

That fury consumed all her remaining strength, and from the relapse she sank to sleep.

Morning brought the inevitable reaction. However long her other struggles, this monumental and final one would be brief. She realized that, yet could not understand how it could be possible, unless shock or death or mental aberration ended the fight. An eternity of emotion lay between this awakening of intelligence and the hour of her fall into the clutches of primitive passion.

That morning she faced the sad and tragic image of herself in the mirror and asked: "Now, what do I owe you?"

It was not her voice that answered. It was beyond her. But it said: "Go on! You are cut adrift. You are alone. You owe none but yourself. Go on! Not backward, nor to the depths, but up—upward."

SHE shuddered at such altruistic and martyred decree of spirit. How impossible for her! All animal, all woman, all emotion, how could she live on the cold, pale, pure heights? But yet she owed something intangible and inscrutable to herself. Was it the thing that woman lacked physically, yet contained hidden in her soul? An element of eternal spirit to rise! Because of heartbreak and ruin and irreparable loss must she fail? Was loss of love and husband and children only a test? The present hour would be swallowed in the sum of life's trials. She could not go back. She would not go down. There was wrenched from her tried and sore heart an unalterable and unquenchable decision, to make her own soul prove the evolution of woman. Vessel of blood and flesh she might be, doomed by Nature to the reproduction of her kind, but she had in her the supreme spirit and power to carry on the progress of the ages, the climb of woman out of the darkness.

Carley went out to mingle among the workmen. The house should be completed, and she would live in it. Always there was the illimitable desert to look at, and the grand heave upward of the mountains. Doane was full of zest for the practical details of the building. He saw nothing of the havoc wrought in her. Nor did the other workmen glance more than casually at her. In this Carley lost something of a shirking fear that her loss and grief were patent to all eyes.

THAT afternoon she mounted the most spirited of the mustangs she had purchased from the Indians. To govern him and stay in the saddle required all her energy. But she rode him hard and far, out across the desert, across mile after mile of cedar forest, clear to the foothills.

She rested there, absorbed in gazing desertward, and upon turning back again she ran him over the level stretches. Wind and branch threshed her seemingly to ribbons. Violence seemed good for her. A fall had no fear for her now.

She reached camp at dusk, wringing wet, hot as fire, breathless and strengthless. But she had earned something. Such action required constant use of muscle and mind. If need be she could drive both to the limit.

She could ride and ride—until the future, like the immensity of the desert there, might swallow her.

She changed her clothes and rested a while. The call to supper found her hungry. In this fact she discovered mockery of her grief.

Love was not the food of life. Exhausted Nature's need for rest and sleep was no respecter of a woman's emotion.

NEXT day Carley rode northward, wildly and fearlessly, as if this conscious activity was the initiative of an endless number of rides that were to save her. As before the foothills called her, and she went on until she came to a very high one.

Carley dismounted from her panting horse, answering the familiar impulse to climb high by her own efforts.

"Am I only a weakling," she soliloquized, "only a creature mined by the fever of the soul? Thrown from one emotion to another? Never the same? Yearning, suffering, sacrificing, hoping and changing—forever the same? What is it that drives me? A great city with all its attractions has failed to help me realize my life. So have friends failed. So has the world. What can solitude and grandeur do? All this obsession of mine, all this strange feeling for simple, elemental, earthly things likewise will fail me. Yet I am driven. They would call me a mad woman."

It took Carley a full hour of slow, body-bending labor to climb to the summit of that hill. High, steep and rugged, it resisted ascension. But at last she surmounted it and sat alone on the heights, with naked eyes and an unconscious prayer on her lips.

What was it that had happened? Could there be here a different answer from that which always mocked her?

She had been a girl, not accountable for loss of mother, for choice of home and education. She had belonged to a class. She had grown to womanhood in it. She had loved, and in loving had escaped the evil of her day if not its taint.

CONSCIENCE had awakened, but alas, too late! She had overthrown the sordid, self-seeking habit of life; she had awakened to real womanhood; she had fought the insidious spell of modernism, and she had defeated it; she had learned the thrill of taking root in new soil, the pain and joy of labor, the bliss of solitude, the meaning of home and love and motherhood. But she had gathered all these marvelous things to her soul too late for happiness.

"Now it is answered," she declared aloud. "That is what has happened. And all that is past. Is there anything left? If so, what?"

She flung her query out to the winds of the desert. But the desert seemed too gray, too vast, too remote, too aloof, too measureless. It was not concerned with her little life. Then she turned to the mountain kingdom.

It seemed overpoweringly near at hand. It loomed above her to pierce the fleecy clouds. It was only a stupendous upheaval of earth crust, grown over at the base by

(Continued on Page 176)

The second season for your favorite hat

A becoming straw hat is a treasure to be saved. If it has faded, Colorite Hat Finish will make it look like new. Or it can be changed to almost any color you wish, for Colorite is made in sixteen colors.

So look over your straws of other seasons, and let Colorite renew their youth. It is easy to apply, waterproof and durable.

Colorite is for sale at all drug stores, also in department and dry goods stores, for 25 cents (in Canada 30 cents). Rather than accept a substitute, send us the price for the shade you want.

You can also get Colorite Fabric Dyes (in convenient tablets) for the easy dyeing or tinting of cotton, wool, silk and mixed goods. One dye does all.

16 COLORS

Jet Black (Gloss)
Dull Black
Cardinal Red
Yellow
Navy Blue
Cadet Blue
Victory Blue
Sage Green
Lavender
Old Rose
Cerulean
Burnt Straw
Brown
Violet
Gray
Natural

CARPENTER-MORTON COMPANY
Dept. 22 77 Sudbury Street, Boston

Colorite HAT FINISH

STEERO BOUILLON CUBES

Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.

Patented Oct. 21, 1911

To tempt an indifferent appetite

Serve a rich, savory beverage to start the meal. Try hot Steero bouillon and see how its delightful flavor makes one want a man-sized meal. It makes the whole meal taste better.

Hot Steero bouillon is easy to make. Put a Steero cube into a cup and simply add boiling water. Steero bouillon cubes will add zest and flavor to your other soups, gravies, or scalloped dishes.

Put Steero bouillon cubes on your order list today—and insist that you get STEERO. The trade-mark STEERO is on the wrapper of every cube.

Send for Free Samples

Let us send you free samples of STEERO bouillon cubes so that you may learn how good hot STEERO bouillon tastes. Write today. If you enclose ten cents we will also send you the 64-page STEERO Cook Book, full of practical and delicious recipes—helpful to every housewife.

Schiffelin & Co.
260 William St., New York
Distributors for American Kitchen Products Co.
New York

"A Cube Makes a Cup"
"Simply Add Boiling Water"

STEERO BOUILLON CUBES—the trade-mark STEERO is on every wrapper—are sold in boxes of 12, 50, and 100. If not readily obtainable at your dealer's we will mail direct upon receipt of 35 cents a box of 12. Ask for STEERO bouillon cubes.

If YOU want to earn extra money in your spare time, mail this coupon TODAY

The Curtis Publishing Company

430 Independence Square, Philadelphia, Penna.

Gentlemen: Please explain to me how your subscription representatives earn up to $25.00 a week extra in spare time. I assume no obligation in making this inquiry.

Name _____

Street _____

Town _____ State _____

Goo! Goo!

—is all I can say but it means I'm happy, healthy and comfy."

"My mother certainly knows how to treat a baby. She pins my clothes with Stewart's Duplex Safety Pins. They can't open and prick me or tear my dresses. And they never rust."

Stewart's Duplex Safety Pins are made of strong, durable brass wire. Bevelled point passes easily through thickest fabrics. Tongue in head and guarded coil spring prevent tearing of delicate material.

Cost A Little More Than Ordinary Safety Pins—But Worth It

Ask Your Dealer For Stewart's Duplex Safety Pins. If He Cannot Supply You Send 2c For Sample Card.

CONSOLIDATED SAFETY PIN CO.
Bloomfield, New Jersey

STEWART'S DUPLIX SAFETY PINS
"The World's Safest Safety Pins"

The Call of the Cañon

(Continued from Page 175)

leagues and leagues of pine forest, belted along the middle by vast, slanting, zigzag slopes of aspen, rent and riven toward the heights into cañon and gorge, bared above to cliffs and corners of craggy rock, whitened at the sky-piercing peaks by snow. Its beauty and sublimity were lost upon Carley now; she was concerned with its travail, its age, its endurance, its strength. And she studied it with magnified sight.

What incomprehensible subterranean force had swelled those immense slopes and lifted the huge bulk aloft to the clouds? Cataclysm of Nature, the expanding or shrinking of the earth, vast volcanic action under the surface! Whatever it had been, it had left its expression of the travail of the universe. This mountain mass had been hot gas when flung from the parent sun, and now it was solid granite. What had it endured in the making? What indeed had been its dimensions before the millions of years of its struggle? Eruption, earthquake, avalanche, the attrition of glacier, the erosion of water, the cracking of frost, the weathering of rain and wind and snow—these it had eternally fought and resisted in vain, yet still it stood magnificent, frowning, battle-scarred and undefeated. Its sky-piercing peaks were as cries for mercy to the Infinite.

THIS old mountain realized its doom. It had to go, perhaps to make room for a newer and better kingdom. But it endured because of the spirit of Nature. The great, notched, circular line of rock below and between the peaks, in the body of the mountains, showed where in ages past the heart of living granite had blown out, to let loose on all the near surrounding desert the streams of black lava and the hills of black cinders. Despite its fringe of green, it was hoary with age. Every looming, gray-faced wall, massive and sublime, seemed a monument of its mastery over time. Every deep-cut cañon, showing the skeleton ribs, the caverns and caves, its avalanche-carved slides, its long fan-shaped spreading tali, carried conviction to the spectator that it was but a frail bit of rock, that its life was little and brief, that upon it had been laid the merciless curse of Nature.

Change! Change must unknit the very knots of the center of the earth. So its strength lay in the sublimity of its defiance. It meant to endure to the last rolling grain of sand. It was a dead mountain of rock, without spirit, yet it taught a grand lesson to the seeing eye.

Life was only a part, perhaps an infinitely small part of Nature's plan. Death and decay were just as important to her inscrutable design. The universe had not been created for life, ease, pleasure and happiness of a man creature developed from lower organisms. If Nature's secret was the developing of a spirit through all time, Carley divined that she had it within her. So the present meant little.

"I HAVE no right to be unhappy," she concluded. "I had no right to Glenn Kilbourne. I failed him. In that I failed myself. Neither life nor Nature failed me, nor love. It is no longer a mystery. Unhappiness is only a change. Happiness itself is only a change. So what does it matter? The great thing is to see life, to understand, to feel, to work, to fight, to endure."

"It is not my fault I am here. But it is my fault if I leave this strange old earth the poorer for my failure. I will no longer be little. I will find strength. I will endure. I still have eyes, ears, taste. I can feel the sun, the wind, the nip of frost. Must I sink like a craven because I've lost the love of one man? Must I hate Flo Hutter because she will make Glenn happy? Never! All of this seems better so, because through it I am changed. I might have lived on, a selfish clod."

Carley turned from the mountain kingdom and faced her future with the profound, sad, farseeing look that had come with her lesson. She knew what to give. Sometime and somewhere there would be recompense. She would hide her wound in the faith that time would heal it. And the ordeal she set herself, to prove her sincerity and strength, was to ride down to Oak Creek Cañon.

Carley did not wait many days. Strange how the old vanity held her back until something of the havoc in her face should be gone.

ONE morning she set out early riding her best horse, and she took a sheep trail across country. The distance by road was much farther. The June morning was cool, sparkling, fragrant. Mocking birds sang from the topmost twig of cedars; doves cooed in the pines; sparrow hawks sailed low over the open, grassy patches. Desert primroses showed their rounded pink clusters in sunny places, and here and there burned the carmine of Indian paintbrush. Jack rabbits and cottontails bounded and scampered away through the sage. The desert had life and color and movement this June day. And as always there was the dry fragrance on the air.

Her mustang had been inured to long and consistent travel over the desert. Her weight was nothing to him, and he kept to a swinging lope for miles. As she approached Oak Creek Cañon, however, she drew him to a trot and then a walk. The sight of the deep, red-walled and green-floored cañon was a shock to her.

The trail came out on the road that led to Ryan's sheep camp, at a point several miles west of the cabin where Carley had encountered Haze Ruff. She remembered the curves and stretches, and especially the steep jump-off where the road led down off the rim into the cañon. Here she dismounted and walked. From the foot of this descent she knew every rod of the way would be familiar to her, and womanlike she wanted to turn away and fly. But she kept on and mounted again at level ground.

THE murmur of the creek suddenly assailed her ears, sweet, sad, memorable, strangely powerful to hurt. Yet the sound seemed of long ago. Down here summer had advanced. Rich, thick foliage overspread the winding road of sand. Then out of the shade she passed into the sunnier regions of isolated pines. Along here she had raced Calico with Glenn's bay; and here she had caught him, and there was the place she had fallen. She halted a moment under the pine tree where Glenn had held her in his arms. Tears dimmed her eyes. If only she had known then the truth, the reality!

By and by a craggy red wall loomed above the trees, and its pipe-organ conformation was familiar to Carley. She left the road and turned to go down to the creek. Sycamores and maples and great boulders, and mossy ledges overhanging the water, and a huge pine marked the spot where she and Glenn had eaten their lunch that last day. Her horse halted to drink. Beyond, through the trees, Carley saw the sunny, red-earthed clearing that was Glenn's farm. She looked and fought herself and bit her quivering lip. Then she rode out into the open.

The whole west side of the cañon had been cleared and cultivated and plowed. But she gazed no farther. She did not want to see the spot where she had given Glenn back his ring and had parted from him.

She rode on. If she could pass West Fork she believed her courage would rise to the completion of this ordeal. Places were what she feared, places that she had loved while blindly believing she hated.

(Continued on Page 178)

5 days from New York debut to Chicago dance floor!

Act 1. WEDNESDAY, October 19th

Scene: The exclusive Club de Vingt (Hotel Vanderbilt), New York. "April Showers" is introduced to New York's smartest dancing set. The fox-trot sensation of the season.

Act 2. One Day Later, THURSDAY, October 20th

Scene: Edison Recording Studio, New York. The famous Club de Vingt Orchestra records "April Showers."

Act 3. Four Days Later, at Sunrise, MONDAY, October 24th

Scene: Hazelhurst Field, Long Island. Representatives of the Edison Laboratories catch the U. S. airplane mail for Chicago with Edison RE-CREATIONS of "April Showers."

Act 4. Fourteen Hours Later, MONDAY, October 24th

Scene: Black Cat Ball-Room, Edgewater Beach Hotel, Chicago. Chicago's smart set dances to the New Edison's RE-CREATION of "April Showers."

EDISON is FIRST with Broadway Hits

SAVE 1/2 ON RUGS

Let Us Show you how to beautify your home with soft, luxurious rugs in the fashionable one and two toned, fancy or Oriental patterns at only one-half the cost of new store rugs.

Send Us Your Old Carpets
Rugs and Clothing

We reclaim the wool in your old material by our special process of cleaning and respinning, and then dye this wool and reweave bright, new—

Olson Velvety Rugs

—seamless, high grade, finely woven rugs, any color, any size—rugs that rival the high priced Wiltons and Axminsters and are guaranteed to wear for many years. Will lend charm to the finest homes. Read what others say. Over one million satisfied OLSON customers.

5 DAYS' FREE TRIAL

Give your new rugs the test of use—use them 5 days on your floors, then if not completely satisfied, return them—and we will pay you liberally for your material.

Every Order Completed in One Week

FREE BEAUTIFUL RUG BOOK Write at once for catalog of 31 beautiful new patterns in actual colors. See our new low prices. We allow express or freight charges from all states.

OLSON RUG CO.
Dept. B-16 36 Laflin St.
Chicago, Ill.

MAIL THIS NOW
Please send Free Rug Book, postpaid, to: 36 Laflin St., Chicago, Ill.

Name _____
Address _____
City _____
State _____

What 400,000 Women Are Reading

Coming every week from the Nation's Capital to the homes in every state, county, town and locality in the Union, The Pathfinder is an eagerly awaited visitor. The Pathfinder is a cheerful, illustrated weekly—an independent home paper that tells the story of the world's news in an interesting and understandable way. Now in its 29th year. This splendid National Journal supplies a long-felt need. If you want a paper in your home which is reliable and wholesome; if you would appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, strongly, briefly, entertainingly—here it is. Bright serial and short stories; unusual miscellany, humor, etc.,—diverting and instructive matter for the youngsters. The Question Box answers YOUR questions and is a mine of information. Send 15 cents (introductory price) to show that you might like such a paper, and we will send the Pathfinder three. If you do not regret it, but would like to have it in new friends, try it today, 15 weeks for 15 cents. Address: The Pathfinder, 566 Langdon St., Washington, D. C.

New Money-Making Plan

Do you want $2 an hour or more for your spare time—$15 to $60 a week for entire time? Our new sales system is making big money for men and women as factory agents in selling

Malloch-Knit Hose
Guaranteed for 6 months and quality underwear—direct from mills to wearer. Let us start you in a business of your own with our Free Sample Outfit and new plans. We pay all express. Become our District Manager—appoint sub-agent and we pay you a commission on the goods they sell—WRITE TODAY.

Malloch Knitting Mills
622 Grant St. Grand Rapids, Mich.

LLOYD PRODUCTS

Lloyd

Baby Carriages and Furniture

The Lloyd Manufacturing Co., Dept. M-6
Hewlett-Walshfield Co.
Menominee, Mich.

GORHAM

SILVER POLISH

WILL CLEAN SILVER, IVORY AND CELLULOID

SELLING AGENTS: HAROLD F. RITCHIE & COMPANY, INC.
171 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK; ALSO OF LONDON, ENGLAND; - TORONTO, CANADA; - SYDNEY, AUSTRALIA

Maternity

MATERNITY apparel with no maternity look. Pictured in a 16-page Style Book of latest fashions in Dresses, Coats, Skirts, Waists, Corsets and Underwear. Patented features provide ample expansion. Clever designing conceals condition. This Style Book sent you absolutely FREE. Write today.

Write: Lane Bryant, 38 St. at Fifth
Dept. 51, New York

STYLE BOOK FREE

The Call of the Cañon

(Continued from Page 176)

There the wonderful narrow gap of green and blue split the looming red wall. She was looking into West Fork. Up there stood the cabin. How fierce a pang rent her breast! She faltered at the crossing of the branch stream and almost surrendered. The water murmured, the leaves rustled, the bees hummed, the birds sang—all with some sad sweetness that seemed of the past.

Then the trail leading up West Fork was like a barrier. She saw horse tracks in it. Next she descried boot tracks, the shape of which was so well remembered that it shook her heart. They were fresh tracks in the sand, pointing in the direction of the Lodge. Ah! That was where Glenn lived now. Carley strained at her will to keep it fighting her memory. The glory and the dream were gone!

A touch of spur urged her mustang into a gallop. The splashing ford of the creek, the still eddying pool beyond, the green orchards, the white lacy waterfall—and Lolomi Lodge!

Nothing had changed. But Carley seemed returning after many years. Slowly she dismounted; slowly she climbed the porch steps. Was there no one at home? Yet the vacant, eyelike doorway, the silence, something attested to the knowledge of Carley's presence.

THEN suddenly Mrs. Hutter fluttered out, with Flo behind her. "You dear girl, I'm so glad!" cried Mrs. Hutter, her voice trembling.

"I'm glad to see you too," said Carley, bending to receive Mrs. Hutter's embrace. Carley saw dim eyes, the stress of agitation, but no surprise.

"Oh, Carley!" burst out the Western girl, with voice rich and full, yet tremulous.

"Flo, I've come to wish you happiness," replied Carley very low.

Was it the same Flo? This seemed more of a woman, strange now, white and strained, beautiful, eager, questioning. A cry of gladness burst from her. Carley felt herself enveloped in a strong, close clasp, and then a warm, quick kiss of joy. It shocked her, yet somehow thrilled. Sure was the welcome here.

Sure was the strained situation also; but the voices rang too glad a note for Carley. It touched her deeply, yet she could not understand. She had not measured the depth of Western friendship.

"Have you seen Glenn?" queried Flo breathlessly.

"Oh, no; indeed not," replied Carley, slowly gaining composure. The nervous agitation of these women had stilled her own. "I just rode up the trail. Where is he?"

"He was here a moment ago," panted Flo. "Oh, Carley, we sure are locoed. Why, we only heard an hour ago that you were at Deep Lake. Charley rode in. He told us. I thought my heart would break. Poor Glenn, when he heard it! But never mind me. Jump your horse and run to West Fork."

The spirit of her was like the strength of her arms as she hurried Carley across the porch and shoved her down the steps.

"CLIMB on and run, Carley," cried Flo. "If you only knew how glad he'll be that you came!"

Carley leaped into the saddle and wheeled the horse. But she had no answer for the girl's singular, almost wild exultance. Then like a shot her spirited mount was off down the lane. Carley wondered with swelling heart. Was her coming such a wondrous surprise, so unexpected and big in generosity, something that would make Kilbourne as glad as it had seemed to make Flo? Carley thrilled to this assurance.

Down the lane she flew. The red walls blurred, and the sweet wind whipped her face. At the trail she swerved the horse, but did not check his gait. Under the great pines he sped and round the bulging wall. At the rocky incline leading to the creek she pulled him to a trot. How low and clear the water! As Carley forded it, fresh, cool drops splashed into her face.

Again she spurred her mount and again trees and walls rushed by. Up and down the yellow bits of trail, on over the brown mats of pine needles, until there in the sunlight shone the little, gray log cabin with a tall form standing in the door.

One instant the cañon tilted on end for Carley, and she was riding into the blue sky. Then some magic of soul sustained her, so that she saw clearly. Reaching the cabin she reined in her horse.

"Hello, Glenn, look who's here," she cried, not wholly failing of gaiety. Indeed, a splendid gladness pervaded her.

He threw up his sombrero. "Whoopie!" he yelled in a stentorian voice that rolled across the cañon and bellowed in hollow echo and then clapped from wall to wall.

THE unexpected Western yell, so strange from Glenn, disconcerted Carley. Had he only answered her spirit of greeting? Had hers rung false? But he was coming to her. She had seen the bronze of his face turn to white. How gaunt and worn he was! Older he appeared, with deeper lines.

His jaw quivered. "Carley Burch, so it was you?" he queried hoarsely.

"Glenn, I reckon it was," she replied. "I bought your Deep Lake ranch site. I came back, alas, too late! But it is never too late for some things. I've come to wish you and Flo all the happiness in the world, and to say we must be friends."

The way he looked at her made her tremble. He strode up beside the horse, and he was so tall that his shoulder came abreast of her. He placed a big, warm hand on hers, as it rested, ungloved, on the pommel of the saddle. "Have you seen Flo?" he asked.

"I just left her. It was funny, the way she rushed me off after you. As if there weren't two—"

Was it Glenn's eyes or the movement of his hand that checked her utterance? His gaze pierced her soul. His hand slid along her arm—to her waist—around it. Her heart seemed to burst.

"Kick your feet out of the stirrups," he ordered.

Instinctively she obeyed. Then with a strong pull he hauled her half out of the saddle, pell-mell into his arms. Carley had no resistance. She sank limp in an agony of amaze. Was this a dream? Swift and hard his lips met hers—and again—and again.

"Oh, Glenn, are you—mad?" she whispered, almost swooning.

"Sure; I reckon I am," he replied huskily, and pulled her all the way out of the saddle.

CARLEY would have fallen but for his support. Blind, sweet tumult! She could not think. She was all instinct. Only the amazement, the sudden horror drifted, faded as before the fires of her heart.

"Kiss me!" he commanded.

She would have kissed him if death were the penalty. How his face blurred in her dimmed sight! Was that a strange smile? Had she, too, lost her senses? Then he held her back from him, swaying into the hollow of his arm.

"Carley, you came to wish Flo and me happiness?" he asked.

"Oh, yes, yes. Pity me, Glenn; let me go. I meant well. I should never have come."

"Do you love me?" he went on with passionate, shaking clasp.

"Heaven help me, I do—I do! Too late! Too late! And now it will kill me."

"What did that fool Charley tell you?"

The strange content of his query, the trenchant force of it brought her upright, transfixed and thrilling, with sight suddenly cleared. Was this giant the tragic Glenn who had strode to her from the cabin door?

"Charley told me—you and Flo—were married," she whispered.

"You didn't believe him!" returned Glenn.

She could no longer speak. She could only see her lover, as if transfigured, limned dark against the looming red wall.

"That was one of Charley's queer jokes. I told you to beware of him. Flo is married, yes, and very happy. I'm unutterably happy too, but I'm not married. Lee Stanton was the lucky bridegroom. Carley, the moment I saw you I knew you had come back to me."

THE END

"In just ten minutes I earned a dollar"

MISS HERA PIERCE of Arkansas is just a beginner—yet she has already earned liberal profit for the few spare hours that she spends in easy, pleasant work as a subscription representative of The Ladies' Home Journal, The Saturday Evening Post and The Country Gentleman. And she has laid the foundations of an interesting, permanent business that some day may pay her $75.00 or $80.00 a week—just as it now does Mrs. Nellie McCall of Minnesota.

Why Not You Too?

In Curtis work women in all parts of the United States find easy, liberal profit for their spare hours alone or generous, adequate return for all their time. No experience is required to be successful from the start.

The coupon below will bring all details about this unusually attractive opportunity, without placing you under any sort of obligation.

-----Send This Coupon Today-----

The Curtis Publishing Company
429 Independence Square, Philadelphia, Penna.

Gentlemen: I'd like to know more about that position described in the February Journal. Please understand that I assume no obligation in making this inquiry.

Name _____
Street or R. F. D. _____
Town _____
State _____

Bea Nurse

Learn in spare time at home
Earn $30-$35 a week

Every woman should learn. I train Beginners, Practical Nurses, Mothers and Religious Workers. Our Fascinating Home-study Method. Leading Chicago System. Endorsed by physicians. Established 17 years.

Earn while learning

If you are over 18 and under 35 years, write for Illustrated Catalog and Sample Lesson Pages with FREE set of Money-Back Guarantee and 75 NURSE'S EQUIPMENT.

Become Independent
Chicago School of Nursing, Dept. 32, 421 Ashland Blvd., Chicago

"Mizpah" Baby Nipple

Do not collapse—Prevent much colic
Free to Mothers and Doctors

Valve (A) prevents vacuum. Inside ribs prevent collapsing when child bites nipple. Rim is made so nipple cannot be pulled out. Guard your baby's health. Send money! We send you a sample nipple postpaid on request. Write now to

THE WALTER F. WARE CO., Dept. Philadelphia, Pa.

A BOOK

Every Home Owner
Should Have

Whether you expect to build a new home, or plan remodeling the old one, you will find our "Home Suggestion" Book serviceable.

It contains many helpful ideas along both practical and decorative lines, with particular reference to the use of

TILES

This is the indispensable material for cleanliness and beauty in the bath room, kitchen and laundry, and for desirable color and texture treatments in other parts of the house.

Free on request.

The Associated Tile Manufacturers
1282 Seventh Ave.
Beaver Falls
Pa.

Cut Me Out

and mail me, with your name and address, to The Curtis Publishing Company, 369 Independence Square, Philadelphia, Pa. I will bring you full details about how you, as our subscription representative, have an opportunity to make $5 or $10 a week extra in your spare time!

Name _____
Address _____
City _____ State _____

High School Course
in 2 Years

You can complete this simplified High School Course at home inside of two years. Meets all requirements for entrance to college and the leading professions. This and thirty-six other practical courses are described in our Free Bulletin. Send for it TODAY!

AMERICAN SCHOOL

Dept. H-253 Drexel Ave. & 58th St., CHICAGO

EVERLASTING

NATURAL FLOWERS are what the name indicates. They retain their shape and colors indefinitely. We grow all varieties and mail them by prepaid parcel post to all parts of the world at the following prices: French bouquets, $1.00; Limousine bouquets, $1.00; large loose Limousine bouquets, $1.60; Wreaths, $3.00.

Hanson Everlasting Natural Flower Co.
Pacific Beach, California

Music Lessons
Complete Conservatory
Course by Mail

Wonderful home study music lessons under great American and European teachers. Endorsed by Adams. Master teachers guide and coach you. Lessons a series of simplicity and completeness. Write naming course you are interested in: Piano, Harmony, Voice, Public School Music, Violin, Cornet, Mandolin, Guitar, Bass or Reed Organ—and we will send FREE CATALOG. SEND for it NOW!

University Extension Conservatory, 505 Segal-Wyler Bldg., Chicago

AGENTS! A SALE IN EVERY HOME

Take orders for our beautiful Dress Goods, Silks, Wash Fabrics and General Yard Goods. Our agents get big business. Large book of over 1000 handsome fabric samples. Write today!

National Importing & Mfg. Co., Dept. 29X
573 Broadway, N. Y.

Hotels Need Trained Women

Nation-wide demand for trained women; all departments, hotels, clubs, apartment houses; uncrowded field; fine living, quick advancement. Our methods endorsed by leading hotels everywhere. Write for FREE BOOK "Your Big Opportunity." LEWIS HOTEL TRAINING SCHOOL, Room 513, Washington, D. C.

COIFFURES OF HAIR

FOR YOUTHFUL LOOKS
GUARANTEED Transformations, Switches, Curls, Wigs, Pompadours, etc. Catalog Free.
Frances Roberts Co.
14 Fifth Ave., Dept. O, New York

Poultry Book Latest and best yet: 144 pages, 213 beautiful pictures, hatching, rearing, feeding and disease information. Describes busy Poultry Farm handling 50 pure-bred varieties and BAY CHICKS. Tells how to choose tools, eggs, incubators, sprouters. Mailed for 10 cents.
Berry's Poultry Farm, Box 53, Clarinda, Iowa

"I Hear America Singing"

By EDNA RANDOLPH WORRELL

IT IS the evening of Monday, February Twentieth. Behind the curtain there is a flutter of excitement. To a murmur of voices, girls needlessly arrange ribbon or sash, while men give final touches to their white ties. There is a hush as the curtain ascends, and then, at a signal from the conductor, a vocal burst, and the National Week of Song has begun.

Not on one but on many stages this little drama is enacted, with replicas on the platforms of schools the country over. Choirs, operatic societies, community clubs and other musical organizations may well take the week in which Washington's Birthday falls for the most delightful of entertainments, the song festival.

Programs may be patriotic or as varied as the character of the societies that give them. Cantatas and operas, classic or popular programs, songs of the olden time may all be performed with the one purpose of adding to the musical life of the community. Whatever the program may be, there is one feature, however, which should be stressed as a patriotic duty, that of rendering compositions exclusively in English and in the best possible diction. The lessons learned in Better Speech Week of last November should not be lost by default, but be brought into practical application when the spoken word is set to music. The garbling of words by singers in order to produce "tone" is so usual as to pass without comment.

"Hallelujah! Hallelujah!"

Sang the choir above her head.

"Hardly knew you! Hardly knew you!"

Were the words she thought they said.

A not infrequent opera goer sat through a performance of "Rigoletto" without being aware, until she caught a familiar word in the last act, that the performance was in English and not in Italian. Even when the text of a cantata or song cycle is printed on the program it is sometimes impossible to follow the words as sung. This is especially noticeable in ensemble performances.

The Need of Better English

A NUMBER of clubs have been started throughout the country to encourage the use of better English and to correct the slipshod habits of speech now so prevalent. The movement has the endorsement and assistance of such organizations as The National Council of Teachers of English, the Academy of Arts and Literature, The Chicago Women's Club and the General Federation of Women's Clubs. The New York City Board of Public Education deemed the subject of so much importance that it created the office of Director of Speech Improvement, and the "National Round Table for Speech Improvement" holds monthly conferences to advance the work. At one of its recent meetings the speaker of the evening was Henry W. Geiger, who for the last eight years has taught singing to children whose ages range from three to thirteen. His discussion rested on the conclusion that the best training of the vocal mechanism for both speech and song came, not through exercises on vowels alone, but through the development of the consonant.

A deeper analysis discloses the significant fact that man alone is master of the consonant, which at once places his vocal achievements above those of the brute. The mew of a cat, the bark of a dog, the neigh of a horse, the lowing of cattle, the hoot of an owl, the cooing of doves can all be translated into vowels. It is man alone who, placing the consonants before and after these primitive sounds, magically turns them into words. The glaring lack of enunciation in song led

Mr. Geiger to a careful study of the possibilities of consonants. He found that but four could be vocalized—that is, sung to a sustained tone—and these proved to be the primitive and universal sound of m, n, l and ng.

A little personal experimentation will soon prove this to be the case by attempting to sing the letters b, d, t, s and other consonants. As these are made by lips and teeth only, and not by the vocal cords, no tone results.

In order to produce tone and at the same time train the lips and tongue the four available consonant sounds were used as a basis for the method. By combining each of these sounds with the vowel formations of oo, ah and ee, the student has twelve syllables with which to produce resonant tones in the vocal cavities. The exercises thus resulting are designated as Syllabic Vocal Mechanics. The syllables selected for practice are supposed to give resonance to the voice through the resistance of the air chambers. "These exercises have now been used intensively," to quote from the monthly bulletin of the National Round Table for Speech Improvement, "for the past six months by students of from three to fifty years of age, from five to ninety minutes daily, with invariably good results." The exercises are intended to augment, not to replace, the usual and exclusive vowel practice.

Programs of Familiar Songs

THE possibilities, the inspiration of the National Week of Song are endless. All the masterpieces can be sung in our mother tongue, or entire programs of American composers alone may be given. The following may be used as a guide which follows a chronological sequence, opened with "America" by performers and audience:

INDIAN GROUP

Omaha Indian Corn Song Government Records
The Blue Juniata Mrs. Sullivan
The Land of the Sky-Blue Water Cadman
Indian Cradle Song Woodman

COLONIAL GROUP

Long, Long Ago Old Song Collection
The Minuet Mozart

OLD HOME GROUP

Home, Sweet Home Bishop
Grandfather's Clock H. C. Work
The Old Oaken Bucket Woodworth
Ben Bolt Nelson Kneass
The Quilting Party John Fletcher

PLANTATION GROUP

Old Folks at Home Stephen C. Foster
Old Black Joe Dan Emmett
Dixie Dan Emmett

MODERN

The Rosary Naxos
It Isn't Raining Rain to Me Harding
There's a Long, Long Trail Elliott
Smilin' Through Penn

PATRIOTIC GROUP

Yankee Doodle—1776 Unknown
The Girl I Left Behind Me—1861 Old Air
The Americans Come—1918 Fay Foster
The Star-Spangled Banner

The audience should be invited to join in the chorus of familiar songs, that all may have a part in a truly American celebration.

Songs which children love and which have been proved in the schoolroom as especially adapted to their performance are:

How Do You Like to Go Up in a Swing Eleanor Smith
The Fairy Pipers C. Herbert Brewer
I Know a Bank Henry Parker
The Cuckoo Clock G. A. Grant-Schaefer
The Shalimar Boat Jessie G. Gaynor
The Trout Franz Schubert
There Stands a Little Man—
From Hansel and Gretel Humperdinck
The House With the Raisin Roof Lydia Coe
Mammy's Song Harriet Ware
The Prayer Perfect Ervine J. Stenon

New Shoes
Old Shoes
Tight Shoes
all feel the same
if you shake into them some

ALLEN'S
FOOT-EASEThe Antiseptic, Healing
Powder for the feet

Takes the friction from the shoe, freshens the feet and gives new vigor. At night when your feet are tired, sore and swollen from walking or dancing, Sprinkle ALLEN'S FOOT-EASE in the foot-bath and enjoy the bliss of feet without an ache.

Over 1,500,000 pounds of Powder for the Feet were used by our Army and Navy during the war.

Rests the Feet

In a Pinch, use ALLEN'S FOOT-EASE.

A Delightful Birthday Gift

Distinctive—Unique—Pleasing

AN IDEAL PRESENT FOR SCHOOL CHILDREN

THREE PENCILS—60 cents in beautiful embossed genuine leather case with your name engraved in 18 karat Gold on pencils and case.
Stamps accepted.

THE IMPRINT PENCIL COMPANY
530 Broadway, New York, N. Y.

Women! Corset Comfort
Guaranteed!

This Corset Sent on Trial

Have better health—perfect corset comfort—an ideal figure without tight lacing by wearing the wonderful

M & K Uplift Corset

Is patented, scientifically constructed Uplift belt gently lifts and supports the abdomen in its natural position. Stops backaches, headaches and tired-out feeling due to sagging muscles. Reduces stout figures—supports the slender. Thousands of women would wear no other. Doctors prescribe it. Dressmakers like it. Write for Trial Offer, illustrated description and expert confidential advice. Address me personally. (16)

KATHERINE KELLOGG
M & K CORSET CO.
208 Kellogg Bldg., Jackson, Mich.

Direct from mill

Make a sweater for $2.00—New striped drop-stitch slip-on. Slip-on in block pattern with Bramley type neck. Child's dress ($1.50). Man's slip-on, V neck ($1.80)—a few examples of what you can knit at extremely low cost with Peace Dale Yarns. Directions for striped slip-on sent free. Book of 43 new designs 25c by mail.

Best yarns—great saving—Finest quality yarns at a great saving. Satisfaction guaranteed.
Free samples—Send today for 90 free yarn samples and free directions. Peace Dale Mills, Dept. 465, 25 Madison Ave., N. Y.

Peace Dale Yarns

PLAN YOUR HOME NOW

Send for Stillwell Building
Books with Economy Plans of new California Styles suitable for any climate. Famous for comfort and beauty.

"Representative Cal. Homes"
10 Houses—7 to 10 Rooms—$1.
"The New Colonials"
10 Houses—6 to 10 Rooms—$1.
"West Coast Bungalows"
10 Houses—6 & 7 Rooms—$1.
"Little Bungalows"
75 Houses—3-4-5 Rooms—$1.
SPECIAL OFFER: Send $1.50 for any three of these books and get Garage Folder FREE.
Money back if not satisfied.

E. W. STILLWELL & CO., Architects, 745 Calif. Bldg., Los Angeles

18 inches at 28c an inch—$5.04

That's what the Deltor saved on this one dress!

SHE had always cut her patterns economically, she thought, out of the material each pattern called for. And now to claim that the individual Deltor enclosed in her pattern envelope could save her money! Of course not! How could it? She was an expert! She had used patterns for years and with undoubted success!

This time she planned to make a street dress. She bought the yardage her pattern called for and started to lay out her tissues on her two and a half yards of material.

Quickly and surely she worked at first. But gradually she slackened. It just wouldn't go. Somehow or other the pattern refused to fit into her length of fabric.

Like most women who had been making their own clothes for years, she did not realize, until experience showed her, that her pattern now called for less material than it could, were it not for the Deltor, enclosed in the envelope. She did not know that the half yard which her pattern was seemingly short represented the money that the Deltor saved—$5.04 on this one dress.

Then she consulted the Deltor. There she found a series of layout charts, photographic in their exactness, each one worked out for her size and one for each width of suitable material.

With the Deltor You Use Less Material Than Ever Before

SHE followed the Deltor, shifted the pieces of tissue. In ten minutes her pattern was laid. It fitted to the inch. There was not one inch short! Then and there she learned the value of the Deltor. Then and there she learned the lesson that thousands of women who have always made their own clothes are learning—that

Each Individual

DELTOR

especially planned for the pattern it accompanies

Saves You 50c to $10 on materials

- I. enables you to buy $\frac{1}{4}$ to $1\frac{1}{2}$ yards less material because of its individual layout chart.
- II. guides you in putting your garment together so that you attain the fit, drape and finish of an expert.
- III. gives you Paris' own touch in finish—those all important things upon which the success of your gown depends.

BUTTERICK
Style Leaders of the World

no matter how skilled they are in laying out a pattern, no matter how little material they have used before, Butterick patterns, because of the Deltor, now call for less material than any other patterns can—less than even Butterick patterns could—before the Deltor.

The Deltor means money saved because you buy $\frac{1}{4}$ to $1\frac{1}{2}$ yards less material—a saving of from 50c to \$10 on every gown, suit or dress you make.

The Deltor Brings Paris' Own Charm

BESIDES showing you how to lay your pattern on $\frac{1}{4}$ to $1\frac{1}{2}$ yards less than ever before, a saving of 50c to \$10 always—the Deltor guides you to that air of Parisian smartness which has so long eluded even the most skilled needles.

Through simple picture-and-word illustrations, the Deltor shows you just how to put your own dress together. Every stitch, every step, the Parisian dress-maker would take is right before your eyes. You sew more quickly, more successfully than ever before!

And those little things upon which the fate of your gown depends—the new hem-line, sleeve or trimming—any whim which your dress embodies is explained in minute detail. Your dress—your most economical dress—is a creation of Paris!

Whichever Style You Select Becomes Simple and Economical

HUNDREDS and hundreds of this season's fashions await you at the Butterick counter. Make your selections, remembering that the Deltor simplifies the making of the most intricate garment and invariably saves you 50c to $10.

Our Jazz-Spotted Middle West

(Continued from Page 38)

account for numerous wooden structures at crossroads and in groves. He asked a companion whether these structures had something to do with a new agricultural idea.

"Yes," was the reply; "those are jazz platforms. In some places the saxophones make more noise than the threshing machines. The farmer is getting all the advantages of city life right at home."

While in Chicago I verified the dance-hall situation as outlined in a previous article of this series. Doubtless the metropolis of the Middle West has more dancing than any other city, and its dance halls are generally larger than elsewhere, one of them having a capacity of ten thousand persons. A number of these places are quite palatial and fairly deserve the title of ballroom, which the organized proprietors are trying to substitute for the older term with its unsavory connotation. A combination of enlightened selfishness on the part of owners and of public-spirited service by a few women has done much to purify the dance in Chicago. If there is something yet to be desired, the responsibility is more with the public than with the proprietors. The music has been improved by use of faster tempo, toddling and shimmying have been modified or barred, many details of conduct regulated and a closer supervision practiced.

College and high-school students in Chicago have been largely drawn into the maelstrom of the ultradance. A professional teacher of dancing told me that his classes included forty-five members of the faculty of Hyde Park High School. These faculty members are learning to dance partly for their own pleasure and also to keep tabs on student dancing.

A Chair of Applied Dancing

OFFICIALS of Northwestern University, which is coeducational and has about seven thousand students, admitted that there was a college dance problem. There are about fifty dances, as officially reported, held yearly. It is hard to insure any proper regulation; supervision is perfunctory.

Assistant Dean Terry, who heads the amusement board at Northwestern, thought it might be a good idea to have a chair of applied dancing or a dancing teacher, who would handle the whole problem, including the democratization of dancing.

The University of Michigan, at Ann Arbor, has its troubles with the jazz. The Junior Hop for 1921 was canceled because the students, preceding this event, had flagrantly broken the regulations laid down by the faculty for conduct at dances. The students were very contrite and made all kinds of promises to be good, but in view of the fact that they had broken the same promises the year before the faculty was obdurate.

Iowa State College, at Ames, which is agricultural, scientific and domestic in purpose, made such an extraordinary record of continuous stepping last year that I hesitate to quote the figures given to me. Apparently there were a dance and a half every week night of the year and several for each holiday. The college has a good set of printed regulations for dancing, including the rules of the American National Association of Dancing Masters. I saw a chastened form of the toddle at Ames. One thing, there are fewer spoiled youngsters in such an institution than in the large city and Eastern colleges. Many of the students are working their way, and the isolated environment is a favorable factor.

The University of Missouri, at Columbia, also has the advantage of isolation. Miss Eva Johnson, dean of women and a fine stalwart type of Southerner, said, "We are like a big family here and do not like to discuss in public all the details of family affairs," very smilingly and pleasantly. "Yes, we have reports on all dances, and chaperons."

Dean Johnson thought it might be well to have a teacher of dancing. She does not care for the modern dance, but tries to be tolerant and thinks the youngsters do not get the harm that seems obvious to elders.

At the University of Illinois, at Urbana, Miss Ruby E. C. Mason, dean of women, said that she recognized the difficulty of to-day's problem with youth. She had earlier tried out the mandatory method and failed. Her effort now was to build up character by personal contact. She thought her institution was favored by environment, more supervision and contact being possible than in urban centers. Deans of women in Eastern colleges, though deploring the modern dance, have fairly been forced to surrender to it; the universal fashion has been too much for them. At Urbana this situation has not arrived. There are here no printed rules to regulate dances, but students are told what conduct is objectionable and violators are disciplined. There is a system of permits, reports and chaperonage.

Youth Needs a Perfect Model

DEAN Mason attends the larger dances and acts as hostess, all couples being introduced to her. This has a psychological effect, for each student feels that he or she is ever under the eye of authority and must keep up company manners. It is also useful to work through the principle of group honor and pride. All girls are encouraged to join sororities, since it is easier to exercise control over groups than over individuals. Recently a new girl in a college boarding house was reported to be smoking cigarettes, and all the other girls in the house threatened to leave unless she was put out. This was cited to show the attitude of University of Illinois girls on cigarettes, which are said to be officially permitted in some Eastern women's colleges.

One educator observed that a poor example to youth was set by many faculty members who smoke, drink and dance just like men of the world. One must sympathize with the need of youth to have perfect models and also with the teachers who want to act like regular human beings.

Kansas City does not have so much dancing in proportion to its size as some other cities. It makes up in intensity for what it lacks in quantity. A municipal regulation to modify the jazz was promulgated last fall and was generally ignored. A dance-hall owner excitedly informed me that it was nobody's business, not even the city authorities', how he conducted his place of amusement. He and his patrons were a law unto themselves. The last statement was obviously true; and even more so at another resort where several hundred young girls and boys shimmied and toddled in a haze of cigarette smoke.

Youth here was not beautiful. It was prematurely aged, pale, seamy of visage, crafty of eye. The place was an academy of the underworld. After seeing the hapless juveniles, it was easy to believe the statement of my expert guide, a police reporter for the Kansas City Star, that the district was tough and every other house harbored a crook.

From the dive to the genteel dance floors of Kansas City's best hotels gave a contrast. What a gulf separated the top from the bottom! There was an immense difference—physically, none at all morally.

America will perhaps heed the practical argument that her civilization, regarded only from the standpoint of material efficiency and welfare, is gravely imperiled and can no longer endure the widely prevalent conditions of rottenness. We are dancing on an inclined platform that slopes into the bottomless pit of impotent and inferior races. Let's quit! Safety first! Let us find excitement in straight and wholesome activities. Every human being can enroll in the big struggle of momentous consequence now going on—to keep from wobbling and upon an even keel the world, America, one's own neighborhood and oneself!

THE 40th LEONARD YEAR

The Climax of 40 Years of Food Refrigeration

Women are learning by happy experience that the Leonard is the ideal guardian of food; that it means safety and convenience; that it frees them from many kitchen cares; that it saves time, work and money.

Learn about the Leonard's ten walls of insulation, one-piece food chamber with triple coat of hard, white porcelain, seamless, jointless; rounded inside corners, easy to clean.

One out of every seven refrigerators sold is made by Leonard. Visit the Leonard dealer in your town. If you fail to find him, write us and we will see that you are supplied.

Send for actual sample of porcelain, catalog illustrating over 75 styles and sizes of refrigerators. Mr. Leonard's own booklet on "Selection and Care of Refrigerators" will be mailed, too.

There is a size and style of Leonard Refrigerator to suit every purse.

GRAND RAPIDS REFRIGERATOR COMPANY

22 Clyde Ave., Grand Rapids, Mich.

Be sure the refrigerator you buy is made in Grand Rapids

C. H. LEONARD

Leonard CLEANABLE Refrigerator

"Like a Clean China Dish"

Home Plan No. 708. De Luxe 6-room-and-bath bungalow. Mail's room and separate toilet. Pergola Porch. Big sunny nook. Wonderful closets. Full basement. Floored attic. Open fireplace. Built-in conveniences. Big porches. Beautiful exterior. A home to be proud of.

Distinctive Homes at Wholesale Prices!

Many customers write that our wholesale prices save them from $200 to $2,000. Buy your home at guaranteed cost—all materials complete as specified. No extras. Highest quality material only. Homes planned by best architects. Built-in convenience features. Ample closets. Scientifically planned kitchens. 200,000 delighted customers. Get new, low 1922 wholesale prices!

"Ready-Cut" Method Lowers Lumber and Labor Costs

By sawing, cutting and fitting by modern machinery, we effect big savings in material and also cut labor costs on the job. Substantial, permanent homes. Specifications conform to all city building codes.

Four Big Mills Prompt shipment from one nearest you—Davenport, Ia.; St. Louis, Mo.; Chehalis, Wash.; Hattiesburg, Miss.

Ready-Cut Garages $74 Up

Build it yourself.

Save money. Summer Cottages Ready-cut—Inexpensive. 1 to 3 rooms.

Catalog of 5,000 Building Material Bargains—Lumber, screens, paint, roofing, etc., at wholesale prices. Write!

Book of 200 Home Plans FREE!

Shows plans, photos, specifications, convenience features; 3 to 10 room homes—some as low as $709.

WRITE! or Mail
Coupon

Send me Free Books; I expect to ☐ build; ☐ repair; as follows:

Gordon-Van Tine Co.
ESTABLISHED 1888

Satisfaction Guaranteed or Money Back

135 Case Street

Davenport, Iowa

Name

Address

Out of Practice

GEORGE M. COHAN, the actor-playwright, has a friend named Brady, a press agent, who in summer precedes a circus and in winter goes ahead of an opera company. He works mostly in the West.

"Recently," said Mr. Cohan, "Brady was enabled to visit his beloved New York, the place of his birth. Shortly after his arrival I ran across him on Broadway. 'Well, old man,' I said to him, 'I suppose you're glad to be back in New York again?'"

"George," he answered earnestly, "it's like a glimpse into another world. But I've been away so long that I have to rehearse to cross Broadway."

The Dangerous Hen

THE three-year-old girl started down the street and stopped. Her mother saw her do so and noticed a dog a little way ahead. Supposing the child was afraid to pass the dog, she went to her help. But she found it was not the dog, but some chickens which were vigorously scratching beside the walk, that she hesitated to pass.

"Why, Betty," the mother cried, "are you afraid of chickens?"

"Yes," Betty candidly admitted, "they kicked at me."

Candy Fashions of Scotland

A YOUNG American tourist stepped into a shop in a Scottish town one Sunday recently to buy some candy for a Scotch lassie of his acquaintance, and as soon as the customer ahead of him had been served he asked for chocolate creams.

"I dinna sell chocolate creams on the Sabbath," the old dame behind the counter said severely.

"But," the young man protested, "you sold candy to the woman who has just gone out."

"Aye; some ecclesiastical confectionery, but nae chocolate creams," the old dame declared.

"Some what?" gasped the tourist.

"Ecclesiastical confectionery—that is, peppermint draps, pan draps and ginger lozenges," she graciously explained, and added sternly, "but nae chocolate creams."

Some Cows!

THE following advertisement appeared a while ago in a California newspaper:

FOR SALE—One large, red-and-white cow, three-eighths mule and five-eighths wildcat. She usually goes on a visit every summer but is at present attached to her home by means of a log chain. To any person wishing to buy her, I will throw in the chain and a sledge hammer. Would be delighted to sell this cow to some citizen of San Diego who thinks he can whip Mexico single-handed.

"He" and "She" Bibles

IN A RECENT lecture, Prof. William Lyon Phelps, whose series of articles, Human Nature in the Bible, is now appearing in the HOME JOURNAL, entertainingly told his audience about the "he Bible" and the "she Bible." It seems that when the first English Bible was being published, after the King James translation in 1611, a typographical error crept into a verse of the third chapter of Ruth, verse 15, so that it read, "and he went into the city." Quite a number of copies of the ponderous volume had been issued before the error was discovered and the missing s prefixed to make he into she. Comparatively few of the first-edition Bibles are now in existence, for most of them were chained in the churches and literally read to shreds. Of those that are left, the "he Bibles" are naturally in greater demand by collectors, for, as Professor Phelps characteristically pointed out, "The he Bible is more valuable, though less accurate, than the she Bible." Now Professor Phelps points out that the authorized version invariably reads "she," whereas the revised version reads "he."

The Office Dog

Scraps That He Picks Up Here,
There and Everywhere

Why He Didn't Want It

SEVEN-YEAR-OLD Willie had been bothered all day by cautions not to disturb his Aunt Louise, because she was feeling "so nervous." At dinner he appeared looking very glum, but ate heartily of everything until dessert, which happened to be jelly. He stared at the trembling portion placed before him and then pushed it away.

"Why, Willie," his mother asked, "aren't you going to eat your jelly?"

"Naw," he replied with a disgusted air; "it's too nervous."

When She Was "Bawnd"

THE young daughter of the household was celebrating her birthday anniversary when she suddenly turned to the interested old colored mammy and asked: "Hannah, when is your birthday?"

"Law, miss," Hannah replied, "I ain't got no birthday; I was bawnd in de night-time."

The First Newspaper

IT SEEMS queer to think of a time when there were no newspapers, when the news was circulated wholly by word of mouth. The first formal change in the circulation of news came with the appearance of news-letters. The earliest of these is said to have been the Acta Diurna (Daily Happenings), issued at Rome in 691 B.C.; the latest is claimed to have appeared nearly twenty-four centuries later in a land which only a little more than two centuries before had been a howling wilderness—the Boston News Letter issued by John Campbell in 1704 at Boston, Massachusetts, several numbers of which are in the collection of the Boston Historical Society. The first newspaper printed in ink from type was called the Gazette and was published at Nuremberg, Bavaria, in 1457. The first newspaper advertisement—a reward offered for two stolen horses—was printed in the London Impartial Intelligencer in March, 1648.

Too Unhealthy

THE old couple had removed from the city to a home in a New England village, and one of their first visits was to the cemetery. "We must select a burial lot," the husband had remarked. "Life is uncertain, and we had better attend to it at once."

The wife chose a site on a hill overlooking a beautiful lake.

But the husband objected. "No, Ann; it's too much of a hill to climb. Let's look down toward the lake."

These lots pleased Ann even better than those more elevated. "Here, Frederick," she said; "let's decide upon one of these."

Frederick looked at her in surprise. "Why, Ann," he replied, "I did think you had better judgment. I shouldn't think of being buried in this low, marshy place. It's the unhealthiest spot in the whole cemetery."

She Was Pleased

THE mistress of an old Southern plantation had called on a negro mammy to see the new baby. "And what have you named her, Sue?" she asked.

"Why, 'm,'" drawled the colored mother, "Ah done look thu all the almanac, an' Ah name that chile the purtiest name Ah could find—'Vertigo.' Doan' you think that's a right sweet name, 'm?'"

A Reader—in His Class

WHEN Thomas Nelson Page, the novelist, was a baby, his father called in the old family butler to see his son.

The grizzled servitor of two generations of the family gazed at the wrinkled mite and said: "Ah 'clare, Mars' John, dis de prettiest little white baby Ah ever did see."

It Surely Would Be

A MAN and a girl of eight years were traveling on an express train and he was trying to while away the tedium of the journey by asking her all kinds of funny and ridiculous questions. Finally he suggested this one: "If the clock strikes thirteen, what time is it?"

The little girl hesitated, thought a moment and then replied in an amusingly positive manner: "Time to fix the clock."

She Was Puzzled

LITTLE Jane's mother brought home a box of candy given to her by an Episcopal friend shortly before Easter, and passed around some of its contents to her children, explaining that Mrs. Cox's children had given up eating candy until after Easter, "so they cannot eat any now, as it is Lent."

Little Jane's brothers promptly ate their pieces, but she stood looking at the candy in her hand with a puzzled air.

"Why don't you eat it, Jane?" her mother asked.

"Because," she explained, "then how could I give it back if it's just lent?"

Table of Contents

	Page		Page
Editorial	26	FOR CHILDREN
FICTION		The Mexican Twins Celebrate San
Philip the Gay— Francis Noyes Hart	3	Ramon's Day— Lacy Fitch Perkins	32, 35
The Amateur Rebel— Phyllis Duganne	6	POEMS
Sumac and Goldenrod— Philip Curtiss	8	The Query— Winifred Lockhart Willis	42
The Unspeakable Gentleman (In four parts): Part I— J. P. Marquand	10	The Prayer of Busy Hands— B. Y. Williams	55
Bannertail (In four parts): Part I— Ernest Thompson Seton	13	A Belated Valentine— Carolyn Wells	134
His Gift— Fannie Kilbourne	14	ART FEATURE
The Juggernaut— Albert Payson Terhune	16	Children are an Heritage of the
Vandemark's Folly: Part VI (Conclusion)— Herbert Quick	18	Lord— W. L. Taylor	25
The Call of the Cañon: Part IV (Conclusion)— Zane Grey	22	FASHIONS
SPECIAL ARTICLES		"Many New Fabrics Look Mar-
How to Lose Fat— Royal S. Copeland, M.D.	5	celled"— Mary Brush Williams	67
How We Neglect Our Schools— Charles A. Selden	17	For Formal Daytime Wear and In-
My Years on the Stage: Part V— John Drew	21	formal Evening	70
Human Nature in the Bible— William Lyon Phelps	24	Spring Lines in Midseason Frocks
What are We Doing With Our Children— Beatrice Barnaby	27	for Matrons	74
Our Jazz-Spotted Middle West— John R. McMahon	38	In Between of Age and Season	80
Making Our Schools Safe for Our Children— S. Josephine Baker, M.D.	58	Clothes for the Very Young that
"I Hear America Singing"— Edna Randolph Worrell	179	are Easy to Make and Launder	82
HOUSEHOLD		Modish Suits for Early Spring	85
Ask These Questions in Selecting a		Coiffures for Young and Old and a
Home Site— P. S. Lovejoy	28	Dress for the Matron	89
Her Kitchen Doors— M. H. Carter	107	Many a Spring Blouse Features a
Come Into the Kitchen— Mae Savell Croy	110	Puritan Collar	92
What Science Has Done for the		NEEDLEWORK
Housewife— Mary D. Warren	113	Smart Embroideries for Spring and
French Ragouts and Stews— Marie Jacques	114	Summer	62
Dried Fruits De Luxe— Caroline B. King	116	Filet Designs that Accord With
The Complete Furnishing of the		Lingerie	64
Little House— Ethel Carpenter	161	Slipper Satin Hats for You to Make at Home	73
		Making the Popular Chemise Dress
		— Ruth Sill	77
		ENTERTAINMENT
		A Round of Parties for February—
		Claire Wallis	125
		MISCELLANEOUS
		Bumbleton Folks— Claude Callan	30
		You, Too, Can Have Money in the Bank!— Manager of The Girls' Club	95
		Helpful Ladies' Home Journal Books	158
		Motion Pictures in the Fine Arts	167
		The Office Dog	182

A Special Word to Subscribers

WHEN you receive notice that your subscription has expired renew it at once, using the blank enclosed in your final copy. Please sign your name exactly as it appears on your present address label.

A request for change of address must reach us at least 5 weeks before the date of the issue with which it is to take effect. Duplicate copies cannot be sent to replace those undelivered through failure to send this advance notice. Be sure to give your old address as well as the new one.

Should your subscription expire with this issue of the HOME JOURNAL, your renewal should be sent promptly to insure receipt of the March issue before it is "sold out." We cannot begin subscriptions with back numbers. Subscribers should always use Postal or Express money orders or bank drafts in remitting. All Rural Free Delivery carriers can supply Postal money orders.

Our Advertising Branch Offices

[For advertising business only. Subscriptions not received.]

PHILADELPHIA: Independence Square
NEW YORK: 366 Madison Avenue
BOSTON: Merchants' National Bank Building
CHICAGO: Home Insurance Building
SAN FRANCISCO: First National Bank Building

And Now in Colors

Indian Head is now made in twelve colors, as well as in white. These colors are guaranteed fast against sun and washing.

We Guarantee: If any garment made of Indian Head fails to give proper service because of the fading or running of Indian Head colors, we will make good the total cost of the garment.

The colors are:

2 Ciel	5 Linen	8 Helio	11 Cadet
3 Pink	6 Tan	9 Reseda	12 Copen
4 Pearl	7 Biscuit	10 Rose	13 Brown

36 inches wide, only 59 cents a yard.

Picture yourself in one of these dresses made in your favorite color of Indian Head

Indian Head in Colors Is New

If you do not find Indian Head in colors at the store where you shop, you are invited to avail yourself of the following offer:

For $2.95 we will send you 4 1/4 yards of Indian Head in any of the twelve colors and the pattern illustrated. This is for the dress with the new bell sleeves.

For $2.40 we will send you 3 1/4 yards of Indian Head in any of the twelve colors and the pattern illustrated. This yardage is enough for the jumper dress.

You may have as many dress lengths and patterns as you wish.

Order today. Enclose money order. State what size pattern you wish: 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44, 46, 48 and 50. Mention color: Ciel, pink, pearl, linen, tan, biscuit, helio, reseda, rose, cadet, copen, brown. This offer expires March 15.

"The Girl Who Loved Pink," with actual sample, will be mailed free upon request

Amory, Browne & Co., Department 235, Box 1206, Boston, Mass.

Nashua Blankets Parkhill Fine Gingham Lancaster Kalburnie Gingham Gilbrae Gingham

INDIAN HEAD CLOTH

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

Always on the Selvage

See inside pages 68-69

THE PRICE of the HOME JOURNAL

PUBLISHED once a month. 15 cents the copy from all newsdealers. By subscription: To the United States and Possessions, Cuba and Mexico, $1.50 the year. Remit by U. S. money order, express money order, check, or by draft payable in U. S. funds.

To Canada, by subscription, $2.00 the year. Single copies, 20 cents—Canadian or U. S. funds.

To Foreign Countries in the Postal Union, by subscription, postpaid, $3.00 the year, remittance to be by draft payable in U. S. funds.

The Ladies' HOME JOURNAL

THE FAMILY MAGAZINE OF AMERICA

Incorporating The Home Journal. Registered in the United States Patent Office and in Foreign Countries

PUBLISHED ON THE FIRST DAY OF EACH MONTH BY

THE CURTIS
PUBLISHING COMPANY

INDEPENDENCE SQUARE
PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA

CYRUS H. K. CURTIS

PRESIDENT

C. H. LUDINGTON

TREASURER

PHILIP S. COLLINS

GENERAL BUSINESS MANAGER

WALTER D. FULLER

SECRETARY

WILLIAM BOYD

ADVERTISING DIRECTOR

BARTON W. CURRIE, Editor

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LORING A. SCHULER WALTER H. DOWER

MARTHA E. DODSON

Copyright, 1922 (trade-mark registered), by The Curtis Publishing Company, in the United States and Great Britain. London Offices, 6, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W. C. All rights reserved. Entered as second-class matter May 6, 1911, at the Post Office at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, under Act of March 3, 1879. Additional entry as second-class matter at Columbus, Ohio, at Decatur, Illinois, at Chicago, Illinois, and at Indianapolis, Indiana.

Foursquare

By

GRACE S. RICHMOND

*Author of 'Red and Black,'
The Twenty-Fourth of June, Red Pepper Burns, Etc.*

Illustrations by John Alonzo Williams

that tower of strength
Which stood foursquare to all the winds that blew!
—TENNYSON.

WHEN on one blustering afternoon in late March Professor Mark Fenn came into the dingy old college bookshop which was one of his favorite haunts, he passed by the magazine stand in a hurry, though it was thick with all the newest April publications and vivid with their color. His mind was upon a certain row of bookshelves in the dimmest part of the back of the shop, where he had yesterday discovered rich treasure. Almost an hour later, when he had decided, rather against his judgment, but wholly according to his inclination, to purchase the full tale of seven books which he needed to complete a certain group in his collection of authorities in his line of teaching, he passed the magazine stand again, and this time he halted. He had caught sight of the name of "Mary Fletcher," emblazoned in large letters upon the cover of "The Centrepiece."

He put down his books and picked up the magazine, frowning a little. Why should Mary be writing for "The Centrepiece"? He ran hastily through the pages; he didn't have to go far, for the story he sought was well toward the front, as Mary Fletcher's things always were. He glanced at the opening lines; yes, there it was—the delightful, sparkling style which flashed at you from the cold print with the very first distinctive paragraph. Mark Fenn fished a quarter from his pocket, waved it at Booth, the old bookseller, just now occupied with another customer, placed it on the magazine stand, stuffed the magazine in his overcoat pocket, picked up his package of books and left the shop.

When Harriet Fenn came down the street from the high school where she held a teaching position toward the little old brown house where she and her brother lived together, she saw the light in his study window which proclaimed that he had reached home before her. At this time of year she was quite sure to see that cheerful light shining from the two lower front windows, the shades undrawn; Mark never in the world thought of shutting out the passers-by. Although Harriet's first move when she came in was to go and twitch the shabby old dark-red curtains together, jealous of intrusion, she was always glad Mark hadn't done it before her.

That welcoming light in the window made all the difference, to a weary school-teacher, the presence of whose one brother in the old house kept it home to her, as she was sure her presence did to him.

Mark didn't hear her come in; he seldom did. She liked to let herself in quietly and steal to the door of the square, low-ceiled study, its walls lined from floor to ceiling with books in all sorts of bookcases. From year to year Mark had extended his ever-growing collection, more eager as to the contents of the shelves than as to the beauty or uniformity of the shelves themselves. Yet the result was not inharmonious; somehow one forgot the motley character of the containers in wonder and pleasure at the wealth of the collection itself. The professor of psychology at Newcomb College had not thrown himself, as usual, into the dingy old study armchair; neither had he taken the spindle-backed chair which served him at his desk—it had been his father's before him. He was sitting on the edge of his desk, hat shoved back, overcoat still on, his legs braced to hold him steady, while he read with absorption from a popular magazine. Harriet's affectionate eyes studied her brother's sturdy figure for a long minute before she spoke. He was thoroughly the mature young athlete in his general aspect; his color was healthy; his lean, well-cut features were markedly interesting; discerning gray eyes looked out below straight brows, and the firm lines of a very good mouth suggested both poise and authority. He was several years older than Harriet, who had herself been teaching for some six years since she left college, though with her fair hair and girlish figure she by no means looked as far along in the twenties as the records declared her.

"It must be a pretty absorbing story, to keep you from undoing a package of new books," she observed at length.

Mark looked up, met her scrutinizing eyes with the queer one-sided smile which she knew of old to speak not entire agreement with the proposition stated and returned to his page. "Dead tired, Harry?" he inquired absent-mindedly.

"As usual. What else could I be after a week of mid-year examinations? Never mind—it's Friday night; and I've brought home oysters for supper."

"Good!" But he was still absent-minded.

SHE came close and looked over his shoulder for a minute or two. "Oh, by Mary Fletcher," she observed. "The girls were talking about it to-day."

Since it was the last page of the story, the name of the author was not in sight. Harriet had judged by internal evidence; she had caught the sparkle of original style which was always to be recognized.

Mark read the last paragraph and dropped the magazine upon his desk, where with its gay cover it lay incongruously among its austere surroundings. "Is it good?" Harriet asked, taking off her hat and running ordering fingers over the pale-colored masses of her hair.

"It's—Mary Fletcher," her brother responded; "neither more nor less. After a year of war writing from France, I thought it might be more."

"I'll read it by and by. A Mary Fletcher story on Friday night will make me forget all my troubles."

"There's no possible doubt of that," he admitted.

When Harriet Fenn had washed and put away the supper dishes and sat down at last in her brother Mark's big shabby armchair beside the low study light, she was in a mood to enjoy the relaxation which is one of the rewards of labor. At the other side of the room Mark was crowding a row of books unmercifully to make space for a thick volume from the opened package upon his desk.

Harriet glanced across at him, regarding his profile against the dark background of the books. "Mark, you look more like father every day," she observed, "and act like him. He was never happy till he'd put a new book in its place. Not that he had many, compared with you. How he would open his eyes at this room! You must have doubled—trebled the number he had."

"I'm afraid I have. Where I'm reckless in buying, he'd have denied himself. I wish he hadn't. I wish I could show him these I've brought home to-night."

Brother and sister instinctively looked up at the one picture the room contained—a dark portrait hung above the chimney piece, with rows of books pressing close on either side. The portrait looked down at the pair below with a kindly, fatherly gaze from warmly human eyes, yet with a suggestion of severity showing in the lines of the lips and the prominent chin. It was preeminently the portrait of a scholar, but the man himself had been greater than his learning.

"Do you realize," Mark continued with sudden vehemence, "that my slim salary to-day is exactly double the biggest he ever had in the very last years of his life? No wonder he couldn't buy books except by going without meat—which he did, bless him. I wouldn't take ten times their cost for that little old first collection of his in his first bookcase, that he made himself. There's the library of a scholar for you—two hundred and seventy-three books with the autograph of David Matthew Fenn in every one of them. I'd like to show that library to Mary Fletcher," he added with sudden sternness, "and tell her to study it and learn—to write!"

"TO WRITE, Mark! Why, I thought you thought —" Harriet looked distinctly puzzled. Her gaze fell to the magazine she had picked up. Her fingers turned the pages till they came to the story; "And, Behold" was its singular title. She looked up again. "It looks delightful," she temporized.

"It is delightful," Mark turned again to the portrait. "Father used to prophesy big things for her. I wonder what he'd say to her now."

"Why, Mark! Has she lost? I've heard you say her style was exquisite."

"It is. And her technique is perfect. But —" Harriet cried out sharply, interrupting him. "Why, here's a picture of Mary—did you see it?—just over the leaf. 'Mary Fletcher, since her return from war work in France.' Oh, isn't she lovely?"

Mark came across the room to look over her shoulder. "My word, she is!" he agreed.

"Lovely—and full of fire, as she always was. Just a little older, naturally." Harriet went on commenting, studying the face before her. "But one wants her to be; and she's only the more interesting."

The photograph showed a face which might well challenge attention. There was something unusual about it; the eyes were those of a poet and dreamer, yet the mouth suggested a sense of humor, and the firmly rounded chin more than declared that its owner possessed will and energy in plenty. The poise of the head with its carefully ordered wealth of dark hair, the clear-cut curve of neck and shoulder, spoke of one who held an assured position. Altogether the somewhat prolonged contemplation which both brother and sister gave this presentment of one whom they had long known, but had not of late much seen, could hardly be wondered at.

"I beg your pardon"—a pleasant, low voice spoke deprecatingly. "You didn't hear the knocker, and I ventured in. It's raining, and the wind blows right across your front porch."

Harriet sprang up, dropping the magazine. "Oh, come right in, Miss Sara. No, we didn't hear you; the wind's blowing so. Let me take your wraps."

It was the Fenns' next door neighbor, Miss Sara Graham.

She came in smiling, a slender, aristocratic little figure of a middle-aged woman, with a scarf of fine blue silk tied about her perfectly arranged gray hair, a richly fur-lined cape slipping from her shoulders. Harriet took charge of cape and scarf, while Mark pushed the old armchair nearer the smoking logs in the narrow little fireplace, and gave a bracing poke to them which resulted in a freshly springing blaze.

"I'm so very happy over some news of mine, I wanted to come over and share it with you," Miss Graham drew a letter from her little beaded hand bag. "I knew you were always interested in my niece's plans, and this one seems to me very wonderful—for me, and I hope for her."

WITH Harriet in the spindle-backed desk chair, waiting with eager curiosity, and Mark leaning an elbow on the chimney-piece shelf as he stood on the hearth rug, poker still in hand, the visitor read aloud a paragraph from the long typed letter of many sheets:

Somehow I'm bitten with the hungriest desire to get back to your blessed old home and your blessed young self. And I know of no place in the whole wide world where it now seems to me I can better pull my vagrant thoughts—and self—together, and make them do a respectable day's work. The book—the book I want to write, my first real book after all these volatile short stories and the collections of them which don't really count as books at all, you know—that's all I can think of. And now that I'm back from France, somehow I can't seem to settle down here in the little old apartment, even with my dear Alexandra Warren. Girls and men are always dropping in, and there are theaters and supper parties without end, something everlastingly doing; and it's impossible to keep out of it, even on the plea of work. Somehow it doesn't seem real life any more, though before I went across I thought it the only real life. I want to come back to that darling room you always gave me. And I want to sit on the old cross-stitch footstool with the bits of arms, almost in your big fireplace, in your adorable drawing-room with its lovely old mahogany and its portraits, and its samplers in frames, and its cabinets of East India treasures —

Miss Graham broke off, glancing down the page. "The child goes into such raptures over my plain old home," she explained. "I'll find the place where she —"

"Oh, please don't leave out the raptures," Harriet begged. "We like to hear every word Mary ever wrote, you know. She writes so differently from other people, even in her letters. Why, we were just reading her last story and talking of her. We haven't really seen anything of her since long before she went to France. It must be—why, all of four years."

MARK TURNED AGAIN TO THE PORTRAIT. "FATHER USED TO PROPHECY BIG THINGS FOR HER. I WONDER WHAT HE'D SAY TO HER NOW"

CONVERSATION AND CHOCOLATE, FIRELIGHT AND MARY FLETCHER
—THE EVENING
PASSED SWIFTLY
FOR THE GUESTS

"She says it's five. It is three since her father and mother died, and she hadn't been here for two years, at least, before that."

THERE was no change of tone in her quietly natural allusion to the greatest tragedy of her own life. Mary Fletcher's father and mother—Mrs. Fletcher was Miss Graham's sister—had been killed together in a motor accident while traveling in Italy. Doctor Fletcher had been the distinguished head master of a famous private school for boys. It was from her girlish life in this school that Mary had come to spend her summers with her aunt in the small college town near by. It had been her mother's home until her marriage, and so it was natural that Mary should look upon it with affection.

"Oh, this is what I specially wanted you to hear," Miss Graham went on, her face brightening again. She read with a smile touching her delicate lips:

It seems to me, Aunt Sara, that if I could just live a perfectly simple, rational life with you, for one whole year—can you bear it to have me that long?—go to bed at ten o'clock—I can't fancy it!—have grapefruit and coffee and 'Liza's jolly little old graham rolls in the morning, go for long tramps, and perhaps—well, have Harriet Fenn and Professor Mark in now and then in the evenings, by way of dissipation—

Harriet laughed out at this, and Mark grinned darkly in the shadow above the fire.

I could perhaps after a while give myself to serious work. I never can do it here now; that I'm sure of. I really can't describe to you how it has suddenly all palled upon me. For one whole year I don't want my flowers out of a florist's shop; I want to pick them in your garden. May I come, belovedest?

Miss Graham would have caught back that last word, which had spoken to her more vividly of her niece's longing to be with her than any other, but it was out before she knew.

Somehow, to both Harriet and Mark Fenn it brought up a vision of Mary Fletcher as not even her own work in the popular magazine had done. Mary was always daring to say what other people did not. Somehow such words didn't sound sentimental on her laughing lips, they merely made her seem the picturesquely interesting creature that she was.

"When will she come?" Harriet asked, understanding that the matter was already settled.

"SHE gives me barely time to get her room in order," Miss Graham declared happily. "And the piano must be tuned; she stipulated that. She wants to know if you've kept up your practice on the cello"—Mark shook his head regretfully—"and says she must have music, if she is to write. It all sounds as if she were precisely her old—what is the word used so much these days?—her old temperamental self."

"Don't say it!" Mark fairly interrupted, a frown of impatience crossing his brow. "Of all modern excuses for intemperance and irrelevance—and general idiocy—that's the worst. An author of her class is old enough to stop being 'temperamental' in her work—and out of it—and become rational in her work and out of it. I want to see her do it."

Miss Graham stared up at him, not quite comprehending. "Don't mind him," Harriet said quickly, as Mark picked up the magazine which contained Mary's story. "He's rather a bear to-night. The week's work has been heavy." She shook her head warningly at her brother.

But Miss Graham had recognized the magazine and was reminded of something in Mary's letter which she hadn't read to the Fenns. "Oh," she said, "Mary spoke of that. Have you read it? I haven't—yet. She calls it—I think the word was—'punk.'" She spoke the unaccustomed syllable with a wry little twist of her lips. "She said when I'd read it I should know why she needed a year with me. I'm sorry; I didn't suppose Mary would ever write anything unworthy."

"She hasn't," Harriet was quick in defense. "I haven't read it myself, yet I know it isn't unworthy. Perhaps it isn't her best, all that she's capable of—"

Miss Graham looked up with almost pleading in her blue eyes at Mark.

"IF SHE knows it's punk," he said in answer to her unspoken question, "and if she's coming off up here to get away from the temptation to keep on writing punk, there's hope for her. Get her here as soon as you can and—if you'll take my advice—don't coddle her too much. I'm not sure I should tune the piano for her."

"Why, Mark!" Harriet was smiling, yet she was a little worried, lest he hurt the gentle lady for whom they both cared so much. "I think it would do you yourself good to get out the old cello and play with her. Only yesterday you were planning to take me in town for a concert. You said you were starved to hear some good music."

"I certainly never used that word," denied her brother, evidently nettled. "Starved's not a word of mine, thank heaven! Mary uses it three times in one short story. Emotionalism, overemphasis—I've no use for 'em." He looked at Miss Graham, and his frowning brows smoothed somewhat. "I'm afraid I am a grouch to-night," he admitted. "It's really great news you bring us, neighbor, and we shall be glad to see your Mary again, be she never so scornful of our limitations."

"Scornful? I think she feels she needs limitations," said Harriet Fenn, with one of the flashes of interpretation which sometimes surprised her brother. "She's been having so much, doing so much, experiencing so much; she wants to get away where it's quiet and she can think it over. How can one wonder! With all her success—so much praise, so much vogue; and then this last year and a half abroad, writing all those wonderful articles in the midst of all the excitement and tension. No wonder she wants to collect herself. And this is just the place! I'm so glad she's coming."

"I will tell her you say so," Miss Graham laid the sheets of the letter together, the flush on her cheeks deepening as she rose to go. "She really thinks very much of you both, I know. And you will be good for her. Do you know, at the bottom of it all, I think Mary is just a little tired? She wrote so much, worked so hard, all the while she was over there, she must need a real rest. It will give me great happiness to look after her. Independent as she is, I know she misses—her father and mother."

THE little dignified speech, so like the finely bred, sweet-spirited woman who made it, brought Mark forward with a warm word of apology.

"Forgive me, so she does, Miss Sara. She shall have the best we can give her. Please tell her so from me. I suspect the matter with me is that I'm jealous of that marvelous ability of hers—and jealous for it, too—that she shall do the thing she's capable of, and that she hasn't done yet."

When Harriet had escorted her visitor to the door and returned to the snug, pleasant room, with its plain, comfortable furnishings, she regarded her brother reproachfully.

"How could you take away from her happiness by suggesting such a criticism of Mary? All writers are more or less uneven; I've heard you say so many a time yourself. You know everything she writes is delightful, and I've no doubt this last thing is. I'm going to read it and find out."

"Go to it!" Mark slid the magazine across the desk at her. "Revel in the moonlight and the mush."

"Mark! Mary never writes mush."

"She comes mighty near it this time, I think. But don't let me prejudice you."

"As if you hadn't done your best to! But I refuse to be prejudiced."

"Good old Harry—with her judicial mind."

Then Harriet turned her back upon him and began to read. She read the six pages at a rush, lingered over the illustrations, three out of the four of which represented the heroine with one or other of the five men by whom she was surrounded throughout

(Continued on Page 48)

"AND THAT'S WHY THEY WENT! ANNA, DID YOU WANT 'EM TO GO?"

The Ghost Story

A One-Act Play for Amateurs of No Great Age

By BOOTH TARKINGTON

Illustrations by Wm. Meade Prince

NOTE.—Upon the program it should be mentioned that the curtain will be lowered for a moment during the progress of the play, to denote a lapse of about half an hour.

THE rise of the curtain discloses a comfortable and pleasant living room of commonplace type. It is early evening; a clock on the mantelpiece marks the time as twenty minutes after seven; the lamps are lit. At a piano is seated a pretty girl of twenty; she plays dance music gayly for a few moments; then abruptly her theme becomes sentimental and she plays a love song, singing bits of it to herself, while her expression becomes tender and wistful.

An electric bell is heard, and upon this sound she stops singing and playing at once; her look is alert. She considers the room thoughtfully, then goes to a chair beside a little table, picks up a small leather-bound book, sits and pretends to read with dreamy absorption. Then, behind her, across the room, a door is opened, offering a glimpse of a hallway, where a nervous and earnest young gentleman of twenty-two is hastily concluding the removal of his heavy overcoat and gloves, with the connivance of a housemaid. He comes into the living room immediately. With an air of complete surprise, the girl looks up from her pretended reading.

THE GIRL: Why, George — (She rises.)
 GEORGE (as the housemaid closes the door): Anna, I came early because — ANNA (as they shake hands and sit): I'm so flattered. I didn't dream you'd do more than just call me up to say good-by.
 GEORGE: You didn't think I'd come myself?
 ANNA: Why, no. I didn't think you'd have time; you have to make good-by calls on all your aunts and married sisters and cousins, don't you? I'm really very much flattered.
 GEORGE: I came early, as soon as I could choke down dinner and run, because—well, I wanted to talk to you alone for a few minutes, for a novelty. I thought maybe just this once I could get here before the rest of 'em pile in.

ANNA: "The rest of 'em"? I don't know that any of 'em will "pile in" this evening, George.

GEORGE: No; you never do; but they pile in, just the same. That's the trouble with you, Anna; you're too popular. (She laughs protestingly. He goes on earnestly.) Oh, yes, you are. It's horrible!

ANNA: What nonsense!

GEORGE: It's the truth; it's just horrible for a girl to be like you.

ANNA: Thanks!

GEORGE (emphatically): It is. Nobody can ever get within a mile of you. And what I hate about it is that girls hang around you just as much as the rest of us do.

ANNA (demurely): You think it's queer that girls like me, George?

GEORGE: It isn't "queer," no. (Adds in a burst of confidence.) But it's been pretty painful to me, these holidays.

ANNA (staring): What are you talking about?

GEORGE: Well, that's what I came early to tell you.

ANNA: You came early to tell me what you're talking about?

GEORGE (a little confused): What I mean to say—listen; it's just this: I—I—I—

ANNA (reminding him): You began by saying it's horrible that anybody seems able to stand me.

GEORGE: It's horrible that I always have to see you in a crowd; that's what I mean. If there aren't four or five men around you, then there are four or five girls; and if there aren't just four or five girls, or four or five men, then there are four or five of both of 'em!

ANNA: But look, George. Look under the piano, and under the chairs and under —

GEORGE: What for?

ANNA: For all those people you said were always around me. It's queer, but you do seem to me to be the only one here.

GEORGE: Yes, just this minute. But you know as well as I do that pretty soon the bell will begin ringing, and they'll come pouring in. Then when they're here they stay and stay and — Why, it is horrible!

ANNA: Aren't you a funny boy?

GEORGE: I wish I could see any fun in it! (He rises and paces the floor as he talks.) Why, I believe if I'd known it was going to be like this I wouldn't have come home for the holidays. You don't know how I looked forward to coming home and—and seeing you! Why, I've hardly thought of anything else, all the fall term!

ANNA (incredulously): You don't mean you thought of it during the football season?

GEORGE: No. I mean yes. Yes, I was looking forward to it even then too. I kept thinking: "Just wait till the Christmas holidays come; then I'll get to see a whole lot of Anna. I'll get to dance with her a lot, to take her to a lot of things—maybe, even, I'll get some evenings alone with her by the fire, and we'll read some poetry or something together." That's what I thought! (He laughs bitterly.) And look what's happened! You were booked up solid for every last little thing a person could hope to take you to! I've never got nce clear around with you a single time you've danced with me—some frenzied bird always cut in—and every afternoon evening I've found you at home I've had to sit about seven—rows back and just be audience for the bickering that went on. And now it's my last evening; my train leaves at nine-fifty-one, and I won't see you again till June, after commencement; and I know I'm not going to get a chance to talk to you five minutes! Some of these birds'll be breaking in here any second. That's why it's horrible!

ANNA: But they haven't broken in yet, George.

GEORGE: Yes, but they will!

ANNA (shyly): Well, but if you—if you do like being alone with me, why don't you—well, why don't you just like it until they do come?

GEORGE: "Like it"? You don't seem to realize my train is the nine-fifty-one, and I'll have to leave here at least half an hour before then; and I'll have to say good-by to you with people around, so I can't say what I want to!

ANNA: But what is it you want to say to me—except just good-by?

GEORGE: Well, it's something I couldn't say with people around.

ANNA (nervously): But—but there aren't any people around now, George.

GEORGE (shaking his head gloomily): Oh, there would be, before I could say it! I know 'em!

ANNA (noncommittal): Well—

GEORGE (taking a chair near her suddenly): Anna, it's just this. I want you to understand the position I'm in. I want you to understand what I—what I have in mind. (Breaking off abruptly in a tone of abysmal despair.) But what's the use? Some of 'em are sure to come in. Couldn't you send word you're not at home?

ANNA: Well, you see, Lennie Cole and Tom Bannister and Mary and Grace and Fred—

GEORGE: I knew it! And you said you didn't know they'd be piling in!

ANNA: I don't—not precisely, that is. But—but, of course it's possible. And they'd certainly know it wasn't so if I sent word "not at home," and they'd feel hurt.

GEORGE (despairingly): That's it! That's my regular luck with you! Isn't there any way to get rid of 'em?

ANNA (seemingly reproachful): They are friends of mine, you know, George.

GEORGE (despondently): Pardon me.

ANNA: Very well.

GEORGE: Listen. What I was saying—

ANNA (quickly): Yes, George?

GEORGE (speaking hurriedly): I wanted to tell you, I have been looking forward to the holidays because I thought this would be the time I'd be—ah—justified, as it were, in saying something I—something I had in mind to say to you.

ANNA: Yes, George?

GEORGE: I've had it in my mind to say ever since—well, for quite a time—ever since—ever since—

ANNA: It is something about your studies, George?

GEORGE: No, it certainly isn't. It's about—well, I've wanted to say it—ah—a long time.

ANNA: How long?

GEORGE: Ever since—well, it was that day you wore a blue dress.

ANNA: What sort of a blue dress?

GEORGE: I don't know. It was—it was blue.

ANNA: With flounces? And lace on the blouse?

GEORGE: I don't know. It was just—sort of blue.

ANNA: But I haven't had a blue dress this year.

GEORGE: No. It wasn't this year.

ANNA: Why, the last time I wore a blue dress was that summer at the lake, three years ago.

GEORGE: Yes. That was when it was. You wore it the day we went canoeing for water lilies. That was the day it happened.

ANNA: The day what happened?

GEORGE: The day you wore the blue dress.

ANNA: Oh, yes.

GEORGE: Yes. It was then.

[Both of them are very serious.]

ANNA: Yes. That one was blue linen and very simple. It was another one that had flounces—with lace on the blouse.

GEORGE: Well—ever since then I've thought that some day I might feel that I was in a—well, in a position to—to justify—ah—what I'd like to say. You see, I—well, I was pretty young then; we both were, in fact.

ANNA: Yes, I suppose we were.

GEORGE: Yes. I suppose I hardly realized how young I was at the time. Funny, isn't it? I thought I was a real grown-up man of the world, and I was only nineteen! Looking back on it over these years a person sees how much he had still to learn! My goodness! When I think of all I've been through since then—

ANNA: You mean at college?

GEORGE: Yes, and here at home, too—like what I've been through these holidays, for instance.

ANNA: Have you? Why, I thought you looked so well, George.

GEORGE: I mean not getting near you. You know. What I was talking about.

ANNA: But that couldn't be very severe, George.

GEORGE: Yes, it could, because it was. Anna, my father stopped off a day to see me at college in October—

ANNA: How nice!

GEORGE: We had a pretty serious talk about my future.

ANNA: Oh, I'm sorry it was serious, George.

GEORGE: What I mean—it was business-like. About my future in business.

ANNA (somewhat vaguely): Oh, yes.

GEORGE: Next June, when I get home, he's going to take me right in with him. He thinks—well, he thinks I'll get along all right. He—he's going to give me a ten per cent interest in the business, Anna.

ANNA: How lovely!

GEORGE (swallowing): So that's—that's why I said I feel—ah—justified—in saying what I want to get a chance to—to say to you, Anna.

ANNA: Yes, George?

GEORGE: What I mean—I mean that's why I'm sure to have sufficient means to—to settle down, as it were—and so I—I thought—I—

ANNA: Yes, George?

GEORGE: You see, that day you wore the blue dress I was only nineteen and I hadn't had this talk with my father, because, in fact, I never did have this talk with him until just this October—as it were—and so—and so—

ANNA: Yes, George?

GEORGE (solemn but increasingly nervous): And so—well, the time has come—the time has come—

ANNA (glancing over her shoulder at the hall door): The time has come? Yes, George?

GEORGE: The time has come when I—when I want to ask you if—if—the time has come—it's come—it's come—

ANNA: Yes, George?

[The bell rings loudly.]

(Continued on Page 126)

"AND THEY KEPT WONDERING AND WONDERING, AND SO ONE NIGHT—ONE NIGHT WHEN EVERYBODY WAS ASLEEP AND THE WIND WAS MOANING AND THE SKY WAS COVERED WITH A THUNDER CLOUD—"

The Right Kind of Public School Teachers Needed

By CHARLES A. SELDEN

Illustration by Thomas Fogarty

IN A SCHOOLROOM in New York City the boys and girls of the history class were discussing the American Constitution. The teacher, old enough to be the mother of any of her pupils, was as young as any in the spirit and enthusiasm with which she inspired and guided them. She was beautiful, thoroughly alive to her work, a teacher because she loved to teach. There was a suggestion of motherliness in her snow-white hair.

"But, mother, Alexander Hamilton insisted on the strong central government," exclaimed a boy, too eager to wait for the teacher's formal recognition of his upraised hand. And she was such a teacher, had made the children so much her own in their school work, that the boy's unconscious use of the word "mother" caused no comment in the class. Probably no teacher ever received a finer, more spontaneous tribute than that.

The need of the United States is for seven hundred thousand teachers like that woman.

Here is another incident, the story of two high-school girls who by no stretch of the imagination could be thought of as ever having been inspired by good teaching, in school or out. They were passengers on a train going from St. Louis to Little Rock and had two seats in a sleeping-car section for the all-day ride. One was apparently a girl of about seventeen, the other a little younger. Scraps of their conversation, which could be heard all day long throughout the car, revealed the fact that they were schoolgirls.

A weary-looking middle-aged woman whose seat reservation was in the same section got aboard at St. Louis a few minutes ahead of the girls, took the place by the window, facing forward, and settled down with a book to make the best of a hard journey on a stifling hot day. Her comfort was of brief duration. The schoolgirls came aboard and swamped her with themselves and their numerous traveling bags. They sprawled. They giggled their way along for the first half hour of the journey, and then one of them had an idea. She put a suitcase across their laps, took a pack of cards out of a large and most decorative vanity case, and then each of the girls produced a handful of coins and they began to gamble. The woman, wedged into the corner, was too astonished to give close attention to her book.

This first arrangement was not comfortable for the card players. The train lurched and a fifty-cent piece slid off the shiny patent-leather suitcase and rolled under the seat of the woman traveling alone. It was necessary for her to get up and step into the aisle before the coin could be recovered, and the girls suggested to her that if she took the aisle seat they could use the window sills as shelves on which to keep their money. The woman yielded. A few minutes later the little gamblers added still further to the comfort of their game by having the porter set up the table between the seats without consulting the third occupant of the section, whose space was thus further curtailed.

Selfish and Frivolous

SO THE game continued, garrulously, with occasional noisy explosive remarks about cheating. Finally there was a quarrel about the deal and the game ended. One of the girls curled up and went to sleep. The other tried to, but couldn't. She amused herself as long as possible with her rouge box and powder puff, but even that did not save her from becoming bored. She began to tickle the girl who was asleep and woke her up with an affectionate bite on the neck. The quarrel was forgotten and the older schoolgirl removed revolving dice from her necklace and the gambling was resumed with that. By and by the cards again.

And so on throughout the day of the two schoolgirls on a journey—cards, dice, money, rouge and powder, gum, naps, pouts, quarrels, make-believe slapping and scratching, then tickling to make up. Absolute selfishness and disregard so far as the comfort and rights of the third woman were concerned, and she had to stand it because the car was filled and there was no other seat in which she could find refuge. Needless to say the skirts of the two schoolgirls were of the shortest and their contortions to get into comfortable positions apparently shocked their fellow traveler more than the gambling.

Although they had started on the journey with ten hours of daylight riding ahead of them, the girls had neither book nor magazine nor newspaper; not a scrap of reading matter, not even a motion-picture magazine. They were not foreign girls. They were not of those who have to leave school too early to earn a living. They were the children apparently of well-to-do American parents.

These girls were not posing. They were not playing wild and showing off because they were on a journey by themselves. They were as natural and free from self-consciousness in their gambling, in their imposition on a fellow traveler, as in their gum chewing, and their behavior was a matter of course. It certainly suggested no former experiences in a schoolroom with the sort of teacher who could get her children earnestly excited over such a matter as Alexander Hamilton's attitude toward the Constitution.

Victims of Our School System

IT WOULD be absurdly unfair and unjust to hold any one teacher of those girls solely or even largely responsible for their conduct. No doubt their parents, their social and home influences were far more to blame. There is no point in attacking untrained and uncultivated teachers as individuals, for they constitute four-fifths of the entire teaching force of the United States. They themselves, as well as the millions of children under them, are the victims of the grave defects in our public-school system.

But—it's a fair question—if the teachers whom these two girls had had all along the line from primary grade had been what they should have been, if the atmosphere of their schools had been what it should have been, would not their education have served as enough of an offset against their natural tendencies and their home influences to have modified somewhat their selfishness and their general behavior on that train?

The answer to this question, the frank admission of the good teachers themselves throughout the country, who are striving now as never before to raise the standards of their own profession, is that the average quality of the teaching personnel as a whole is far below what it should be and must be and that the bulk of the twenty-five million children in American schools are consequently growing up to citizenship poorly equipped for it and sadly lacking in culture.

This teacher in New York who had become a sort of mother in learning to her pupils is of a type that is rare—rare in New York, rare in every state of the Union. Perhaps there are several thousands like her in the whole country. But there are seven hundred thousand public-school teachers all told. She is a graduate of both a normal school and college. But she is more than that. She has had years of experience in teaching; but that is only a part of her equipment. She has everything in the way of technical training that could be asked to conform to the highest standard set by any board of education in the United States. But she has something else, which cannot be gauged, or even discovered by the quantitative methods of measuring teacher capacity which, unfortunately, are the only methods so far available.

It was that something else to which the boy was unconsciously responding when he said "mother." And it is that something else which the country needs throughout its army of teachers.

It is the attribute of the "natural teacher." Wherever there is such a teacher there is a good school, no matter what its environments and its handicaps may be. Whether she has had technical training or not, she is a priceless possession for the community fortunate enough to have her.

The woman in charge of that New York school was a natural-born teacher and would have known how to give both inspiration and information if she never had been in that normal school or that college.

In Vermont I found another natural teacher who had had no normal training whatever. She was not even a high school graduate. She was the oldest child in a family of nine and at one time four of her pupils in the district school were her brothers and sisters. She could control them in school. It would be difficult to impose a severer test than that. After years of teaching she married a farmer, but kept right on teaching because she loved it, and used her school salary to hire a woman to do the work at home. Eventually two of her own children became her pupils. An entire generation of boys and girls has grown up in those Vermont hills, grateful to that woman for what she did for them.

Unmeasurable Ethics

AT THE recent state convention of the Parents-Teachers Association in North Carolina, E. C. Brooks, superintendent of public instruction in that state, said that more money was needed for schools and higher salaries for teachers, but that above all there was need of more character in the great national teaching body of the United States. To illustrate, he told the convention about three North Carolina teachers who had been away to take summer training courses at the university of another state. The marks which they received at that university were not high enough to qualify them for the advanced positions which they had hoped to get in the public schools of North Carolina. So they tampered with their certificates and raised their own marks. This was detected and the three were dismissed. Five hundred teachers have been dropped from the North Carolina pay rolls in a comparatively short time. All had been found unfit, and in most of the cases some defect of character was among the shortcomings. There is no state in the Union which does not have more or less of the same difficulty.

These matters of schoolroom ethics and manners, the character of teachers and their ability to help boys and girls to form character, are not capable of measurement and appraisal with results that may be set down in statistics and charts. They cannot be standardized and put into a formula as simple and tangible as the statement that every grade-school teacher in the United States should be a graduate of a high school and

THEY GIGGLED THEIR WAY ALONG FOR THE FIRST HALF HOUR OF THE JOURNEY, AND THEN ONE OF THEM HAD AN IDEA

(Continued on Page 65)

HAD formed a habit of choosing from the after-war Europe in which I live one woman of each country to individualize its new type of womanhood. But here in England I was puzzled. Women have cut with such a sharp edge into their old Victorian traditions that I could not find one sufficiently emphasized to make my choice representative until, one tinted autumn morning, I turned into a lane in Surrey.

Coming along full tilt on her bicycle was the picture, at least, of a typical English girl. At the bottom of the lane, where it narrowed to a single pass, she got off her bicycle, a rather weatherworn-looking one. The young man with her also dismounted from his and halted. So impressed was I with finding my "type" all in a flash, I was only subconscious of having seen her face several times before; or was it so representative of this new girlhood that association was playing me a trick?

A Pen Picture of Her

MY EYE fell quickly to the short tweed skirt, the hand-knit country stockings, the low-heeled brogues, the knit gloves. Her sweater was of a dull rich blue, and so was the cap that sat jauntily on her heavy golden hair, all on the tumble and spraying up fine wispy curls in the autumn mist. Her cheeks had a dew-washed freshness and her very blue eyes twinkled.

"Come along, David," she called over her shoulder to the young man, who nodded back and whistled to the wire-haired terrier practicing a jiu-jitsu in the heather scrub.

Her smile was the very counterpart of the young man's. Suddenly I recognized him, and I stepped back to let the Prince of Wales and his sister, Princess Mary, pass.

But the prince was all confusion. I never saw anyone blush rosier. He pushed back farther still, as did the princess and the wire-haired dog. We all—even the dog—laughed, for the lane turned into a sort of bottle-neck pass, and someone had to go first; so His Royal Dogginess, evidently a gay fellow with more savoir faire than any of us, took the lead, and I plunged after, turning the sharp end of the hill and leaving their merry Highnesses with just the echo of a girl's laugh and a young man's whistle to him of the wiry fur in my ears, while the vision of them was fast camouflaged into the purple heather that brilliantly stained the Surrey October landscape.

When Princess Mary's engagement to Viscount Lascelles was first announced those of us who had witnessed the romance between the guardsman and the princess were not oversuprised at her answer.

Viscount Lascelles—despite the fact that he commanded the Guards known as the "Die Hards" in some of the Great War's worst fighting at Ypres, where he led them on foot, that he had been twice wounded and yet returned again to the front, where he refused a staff appointment because he would not leave his men, and was wounded again—despite these evidences of a high kind of courage, was known as a curiously shy man with women. Owing to his own initiative and thrift in converting his lands into well-paying farms, he was one of the wealthiest peers in England, and so he was not overlooked altogether in the invitations of managing mammas with debutante daughters.

But the aloof, grim soldier seemed to have only one recreation—farming and still more farming. With this bent persisted a vision he had resolutely tried to put from him in the prewar days when, if a cat might look at a king, a commoner couldn't at the king's daughter, at least with a view to marriage. It was a strange, fairylike vision of a sort of real and yet make-believe little princess at Windsor Castle with golden hair and deep-blue eyes, who was standing before a big birthday cake with twelve candles, and plenty of royalty about to read officially their long good wishes to her, Princess Mary.

"Now who will blow the candles out?" asked the queen, probably with a mother's eye to the soon eligible German, Spanish, Swedish, Russian and other princes, in fact, all the family royal connections who were understood to be "likely."

The little princess looked over the royalties present in solemn review. She sighed, for she knew her lot was no different from that imposed on all the women of her caste who were expected to make dutiful marriages. She passed up and down the lines of embarrassed and also dutiful suitors, who were of course well drilled in the diplomatic importance of what a marriage with the King of England's daughter might mean. As she came almost to the last she was just about to shake her head, for she couldn't see a single one among the royal suitors whom she wished to have blow out her candles.

Then suddenly she looked up and, over their heads, she saw, standing away off near the door, a young man with a pair of wistful eyes and a smile brimming with all sorts of good wishes for her; and yet that smile was even more timid than her own, for even if young Viscount Lascelles had been asked to her party, he understood that his place was over there near the door, not in the front line of the royal cousins.

But the princess' smile met his. Eyes twinkled to eyes. "You, over there!" she cried. "I want you to blow out my birthday candles."

The Viscount in War

THE vision of the birthday princess always stayed with the young man, who went back to his farms. War came. The vision went down with him to the trenches. Three times it went with him to the hospital. It followed him back each time to the front and became a part of deeds of courage which won him the D. S. O. and bar and the French Croix de Guerre and which the Tommies still love to tell of "the devil-may-care lieutenant colonel"—that is, those of them who came back with the thin line of "Die Hards" from Maubeuge, which the young commander helped to take himself, fighting on foot with his troops. Then came peace. The smoke of battle, clearing away, showed the once formidable line of princes scattered to the four winds by war.

And now the vision changed. The you-there-blow-my-candles princess was grown up; she was ready to be married, and there was no royalty left to marry; and she had stamped her foot and said she would marry only the man she loved anyway.

So the farmer happened to come to Sandringham Castle, and he walked with her in the woods, and they gathered primroses, and he got up all the courage with which he once blew out her birthday candles and stammered, blushing and digging his boot into the mud: "Do you suppose the world has changed so much that a commoner could dare to think—just to think, mind—that a princess could care for him, even a bit, a teeny bit?"

"I've waited for you such a time, such a long time!" said the birthday princess.

As that answer reveals her true-hearted nature and as her friends have come to know Princess Mary, I don't believe I could have found a more typical girl of England's new womanhood. In the changing estates and exchanging classes of the present topsy-turvy England, she is a really valuable national asset; but I think, further, that in her universal qualities—among which are included the same qualities of simplicity and genuineness as characterize her brother, the Prince of Wales—she is typical of the ideal of all English-speaking girlhood.

(Continued on Page 138)

England's Only Princess Marries a Commoner

By CATHERINE VAN DYKE

AND LONG INTO THE NIGHT THE MAN WHO TWICE HAD ROBBED ME OF MY CHILD
SAT AT THE LONG TABLE STARING OUT BEFORE HIM, DRINKING GREAT DRAUGHTS AND SOMETIMES BEATING THE BOARDS WITH HIS BARE FISTS

Empty Arms

By ROLAND PERTWEE

Illustrations by E. F. Ward

THERE was a maroon wall paper in the dining room, abundantly decorated with sweeping curves unlike any known kind of vegetation. There were amber silk sashes to the Nottingham lace curtains at the huge bow window and an amber winding sheet was wrapped about the terra cotta pot in which a tired aspidistra bore forth a yearly leaf. Upon the Brussels carpet was a massive mahogany dining table, and facing the window a Georgian chiffonier, brass railed and surmounted by a convex mirror. The mantelpiece was draped in red serge, ball fringed. There were bronzes upon it and a marble clock, while above was an overmantel, columned and bemirrored, upon the shelves of which reposed sorrowful examples of Doulton ware and a pair of wrought-iron candlesticks. It was a room divorced from all sense of youth and live beings, sunless, grave, unlovely; an arid room that bore to the nostrils the taint and humor of the tomb.

From somewhere near the Edgware Road came the clatter of a late four-wheeler and the shake and rumble of an underground train. The curtains had been discreetly drawn, the gas turned off at the meter and an hour had passed since the creaking of the old lady's shoes and the jingle of the plate basket ascending the stairs had died away. A dim light from the street lamp outside percolated through the blinds and faintly illuminated the frame and canvas of a large picture hanging opposite the mantelpiece.

It was a beautiful picture, a piece of perfect painting—three figures in a simple curve of rocks, lit as it were by an afterglow of sunset. In the center was a little Madonna draped in blue and gold. Her elbows were tight to her sides and her upturned palms with their tender curving fingers were empty. It seemed almost as though they cradled someone who was not there. Her mouth was pulled down at the corners, as is a child's at the edge of tears, and in her eyes was a questing and bewildered look. To her right, leaning upon a slender staff, was the figure of St. John the Baptist, and upon his face also perplexity was written. A trick brush-work had given to his eyes a changing direction whereby at a certain angle you would say he was looking at the Madonna, and again that he was following the direction of her gaze out into unknown places. His lips were shaped to the utterance of such a word as "why" or "where." It seemed as though the two were in a partnership of sorrow or of search.

The third figure was of Saint Anne, standing a little behind and looking upward. A strange composition, oddly incomplete, giving an impression of sadness, of unrest and of loss irredeemable.

A clock was chiming the parts of an hour when the little Madonna stepped from the frame and tiptoed across the room. To her own reflection in the mirror opposite she shook her head in a sorrowful negative. She peeped into a cupboard and behind the draperies of the mantelpiece, but there was nothing there. She paused before an engraving of Raphael's Holy Family, murmured "Happy lady" and passed on.

ON A SMALL davenport table next to one of the two inexorable armchairs she found the old lady's workbasket. That was a great piece of good fortune, since nightly it was locked away with the tea, the stamps and other temptations that might persuade a soul to steal should opportunity allow.

In the many years of her dwelling in the house, but three times only had she found it unguarded. There are glorious possibilities in a workbasket. Once she had found wool there, not carded, but a hank of it, soft, white and most delicate to touch. To handle it had given her the queerest sensation. She had shut her eyes, and it had seemed to weave itself into the daintiest garments—very small, you understand, and with sleeves no longer than a middle finger. But it was a silly imagining, for not many days afterward, looking down from the canvas, she had seen the old lady, with her clicking ivory needles, knit the wool into an ugly pair of bed socks.

Quite a while she played in the basket that night. She liked the little pearl buttons in the pill box, and the safety pins were nice too. Kind and trustworthy pins they were to hide their points beneath smooth round shields. She felt it would be good to take some of them back in one of her empty hands and hide them in that little crevice of rock under the juniper tree.

It was the banging of a front door opposite and the sound of running footsteps that moved her to the window. She drew back the curtain and peeped out across the way. There were lights in an upstairs window and a shadow kept crossing and recrossing the blind. It was a nice shadow and wore a head-dress like her own except that it was more sticky out.

The hall, too, showed a light, and, looking up the street, she saw a maidservant, running very fast, disappear round the corner. After that there was silence for a long time. In the street no one moved; it was deserted, empty as the little Madonna's arms, and dark. A fine rain was falling, and there were no stars. The sound of distant traffic had died away. The last underground train had drilled its way through sulphurous tunnels to the sheds where engines sleep.

She could not tell what kept her waiting at the window; perhaps it was the moving shadow on the blind, perhaps a prescience, a sense of happenings near at hand, wonderful yet frightening. A thousand other times she had looked across the street in the dead of night, only to shake her head and steal back sorrowfully to her canvas. But to-night it was different; there was feeling of promise, as though the question that she ever asked with her eyes might at last be given an answer.

The front door opened a second time, and a man came out and, though he was quite young, he looked older than the world. He was shaking and very white; his hair was disordered and struggled across his brow. He wore no collar, but held the lapels of his coat across his throat with trembling fingers. Fearfully he looked up the street where the maid had gone, then stamped his foot on the paving stones and with his free hand rubbed his forehead and beat it with his knuckles.

"Oh, will he never come!" she heard him cry, and the words echoed through her as though they had been her own.

If it was a prayer he had uttered it was swiftly answered; for at the moment the maid and a bearded man came round the corner at a fast walk. The bearded man had a kind face and broad shoulders.

She did not hear what passed between them; but the bearded man seemed confident and comfortable and compelling, and presently he and the maid went into the house, while the other man leaned against the railings and stared out before him at a tiny star which had appeared in a crack between the driven clouds. Lonely and afraid he looked, and strangely like herself. The misery of him drew her irresistibly. Always before, she had shunned the people of every day, having no understanding of their pleasures or sorrows, seeing little meaning in their lives or deaths. But here was a mortal who was different, who was magnetic, and, almost without realizing, she passed out of the house, crossed the road and stood before him, the corners of her cloak draped across her arms.

HE DID not seem aware of her at once, and even when she spoke to him in Italian of the Renaissance he did not hear. So she spoke again and this time in English: "What is it?"

He started, rubbed his eyes, blinked at her and answered: "Hullo, who are you?"

"What is it?" she repeated. "Have you lost something?"

"Don't—don't!" he pleaded. "Don't even suggest such a thing, little lady."

"I won't. I only thought—and you looked so sad."

"Be all right directly. It's the waiting. Kind of you to stop and speak to me." His eyes strayed over the gold and blue of her cloak. "Been to a theater?" he asked.

She shook her head and looked up at him with a child's perplexity.

"A play?" he amended.

"I've no one to play with," she answered simply. "See!" And she held out her empty arms.

"What's wrong then?"

"I don't know." She seemed to dwell on the last word. "I only thought—perhaps you could tell me."

"Tell you what?"

"Help me to find it perhaps. It seemed as if you were looking, too; that's why I came."

"Looking?" he repeated. "I'm waiting; that's all."

"Me too. But it's such a long time, and I get no nearer."

"Nearer to what?"

"Finding."

"Something you lost?"

"I think so. Must be. I'll go back now."

He put out a hand to stop her. "Listen," he said. "It'll be hours before I shall know. I'm frightened to spend them alone. Be a friend, little lady, and bear me company. 'Tisn't fair to ask, but if you could stay a little."

"I'll stay," she said.

"And will you talk to me?"

"Yes."

"Tell me a story then—just as if I were a kid, a child. A man isn't much more these times."

At the word "child" her arms went out to him, but dropped to her sides again as he said "a man."

"Come under the porch, where the rain won't spoil your pretty silk. That's better. Now tell away."

They sat side by side, and she began to talk. He must have been listening for other sounds, or surely he would have been bewildered at the very beginning of what she told.

"It's hard to remember when one was alive, but I used to be—yes, hundreds of years ago. I lived—can't remember very well; there was a high wall all around, and a tower and a bell that rang for prayers—and long, long passages where we walked up and down to tell our beads. Outside were mountains with snow caps like the heads of the sisters, and it was cold as snow within, cold and pure as snow. I was sixteen years old and very unhappy. We did not know how to smile; that I learnt later and have forgotten since. There was the skull of a dead man upon the table where we sat to eat, that we might never forget to what favor we must come. There were no pretty rooms in that house."

"What would you call a pretty room?" he asked, for the last sentence was the first of which he was aware.

"I don't know," she answered. "I think a room with little beds, and wooden bars across the window, and a high fender would be a pretty room."

"We have been busy making such a room as that," he said. "There's a wall paper with pigs and chickens and huntsmen on it. But go on."

"There were iron bars to the window of my cell. He was very strong and tore them out with his hands as he stood up on the saddle of his horse. We rode into Florence as dawn broke, and the sun was an angry red; while we rode his arm was around me and my head upon his shoulder. He spoke in my ear and his voice trembled for love of me. We had thrown away the raiment of the sisterhood to which I had belonged, and as I lay across the saddle I was wrapped in a cloak as crimson as the sun."

"Been reading Tennyson, little lady?" asked the man.

She did not understand, and went on: "It was a palace to which he brought me, bright with gold, mosaic and fine hangings that dazzled my eyes after the gray they had been used to look upon. There were many servants and richly clad friends, who frightened me with their laughter and the boldness of their looks. On his shoulder he bore me into the great dining hall, where they sat awaiting us, and one and all they rose to their feet, leaping upon stools and tables with uplifted goblets and shouting toasts."

THE noise was greater than any I had heard before and set my heart a-beating like the clapper of the convent bell. But one only stayed in his chair, and his looks were heavy with anger. At him the rest pointed fingers and called on him derisively to pay the wager and be glad. Whereat he tugged from his belt a bag of gold which he flung at us as though with the will to injure. But he who held me caught the bag in his free hand, broke the sealed cord at the neck of it and scattered the coins in a golden rain among the servants.

"After this, he set me by his side at the board, gave me drink from a brimming goblet and quails cooked in honey from wild bees and silver dishes of nectarines and passion fruit. And presently by twos and threes the guests departed, singing and reeling as they went, and he and I were left alone. Alone," she repeated shuddering.

"Did you hear anything?" said the young man, raising his head. "A cry, a little cry? No? I can hear footsteps moving up and down. Doctors' boots always creak. There! Listen! It was nothing. What were you saying?"

(Continued on Page 38)

WE HAD THROWN AWAY THE RAIMENT OF THE SISTERHOOD TO WHICH I HAD BELONGED, AND AS I LAY ACROSS THE SADDLE I WAS WRAPPED IN A CLOAK AS CRIMSON AS THE SUN

"A WOMAN WHO WANTS A GREAT CAREER MUSTN'T EVER THINK OF MARRYING.
THAT WAS WHY I MADE UP MY MIND I WOULDN'T"

Babe Grows Up

By SOPHIE KERR

Illustrations by Henry Raleigh

SHE slipped, intensely cautious, downstairs and paused a moment in the hall to listen to the voices in the parlor. Virginia was saying: "I think it would be rather nice if you told her, Ted, she's so fond of you," and then came Doctor Warburton's voice, with that laughing note in it that always made her catch her breath and thrill with warm happiness: "All right; how about to-night?" But she did not imagine they were speaking about her. So she went on, stealthily, out to the side veranda, and then down the drive where Doctor Warburton's car was parked.

She was going to do a very wicked thing, and she wanted all the secrecy possible.

She was glad that she had on the dark-blue chiffon her mother had finally consented to buy as a substitute for the black one Babe had longed and teased for. Mother had said black was too old and had only shaken her head when she had told her that all the girls—well, Mary Jenkins and Clare Turnbull, at least—had black frocks. The compromise had been the dark blue, and she had chosen the darkest blue in the shop. It made her very inconspicuous in the shadows of the summer night.

But the doctor's car was standing partly in the light, so she must be quick. She felt of the sharp little penknife she held so tightly in her hand, and opened the longest, keenest blade. She would run to the car, stick the knife quickly, sharply, deep into one of the front tires, and then slip away again, back upstairs as she had come. "He'll not take Virginia very far to-night with a puncture like that," she thought exultantly.

Yet she paused. It was such a very wicked thing to do. Tires cost money, and Doctor Ted was not well off, just a young physician come to Hilltown within the year; perhaps he couldn't afford new tires. Perhaps he would have to give up his car and would get poor. She sighed at the thought, her quick and ignorant imagination pictured Doctor Ted threadbare, hungry, perhaps reduced to digging ditches or working on the railroad or something like that.

wasn't fair, just because Virginia was six years older, that she should have everything—high-heeled slippers with buckles, hair done up instead of a hateful braid, low-necked dresses, going to the Country Club dances and staying till all hours, silk sweaters, and—and the sole and exclusive attention of Doctor Ted.

Doctor Ted, the most beautiful, the most wonderful man in the world! Why, Virginia might never have met him if she, Babe, hadn't got the chicken pox and been hustled home from boarding school on account of it. And oh, he had been so kind, so sympathetic, and had beguiled the tedium of sick-room hours with such amazing tales of his college days!

And then she had had to go back to school, and when she came home again for vacation Virginia had appropriated him.

Virginia was a mean thing! A greedy! Always reminding Babe how young she was. Wouldn't even lend her one of her silk sweaters—and she had two. Nor her parasol with the long carved-ivory handle.

SO RAPT was she in the thoughts of her wrongs at Virginia's hands that she jumped when she heard her name called: "Babe—Babe, where are you?" though the voice was not Virginia's, but that of Doctor Ted himself. She dropped the penknife in panic and even more silently than she had come, as well as far more quickly, she slipped back to the vantage of the side veranda.

She tried to make her voice very careless as she answered: "Here I am—out here."

Steps came through the hall and Doctor Ted's long self-darkened the door. "Want to go for a little ride with me, down the Shell Road?" he asked.

Her heart leaped and pounded right up in her throat, it seemed, and she could hardly still it so that she could speak. "Why, yes; I guess so," she managed to stammer out.

"Get a coat then, and we'll go right along."

She flew upstairs in an exultant glory. Oh, wasn't it a blessed miracle that she hadn't stuck that knife in the tire! She seized her cape and ran down, shining, radiant.

At the foot of the stairs her mother's voice, coming from the library, made her pause. "Take your warm cape, Babe."

"I've got it, mother," she returned impatiently.

"Better wear your tam, too, or put a scarf over your head. You might catch cold."

"Oh, mother! I won't catch cold." Why couldn't they leave her alone, or trust her to do the simplest things without endless direction! Always treating her as if she were a child! She went back and picked up her tam, but stuffed it into her pocket. "All right; I've got it," she flung impatiently to the library door as she hurried out.

It was splendid to be rushing through the night in Doctor Ted's car, with its great yellow eyes making a path of radiance before them. She gave a little laugh of pleasure and cuddled down in the seat, wrapping the cape about her.

"It's just like a big tiger, running, running, running," she said. "A monster tiger, with shining eyes, and a bold wild voice, running, running, and yelling to people to get out of his way."

"You're a queer kid," commented Doctor Ted briefly.

She did not resent his calling her a kid, though from anyone else it would have been an insult. Still on principle she protested: "I'm not a kid. I'll be sixteen my next birthday, and mother says I can put my hair up then or have it bobbed, whichever I want."

"Which do you want?"

"To put it up; it makes you look so much older. Of course, it's sort of clever and arty to have it bobbed, but it's awfully youthful."

DOCTOR TED concealed a smile in the darkness. "I see," he said respectfully. "Well, I agree with you, Babe. It would be a shame to cut off that lovely hair of yours anyway."

Oh, he thought she had lovely hair! How sweet, how perfect! She reached a stealthy hand and pulled her long braid around so that it would lie against her neck and down her breast, a warm delight, to be held lovingly and cherished, since he liked it. She would never, never, never cut it off. Lovely hair! Lovely hair! Why, this was the most beautiful thing that had ever been said to her.

The tiger was leaping down the Shell Road now, devouring its long, curving whiteness impetuously. Above, a million stars sang in a dark sky, sang in tune with her heart. Oh, how happy she was, and again how thankful that she had not carried out her evil purpose of knifing the tiger's paw. This must be a lesson and a warning, she decided, never again to think of such terrible things to do.

Doctor Ted spoke again. "Babe, you like me, don't you?" His voice was wistful, questioning.

Oh, now she understood! He was going to tell her—ah, she rose and was one with the stars! She could not answer.

Not that he noticed, for he was going on. "I want you to like me, Babe, because it looks as if we were going to see a good bit of each other for the rest of our lives. I feel as if I owe it all to you, anyway, for if you hadn't been sick it might have been months before I met Virginia"—she was trying to comprehend, her lips parted—"but—but, thank heaven, she feels about it as I do, and so—you're going to have the chance to be a bridesmaid in a couple of months or so. And I'm going to pick out the nicest chap I know for your usher too."

SHE RAISED HER EYES AND GAVE HIM A LEVEL LOOK.
HIS LITTLE PAL! OF ALL THE FATUOUS WORDS!

He was babbling on about Virginia—Virginia! How dear and wonderful she was, how from the first moment —

And Babe was falling, falling, falling from the stars. She had a queer difficulty about getting her breath, but it was not the beating of her heart that stifled her now, but its leaden stillness, its weight. She wondered dimly if this were the way people felt when they died, for something within her was dying, dying hard, dying in agony, dying in pain and shame and hopelessness.

She could not have spoken now if worlds had depended on it, and at last Doctor Ted, in the middle of his rhapsody, noticed her silence.

"LOOK here, Babe," he said, checking the swiftness of the tiger, "you're not going back on me, are you? Why, I'd have sworn that you liked me; I want you to like me. You're just the kind of a little sister I've always wanted. I'm awfully fond of you, Babe. Of course I know that there isn't a man alive who's worthy of Virginia, and you couldn't have been her sister all these years without knowing it, too, but hang it—tell me, what funny little crotchet's got into your head against me? Come on, don't hold out on me. Why, you make me feel —"

He put his hand affectionately over hers. Five minutes ago she would have trembled with ecstasy at his touch; now it meant nothing, less than nothing. She was the most forlorn, forsaken, humiliated of beings, but oh, she mustn't, she mustn't let him see it!

"I'm just surprised; that's all," she said faintly.

Doctor Ted gave a chuckle. "Oh, well, I suppose you might be. I forgot you've only just got back from school, so you haven't seen the hours I've been putting in hanging round Virginia. Nobody else in the whole neighborhood is surprised though. She's kept me dancing, I can tell you. Well, now, if you've sufficiently recovered from your surprise won't you tell me it's all right, and that you're going to like your new brother a little bit?"

She rallied herself to meet this. "Oh, I do like you," she said. "Indeed I do."

"Then everything's all right," said Doctor Ted with blind heartiness. "And say, Babe, don't think that I'm going to forget that promise about a nice usher for you. I've got him all picked out right now. Virginia says —"

He was in further rhapsody about Virginia, a rhapsody which Babe presently interrupted. "Let's go home," she said. "I'm chilly."

The tiger obediently wheeled about and began his homeward leaping, a surprisingly docile tiger. Once more Doctor Ted took up the epic of his courtship, and Babe, thankful to sit in silence, gripped her hands together under her cape and looked up with hot, miserable eyes at the stars. They had been singing before; now they were mocking her. And as the car neared home they seemed to question: "How are you going to bear it? How are you going to bear it?" over and over again. And she had no answer.

She slipped upstairs to her room and flung herself on the bed in the darkness, careless of the treasured blue dress. Unconsciously she was copying in gesture and emotion a scene she had seen in the theater a few months before. Her voice took on the inflections of the voice of the actress who had wailed, softly, bitterly: "Among you, you have broken my heart!" Tears dripped through the fingers she held so close against her eyes. Another scrap of phrase, overheard from one of her mother's callers who was retailing a scrap of local gossip, slipped from the back of her mind into her pool of self-pity. "Young, of course," Mrs. Toombs had said; "but oh, my dear, that woman has lived!"

THEY would, perhaps, say that of her, Babe thought, as she moved about them in the dreary days to come, quiet, pale, with tragic eyes. As in a mirror she saw herself, a dramatic, impressive figure. She might even go into a decline; one of her great-aunts had done so, and the tale had become a family legend. And she would die, and flowers would be heaped over her, like—like Ophelia. More tears came at the vision of this hugely satisfactory end. Or perhaps Ophelia wasn't heaped with flowers, perhaps it was she scattered them when she went mad; oh, it was so hard to remember!

The door opened. "You in here, Babe?" asked a serene voice.

She sat up, wiping telltale eyes, stifling the break in her voice. "Yes, mother."

Mrs. Hayes snapped on the light. "Why, Babe, you foolish child," she said with instant concern, "I do believe you've been crying! You mustn't feel badly, dear. It isn't taking Virginia away from us; she'll be quite near. And Ted's really a very fine young man. I thought you liked him."

NO ONE WOULD KNOW BY HER APPEARANCE, SHE TOLD HERSELF, THAT SHE WAS A WOMAN WHOSE LIFE HAD BEEN BLASTED

The amazing blindness of mothers! To think that she, Babe, would waste a tear on the getting rid of Virginia with her privileges, her perquisites, her asserted authority as an elder sister!

Babe made no relevant answer. "I wish you wouldn't call me Babe," she remarked. "I've got a name of my own just as much as Virginia has. You don't call her Kid, or Wee-wee, or Tot or anything silly. But I get called Babe all the time."

(Continued on Page 44)

HER VOICE TOOK ON THE INFLECTIONS OF THE VOICE OF THE ACTRESS WHO HAD WAILED, SOFTLY, BITTERLY: "AMONG YOU, YOU HAVE BROKEN MY HEART!"

In Strange Company

By ALBERT PAYSON TERHUNE

Illustrations by Frank Stick

But Lad would not have it so. Barking with sheer delight in the excitement of meeting this savage-looking monster, he rushed merrily at the bear. His teeth were not bared. His hackles were not bristling. This was no fight, but a jolly game. Lad's dark eyes danced with fun. Midway of his charge he checked himself. Not through fear, but from utter astonishment. For his new acquaintance had done a nonquadrupedal thing. He had reared himself upon his hind legs and was standing there like a man, confronting the dog. He towered thus ever so high above Lad's head.

His short arms, with their saber-shaped claws, were outstretched toward Lad as if in humble supplication.

of the common. Catching up his rifle he made for the direction of the bark, running at top speed.

The bear put an end to the moment of hesitancy. Lunging forward, he raked at the crouching collie with one of his murderous claws in a gesture designed to gather the impudent dog into his death embrace.

Now, even from humans—except only the mistress and the master—Lad detested patting or handling of any kind. Whether he thought this maneuver of the bear's an uncouth form of caress or a menace, he moved back from it. Yet he did so with a leisurely motion, devoid of fear and expressive of a certain lofty contempt. Perhaps that is why he moved without his native caution. At all events, the tip of one of the sweeping claws grazed his ear, opening the big vein and hurting like the very mischief.

ON THE instant, Lad changed from a mischievous investigator to a deeply offended and angry dog. No longer in doubt as to bruin's intent, he slithered out of reach of the grasping arms with all the amazing speed of a wolf-descended collie of the best sort, and in practically the same fraction of a second he had flashed back to the attack.

Diving in under the other's surprisingly agile arms, he slashed the bear's stomach with one of his razorlike eyeteeth, then spun to one side and was out of reach. Down came the raging bear on all fours. Lurching forward, he flung his huge bulk at the dog. Lad flashed out of reach, but with less leeway than he would have expected. For bruin, for all his awkwardness, could move with bewildering speed. And as the bear turned Lad was at him again, nipping the hairy flank till his teeth met in its fat, and then diving, as before, under the lunging body of the foe.

IT WAS at this point the master hove in sight. He was just in time to see the flank bite and to see Lad dance out of reach of the furious counter. It was an interesting spectacle, there in the gray dawn and in the primeval forest's depths—this battle between a gallant dog and a ragingly angry bear. If the dog had been other than his own loved chum, the master might have stood there and watched its outcome. But he was enough of a woodsman to know there could, in all probability, be but one outcome to such a fight.

Lad weighed eighty pounds—an unusually heavy weight for a collie that carries no loose fat—and he was the most compactly powerful dog of his size the master had ever seen. Also, when he chose to exert them, Lad had the swiftness of a wildcat and the battling prowess of a tiger. Yet all this would scarce carry him to victory or even to a draw against a black bear several times heavier than himself and with the ability to rend with his claws as well as with his teeth. Once let Lad's foot slip, in charge or in elusive retreat, once let

(Continued on Page 73)

WHEN the car and the loaded equipment truck drew up at the door that golden October day, Lad understood. Lad always understood. This gear meant the annual fall camping trip in the back reaches of the Ramapo Mountains, some twenty-odd miles north of the Place—the fortnight of tent life, of shooting, of fishing, of bracingly chill nights and white-misted dawns and of drowsily happy camp-fire evenings. It meant all manner of adventure and fun for Lad.

Gleefully he took his place, by invitation, in the car's tonneau, amid a ruck of hand luggage, as the campward pilgrimage began. Ten miles farther on the equipment truck halted to take aboard a guide named Barret and his boy, and their old Irish setter. This setter had a quality, not uncommon with members of his grand breed—a trait which linked his career pathetically with that of a livery plug. He would hunt for anybody. He went through his day's work, in stubble or undergrowth, with the sad conscientiousness of an elderly bookkeeper.

Away from the main road and up a steadily rising byway that merged into an axle-snapping mountain track toiled the cars, at last coming to a wheezy and radiator-boiling halt at the foot of a rock summit so steep that no vehicle could breast it. In a cup at the summit of this mountain-top hillock was the camp site; its farther edge only a few yards above a little bass-populated spring lake. The luggage was hauled, gruntingly, up the steep; and camp was pitched. Then car and truck departed for civilization. And the two weeks of wilderness life set in.

FOR Lad they were weeks of gay and varied adventure. For example: Once, during a solitary ramble, before the humans had awakened in the morning, Lad caught an odd scent and followed it for a quarter mile down the mountain side. It waxed stronger and ranker. At last a turn around a high boulder brought him face to face with its source. And he found himself confronting a huge black bear.

The bear was busy looting a bee tree. He had scented Lad for as long a time as Lad had scented him. But he had eaten on, unperturbed. For he knew himself to be the match of any four dogs; especially if the dogs were unaccompanied by men. And a long autumn of food had dulled his temper.

As Lad rounded the boulder and came to a growling halt the bear raised his honey-smeared head, showed a yellowing fang from under one upcurled corner of his sticky lips and glowered evilly at the collie out of his reddening little eyes. Then he made as though to go on eating.

But there was nothing supplicating or even civil in the tiny red eyes that squinted ferociously down at the collie. Small wonder that Laddie halted his own galloping advance and stood doubtful.

The master a minute earlier had turned out of the blankets for his painfully icy morning plunge in the lakelet. The fanfare of barking a quarter mile below changed his intent. A true dog man knows his dog's bark—and its every shade of meaning—as well as though it were human speech. From the manner wherewith Lad had given tongue the master knew he had cornered or treed something quite out

AND NOW THE SIDE OF THE HILLOCK SHOWED OTHER SIGNS OF FOREST LIFE. UP THE STEEP SLOPE THUNDERED A SIX-POINT BUCK

"OH, FATHER!"—AND I FOUND I COULD NOT KEEP FROM CRYING—"HOW COULD YOU TREAT ME THIS WAY! HOW COULD YOU!"

IF YOU cannot get some idea of the way even the smallest things fit into a larger whole, the me is pretty sure to come when you are suddenly going to find yourself up against a collection of little things that you thought didn't matter at all, but that turn out too large for you to handle. And when anything gets so large for you to handle, it's turned over to somebody else, of course, and there goes the direction of your life right out of your own hands for a while, until you can get back some strength in your hands and some vision in your eyes.

I'm not sure what you call these little whirling dervishes that sweep things out of your hands. Maybe different people call them different things—fate, folly, luck, lessons. But I do know that at the time you usually think you have had nothing to do with it, that it's something thrust on you from the outside.

It's only afterwards that you see that these big things which come of our losing hold were all made up of little things you didn't believe needed attention.

Perhaps we have to be fitted into taking hold, fitted by all the strange things that come of letting go, or we'd never get our holding-on muscles strong enough.

SUPPOSE mothers hold on harder than anybody else in the world. I know when I was a little girl of seven my mother, whose hands were so light and thin, said: "See, dear, how easy it is to hold tight. Reach out whenever you need to hold." And in the weeks that followed, when I couldn't get to sleep at night because there was nobody any longer to reach out to, I used to wonder and wonder what my mother meant. Then one night, through my open door out in the hall where Anna used to sit until I slept, or she thought I did, I heard Ellen, the housemaid, say to Anna: "If she was only boy she'd have more hold on her father."

I don't know what Anna answered. Anna had been my mother's maid, and she stayed on and took care of me. But I know that as I lay there wondering what my mother had meant, it came to my little girl mind that perhaps she meant I was to hold on to my father. So I got up and tiptoed through the day nursery to father's room, and he wasn't there. It was dark and I didn't know what to do; all I knew was that I hadn't reached far enough, if he wasn't there.

So I went on to mother's room, where it wasn't warm and quiet any more, but all orderly and dreadfully still. And there I found father. He was bending over mother's big chair with his head on the back of it and he, too, was dreadfully still.

I was barefoot and he didn't hear me; and when I put my hand in his, his hand trembled and he said "Leila!" in a strange way. But Leila was my mother's name as well as mine.

"Father," I said, "I could learn to spin tops and fly kites, even if I am a girl."

Illustration by Florence Gardiner

I must have been almost sixteen when I first began to notice that he had stopped using that sentence about holding on, and that he listened when the visitationers talked of schools. If I had only known that that was the time for me to hold on harder than ever! The visitationers talked a little less to father and a little more to me about school. They showed me catalogues with girls riding horseback down over the pages and dancing with cadets and midshipmen; and they said I knew too few girls, that other girls' mothers wouldn't let them come to my house when it was so unchaperoned.

SO ONE day when father was looking at me a bit wistfully—the way he did when I looked like mother—he said a little sadly: "I wonder if I'm doing the best for you? Do you want to go away to school, Leila?"

I didn't think of anything much except the pictures of the girls dancing with cadets; I knew no boys my age; and so I said quite thoughtlessly: "It might be nice, father."

It wasn't until I was almost asleep that night that I thought of father's face when I said that. If he had been home I'd have got up and talked to him.

The next day the visitationers came, all excited about picking out a school for me before father changed his mind; and they rushed me into more excitements getting lovely clothes; they called it "clothes fitted for Benjamin Laughlin's daughter." It made Anna sniff. Anna had never said anything about my going away to school, but I knew she hoped I wouldn't go.

It wasn't at all bad with Anna sending me boxes of cakes and books and father's daily letter; that is, it wasn't bad until father's letters began to get fewer. When I wrote Anna about it, she said that father was hardly ever at home in the evenings now, and she supposed he hadn't time to write.

AND then, just two days before the Christmas vacation, on the afternoon we girls went to the little town near school to reserve our chair seats home, I bought an evening paper. And there in big headlines was: Benjamin F. Laughlin Crowns a Romance of His Youth by Marriage.

